DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

U.S.: Courts No Longer Open To Detainees (AP) ... 3
Opinions Vary On Constitutionality Of Tribunal Compromise Law (MCT) ... 4
Lawyer Convicted In Terror Case Lied On The Stand, A Juror Says (NYT) ... 5
Enemy Of The State: Kurdish Man Imprisoned By Taliban And U.S. (AP) ... 7
The FBI's Un-intelligence (TOLB) ... 8

Homeland Response:

Man, 20, Arrested In Stadium Threat Hoax (NYT) ... 9
Wisconsin Man Charged In Terror Hoax (WT) ... 9
FBI Removes Dead Man From Terror List (AP-Y) ... 10
Ground Zero Forensic Team Is Posted To Seek Remains (NYT) 10
Fire On The Water (NYT) ... 11
Louisiana Pays Part Of FEMA Bill And Sues On Rest (NYT/AP) 11
Storming Capitol Hill To Help Louisiana (LAT) ... 12

War News:

Bush, Rumsfeld Defend Strategy (WP) ... 14
Militias Battle For Iraqi City As Shiite Rivalry Escalates (NYT) ... 15
Bush Open To Shift In Iraq War 'Tactics' (LAT) ... 17
Pressure Builds For Policy Shift, But Bush Shows No Signs Of Budging (MCT) ... 18
Bush: I Won't Change Strategy In Iraq (AP) ... 20
Bush Sees Support Ebb Away For Military Strategy In Iraq (FT) 21
Amara Violence Increases Strains On Unified Iraq Idea (Update1) (BLOOM) ... 21
An Old Bush Hand Takes On A New Role On The Iraq War (NYT) ... 23
Bush Pins Label Of 'Defeat' Party On Democrats (WT) ... 24
Hutchison: WMD Info Swayed Vote On Iraq (AP) ... 25
Allen Faces Questions On Iraq War Stance (AP) ... 26
Rumsfeld: Iraq Must Take Over Security (AP) ... 26
Rumsfeld: Iraq Must Stand Up 'Sooner' (WT/UPI) ... 27
Exit Vibrations (WT) ... 27
Sadr Militia Briefly Seizes Southern City (WP) ... 28
Siege Of Amarah Reflects Trouble In Baghdad (LAT) ... 29
Shiite Militias Attack Iraqi Government Forces In Amara (MCT) ... 31
Amara Unrest Strains Plans For Unified Iraq (FT) ... 31
Shiite Militia Briefly Seizes Iraqi City (AP-Y) ... 32
Many Iraqis Look To Gunmen As Protectors (NYT) ... 33
Iraq's Religious Figures Issue Edicts (AP) ... 35
Islamic Clerics Decree A Halt To Sectarian Bloodshed (WT) ... 36
U.N.: 914,000 Have Fled Homes In Iraq (AP-Y) ... 37
914,000 Iraqis Displaced By War, U.N. Says (LAT/AP) ... 38
U.N. Says Iraq Seals Data On The Civilian Toll (NYT) ... 38
Republicans Call CNN Tape 'Enemy Propaganda' (LAT) ... 39
Plea Deal Reported In Iraqi Murder Case (AP) ... 40
Marine To Plead Guilty In Killing Of Iraqi Man (LAT) ... 40
Officer Awaits Fate In Abu Ghraib Case (AP) ... 41
Gunmen Execute 8 Afghan Laborers (LAT/AP) ... 41
Total Says Executive Questioned Over Iraq Oil Deals Is Innocent (NYT) ... 42
Total Chief Charged In Oil-for-food Scandal (FT) ... 42
The Real 'New Iraq' (WP) ... 43
Bush Exploited Americans' Urge For Safety (AJC) ... 44

DOJ:

U.S. Prosecutors Honored (BSUN) ... 45

Corporate Scandals:

Ouster Of UnitedHealth CEO Rachets Up Stock Options Scandal (AP) ... 45
Ruling On Convictions Could Help Skilling (BLOOM) ... 46
SKILLING MAY GET 20 YEARS IN PRISON (NYPOST) ... 47
Feinstein Asks Justice To Appeal Ruling Vacating Lay Conviction (FRESBEE) ... 47
Senator Wants Justice Department To Appeal Lay Decision (HC) ... 48
Grasso Braces For Long Battle Over Pay Ruling (WSJ) ... 48

Criminal Law:

Foley Case A Test For Ethics Panel (WP) ... 49
Priest Named By Foley Is Barred From All Religious Duties (NYT) ... 51
Just A Quiet Retiree Leading Mass In Malta (NYT) ... 51
After 3 Attempts To Convict Gotti, Prosecutors Decide Against Making It 4 (NYT) ... 52
Federal Prosecutors Decline To Pursue Fourth Racketeering Case Against Junior Gotti (AP) ... 52
We Give Up On Jr., Say Feds (NYDN) ... 53
Junior Gotti Won't Face Retrial (NSDY) ... 54
GIDDY GOTTI JR. DEFEATS THE FEDS (NYPOST) ... 54
Mr. Gotti, You're Free To Go (STNIA) ... 55

`Junior' Gotti Kidnap Case Is Dismissed By U.S. (Update2) (BLOOM) ... 56
Exclusive: Feds Probe A Top Democrat's Relationship With AIPAC (TIME) ... 57
Rep. Harman Reportedly Under Investigation (WT) ... 58
Abramoff To Do Time In Cumberland, Md (NBC) ... 58
TAX BREAK: Legislator Lobbied Him On Behalf Of Marlow, Borough Mayor Says. (ADN) ... 59
FBI Said To Be Investigating Ex-official (APP) ... 61
Video: FBI Examines Records At West Warwick Town Hall (WJAR-TV) ... 62
FBI Grabs Montalbano Records In W.W. (PAWTIMES) ... 63
The Secret Life Of An Informant (WSJ) ... 63
Columnist Settles Education Dept. Case (AP) ... 67
Glenview Man Linked To Cop Killing In Poland (CHIT) ... 67
FBI Arrests Businessman Wanted In Poland Over 1998 Police Official Slaying (AP) ... 69
YouTube Shared User Data With Studio Lawyers (MRKTWTCH) 70
Former Youth Pastor Faces Child Porn Charges (SLPD) ... 71
Federal $$ To Help Purchase Bulletproof Vests For NYPD (STNIA) ... 71
Off-label Drug Marketing: Missing The Mark (MERCN) ... 72

Civil Law:

Naval Shipyard Kickback Suit Settled For $4.2M (DPHR) ... 73
Tentative Settlement Reached In Va. Jet-noise Case (NAVYT) . 74
Feds Getting Tough On Utah Bankruptcy Fraud (SLT) ... 75
Response Rates To FOIA Requests Improve (FEDT) ... 76

Civil Rights:

Calif. Candidate's Office, Home Raided (AP) ... 76
Nguyen's Campaign Office Raided (OCR) ... 77
State Police Raid Home Of California Congressional Candidate (MCT) ... 78
Raids Widen 'Immigrant' Letter Probe (LAT) ... 79
California: Offices Searched Over Letters (NYT) ... 81
Discrimination Claims Hurt Business Even If False (TSSC) ... 81
Nevada: Street Solicitation (NYT) ... 82
FBI: No Hate Crimes Recorded In Alabama In 2005 (MR) ... 82
U.S. Asked To Watch Election In Chesterfield (RTD) ... 83
Citing Minority Voting Concerns, ACLU Seeks U.S. Poll Observers (AP) ... 84
Arizona May Use Voter-ID Law, High Court Says (WP) ... 84
Supreme Court Allows Arizona To Use New Voter-ID Procedure (NYT) ... 85
Court: Ariz. Can Seek Photo ID For Vote (AP-Y) ... 85
High Court Allows Arizona To Enact New Voter ID Law (LAT) ... 86

Antitrust:

Groups Balk Over Buyout (AP) ... 87
AT&T To Fight Calls To Jettison Airwaves (BLOOM) ... 87
Judge: Petco Vote Can Go Ahead (SDUT) ... 88
Regions, AmSouth Merger Wins Fed Approval (HT) ... 88
Ripplewood Ponders Bid For Delphi (WSJ) ... 89
Tops Sale Of Stores To Rival Defended (CLPD) ... 89
States Battle Weyerhaeuser Argument (OREG) ... 90
Feds Accuse Avaya In Antitrust Lawsuit (AP) ... 92
Update: Vista Security Discussions Off To Bad Start (IDG) ... 92
Microsoft Partners Fume Over Vista Security Stance (AP) ... 93
Gartner: Vista Antitrust Tweaks To Take Years (CNET) ... 94

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Sunny Side Up (NYT) ... 95
Future Forecast: Extreme Weather (WP/AP) ... 96
The Population Boon (WSJ) ... 97
Court Limits U.S. Authority At Casinos (AP-Y) ... 98

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Plead Guilty To Gun Trafficking Charges (KNOXNS) ... 98

Congress-Administration:

Limits On Aide In Leak Case Are Protested By Democrat (NYT) 99
Suspecting Leak, Chairman Suspends Panel Staffer (WP) ... 100
Democratic Aide's Access To Intelligence Is Cut Off (LAT) ... 101
Democrats Back Staffer Suspended Over Iraq Leak (WT/AP) . 102
Bush Urges GOP On Medicare Drug Benefit (AP-Y) ... 103
Michael Gerson Mr. Compassionate Conservatism (WSJ) ... 104
The Woman Who Would Be Speaker (WP) ... 106
Madam Speaker? Pelosi Likes The Sound (LAT) ... 108
Rank Would Guide Pelosi As She Chose Chairmen (WP) ... 110
At Play In The Realm Of Political Animals (NYT) ... 111
U.S. Treasury's Paulson Sells New York Condo For $8 Million (BLOOM) ... 113
Flexing Our Muscles In Space (NYT) ... 114
Farm Insurance Racket (WP) ... 114

Other News:

Dow Closes Out Week Riding Crest Of 12,000 (WP/AP) ... 115
Blue Chips Pause For Oxygen At 12000 Level (WSJ) ... 116
U.S. Stocks Rise As Google, 3M Beat Profit Estimates, Oil Falls (BLOOM) ... 116
Oil Tumbles Below $57 On Skepticism OPEC Will Make Output Cuts (BLOOM) ... 118
Oil Prices Drop Despite OPEC Call To Cut Output (WP) ... 119
Texas Justice Who Spoke For Bush Pick Is Cleared (NYT) ... 120
No Reprimand In Judge's Support Of Miers (AP-Y) ... 121
Bush Drops In At Italian-American Dinner (AP-Y) ... 121
Ads Accuse Dems Of Not Protecting Kids (AP-Y) ... 122
Helping Democrats Bridge The 'God Gap' (WP) ... 123
Politics Why The Center Matters In This Election (WSJ) ... 124
McCain Tries To Trump Republican Woes (WSJ) ... 125
In Debate, Clinton Deflects Questions About 2008 (NYT) ... 126
Clinton, Spencer Hold Debate In New York (AP-Y) ... 127
Focusing On Opinions, Slipping On Some Facts (NYT) ... 128
Elizabeth Edwards Apologizes To Clinton (AP-Y) ... 129
Lieberman Gets A Boost From A Republican And A Lift From A Recent Survey (NYT) ... 130
Senate Candidate Confronts Opponent (AP-Y) ... 131
Playboy And Pastors Enlisted For Attack Adverts (FT) ... 131
Allen, Webb Are Not Spotlighting Their Positions On Immigration (WP) ... 132
Wilder Advises Webb To Make Stance Clear (WT) ... 133
Open Seats Lift Democratic Hopes In The House (NYT) ... 134

DOJ_NMG_0084188

In A G.O.P. Stronghold, 3 Districts In Indiana Are Now Battlegrounds (NYT) ... 136
Working Families Party's Aim: Putting Democrats In Congress (NYT) ... 137
The Political Season Has Gone Sordid (LAT) ... 138
Ehrlich, O'Malley Focus On Turnout As Election Nears (WP) ... 139
Anti-O'Malley Ad Shows Baltimore In A Grim Light (WP) ... 141
Computer Voting Disks Likely Made For Testers (WP) ... 141
Angelides Urges Gov. To Release Tapes (LAT) ... 142
Schwarzenegger Story Gets Another Rewrite (LAT) ... 143
Boo!? An Inevitable October Surprise (WP) ... 147
Obama's Project Runway (NYT) ... 148
The Decline Of Political Competition (LAT) ... 148
U.S. And China Call For North Korea To Rejoin Talks (NYT) ... 149
China Gave 'Strong Message' To North Koreans, Rice Says (WP) ... 150
China Urges North Korea To Return To Negotiations (MCT) ... 152
China Takes Tough Stance On North Korea (AP-Y) ... 153
U.S. Finds Allies Are Reluctant To Enforce North Korea Sanctions (WSJ) ... 154
Asia Goal Proving Elusive For Rice (LAT) ... 155
China Wrests N. Korean Pledge (WT) ... 155
N. Korea Threat Lies In Nuclear Sales (LAT) ... 156
Amid Nuclear Crisis, Sun May Be Setting On `sunshine Policy' (MCT) ... 158
U.N. Reports On Genetic Concentration Camps (WT) ... 159
U.S.: China Must Address Trade Disputes (AP-Y) ... 160
China's Milestone, Our Millstone (NYT) ... 160
Iran's Leader Warns West On Support For Israel (NYT) ... 161
Israel Accuses Iran Of Blocking Release (AP) ... 162
Israeli War Plan Had No Exit Strategy (WP) ... 162
Muslims Flood Streets Of Jerusalem For Ramadan (NYT) ... 165
Residents Shut Out Of West Bank (LAT) ... 166
U.S. Courts Hamas Rival (WT) ... 167
A Liberal Brother At Odds With The Muslim Brotherhood (NYT) 168
Scrambling To Save Trade Perks (LAT) ... 169
EU Urges Putin To Honour Oil Contracts (FT) ... 171
Putin Ducks EU Demands On Energy Charter (AP) ... 172
Aftermath Of A Murder (WP) ... 173
'Enemy' Schoolchildren In Moscow (WP) ... 173

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S.: Courts No Longer Open To Detainees (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo
AP, October 21, 2006

Hundreds of detainees received notice from the Justice Department this week that because of a new law signed by President Bush, the U.S. court system is no longer open to them. Now it will be up to a federal appeals court, and ultimately the Supreme Court, to decide the fate of prisoners who have spent years arguing the government is illegally holding them at overseas military bases.

A prisoner's right to challenge his detention is one of the basic tenets of the Constitution — a right known as habeas corpus. Under the law signed Tuesday, however, the courts no longer have authority over such petitions in cases involving "enemy combatants."

The law gives the military the authority to decide whether to charge prisoners before special commissions or, if necessary, hold them indefinitely.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Friday that the new law gives more access to appeals "than has ever been available to any enemy combatant in the past."

But the habeas corpus exemption has drawn criticism from lawyers, civil rights groups and even members of Bush's own party, such as Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"Habeas protects against the executive taking a person and locking them up without a chance to prove their innocence," said Jonathan Hafetz, who handles many detainee cases for the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law. "Habeas is what stands between us and a system of secret detentions, a police state."

The Justice Department filed notices with several federal judges Wednesday, telling them the law renders detainee cases in their courts moot.

The judges probably will not rule on that issue, however, until an appeals court decides how to handle the law. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which was considering two detainee cases, ordered lawyers to make their case for what should happen next.

DOJ_NMG_0084189

Bush cited the victims of the 2001 terrorist attacks when he signed the bill. He said the law allows the nation to bring to trial such detainees as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the accused mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, and Ramzi Binalshibh, an alleged would-be hijacker.

The law was passed in response to a Supreme Court ruling in June that the Bush administration's original plan for military tribunals violated U.S. and international law.

"The judiciary has provided guidance, and the president acted on it with bipartisan support," said Glenn Sulmasy, a law professor at the U.S. Coast Guard Academy and an early supporter of creating new courts to try terror suspects.

"It will be difficult for the court to attack what's going on and intervene in what's really warfare. It would be a broad step by the judicial branch," Sulmasy said.

The three-member appeals court ordered a month of briefs on the law, which means a ruling will not come before late November or December, well after the Nov. 7 elections.

___

Associated Press writer Lara Jakes Jordan contributed to this report.

Opinions Vary On Constitutionality Of Tribunal Compromise Law (MCT)

By James Rosen

McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - For weeks, as he and other senators held up President Bush's proposal for trying terrorism suspects, Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., said the Supreme Court would reject Bush's measure.

Now, after joining the president at the White House for the bill-signing ceremony, Graham is predicting that the high court will accept the compromise law produced by weeks of high-stakes negotiations.

Graham, a military lawyer who serves in the Air Force Reserve, already has counted heads on the Supreme Court.

"I think this could be 7-2" to uphold the new law, Graham said Thursday in an interview. "I think the court is going to find that the military commissions Congress has authorized are compliant with Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, and that they afford due process of a civilized nation."

"Everything we've done is consistent with the law of armed conflict, and the detainees have more rights than any other enemy prisoners have had in any other war," Graham said.

Legal scholars' opinions vary.

The tribunals law "unconstitutionally suspends the writ of habeas corpus, and it denies any noncitizen held anywhere in the world his fundamental right to contest the lawfulness of his detention by the United States," said Jonathan Hafetz, who represents a detainee as associate counsel at New York University's Brennan Center for Justice.

"It defines `enemy combatant' in overly broad terms that exceed what the Constitution allows," Hafetz said.

Habeas corpus affords those accused of crimes access to court to respond to the charges against them. The Founding Fathers wrote it into the Constitution, preceding the Bill of Rights, which was added later as its first 10 amendments.

Randy Barnett, a constitutional law professor at Georgetown University, expressed confidence that the new law will pass Supreme Court muster, however.

"Most of the Supreme Court's focus (in post-Sept. 11 detainee cases) has been about the failure of the Bush administration to get congressional authorization for what it was doing," Barnett said. "Now the administration has such authorization. The odds of the Supreme Court saying that what Congress did was unconstitutional are extremely remote."

No matter where they stand on habeas or the other substantive issues that the controversial law raises, legal experts of all stripes agree that it will end up before the Supreme Court.

According to legal scholars, much of the coming struggle over the tribunals law will focus on its stripping habeas rights from about 400 terrorism suspects, most of them detained at the U.S. military base in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

The high court probably also will examine the law's definition of "enemy combatant" and explore whether it meets the U.S. government's obligations under the Geneva Conventions.

In large measure, as the government continues to adapt laws and procedures to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the 2006 Military Commissions Act is Congress' answer to two key high-court rulings since the tragedy:

- In a June 2004 ruling on Rasul v. Bush, the justices said U.S. courts - not the military commissions - have the ultimate say in determining whether noncitizens captured overseas and held at Guantanamo Bay have been detained legally.

- In its June 2006 decision in the Hamdan v. Rumsfeld case, the court ruled that Bush had exceeded his presidential authority by creating, without congressional action, a system of military commissions to try the detainees.

DOJ_NMG_0084190

On Sept. 8, almost three months after the Hamdan ruling, Bush sent Congress a proposal for interrogating the detainees and trying them before military tribunals. Almost immediately, Graham and two fellow Republican senators - John McCain of Arizona and John Warner of Virginia - criticized several of its main provisions, and others soon joined them.

Over the next month, White House lawyers led by National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley engaged in fevered talks with the three senators. When they reached a compromise, all said they'd found common ground on the legal issues at stake.

The administration gave more ground on how the military commissions will work and how the trials will run, while the three senators yielded more on the controversial interrogation techniques, said John Radsan, who served as the CIA's assistant general counsel from 2002 to 2004 and now runs the National Security Forum at the William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul, Minn.

The law spells out nine "grave breaches" of Geneva Convention protections and prohibits "cruel, inhumane or degrading" treatment of detainees, Radsan said. It retains "gray areas" in weighing which interrogation procedures are legal.

"I don't know what Graham, McCain and Warner agreed to in that room with Hadley, and I don't think the American people know," Radsan said. "A lot of what was decided stayed in that room between Hadley and those three senators. We want to have some check on the CIA. This is being done in our name."

Graham said the law provided more than enough guidance for CIA interrogations. And he said it protected detainees' rights by allowing them to appeal the U.S. military's classification of them as "enemy combatants" to the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Washington.

Graham, though, also said the law properly dismissed hundreds of lawsuits already brought by detainees with a broad range of grievances over their confinement.

"Every detainee will have their day in court, and the court can determine whether the government properly defined them as an enemy combatant," Graham said. "But they can no longer sue the government for better exercise, mail delivery, medical malpractice."

Despite his confidence that the Supreme Court will uphold the law, Graham said he was far from cocky.

"If I'm wrong, I will take the floor of the Senate and humbly say I was wrong," he said.

Legal scholars who've combed through the 38-page Military Commissions Act of 2006 say the forthcoming court struggle over it probably will focus on three sections:

-Near its start, it defines "unlawful enemy combatant" as "a person who has purposefully and materially supported hostilities against the United States ... including a person who is part of the Taliban, al-Qaida or associated forces." Critics say this definition is too broad and permits the indefinite detention of those who express their intense dislike of the United States but aren't terrorists.

-While the law affirms U.S. adherence to the Geneva Conventions elsewhere, a clause near the ends troubles critics. "No person may invoke the Geneva Conventions or any protocols thereto ... as a source of rights in any court of the United States or its states or territories," it says. Some scholars say the clause appears to prevent the prosecution of interrogators or other American officials for breaking U.S. laws that codify international war-crimes standards and make them part of the American justice system.

-In perhaps the most contentious issue, the measure amends federal civil law by stripping noncitizens of their habeas-corpus rights to appeal their detentions to U.S. courts outside the military. The clause reads: "No court, justice or judge shall have jurisdiction to hear or consider an application for a writ of habeas corpus filed by or on behalf of an alien detained by the United States who has been determined by the United States to have been properly detained as an enemy combatant or is awaiting such determination."

Lawyer Convicted In Terror Case Lied On The Stand, A Juror Says (NYT)

By Julia Preston

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

He was known as Juror 8, for the jury box chair where he listened silently for more than six months as the convoluted evidence unfolded in the trial of Lynne F. Stewart, the radical defense lawyer accused of aiding Islamic terrorism.

The jurors argued behind closed doors in Federal District Court in Manhattan for another month before they finally agreed to convict Ms. Stewart on all five charges she faced for smuggling messages out of prison from her terrorist client, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman.

“We found what jurors called the smoking gun,” Juror 8 said in an interview. “Lynne Stewart knew full well that violence was going to be committed,” he said, after she publicized the sheik’s words. He said the jurors also concluded that she had lied in her testimony.

DOJ_NMG_0084191

So on Monday, 20 months after the verdict, Juror 8 kept his eye on the television, waiting for news of her sentence. When he heard that Judge John G. Koeltl had reduced the 30 years sought by the government to 28 months in prison, Juror 8 said he was first disbelieving, then "vastly disappointed."

He said the light sentence obscured facts the jurors had painstakingly linked together that tied Ms. Stewart to terrorism. He believes only the jurors understood their meaning in the complex case.

He does not speak for all the jurors. Because of the serious terrorism charges, they served anonymously, and the names of the eight women and four men were known to only one court administrator. One other, a woman known as Juror 9, made her views known this week. "I am glad that the sentence was as short as it was, but sorry that she was sentenced to any time at all," Juror 9 said in a statement issued by her lawyer, Steven Masef.

"The right thing for the judge to have done," she said, "was to have overturned the jury verdict and thrown the whole case out."

Although she voted to convict, Juror 9 wrote a letter to Judge Koeltl in March 2005 saying she had done it "as a result of the fear and intimidation I was made to feel for my life" in the jury room. The judge ruled that her objections were not sufficient to overturn the verdict. Juror 8 said that Juror 9 was one of two jurors who held out for acquittal long into the deliberations.

Juror 8 still does not want his name published, saying he continues to have moments of fear because of his vote to convict Ms. Stewart. He is a research scientist in his early 60's who holds an advanced academic degree from a prominent East Coast university and lives in Manhattan.

He came forward for an interview armed with trial exhibit numbers and typewritten notes, giving the most detailed look to date inside the jury's grueling, often angry deliberations. He said he wanted to counter his dismay about the sentence by leaving a public record about the jury's findings.

The jurors' mining of the evidence, he said, convinced them that Ms. Stewart was aware that one militant from Abdel Rahman's organization in Egypt, the Islamic Group, planned to foment terror attacks using a message from the sheik that Ms. Stewart released. The sheik, a blind Islamic cleric from Egypt, is serving a life sentence for his role in a 1993 plot to bomb New York City landmarks.

Juror 8 said the militant, Rifai Taha, a fugitive convicted terrorist, emerged as a major and very chilling figure in the trial. Prosecutors showed a videotape of Mr. Taha sitting with Osama bin Laden somewhere in Afghanistan before the Sept. 11 attacks, calling for violence against Americans.

One message that Ms. Stewart carried into prison on a visit to the sheik in May 2000, violating special restrictions, was from Mr. Taha. He sought guidance about a cease-fire the sheik's followers were observing in Egypt, which Mr. Taha was chafing to cancel.

Ms. Stewart testified that she was not aware of Mr. Taha's violent history or his efforts to spur a new campaign of attacks against Egypt's government.

But according to Juror 8, the jury found clear evidence among the stacks of prosecution documents and wiretap transcripts that she did know of Mr. Taha's extremist violence as early as 1998.

"There's the belief that she didn't know who Taha was, that she didn't think anything bad would happen," Juror 8 said. "I want to state very emphatically: that is a complete lie."

Even more persuasive to the jury, Juror 8 contended, was the evidence about the chain of events after Ms. Stewart called a reporter in Egypt with the sheik's response to Mr. Taha, in which he said he no longer supported the cease-fire.

The sheik's new position provoked a furor in Egypt. According to evidence the jurors examined, Juror 8 said, several of his supporters warned in public comments and letters sent to Ms. Stewart that his words could prompt violence. But a week later Ms. Stewart issued a second press release in which the sheik once again criticized the cease-fire.

Juror 8 said the jurors found that Mr. Taha had used the sheik's words to recruit at least one Egyptian militant to start plotting an attack.

"She smuggled Taha's message in," Juror 8 said. "She smuggled Rahman's reply out. She was told that violence would occur, and she had a second press conference to reinforce the first. No person who was opposed to violence would conduct themselves in that manner."

Ultimately, the cease-fire was not canceled.

Juror 8 said he was offended after the Feb. 10, 2005, verdict when Ms. Stewart said that the jurors had been influenced by post-Sept. 11 fears of terrorism. "It wasn't politics, it was her actions," he said. "The jury did not speculate. We dealt with the evidence."

It is not uncommon for jurors, who have no say in sentencing, to disagree with a judge's decision. In court on Monday, Judge Koeltl cited laws requiring him to consider other factors besides the guilty verdict, such as Ms. Stewart's past work and the possibility that she would repeat her crime.

DOJ_NMG_0084192

While the judge found that Ms. Stewart, who is 67, had engaged in "extraordinarily severe" criminal conduct that "plainly went beyond any reasonable bounds of zealous advocacy," he also considered her long career defending unpopular clients, her recent bout with cancer and her disbarment. He allowed her to remain free on bail while she pursues her appeal.

Juror 8 said he gained respect for Judge Koeltl during the trial. "He's a very logical man," he said. "I'm sure he was led logically to that sentence." The judge was appointed to the bench in 1994 by President Clinton.

The juror insisted that the looming figure of Mr. bin Laden had no impact on the jurors, who were repeatedly instructed he had no role in the case.

"The judge told me he had no part, so he had no part," Juror 8 said. "And 11 other people agreed. We did not go off reservation."

He said he was distressed by the sight of Ms. Stewart celebrating on Monday with cheering supporters outside the courthouse. "The end of this process," he said, "is a person who committed very serious crimes out on the street smiling with bouquets of roses."

Enemy Of The State: Kurdish Man Imprisoned By Taliban And U.S. (AP)

By Michael J. Sniffen, Associated Press

AP, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON – Abdul Rahim insists he's an apolitical student who fled a strict father. But he's fallen into a black hole in the war on terror in which first the Taliban and then the United States imprisoned him as an enemy of the state.

Arrested by the Taliban in Afghanistan in January 2000, Rahim says al-Qaeda leaders burned him with cigarettes, smashed his right hand, deprived him of sleep, nearly drowned him and hanged him from the ceiling until he "confessed" to spying for the United States.

U.S. forces took the young Kurd from Syria into custody in January 2002 after the Taliban fled his prison. Accusing him of being an al-Qaeda terrorist, U.S. interrogators deprived him of sleep, threatened him with police dogs and kept him in stress positions for hours, he says. He's been held ever since as an enemy combatant.

Rahim's story is one of several emerging from the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay as defense lawyers make bids to free their clients while the Bush administration tries to use a new law to lock them out of federal courts.

After the Supreme Court overturned President Bush's plans for commissions to try detainees, Bush obtained a new law from Congress barring federal courts from hearing appeals for release by any alien "properly detained as an enemy combatant." The Justice Department told district and appellate judges this week they no longer have jurisdiction to hear dozens of such pending cases.

A court fight over that is certain.

Calling the move to strip jurisdiction "a direct attack on our constitutional structure," Federal Public Defender Steven T. Wax in Portland, Ore., said, "We will litigate that as hard as we can in whatever forum we can find, because they are wrong."

Other detainees whose lawyers filed new evidence in U.S. District Court motions this month include:

Adel Hassan Hamad, a Sudanese charity worker arrested at 1:30 a.m. July 18, 2002, in his Peshawar, Pakistan, apartment. Co-workers swear he was a hospital administrator with no connection to terrorists. A dissenting U.S. Army major on the panel that reviewed the unclassified and secret evidence against him called it "unconscionable" to detain him because some employees of the same charity may have supported terrorist ideals.

Nazar "Chaman" Gul, a 29-year-old Afghani who thought he was working as an armed fuel depot guard for the Karzi government installed by U.S. forces. The man who hired him swears that was the case, but he is accused of being a member of a terrorist group. The lawyers say he has been mistaken for a commander of that terror group, named Chaman Gul, also held at Guantanamo.

All three are represented by Wax and his assistants. Wax's staff traveled to Afghanistan, Pakistan and the United Arab Emirates to gather dozens of sworn statements from co-workers, relatives, fellow inmates and people who knew these detainees but haven't spoken to them in years. These newly filed accounts substantiate details of the detainees' denials that they were terrorists.

"These clients are not enemy combatants," Wax said in an interview. The new law "does not apply to people who are not enemy combatants," he said.

Wax said it would be unconstitutional to apply the jurisdiction-stripping bill retroactively to existing cases. And he said the Supreme Court has ruled before that it has the final say over its jurisdiction in these so-called habeas corpus petitions for release from custody. Following President Lincoln's suspension of habeas corpus for prisoners of war, the high court in 1866 set a man free after finding he was not a prisoner of war, Wax noted.

The government feels differently about Wax's clients.

DOJ_NMG_0084193

"Multiple reviews have been conducted since each detained enemy fighter was captured, including for these three individuals," said a Pentagon spokesman, Navy Cmdr. Jeffrey D. Gordon. "There is a significant amount of evidence, both unclassified and classified, which supports continued detention of these detainees and others at Guantanamo."

Now 28, Rahim, buttressed by testimony from friends and relatives, says he wound up in Afghanistan in a bid to escape his father, a strict teacher of Islamic education who objected to his borrowing money outside the family for a college trip. With his father holding his passport, he tried futilely to get from his home in the United Arab Emirates to Europe or Canada.

Finally a friendly diplomat got him deported to Afghanistan where he and others say he hoped to be declared a refugee and moved to Europe by international aid agencies. He says the Taliban conscripted him and sent him against his will to the Al Farouq terrorist training camp. When he tried to leave 18 days later, they imprisoned him, he says.

In spring 2000, Abu Dhabi television broadcast a video of a tearful, fidgeting Rahim saying a U.S. agent recruited him to find Osama bin Laden. "I deserve to die ... but if the Taliban let me live, I want to spend the next 22 years fighting for jihad," he said.

On Jan. 17, 2002, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft said U.S. forces found five videotapes in the ruined Afghan home of bin Laden aide Mohammed Atef – one of the men Rahim says directed his torture. Ashcroft said the tapes show young men delivering "martyrdom messages from suicide terrorists" and identified one as "Abd Rahim."

Rahim's attorney Stephen Sady said any Taliban tapes of Rahim "were the product of torture" and no different from false confessions Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., made to stay alive in a North Vietnamese prison.

"After two years the Americans came and saved me from the prison," Rahim told U.S. officers. "I told them about the videotape the Taliban made of me ... it created confusion to the point that the Americans believed I was working with al-Qaeda."

He added: "Nothing changed in my life. I was taken from prison to prison."

The FBI's Un-intelligence (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), October 21, 2006

A FEW weeks ago, Jeff Stein, national security editor for Congressional Quarterly magazine, interviewed Willie Hulon, who recently was named chief of the FBI's national security branch.

Toward the end of the interview, Mr. Stein (according to an op-ed article he wrote for the New York Times last Tuesday) asked Mr. Hulon if it was important for a man in his position to know the difference between Sunnis and Shiites.

"Yes, sure," Mr. Hulon responded. "It's important to know who your targets are."

But then Mr. Stein asked Mr. Hulon to explain the difference. He couldn't. And he misidentified Iran and Hezbollah as Sunni.

Mr. Hulon is continuing a long tradition of abysmal and inexcusable ignorance in high places at FBI.

"My curiosity about our policy makers' grasp of Islam's two major branches was piqued in 2005, when Jon Stewart and other TV comedians made hash out of depositions, taken in a whistle-blower case, in which top FBI officials drew blanks when asked basic questions about Islam," Mr. Stein wrote. "One of the bemused officials was Gary Bald, then the bureau's counterterrorism chief. Such expertise, Mr. Bald maintained, wasn't as important as being a good manager."

Intelligence analyses of North Korea's missile and nuclear programs were badly flawed, wrote Bill Gertz in the Washington Times Oct. 12.

"The officials said there were as many as 10 failures related to intelligence reporting on North Korean missile tests and the suspected nuclear test that harmed administration efforts to deal with the issue," Mr. Gertz wrote.

The 9/11 plot succeeded due to a massive intelligence failure on the part of the FBI and the CIA. The FBI knew that Ramzi Yousef, the architect of the 1993 attack on the World Trade Center, planned to use airplanes in (among other things) a suicide attack on CIA headquarters (Operation Bojinka), and that Islamists were taking flying lessons in Arizona, Oklahoma, and Minnesota. But senior FBI leaders failed to connect the dots and turned a deaf ear to subordinates who did.

The 1993 World Trade Center attack could have been averted had senior FBI officials in New York paid attention to Emad Salem, an informant recruited by Special Agent Nancy Floyd, who warned of the attack. Afterwards, wrote Peter Lance in his superb book, A Thousand Years for Revenge, Ms. Floyd was driven from the bureau for having been too aggressively right. Her superiors - who were so disastrously wrong - were promoted.

When in 2002 FBI translator Sibel Edmonds reported to her supervisor that some of her fellow Turkish and Farsi translators were leaving important information out of their translations and had ties to radical groups, it was Ms. Edmonds who was fired, for "rocking the boat."

The Iraq war was undertaken in large part because intelligence agencies exaggerated the threat posed by Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction. Reporting on Saddam's forces and tactics was also badly flawed, wrote Michael Gordon and retired Marine Gen. Bernard Trainor in their acclaimed book, Cobra II:

DOJ_NMG_0084194

"The CIA in particular was not only wrong about WMD, but failed to identify the importance of the Fedayeen [irregular forces loyal to Saddam] or to uncover the tons of arms that had been cached in the cities and towns of southern Iraq," they said. "The CIA's assurances that the Iraqi military would capitulate and that the Army and Marines would be welcome in the southern cities were misleading and dangerous."

Most of what has passed for debate on intelligence failures has been efforts to assign partisan blame for them.

There is some partisan blame to be assigned. President Clinton slashed spending on intelligence gathering, and his Justice Department forbade FBI agents working on criminal cases from sharing information with FBI intelligence officers.

But most of our intelligence failures have little to do with politics. They are a product of the bureaucratic structures and imperatives of the agencies, and the competence - or lack of it - of the people who lead them.

As far as we know, no one in the FBI or the CIA has been held accountable for intelligence failures. And when no one is held accountable, you get people like Mr. Hulon in jobs they obviously are unqualified to do.

This is President Bush's greatest failure. And it's worse than President Clinton's, because it's happened after 9/11, when there can no longer be any excuse for being asleep at the switch.

"Too many officials in charge of the war on terrorism just don't care to learn much, if anything about the enemy we're fighting," Mr. Stein said.

Jack Kelly is a member of The Blade's national bureau.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Man, 20, Arrested In Stadium Threat Hoax (NYT)

By Ronald Smothers

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

NEWARK, Oct. 20 — A 20-year-old Wisconsin man was arrested Friday and charged with posting messages on Internet chat boards threatening that radioactive "dirty bombs" would go off at National Football League stadiums in seven cities on Sunday.

Federal officials labeled the threat a hoax on Thursday, but at a news conference on Friday to announce the arrest, the United States attorney in Newark, Christopher J. Christie, called it the "Internet version of yelling 'Fire!' in a crowded theater in this post-9/11 era."

Law enforcement officials said that the message posted by the man, Jake J. Brahm, a clerk at a natural-foods grocery cooperative in Wauwatosa, Wis., explained that the timing of the threatened explosions coincided with the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan and that Al Qaeda would take credit for what members would call "America's Hiroshima." General chaos would follow, the message said, with civil wars erupting across the globe and economies collapsing.

Mr. Christie said investigators had determined that Mr. Brahm first posted the message in mid-September and reposted it at least 40 times. It identified the stadiums where the bombs would go off simultaneously as Giants Stadium in East Rutherford, N.J., and those in Atlanta; Cleveland; Houston; Miami; Oakland, Calif.; and Seattle.

Mr. Brahm surrendered to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents in Milwaukee on Friday morning and later appeared in shackles for his first court appearance at the Federal District Court for the Southeastern District of Wisconsin. He was charged with making a terrorist threat over the Internet. A conviction would carry a maximum sentence of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

Citing Mr. Brahm's lack of a criminal record and his strong community ties, Federal Magistrate Patricia J. Gorence released him into the custody of his father on the condition that Mr. Brahm not travel outside Wisconsin and New Jersey, where Mr. Christie's office will have jurisdiction over his case. Judge Gorence also forbade him to use the Internet or any computer that has access to the Internet.

Mr. Brahm's lawyer, Patrick Knight, would not speculate on a motive or on F.B.I. reports that his client had said he had admitted posting the message as part of a "writing duel" with a Texas man to see who could come up with the scariest threat.

Mr. Knight did say that his client's intent was not malicious.

"It's the curse of the Internet," he said. "I think there is a whole class of folks who post a variety of things to get comments back, and in 2006 I don't think anyone is sure what is a private communication and what is intended for public consumption. I think in the end we will find that this was something that just spiraled out of control."

Wisconsin Man Charged In Terror Hoax (WT)

By Jerry Seper

DOJ_NMG_0084195

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

Federal prosecutors have charged a Wisconsin man as the source of an Internet posting that threatened to detonate radioactive "dirty bombs" at NFL stadiums in seven states.

Jake J. Brahm, 20, of Wauwatosa, Wis., was charged in a criminal complaint with willfully conveying false information or hoaxes threatening to damage buildings through the use of weapons of mass destruction and radiological dispersal devices. The charge carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie in New Jersey said Mr. Brahm, a grocery store worker, turned himself in yesterday to the U.S. Marshal's Service in Milwaukee on a criminal complaint filed in U.S. District Court in Newark, N.J.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said Mr. Brahm was first taken into custody by local police in Wauwatosa on Wednesday, based on information police received that he was the source of the Internet threat to bomb the stadiums. The FBI was immediately notified, and Mr. Brahm was interviewed by agents Wednesday evening.

"These types of hoaxes scare innocent people, cost business resources and waste valuable homeland security resources," Mr. Christie said. "We cannot tolerate this Internet version of yelling fire in a crowded theater in the post-9/11 era."

According to the criminal complaint, Mr. Brahm told the FBI he posted the threatening message at least 40 times on various Web sites.

Mr. Kolko said that in the message, Mr. Brahm warned that on Oct. 22, seven "dirty explosive devices" would be delivered by truck and detonated at NFL stadiums in New Jersey, Miami, Atlanta, Seattle, Houston, Oakland, Calif., and Cleveland.

All but the Atlanta stadium are open-air arenas and, according to message, that would allow for a maximum death toll, with the radioactive fallout spreading beyond the stadium to a wider area.

"The death toll will approach 100,000 from the initial blasts and countless other fatalities will later occur as result from radioactive fallout," the message said, adding that the explosions would be lauded by al Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden and the aftermath of the near-simultaneous blasts would be civil wars around the globe.

"Global economies will screech to a halt," the message said. "General chaos will rule."

Mr. Christie credited FBI agents in Newark, under the direction of Special Agent in Charge Leslie G. Wiser, Jr., for their work in the investigation leading to the charges against Mr. Brahm. He also credited FBI agents and the Joint Terrorism Task Force in Milwaukee, under the direction of Special Agent in Charge Richard K. Ruminski, for their work in the investigation, as well as the Wauwatosa Police Department.

The case is being prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney Michael A. Hammer, Jr., chief of the U.S. Attorney's Office Terrorism Unit in Newark.

FBI Removes Dead Man From Terror List (AP-Y)

AP, October 21, 2006

The FBI removed an al-Qaida explosives expert linked to the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Africa from the most wanted terrorists list Friday after learning he was killed six months ago.

Muhsin Musa Matwali Atwah was killed in an April 12 gunfight with Pakistani authorities, FBI spokesman Richard Kolko said. He said the FBI was notified just this week that Atwah's death had been confirmed.

Egyptian-born Atwah was wanted in connection with the deadly embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. The State Department offered a $5 million reward for his capture.

News reports out of Pakistan in late April said Atwah was killed by the Pakistani military in a raid on a suspected insurgent hideout in the tribal region of North Waziristan bordering Afghanistan.

Twenty-six suspected terrorists remain on the FBI's list, including al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden.

___

On the Net:

FBI's Most Wanted Terrorists: http://www.fbi.gov/wanted/terrorists/fugitives.htm

Ground Zero Forensic Team Is Posted To Seek Remains (NYT)

By David W. Dunlap

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

New York City's chief medical examiner will station a team at ground zero to look for human remains from 9/11, the Bloomberg administration said yesterday, after dozens of bones were found Thursday by workers excavating two manholes that had been covered since 2002.

DOJ_NMG_0084196

"This was an enormous disaster," Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg said on his WABC radio program. "It's an enormous area. And I think those that did the recovery effort, you know they did the best they could. You can't be perfect, unfortunately, when something's this big."

The excavation began Wednesday under a service road paralleling West Street. Workers for Phoenix Constructors are preparing this area, south of Vesey Street and within the World Trade Center site, for a passageway to link the future trade center below ground to Battery Park City. On Thursday morning, they found as many as 80 bones and bone fragments and personal effects like wallets and watches.

Officials expect more remains to emerge from four other manholes and utility service boxes that have been covered since the service road was built four years ago. They also expect to find smaller remains in material that was vacuumed out of the manholes by Consolidated Edison crews on Wednesday.

After a 90-minute meeting yesterday with utility executives and other officials, Deputy Mayor Edward Skyler said that Con Ed and Verizon crews would continue to remove material from underground areas near West Street.

"The city's medical examiner will be on site to carefully sift through any material recovered to identify any human remains," Mr. Skyler said. "The medical examiner's forensic anthropologists will work closely with police and fire personnel, who will be on scene at all times."

Mr. Skyler said the city's Department of Design and Construction and the Lower Manhattan Construction Command Center would identify other underground areas, if any, that need to be searched by the same method.

Mayor Bloomberg said such discoveries might continue. "Whether or not two years from now or during construction somebody finds something else, you just don't know," he said.

Despite an impression four years ago that the recovery effort had been completed, human remains continue to be found around ground zero. In the last year, 760 body parts were discovered at the former Deutsche Bank building. Victims' relatives believe that many more remains await recovery at the Fresh Kills landfill on Staten Island.

The discovery this week reopened a scar that never healed for the many relatives of victims who all but vanished on Sept. 11, 2001. To date, the medical examiner's office has identified no physical trace of 1,151 of the 2,749 people who died in the attack.

Yesterday, family members called on local officials to step aside and permit a thorough new search for human remains, governed by strict protocols, on the trade center site and its environs.

"If they were capable of doing the job, we wouldn't be finding these human remains now," said Sally Regenhard of the Skyscraper Safety Campaign. She has yet to recover the remains of her son, Christian, a probationary firefighter, who was killed on 9/11.

The family members demanded a halt to all construction at the trade center site and the intervention of the federal government through the Joint P.O.W.-M.I.A. Accounting Command, which recovers and identifies service members who have been killed in action and operates what it describes as the world's largest forensic anthropology laboratory.

None of these concessions were forthcoming from City Hall, leading Glenn P. Corbett, a technical adviser to the Skyscraper Safety Campaign, to call the mayor's response "totally inadequate."

Fire On The Water (NYT)

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

When the Coast Guard decided it wanted to practice firing its new machine guns on the Great Lakes, it posted an item in the Federal Register — not exactly household reading. Now that the public has caught up, there is an uproar all around the lakes — in Canada as well as the United States — and a belated decision to hold public hearings.

The Coast Guard's proposal is cautious and, as military exercises go, quite modest. It plans two or three test firings a year, a few hours each time, in 34 possible areas at least five nautical miles offshore. Officials argue that it is prudent to give crews heavier weapons than the handheld guns they carried on the lakes before 9/11.

Few are disputing that the United States needs to do more to protect its borders against terrorists. But we face far more plausible threats than terrorists cutting across Lake Michigan in small boats.

As a defense against terrorism, militarizing the Great Lakes is a symbolic defeat. And it is another in a series of incremental changes that threaten to change everything that we take for granted about our country.

The question is how far we choose to militarize ourselves at home in response to terrorism. Turning the Great Lakes — even on occasion — into a live-fire zone is the kind of decision that says little to terrorists but speaks volumes to the rest of us.

Louisiana Pays Part Of FEMA Bill And Sues On Rest (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

DOJ_NMG_0084197

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La., Oct. 20 (AP) — Louisiana wired $319 million to the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Friday, a large part of what the agency billed the state for hurricane recovery for Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, and filed a lawsuit in federal court disputing the remaining $61 million bill.

The state's actions were based on the advice of the legislative auditor.

The commissioner of administration, Jerry Luke LeBlanc, who is the governor's top financial adviser, said that the state attorney general's office filed the lawsuit Friday afternoon and that the disputed dollars would be deposited into a registry of the court until the case was resolved.

The legislative auditor, Steve Theriot, the chief investigator for the Legislature, said that he could account for only 88 percent of the spending, but that the state was objecting to a part of that as well.

In the remaining disputed money, Mr. Theriot said that in some instances, people with invalid addresses or duplicate homes, who should not have received benefits from the agency, had.

"One of those errors, as an example, was a person who was charged with a felony in another state had applied for funds and got it," he told the Joint Legislative Committee on the Budget, which approved the payment to FEMA.

Agency officials have said they welcome any information from the legislative auditor's office about improper spending and will investigate it.

States are required to pick up part of the cost for some types of FEMA's disaster aid.

Storming Capitol Hill To Help Louisiana (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

Women of the Storm encourage lawmakers to visit the devastated Gulf Coast so they will be roused to offer aid. Scores have accepted.

The chartered jet that lifted off at dawn recently from New Orleans carried 131 Louisiana women — homemakers, professionals, full-time volunteers and local celebrities, dressed for political combat in pastel power suits, smart skirt outfits and discreet jewelry.

As they sipped coffee and munched scones, their conversations ranged from their kids' progress at school to next month's reopening of a downtown landmark, Saks Fifth Avenue.

But the chatter came to a stop when Anne Milling, a striking, slender woman in her 60s, strode to the front of the plane. Brimming with confidence and charm, she outlined the game plan. At stake was nothing less than the future of their Gulf Coast home, battered a year ago by Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

"Be positive, be tenacious, be your upbeat self," Milling urged her compatriots. "This is how you're going to sell Louisiana."

The Women of the Storm, as this ad hoc group calls itself, were about to land in Washington and embark on a one-day mission in the nation's halls of power. The goal: to persuade members of Congress to help save the state's fast-disappearing coastline.

The powerful folks in Washington ignore this eclectic group at their peril. The Women are quickly becoming a recognized power among the activist groups that have sprouted from the rubble of Katrina, many fueled by frustration with the slow pace of government assistance.

Their first objective has been to bring Washington to New Orleans. The group's premise is simple: When lawmakers see how devastated the Gulf Coast looks, they will be roused to help. So far, the group has helped convince 55 of the nation's 100 senators and at least 106 of its 435 representatives to visit Louisiana.

But the Women of the Storm also have accomplished something just as rare: offering this city, historically fraught with ethnic division, a shining example of cross-cultural unity. Among these women are whites, blacks, Latinas and Asians. They are executives, civil servants and stay-at-home moms, all pulling together for the future of their city.

Before landing to tackle their September agenda, the group's leaders prepped the fledgling lobbyists.

"Don't hesitate to be dramatic," advised Pam Bryan, a member of the group's executive committee. "What we're asking for is $15 billion. When you think about it, that's not a lot of money. Don't be afraid to ask for that. Please pass on the sense of urgency … that we need this money now!"

Information sheets rustled, and whispered acknowledgments were heard through the cabin. Two committee members, Beverly Church and Nancy Marsiglia, rose for a role-playing exercise, with Church playing a skeptical U.S. representative and Marsiglia playing a Woman of the Storm.

"What about your leadership? Who is running the city?" Church demanded.

DOJ_NMG_0084198

"We think it is important to keep politics out of this," Marsiglia responded. "We are a citizens group, and citizens are leading the way. We are the face of Louisiana today."

The grass-roots women's movement was born on Thanksgiving as Milling sat down to dinner with a group of friends and talked about the paucity of help after the storm. By Jan. 10, Milling had gathered eight pals in her living room to make a plan. And by Jan. 30, when they made their first trip to Capitol Hill to lobby for the release of funds for Louisiana's Road Home program, they had added more than 120 to their ranks. Today, more than 500 Louisiana members are registered on the group's e-mail list.

Financed by donations, the group is a broad range of Gulf Coast women, including some local celebrities, like 83-year-old chef Leah Chase, commonly known as the "queen of Creole Cuisine" and owner of the landmark New Orleans restaurant Dooky Chase's.

They hand-deliver invitations to the politicians and lead those who visit the region on tours of the most damaged neighborhoods.

Still, 45 senators and at least 329 U.S. representatives have not made the journey.

"Why have they not come?" asked Cecile Tebo, a member of the group who is also a crisis unit coordinator for the New Orleans Police Department and a third-generation New Orleanian. "Is it fear? I can't imagine. This affects the entire country. Until you feel it, see it, smell it, hear it, you don't understand it."

For many of the women, mastering the intricacies of lobbying on Capitol Hill is new. But just as Katrina changed New Orleans forever, it changed their minds about their roles in its recovery. Jeanette Bell, a floriculturist who is African American, said, "I believe my presence [in the group] represents a commitment on the part of people of color. Just because we're not always in the forefront doesn't mean that we aren't committed to the rebuilding of the city."

"It's the power of group," added Tebo, the police crisis unit worker. "This is typical New Orleans. There's that passion. There's that little bit of funk."

The women were driven by bus from Ronald Reagan Washington National Airport to a grassy area near the Capitol complex. They hoisted blue umbrellas — symbols of the blue tarps that cover many damaged rooftops in Louisiana. At a news conference, they were surrounded by the state's two senators and five of its members of Congress.

Before fanning out, some of the women changed from pumps into comfortable walking shoes. Naydja Bynum, a property preservationist who lives in the historic traditionally African American New Orleans neighborhood of Treme, donned black soft fabric slip-on shoes that she bought last year on a trip to Europe. "I knew they would come in handy, she said later that day.

The women traipsed from the House to the Senate, from the Senate to House, navigating the maze of underground tunnels and magnificent corridors that connects them.

On Tebo's list were one senator and four congressmen. She was partnered with Lang Le, a Vietnamese American whose eastern New Orleans house was inundated by several feet of water. Tebo and Le rushed to their first scheduled appointment, with Rep. Patrick J. Kennedy (D-R.I.), who has not yet visited New Orleans. But he was called away on other business, so a staff member filled in.

Tebo did most of the talking, sticking to the script and convincingly pleading the case of coastal restoration and flood protection.

"I didn't know if I was saying all the right things," Tebo said as she left the room.

"You did great," Le encouraged. "It sounded good."

Milling was teamed with Rita Benson LeBlanc, executive vice president of administration for the New Orleans Saints football team. At 29, LeBlanc is one of the group's youngest members.

Their list included Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

"How's it going?" Clinton asked the group.

"They know who we are," Benson LeBlanc informed the senator. The Women need no introduction on the Hill.

Clinton told them how important it was that they were helping put a human face on Louisiana's tragedy. "Just be persistent," the senator added.

"You know how women are," Milling said. "They can nag, and they are tenacious."

She handed Clinton a book about Katrina by the staff of the Times Picayune as she impressed upon the senator the need to "get the House and the Senate on the same page" in terms of backing coastal restoration in Louisiana.

"We need the revenue now," Milling told Clinton. "This is an issue that's crucial to us today."

"I'm supportive, and I'll continue to do whatever I can," the senator promised, as she readied to pose for a photograph with the women.

Many of the elected officials pledged continued assistance. But some in the group said they got the cold shoulder from a few representatives or their testy staffers; and one official reportedly mocked the Women as being nothing more than debutantes. Diplomacy prevented group members from naming names.

DOJ_NMG_0084199

Encountering a naysayer or two is par for the course, said Madeline West, an attorney and core member, but "overall it was positive."

En route to the airport for the trip back to New Orleans, one woman called her kids and promised a hug and a kiss when she got home; another longed for a bath. All recognized that their work was far from done.

"The women-hours in this are tremendous," member Polly Renwick said. "And it will not end when we leave here."

As cups of white wine were handed out on board the aircraft, Milling thanked members for their day of hard work — they had gathered at 5:45 a.m. and landed back in New Orleans at around 10:30 p.m.

She also reminded them to send a thank-you note, or a card, to every official or staffer they had called on.

"It does make a difference being a woman," Milling said. "We can say and do things men can't. We are more passionate. It's different to the way a man would approach a problem."

ann.simmons@latimes.com

WAR NEWS:

Bush, Rumsfeld Defend Strategy (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

They Say Surge In Violence Won't Change Iraq Goals

President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld yesterday defended the U.S. strategy in Iraq, saying the ultimate goals remain unchanged despite escalating violence and increasingly somber assessments from military leaders on the ground.

Speaking at a Washington fundraiser, Bush said the U.S. goal in Iraq "is clear and unchanging": creating a country that can govern and defend itself and "that will be an ally in the war against these extremists."

In a briefing later at the Pentagon, Rumsfeld played down the significance of fighting and sectarian violence that have erupted over the past few days outside Baghdad, as U.S. troops in Iraq suffer some of the highest monthly casualties since the 2003 invasion.

The U.S. military strategy of handing over security to Iraqi forces will never be a "straight, smooth, steady path" and American troops may have to step back in repeatedly to quell outbreaks of violence, Rumsfeld said.

But Rumsfeld rejected the suggestion that this means the U.S. strategy of "clear, hold and build" is failing.

The remarks came amid growing concern among both Republican and Democratic lawmakers about the administration's Iraq plan, with some predicting that upcoming elections and the apparent lack of progress on the ground would soon force the Bush administration to abandon its open-ended support of the war.

Rumsfeld said he will meet today with Bush, Vice President Cheney and top U.S. commanders including Gen. John P. Abizaid and Gen. George W. Casey Jr. to "discuss the way forward" in Iraq. White House press secretary Tony Snow said the meeting was a routine update on the conflict -- scheduled weeks ago -- and that it did not herald a major change in strategy.

"The biggest mistake would be not to pass things over to the Iraqis," Rumsfeld said. "It's their country. They're going to have to govern it. They're going to have to provide security for it. And they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

Attacks and sectarian fighting have flared beyond Baghdad in recent days -- from Amarah in the south to the Tigris River town of Balad and the northern city of Mosul -- in some cases requiring the urgent intervention of U.S. forces. Sunni insurgents have also been staging bold military displays in cities and towns in the vast western province of Anbar, which a senior U.S. military officer this week described as "an al-Qaeda stronghold."

The eruption of violence around Iraq comes as thousands of U.S. reinforcement troops are tied down in aggressive operations to secure Baghdad, where attacks have nevertheless surged 43 percent since midsummer in a trend that an American general there this week called "disheartening."

At least 75 U.S. troops have been killed so far in Iraq this month -- the highest daily rate since January 2005. The United Nations has said that more than 100 Iraqis a day are being killed in raging sectarian violence.

U.S. commanders are wrestling with the question of whether to raise troop levels. Last week, Casey, the top U.S. general in Iraq, said that more troops would have an immediate impact on reducing attacks in localities where they operate but that it was uncertain whether they would contribute to bringing violence down in the long term.

Casey is working on projections for when the U.S. military can hand over responsibilities to Iraqi forces in different parts of the country, but Rumsfeld said yesterday that "there's no doubt" some of the projections will not be met. "In some cases, once we meet the projection, we may have to go back and do it again if it doesn't work," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0084200

Iraqi insurgents and other fighters may be targeting areas transferred to the control of Iraqi forces, Rumsfeld said. "They're smart, the enemy," he added. "They've got brains, and they use them."

Rumsfeld and Bush said military commanders are constantly adjusting their tactics to meet enemy challenges, even though overarching goals remain unchanged.

Bush repeated his vow not to withdraw troops from Iraq before the goals are achieved. "Victory in Iraq is vital for the security of a generation of Americans who are coming up," he said. "And so we will stay in Iraq, we will fight in Iraq and we will win in Iraq."

Bush said the recent spike in violence is largely attributable to a more aggressive posture being taken by U.S. troops, who have been directly confronting militias and others who have been stirring trouble. "In other words, we're on the move," Bush said. ". . . We're engaging the enemies, and they're putting up a tough fight."

In his remarks at an event that raised $1 million for Republican Senate candidates, Bush acknowledged the difficulty of the war. "Listen, I fully understand it's a tough fight in Iraq," he said. "I know it, you know it, and our troops know it."

Still, he said, the United States has no choice but to stay in the fight. "This is going to be a long struggle, but in order to prevail, it requires perseverance and determination, and a strong belief in the power of liberty to conquer the ideology of hate," he said.

Militias Battle For Iraqi City As Shiite Rivalry Escalates (NYT)

By Kirk Semple

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 20 — Hundreds of militiamen linked to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr battled local police and members of a rival Shiite militia in the southeastern city of Amara on Friday, destroying police stations, seizing control of entire neighborhoods and detonating bombs that sent thick pillars of black smoke into the sky.

At one point, the Mahdi Army, Mr. Sadr's militia force, appeared to be in control of the eastern half of the city of about 250,000, close to the Iranian border. But after a day of negotiations involving representatives of the warring militias, and delegates from the Baghdad offices of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, Mahdi Army gunmen withdrew from their positions, and by nightfall the city was under the control of an Iraqi Army battalion that had been dispatched from Basra, officials and residents said.

The clashes, pitting fighters linked to Mr. Sadr against members of the Badr Organization, the military wing one of the country's leading Shiite parties, exposed the deep fissures in the country's Shiite leadership and cast doubt on the ability of the ruling Shiite coalition to hold itself together. It also underscored the weaknesses of the Iraqi security forces and the potency of the Mahdi Army, which has been able to operate virtually unchecked in Iraq and is widely accused of propelling the cycle of sectarian violence that has pushed the nation to the brink of civil war.

With the battle for the city erupting only two months after British troops withdrew from a garrison on the city's edge, it raised fresh questions, too, about the ability of the Iraqi government and security forces to maintain order once allied troops are withdrawn.

Reviews of the American strategy in Iraq took on more urgency on Friday, as President Bush held a half-hour meeting at the White House with Gen. John. P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East. The meeting was the first of several scheduled in coming days with his senior advisers.

The stability of Mr. Maliki's government in Baghdad depends on a tenuous peace between Mr. Sadr, who controls one of the largest parties in the ruling Shiite bloc, and Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, who leads another, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and its private army, the Badr Organization. A dynastic rivalry between their families, dating back decades, has carried over into a personal and political rivalry between the men, and their militias have periodically clashed.

"The split is very old and it has caused a lot of tragedy," said Abd-Kareem al-Mahamedawy, one of Amara's most prominent political leaders and a moderate Shiite. "It's just a fight for power."

Mr. Sadr's office disavowed responsibility for the fighting in Amara, and his role in the assault remained murky. But residents and local officials said the gunmen, who wore the black clothes and black balaclavas that have become hallmarks of the Mahdi Army, claimed allegiance to Mr. Sadr.

The possibility of a violent break between the factions would severely complicate the efforts of Iraqi and American officials to quell the soaring sectarian and insurgent violence in Iraq. A factional war among the Shiite groups, which might quickly spread to other major centers where Mr. Sadr and Mr. Hakim are vying for power, including Baghdad, would add another nightmarish dimension to the bloodletting here, on top of the sectarian killing between Sunnis and Shiites and the war that militant groups from both sects are waging against American-led allied troops.

DOJ_NMG_0084201

Compared to the west and north of the country, where a fierce Sunni Arab-led insurgency has tormented American and Iraqi troops and Sunni and Shiite death squads have engaged in a vicious cycle of violence, the predominantly Shiite south has been relatively peaceful. But a disintegration of the unstable pact between Mr. Sadr and Mr. Hakim could draw American attention away from the other fronts and compel the British military to return to areas they had ceded to the Iraqis.

The American military command acknowledged this week that it was re-examining the latest security plan for Baghdad, where three months of intensive American-led sweeps had failed to curb violence by Sunni Arab-led insurgents and Shiite and Sunni militias. An American soldier was killed Friday in a bombing in southwest Baghdad, according to the military, raising the total of American troop deaths in Iraq this month to at least 74.

The Bush administration has pinned the withdrawal of American troops on the ability of Iraqi forces to assume command of the country's security. In the south, the British have handed over security for two provinces to the Iraqis. In August, they put Iraqi forces in charge of Amara and withdrew from the city.

In an interview with The Associated Press, President Bush said of Iraq, "We are constantly adjusting our tactics so that we achieve the objective, and right now it's tough, it's tough."

At the Pentagon, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said it was essential to transfer more security and governing responsibilities to the Iraqi government. "It's their country," he said at a news conference. "They're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

Shiite militias — especially the Mahdi Army — have presented Mr. Maliki with perhaps the greatest conundrum of his administration. American officials have pressed him vigorously to disarm the militias and rid the state security forces of their influence. Yet Mr. Maliki has been hesitant to attack them, particularly the Mahdi Army and Badr Organization, for fear of alienating fundamentalist Shiite leaders inside his fractious coalition. On Wednesday, Mr. Maliki met privately with Mr. Sadr in Najaf but offered no details about their conversation.

British forces did not intervene to stop the bloodshed in Amara, instead deferring to the Iraqi government to resolve the dispute. British military officials said a quick reaction force was standing by in case Iraqi diplomatic efforts failed.

British commanders called the Iraqi response to the crisis a success.

"The Iraqi police and Iraqi Army have faced their sternest test since we stepped back from Amara," Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a British military spokesman, said in a telephone interview. "We believed the Iraqi security forces were in position to provide day-to-day security and implement the rule of law in Amara, and we still maintain the case."

The fighting, he said, did not upset plans to hand over full control of Maysan Province to the Iraqi government in December.

According to Mr. Mahamedawy, this week's dispute between the Shiite militias began after Qassim al-Tamimi, chief of investigations for the provincial police force and a member of the Badr Organization, was killed in a bombing. Badr fighters blamed the Mahdi Army. Police then arrested the brother of the local Mahdi Army commander in connection with the bombing, the authorities said.

More than 200 Mahdi fighters responded with an assault on the city beginning Thursday afternoon, then continuing at daybreak on Friday. According to Col. Khalid al-Fredgy, a police officer in Amara, the police officers eventually ran out of ammunition and fled their posts. By late morning, Mahdi gunmen wearing black clothes and black balaclavas were patrolling neighborhoods in commandeered police vehicles and manning roadblocks, local leaders and residents said.

"Policemen tried to protect the stations, but what can they do?" Mr. Mahamedawy said by telephone early Friday afternoon. "They do not have enough weapons and ammunition compared with the militia, which has all kinds of weapons."

Delegates from the Badr Organization and from Mr. Sadr's headquarters in Najaf met with envoys from Mr. Maliki's office and hammered out a truce that allowed for the Iraqi Army to retake the streets, according to Mr. Mahamedawy.

By dusk, at least 10 police officers and 15 militiamen had been killed, according to Major Burbridge, and about 90 gunmen were wounded. Police officials said that several of their men remained unaccounted for and had presumably been kidnapped by the Mahdi Army fighters.

"Those rogue gangs were brought back into line by their political leaders," Major Burbridge said.

Witnesses said a message from Mr. Sadr was broadcast by loudspeakers atop vehicles Friday, calling on gunmen to lay down their weapons, though the order was widely disregarded.

Western intelligence officials in Baghdad have also spoken of Mahdi splinter groups operating as freelance death squads beyond Mr. Sadr's control, but some American officers have questioned whether Mr. Sadr has adopted this notion in order to deflect responsibility for crimes committed by his men.

Amara is the capital of Maysan Province, a region of farmland and marshes about 240 miles southeast of Baghdad. The city has been a chokepoint for munitions and people entering from Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0084202

Political control there, and throughout the south, has been fiercely contested by followers of Mr. Hakim and Mr. Sadr. Mr. Sadr's allies dominate the provincial council. But the police chief is a former Badr Organization member and many of his officers are loyal to the militia.

Some local leaders warned that the cycle of revenge among Shiites would likely not end with Friday's truce, and that in the fiercely tribal culture of Maysan, relatives of officers who were killed or kidnapped might seek to avenge those attacks.

Bush Open To Shift In Iraq War 'Tactics' (LAT)

By Paul Richter And Doyle Mcmanus

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — With U.S. casualties rising and pressure growing from Republican and Democratic leaders for a change of course in Iraq, President Bush said Friday that he was willing to adjust U.S. "tactics" in Baghdad but did not intend to change his strategy or long-term goals.

"We will stay in Iraq, we will fight in Iraq and we will win in Iraq," Bush told Republican contributors in Washington. "Our goal hasn't changed, but the tactics are constantly adjusting to an enemy which is brutal and violent."

But pressure is mounting among some administration officials and party faithful for a major change in the way Bush is handling the war.

His remarks appeared to signal that he was open to at least a limited change in his approach, and that he was not wedded to a "stay-the-course" doctrine, as critics say. At the same time, Bush pledged to secure victory and said he would not change his administration's strategy or overall goals, even if it shifted tactics.

He spoke at the end of a grim week that saw an American commander acknowledge that U.S. policies aimed at quelling violence in Baghdad had fallen short and on the eve of a White House conference with generals, Cabinet officials and national security advisors.

The developments came as an increasing number of Republicans questioned the wisdom of Bush's policies in Iraq and called for new military and political options, and as expectations grew for a postelection change in direction. By adhering to longer-term goals while allowing for tactical changes, Bush could argue that military shifts did not represent a failure of policies.

In his comments, Bush said his administration's "unchanging" goal was to enable Iraq to govern, defend and sustain itself.

But some administration officials said Friday that in the face of Iraq's deepening troubles, they were weighing major changes in direction and expected a new course — though not a withdrawal — to be announced within months.

One senior official said he expected the change to come once a congressionally chartered panel, the Iraq Study Group, makes its recommendations, giving the administration "political cover."

"We're not going to pack up and go home," said the official, who asked to remain anonymous because he was not authorized to speak on the subject. "But the situation is grim, and may even be worse than it looks in the media" because of frequent near-calamities in Iraq that never come to the public's attention.

"People here are desperate, and there is a lot of deep thinking going on," the senior official said.

Richard N. Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, an independent foreign policy organization, said opinion on the war appeared to be near "a tipping point."

"I think we are reaching the point, and it's going to happen soon, where simply 'more of essentially the same' is going to be a policy that very few people are going to be able to support," said Haass, who was an aide to former Secretary of State Colin L. Powell.

Several strategic alternatives in Iraq are receiving the most attention, observers said.

They include setting a timetable for withdrawal; giving a larger role to other countries in the region, notably Syria and Iran, to win their cooperation on security; decentralizing the government of Iraq, or even formally dividing the country into Kurdish, Sunni Arab and Shiite states; and encouraging the formation of a new government led by a strong leader, such as an Iraqi army general.

Administration officials and outside experts said all of the options had major disadvantages and would have substantial political costs. U.S. officials said each of the alternatives had been rejected at various points by the administration.

But the senior U.S. official said some in the government continued to think about options that had been ruled out — including a more authoritarian approach — in hopes of establishing order as a first step toward rebuilding the country.

The official described it as a "last choice," but said, "at some point, the situation becomes so serious that you need order, period."

Handing the government over to a strong leader would carry large political costs. It would mean setting aside the administration's goal of establishing an American-style government, at least temporarily. And it would mean finding what some officials call a "man on horseback" who would have support from all the major Iraqi factions — perhaps an impossible task.

DOJ_NMG_0084203

The strongman option was called the "most plausible" by scholar Eliot Cohen of the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies, who has close ties to the military and administration. Cohen, often described as a leading neoconservative, has been praised by Bush.

Cohen wrote in a Wall Street Journal column published Friday that the Iraq war was, "if not a failure, failing." He said throwing U.S. support behind a strong leader would force the administration to swallow "a substantial repast of crow."

The option of regionalizing the effort — with the help of Iran and Syria — appears to have the support of former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, the Iraq Study Group co-chairman.

The senior U.S. official said that such an approach would require Washington to set aside other goals regarding Syria and Iran — including its push to keep Tehran from gaining a nuclear weapon.

"The question is, are they willing to throw out their Iran and Syria policies to help their Iraq policy?" he said. "That's hard for me to conceive."

The Pentagon has begun its own work on a "Plan B," involving changes that Bush would consider tactical rather than strategic.

Pentagon officials have declined to talk about alternatives under discussion, but there are several shifts they could make.

The military could intensify its counterinsurgency efforts, moving more American units out of bases and into cities and neighborhoods — a version of the strategy the U.S. pursued in Tall Afar and Ramadi. But those options probably would require additional troops, who most likely would come from unpopular combat tour extensions.

A probable candidate for an extension under such a scenario would be the 4th Infantry Division, which is expected to complete its yearlong tour in November and December. Keeping the division in Baghdad would provide an instant boost in the U.S. military presence.

Conversely, the military may decide to abandon its Baghdad security plan, returning more forces to bases. Such a move essentially would mean dropping a large part of the Pentagon's counterinsurgency effort, but it could force the Iraqi military to take more responsibility.

The Pentagon also could seek to ramp up its military advisor efforts. Top Army generals have repeatedly predicted that as infantry brigades shrink, the number of military advisors working with Iraqi security forces will increase.

One military option, backed by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and others, is increasing troop levels. But administration officials are concerned that would further erode public support, and that there are no extra troops to be had in large numbers.

Bush summoned Army Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, to the White House on Friday. The administration said Abizaid already was in the capital and Bush asked for a meeting.

Bush will consult today with Abizaid and Army Gen. George W. Casey Jr., who is commander of U.S. forces in Iraq. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Vice President Dick Cheney and national security advisor Stephen Hadley also will take part, Rumsfeld told reporters.

Abizaid will appear via teleconference from the U.S. Central Command in Florida and Casey will take part from Baghdad.

Democrats sought Friday to use the acknowledged breakdown of the Baghdad offensive as an opportunity to emphasize their case for a phased withdrawal from Iraq.

"It has never been more clear that we need to change course in Iraq," House and Senate Democratic leaders wrote in a letter to Bush.

Times staff writers Julian E. Barnes and Peter Spiegel contributed to this report.

Pressure Builds For Policy Shift, But Bush Shows No Signs Of Budging (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Appalled by spiraling violence in Iraq and frustrated by Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki's failure to quell it, American officials are grasping for new ways to keep the conflict from spinning out of control.

But President Bush has given no indication that he's ready to make dramatic changes in his Iraq policy, which has come to define his presidency and dominate next month's congressional elections. If anything, the president's public comments and those of his senior aides suggest that he's more determined than ever to stay the course.

Senior U.S. military, diplomatic and intelligence officials, however, have concluded that Maliki's Iraqi government is either unwilling or unable to crack down on the country's Shiite Muslim militias. Some even have suggested that the United States should consider beginning to withdraw some troops to increase the pressure on Maliki to take decisive action.

Bush and his aides, however, say he won't retreat from his vision of a united, stable, secure and democratic Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0084204

"Our goal in Iraq is clear and it's unchanging: a country that can sustain itself, a country that can govern itself, a country that can defend itself, and a country which will be an ally in the war against these extremists," Bush said Friday at a Republican fundraiser.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Friday that Bush has rejected two of the most frequently mentioned options: a phased U.S. withdrawal or a partition that would divide Iraq into Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish regions. He said that Bush is open to changes in tactics that could help achieve his goals, but won't consider any deviation from his core strategy.

"Leaving is not going to work, and partition is simply off the table," Snow said. "The strategy's going to be the same, which is an Iraq that can sustain, govern and defend itself."

That leaves senior American officials and commanders in Iraq in a tough place. They've acknowledged that the current approach isn't working, and that they're looking for an alternative. But the decision ultimately is the president's.

Lawmakers in both parties agree that Bush will face more pressure to change course if Republicans lose control of Congress next month.

Calls for change by the independent Iraq Study Group, headed by former Secretary of State James Baker, a Bush family friend, might sway the president. Baker, who's said that the group won't release its findings until after the Nov. 7 elections, has pledged to consider all options, but Snow already has made it clear that Bush won't be bound by the group's advice.

"This is something you listen to seriously, but we are not going to outsource the business of handling the war in Iraq," he said. "The president is the commander-in-chief. And simply because you have a blue ribbon panel, it does not mean that he hands it off to them."

The pressure for change - from commanders in Iraq, from voters and from Bush's fellow Republicans - is building, and a flurry of meetings has prompted speculation that some changes may be afoot.

Bush invited Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the region, to the White House Friday for an update on Iraq, and the president will hear from commanders in the field in a videoconference on Saturday that will include Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

A senior defense official said that Marine Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, also has begun taking a more active role in shaping discussions about Iraq strategy, meeting regularly with military commanders and retired officers who've returned from the region.

But the official, who declined to be named because he wasn't authorized to speak on the record, was skeptical that the discussions would lead to "a major overhaul" of Iraq strategy, even though Pace acknowledged at a luncheon with reporters last week that the current strategy hasn't worked.

"I think conceptually the strategy is correct," the official said, "and I think operationally there may be a need for some adjustment to achieve the desired results."

At a Pentagon news conference Friday, Rumsfeld declined to say whether he'd offer any new ideas, but he stressed the current goal of transferring security responsibility to Iraqi forces.

"It's their country. They're going to have to govern it," Rumsfeld said. "They're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later. And that means they've got to take pieces of it as they go along."

U.S. officials in Iraq, however, concede that the handoff to Iraqis hasn't gone as planned.

On Thursday, Army Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the chief U.S. spokesman in Iraq, announced that a two-month effort to stabilize Baghdad has fallen far short of its goals. Shiite death squads continue to operate with near impunity, other officials said, and sectarian violence is increasing - up 22 percent in the first three weeks of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan over previous weeks, Caldwell said. The Iraqi government is plagued by corruption and ineffectiveness.

Earlier this week, Iraqi forces lost control of the mostly Shiite city of Balad, months after U.S. forces handed control of the community to local leaders. U.S. forces had to intervene to stop tit-for-tat violence between the residents of Balad and neighboring Sunnis.

On Friday, hundreds of Shiite militiamen took over three police stations in the southern city of Amara. British troops joined Iraqi security forces in trying to restore order.

U.S. officials were particularly frustrated by Maliki's recent decision to order the release of Sheik Mazin al Saidy, a top associate of fiery Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, whose Mahdi Army militia is thought to be responsible for much of the sectarian killings.

U.S. officials had planned to trumpet the arrest as a significant step toward stopping the surge of sectarian violence. But Maliki intervened and demanded Saidy's release, pointing out that he was the elected leader of a democratic Iraq.

To Iraqi Sunnis, the decision was more evidence that the Iraqi government is aligned with Shiite death squads. To U.S. military officials, it was a troubling development in their campaign to crack down on sectarian violence.

DOJ_NMG_0084205

Some senior officials in Washington, all of whom spoke on the condition of anonymity because their reports are classified and their advice to the president and the defense secretary is confidential, echoed the frustrations in Iraq.

Some have concluded that current U.S. troop levels and deployments aren't sufficient to stem the rising sectarian violence, but that sending additional troops wouldn't change the equation. Some say that the U.S. effort to train Iraqi police and troops to take over security has failed because the Iraqi forces are either overwhelmed by or in league with sectarian militias.

Earlier this week, former Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage suggested a gradual reduction of U.S. troops, perhaps at a rate of about 5 percent every few months.

"We can't win on the battlefield," said Armitage, who served throughout Bush's first term. "The problem is that this is now a political struggle being carried out amid chaos, and we can't wish stability on the Iraqis. They have to be willing to fight for it."

Asked if he thought that staying the course remains an option, Armitage replied: "If the definition of insanity is doing the same thing over and over again and expecting a different result, then clearly it isn't. The problem is that you can change tactics in an hour, but it takes time to change strategy, and it's too late for that now."

One senior official said advocates of change have mounted a "low-wattage mutiny" to try to convince Bush to try a new approach.

So far, though, it seems to have had little impact on the president.

"All these proposals have one thing in common: they would have our country quit in Iraq before the job is done," Bush said on Thursday at another Republican fundraiser, after summing up the various options offered by his critics. "America will stay, we will fight, and we will win in Iraq."

Hutcheson reported from Washington, Youssef from Baghdad. McClatchy correspondents Drew Brown and John Walcott in Washington contributed to this report.

Bush: I Won't Change Strategy In Iraq (AP)

By Deb Riechmann And Kevin Freking

AP, October 21, 2006

President Bush conceded Friday that "right now it's tough" for American forces in Iraq, but the White House said he would not change U.S. strategy in the face of pre-election polls that show voters are upset.

With Republicans anxious about the potential loss of Congress — and with conditions seemingly deteriorating in Iraq — Bush addressed the question of whether he would alter his policies.

"We are constantly adjusting our tactics so that we achieve the objective, and right now it's tough, it's tough," Bush said in an Associated Press interview.

Bush met with Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, at the White House for a half-hour Friday afternoon. The White House said Abizaid already was in town and Bush asked him over. The president also will consult by video conference on Saturday with Abizaid at U.S. Central Command in Tampa, Fla., and with Gen. George Casey, who leads the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq, to determine if a change in tactics is necessary to combat the increasing violence.

Despite calls for change, Bush said, "Our goal has not changed. Our goal is a country that can defend, sustain and govern itself, a country that which will serve as an ally in this war. Our tactics are adjusting."

There were fresh signs of Republican doubts about the war. Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, who holds a seat deemed safe for the GOP, said in a campaign debate Thursday she would have voted against the war had she known ousted Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein possessed no weapons of mass destruction.

Democrats also kept up the pressure on Bush. In a letter to the president, a dozen House and Senate Democratic leaders urged him to bring home some U.S. troops and force the Iraqis to take more responsibility for their security. The Democrats said Bush should do more to pressure Iraqi leaders to disarm militias and find a political solution that would curb violence.

"The steadily mounting sectarian violence, growing insurgency and escalating casualty figures in Iraq are unacceptable and unsustainable," the Democrats said. "We urge you to change course, level with the American people and join with us to develop a policy that will work before the situation in Iraq is irretrievable."

Presidential spokesman Tony Snow said that while Bush might change tactics, he would not change his overall strategy.

"He's not somebody who gets jumpy at polls," Snow said of Bush.

Bush, at a political fundraiser in Washington for the National Republican Senatorial Committee, railed against Democrats who criticize the war. Calling the Democrats the party of "cut and run," Bush said voters need to ask: "Which political party has a strategy for victory in this war on terror?' "

As of Friday, the U.S. combat death toll in Iraq during October stood at 75 — possibly heading for the highest for any month in nearly two years. Now in its fourth year, the war has claimed the lives of at least 2,786 Americans. Approval of Bush's handling of Iraq has dipped to 37 percent among likely voters in the AP-Ipsos poll early this month, down slightly from 41 percent last month.

DOJ_NMG_0084206

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said the Iraqi government must become less reliant on the United States to handle security. He also said U.S. officials are working with the Iraqis to develop projections on when that might happen.

"It's their country, they're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later," Rumsfeld said.

"The biggest mistake would be to not pass things over to the Iraqis, create a dependency on their part, instead of developing strength and capacity and competence," he said.

Doubts about the effectiveness of current tactics have risen, and the U.S. military has said its two-month drive to crush insurgent and militia violence in Baghdad has fallen short. Attacks in Baghdad rose by 22 percent in the first three weeks of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, compared with the three previous weeks.

On Friday, the Shiite militia run by the anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr briefly seized control of the southern Iraqi city of Amarah in one of the most brazen acts of defiance yet by the country's powerful, unofficial armies. Tom Casey, deputy spokesman at the State Department, said the United States was urging the Iraqis to make sure that security in Amarah was returned to the government.

"The flare-up of violence in Amarah points out that our strategy to quell the violence in that country is failing," said Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the ranking Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee.

Bush Sees Support Ebb Away For Military Strategy In Iraq (FT)

By Edward Luce And Demetri Sevastopulo In Washington

Financial Times, October 21, 2006

Support for George W. Bush's strategy of "staying the course" in Iraq appears to be crumbling, with a growing number of fellow Republicans and senior military figures questioning how long the US can sustain its presence.

The US president got a jolting reminder of the deteriorating situation when the Mahdi army of hardline Shia cleric Moqtada al-Sadr took control of the southern city of Amara. The putsch raised more questions over the stability of Iraq's coalition government under Nouri al-Maliki, who is nominally supported by the Sadrist group that carried it out.

It follows some of the worst violence in Iraq since the US-led invasion, with more than 100 civilian deaths a day over the past three weeks and more than 70 US military casualties. Major General William Caldwell, US military spokesman in Baghdad, acknowledged on Thursday that the strategy of "clear and hold" in Baghdad was failing.

Mr Bush conceded yesterday that he was increasingly flexible about America's military strategy. In the past few weeks he has abandoned talk of achieving "victory" in Iraq - previously a stock-in-trade of presidential announcements. "We are constantly adjusting tactics so we can achieve our objectives," Mr Bush said. "And right now, it's tough."

Domestic pressure on him is mounting ahead of a widely predicted Republican defeat in the November 7 mid-term elections.

"We are now way past the tipping point on the ground in Iraq," said Gary Samore at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York. "But it is doubtful there will be any change of course until we see the results of the mid-term elections."

Mr Bush's difficulties have been exacerbated by growing dissent within his own party, with Republican congressional candidates distancing themselves from Washington's "stay the course" line. In what analysts see as a sign of growing desperation, some even support a widely-distrusted plan to partition Iraq into separate Kurdish, Shia and Sunni entities.

Attention is increasingly focused on the Iraq Study Group, an independent body led by James Baker, the former secretary of state, and Lee Hamilton, a former Democratic lawmaker, which is expected to recommend a drastic change of course. Some think it could lead to the departure of Donald Rumsfeld, defence secretary, soon after the polls.

"A lot rides on the outcome of the elections," an ISG member in Washington said last night. "If the Democrats win, the pressure on Mr Bush to start drawing down the troops could be overwhelming. If the Republicans retain control of Congress, then you could see more US troops sent there in a last-ditch effort to stabilise the violence."

Amara Violence Increases Strains On Unified Iraq Idea (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Judy Mathewson And Daniel Williams

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

Oct. 20 (Bloomberg) -- A Shiite militia clashed with Iraqi police today in an effort to take over the southern Iraqi city of Amara, raising questions about whether the U.S.-backed central government and its army can keep the country whole.

Hooded gunmen wearing black uniforms seized Amara for a few hours, and 25 people died in gun battles before the Iraqi Army moved in to retake the city of 750,000, the Associated Press reported.

DOJ_NMG_0084207

The fighting involving the Mahdi Army militia broke out yesterday after a police intelligence officer linked to a rival militia was killed. In retaliation, a brother of the Mahdi Army commander in the city was abducted, and demands were made for the official's killers to be handed over, according to AP. Mahdi Army gunmen, loyal to anti-U.S. cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, carried out the assault on Amara. Al-Sadr made an appeal for calm.

The violence in Amara demonstrates how events may be overrunning the U.S. policy of supporting a unified Iraqi government, and also driving a de facto division of the country along ethnic and sectarian lines. President George W. Bush has so far rejected any recommendation to divide the country, saying it would only lead to more violence.

``You don't want to create the Balkans," Bush spokesman Tony Snow said today in Washington. Ethnic conflicts erupted in the Balkans after the breakup of Yugoslavia in the 1990s, killing tens of thousands of people. The U.S. will continue urging Iraqis to identify themselves as one people, recalling how 12 million citizens turned out a year ago for the first democratic election in decades, Snow said.

At least three police stations and several other facilities were attacked in Amara, Sheik Abdul Kareem al-Muhammadawi, a tribal leader, told the New York Times in a telephone interview. He said the Iraqi police were outgunned and lacked sufficient weapons and ammunition.

Status of Amara

The Iraqi police in Amara are able to ``contain" the fighting, according to the U.K. Ministry of Defense, which has responsibility for southern Iraq. CNN broadcast pictures of masked men toting automatic weapons on the streets of Amara as black smoke billowed behind them.

An independent commission set up by Congress and led by former Secretary of State James Baker III is set to make recommendations on Iraq before the end of the year. Baker has said Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki's government is running out of time to demonstrate that it can get control of the country. He has also said creating three Iraqi states in a loose federation is one of the ideas that the panel is reviewing.

Republican Rift

As the idea of creating semi-autonomous states for Kurds and Shiite and Sunni Muslims gains attention, splits are emerging between President George W. Bush and Republican lawmakers.

The break was highlighted this week when Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison, a Texas Republican, endorsed greater autonomy for Iraq's main groups.

``We have to step back and stop trying to put our American ideas onto this problem and start trying to get an understanding of their views, and strong-held prejudices," Hutchinson told the Houston Chronicle.

``There are many Republicans who are privately saying they want to see the decentralization idea tried," Leslie Gelb, president emeritus of the New York-based Council on Foreign Relations and an advocate of decentralizing Iraqi power, said today in a telephone interview.

Gelb said these Republicans will not go public until after the midterm congressional elections a few weeks away. Until then, Gelb said he is ``honor-bound" not to name the dissenters.

Government Model, Poll

The Iraqi Constitution already allows regions to exercise limited self-government while giving the central government authority over common interests, such as border defense, foreign affairs and oil revenues.

Iraqis favor the centralized form of government in place now, according to a poll released last month by the University of Maryland. Asked whether their new system ``grants the central government too much power, too little power or about the right amount," only 37 percent of the 1,150 Iraqi adults questioned said it gave too much power.

Senator Joseph Biden of Delaware, the top Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, joined Gelb last May to recommend amending the Iraqi Constitution to establish independently governed Kurdish, Sunni and Shiite regions with a central government in Baghdad to manage common interests.

`Emerging Reality'

Under the proposal, Sunnis would be guaranteed 20 percent of oil revenue to match their share of the population. In a New York Times commentary they cited the success of Bosnia's Dayton Accords a decade ago that brought peace to that part of the Balkans.

``At least this idea has a chance because it fits the emerging reality on the ground," Gelb said today.

Iraq's Arab neighbors, along with Turkey, all oppose partition or federalism. Several states have minorities within their own borders and regard partition in Iraq as a bad precedent. Arab states, ruled mostly by Sunni Muslim administrations, are reluctant to see Shiites and Kurds benefit from partition, due to their control of the southern and northern oil fields, while Sunnis in the center of Iraq are left without oil.

DOJ_NMG_0084208

The traditional rivalry between Arabs and Iranians makes any partition of Iraq problematic. Many Arab governments view such a partition as an opportunity for Iran to gain influence in the Arab Middle East.

As early as 2003, Egypt's president Hosni Mubarak expressed opposition to ``trends towards partitioning the country." Last April, Mubarak went further and warned that Iran's influence in southern Iraq was poisoning the region.

An Old Bush Hand Takes On A New Role On The Iraq War (NYT)

By Steven R. Weisman

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 20 — For years, James A. Baker III was asked to explain why the first President Bush, whom he served as secretary of state, did not oust Saddam Hussein in 1991 at the end of the Persian Gulf war.

"Guess what?" Mr. Baker says these days. "Nobody asks me that anymore."

Of course, Mr. Baker is still asked about Iraq. But the questions now focus on what strategies he and the Iraq Study Group, which he helps lead, will propose to deal with the Iraq war that the current President Bush started, taking on a job that his father began but cut short.

In a telephone interview on Friday, Mr. Baker said he was reluctant to take the job as the Republican co-chairman of the bipartisan group when Congressional leaders and members of the Bush administration urged him to do it, suggesting that was what Mr. Bush wanted. "My attitude was that if the president wants me to do this, he'll look me in the eye and say, 'Please do it,' " Mr. Baker said. "And that's what he did. The point being, I wasn't going to get involved in an intramural contest about what the policy on Iraq should or shouldn't be without his approval."

Asserting that Mr. Bush has an unwarranted reputation for not listening to dissenting views, Mr. Baker added: "It seems to me that this project demonstrates one heck of a lot of flexibility. He's very interested in what this panel has to say."

Mr. Bush has opened himself to the new ideas when the war is presenting some of the problems the elder Mr. Bush and his aides, in their own memoirs, have said they worried about in 1991. They feared that Iraq would be torn by sectarian strife and that the United States would face worldwide resentment and a backlash at home.

Mr. Baker leads the study group with Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic representative from Indiana who is now director of the Woodrow Wilson Center for Scholars in Washington. Its work is to be completed in December or January, a timetable set up at the group's beginning to keep its conclusions out of the current election campaign.

Few outside the group know what it will recommend. Speculation has centered on the possibility of a phased military withdrawal from Iraq; a possible separation of Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish areas; some kind of international protectorate to secure Baghdad; and greater involvement in Iraq and the region by Iran and other neighbors.

But as a personal drama, the study group has set off fevered talk in Washington, ranging from the political to the psychological, especially now that Mr. Baker has declared that neither Mr. Bush's "stay the course" message nor what the White House calls the "cut and run" approach of critics offers a way out.

"There are other options other than just those two," Mr. Baker said recently on National Public Radio while promoting his new book, "Work Hard, Study and Keep Out of Politics." His group's proposals, Mr. Baker added, will probably not please the administration or its foes.

Mr. Baker's long association with the Bush family has often led to his coming to the rescue in bad situations. But the talk in Washington about the panel's work is filled with rich historical antiphonies.

In late 1992, for example, he resigned as secretary of state to try to save the first President Bush's faltering re-election campaign; Mr. Baker was openly reluctant to leave the citadel of diplomacy at the end of the cold war to return to the petty world of political handlers.

Family associates have said that George W. Bush was among those who resented Mr. Baker at the time for his mixed feelings about leaving when his father needed help. Running for president eight years later, the younger Mr. Bush, by then governor of Texas, turned to many longtime Republican strategists, including former Secretary of State George P. Shultz, but not Mr. Baker. "That was O.K. with me," Mr. Baker wrote in his book.

But in the crisis over the vote count in Florida in 2000, the younger Mr. Bush was prevailed on to reach out to Mr. Baker. People close to the family said Mr. Baker's brilliant managing of the team of lawyers and political experts in that fight banished the younger man's doubts about his loyalty.

"My perception is that Baker feels that with Florida he recouped his relationship with the family," said a friend of Mr. Baker's. "That's very important to him personally."

That friend as well as others who spoke for this article did not want to be quoted discussing Mr. Baker's relationship with the Bush family, a subject that Mr. Baker himself refuses to talk about.

DOJ_NMG_0084209

The friendship between Mr. Baker and the elder Mr. Bush is legendary among their friends. The two men had been friends for years when Mr. Baker's wife died of breast cancer in 1970, leaving him close to despair. Mr. Bush offered Mr. Baker refuge from his grief by asking him to join his Senate campaign in Texas, though Mr. Baker had to change his registration from Democrat to Republican.

The Senate campaign failed, and Mr. Baker went on to more failures and successes: managing Mr. Bush's first presidential run in 1980, serving as President Reagan's chief of staff and treasury secretary, then as manager of Mr. Bush's successful White House campaign in 1988 and later as Mr. Bush's secretary of state.

For some time, Mr. Baker now acknowledges, he shared the limited regard that many people had of George W. Bush. Like others, he attributes Mr. Bush's eventual success to the discipline and Christian faith that led him to turn his life around in his 40's. In his book, Mr. Baker said he has tremendous admiration for the current president.

But reading between the lines, it seems that admiration may not extend to others in the Bush administration.

The Iraq Study Group, for example, may not recommend a change of personnel in the administration along with a change of course, but many doubt that those associated with the current approach could carry out a new one.

It is well known that Mr. Baker is not a great fan of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. Mr. Baker said in his book that Mr. Rumsfeld "engineered" the elder Mr. Bush out of contention as a vice-presidential candidate under President Ford in 1976.

Mr. Baker wrote of the "costly mistakes" of the war, including the lack of adequate troops and the dismantling of the Iraqi Army. But he attributed those failings to the Defense Department, not the White House.

The one hallmark of Mr. Baker's efforts, associates said, is that he would not undertake a project destined to sit on a shelf and be ignored. "Jim Baker knows that Iraq is a mess," said Dennis B. Ross, the longtime Middle East envoy who remains a close adviser to Mr. Baker. "But this is not going to be an academic exercise. He's going to try to come up with a solution that also allows him to persuade the president that this is the right way to go."

If there is an analogy to Mr. Baker's enterprise, it could be the Social Security commission of the early 1980's under President Reagan. There was an impasse between Mr. Reagan and House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr., the Democratic lion and opponent of Mr. Reagan's desire to overhaul the system.

Alan Greenspan, the retired chairman of the commission, recalled in an interview that he had remained in constant touch with Mr. Baker, then White House chief of staff, while the commission's top Democrat was in constant touch with Mr. O'Neill.

The eventual compromise preserved the Social Security system, but subjected benefits of the wealthy to taxation.

"Jim is one of the best negotiators I've ever seen," Mr. Greenspan said. "Were he not involved in the Social Security commission, I seriously question whether we could have pulled it off."

Bush Pins Label Of 'Defeat' Party On Democrats (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

President Bush yesterday said Democrats became the party of "doubt and defeat" during the fight against communism in the Cold War, and said it shows today in their calls for withdrawal from Iraq.

The president also said terrorists are trying to influence the debate in the United States by making images and video clips of their attacks on U.S. troops available to cable news networks "and opinion leaders throughout the West."

"The Democrat Party that has evolved from one that was confident in its capacity to help deal with the problems of the world to one that is doubting, today still has an approach of doubt and defeat," Mr. Bush said in a campaign speech to donors to the National Republican Senatorial Committee at the Mayflower Hotel near the White House.

He said that shift began in 1972, with the nomination of George McGovern to run for president, continued into President Jimmy Carter's administration and characterized Democrats during Republican President Ronald Reagan's administration.

"They'd gotten to the point where they didn't think that we could win," Mr. Bush said. "Many of their leaders fought the Reagan defense buildup; they fought his Strategic Defense Initiative; they opposed the liberation of Grenada; they didn't like America's support for freedom fighters resisting Soviet puppet regimes."

He contrasted that with Presidents John F. Kennedy and Harry S. Truman, who he said "understood the challenges of their time and were willing to confront those challenges with strong leadership."

Mr. Bush finds himself trying to rally support for the war in Iraq in the face of declining support for both the war and for his own presidency, and with congressional elections little more than two weeks away.

He also is facing more questions from inside his party, as well as from Democrats, over specific tactics and strategy during a violent month for both U.S. forces and Iraqi civilians.

In an interview with the Associated Press yesterday, Mr. Bush acknowledged "tough" times in Iraq, but said the United States is always changing tactics.

The president met yesterday with Gen. John Abizaid, commander of U.S. Central Command, and is scheduled today to hold a briefing with military commanders and top civilian officials.

Democrats said the current flare-up in violence means Mr. Bush's strategy is failing.

"The eruptive situation in Iraq reflects that we are reaping the ultimate results of perils of the amateur strategy formulated by our civilian leaders in the early phases of this conflict," said Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the top Democrat on the House Armed Services Committee.

Mr. Skelton, a respected Democratic voice on military matters, said there needs to be "a major change in strategy that will shift the military mission to the Iraqis, allowing for the redeployment over time of American forces, and that will pressure the Iraqi government to disarm the militias."

Meanwhile, the Democratic leadership in the House and Senate wrote a letter urging Mr. Bush to tell the Iraqis the U.S. commitment is not limitless.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld seemed to agree yesterday, saying in a briefing with reporters that U.S. officials are working with the Iraqi government to try to set a schedule for turning over responsibility for the country's security.

"It's their country, they're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later. And that means they've got to take pieces of it as we go along," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

Over the past two days, the Bush administration has argued that the increased violence is an attempt to influence U.S. opinion, particularly in the run-up to the midterm elections. Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, spokesman for the multinational force in Iraq, raised that possibility Thursday, as did White House spokesman Tony Snow.

And yesterday Mr. Bush said the terrorists exploit the press by filming their attacks and e-mailing images and video clips "to Middle Eastern cable networks like Al Jazeera, and opinion leaders throughout the West."

Mr. Snow later pointed to CNN as a network that "has shown pictures of snipers hitting Americans, which was used as a propaganda tool," as evidence of that claim.

But Mr. Snow said those videos are one-sided, and don't do justice to the state of the war.

"I'm sure the editors are savvy enough to know that when they get a video like this, it's designed less to give you a full and complete view of what's going on in the country than to create a sense of triumphalism for the killers of Americans," he said. "That's the intention of that. I think that's hard to dispute."

Hutchison: WMD Info Swayed Vote On Iraq (AP)

By Suzanne Gamboa

AP, October 21, 2006

Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, one of President Bush's most ardent loyalists on the war in Iraq, voiced her strongest criticism yet of the administration's reasons for going to war.

In a debate with her challenger in the Nov. 7 election, Hutchison, R-Texas, said she would not have voted for war had she known there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. But she also made it clear she does not support troop withdrawal.

"If I had known then what I know now about the weapons of mass destruction, which was a key reason that I voted to go in there, I would not vote to go into Iraq the way we did," Hutchison said. "But I have to say, I don't think the president would have asked for that vote, either. We had intelligence that we relied on."

Her comments Thursday night come as a small but growing number of Republicans are suggesting a change in the Iraq strategy may be necessary.

She recently has been edging slightly away from President Bush on the war. This week she told Texas newspapers the option of partitioning Iraq into semiautonomous regions should be considered.

The White House said it has rejected that option.

In July 2004, the bipartisan Senate Intelligence Committee found key U.S. assertions leading to the Iraq war — that Saddam Hussein had chemical and biological weapons and was working to make nuclear weapons — were wrong or based on faulty CIA analyses.

A September report by a Democratic Senate panel said the White House painted a portrait of Iraq of having ties to al-Qaida based in part on intelligence it knew was flawed.

Republicans attacked the report as recycled information and accused Democrats of election-year politicking on the eve of the fifth anniversary of the terrorist attacks.

Hutchison's opponent, Democrat Barbara Radnofsky criticized the senator's debate statement, saying it was evidence the U.S. should not be in Iraq.

"It's clear the Senate papers reflect a lack of consensus or decisiveness that there was weapons of mass destruction. They were there, she just didn't read them," Radnofsky said.

DOJ_NMG_0084211

Allen Faces Questions On Iraq War Stance (AP)

By Bob Lewis

AP, October 21, 2006

Republican Sen. George Allen called for "changes in tactics" in how the U.S. is fighting the Iraq war on Friday as he continued to face questions about his morphing position on the war.

"The situation there is one that needs adjustments, that needs changes in tactics. We need to adapt to the situation on the ground," Allen said at a campaign event Friday morning with GOP leaders of the state legislature.

Even so, Allen, whom polls show to be in a tight Senate race with Democratic candidate Jim Webb, has yet to reject or criticize the hard line on Iraq that he had touted for months and that President Bush repeated Thursday at an Allen fundraiser.

Allen and Webb appeared separately later Friday in Hampton at a forum of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, where each signed up for lifetime membership.

Allen used the event to try to put behind him allegations that he has been insensitive to racial concerns, recounting efforts to provide money for historically black colleges and universities, as well as his trip to Selma, Ala., with Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., to honor the bloody civil rights march there 40 years ago.

Once regarded only as a warm-up race for a presumed 2008 Allen presidential bid, the race became competitive in August after Allen singled out a man of Indian descent before a mostly white crowd at a rally and called him "macaca," which can be considered a racial slur.

Webb couched the coming election as "a choice between those who have power and those who will stand up to power."

Webb has been a critic of the war since 2002, before the U.S.-led invasion, when he wrote that it would mire the United States in a bloody and protracted quagmire and destabilize the oil-rich region. He cited the war, in part, for his decision to leave the GOP. He was asked no questions about Iraq at the Friday event.

Allen began shifting his public position on the unpopular war two weeks ago after fellow Virginia Sen. John Warner, a five-term moderate and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, returned from an Iraq visit saying the war was "drifting sideways," with Iraq's fledgling government unable to disarm its deadly sectarian militias.

Allen continued to hedge his views on the war at the NAACP event.

"Progress in Iraq has not been sufficiently fast as far as I'm concerned," Allen said. But he added, "to leave Iraq a safe haven for terrorists is not an acceptable risk."

On Friday, Allen began televising a new ad in which John Warner says, "George and I stand for a safe and strong America."

Even in conservative Virginia, polls show lagging support for the war. A recent Washington Post poll of 1,004 likely Virginia voters showed that 44 percent believed the war worth fighting considering its costs to the U.S., and 54 percent said it was not worth fighting.

But Allen won't stiff-arm the president, who on Thursday raised an estimated $600,000 for him in a paid media campaign that is costing both sides well over $1 million a week in television time alone.

"I think the point of the matter we ought to take into consideration is the risk here, the risk facing our country, how we need to improve, how we need to adapt, how the Iraqi people have to stand up for their own sovereignty and control their own destiny," Allen said Friday.

A Washington Post poll released Sunday showed Allen favored by 49 percent of voters surveyed last week, while Webb had 47 percent support. The results were within the poll's margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Rumsfeld: Iraq Must Take Over Security (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, October 21, 2006

The Iraqi government is going to have to take over its country's security "sooner rather than later," Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Friday, as the violence there continued to escalate.

Rumsfeld said U.S. officials, including Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, are working with the Iraqi government to develop projections as to when they think they can pass off various pieces of responsibility. He provided no detail.

"The biggest mistake would be to not pass things over to the Iraqis, create a dependency on their part, instead of developing strength and capacity and competence," said Rumsfeld. "It's their country, they're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later. And that means they've got to take pieces of it as we go along."

DOJ_NMG_0084212

Rumsfeld has made similar comments before about gradually turning control of the country from American forces to Iraqi authorities.

But Friday's remarks came less than three weeks before elections in which Democrats are threatening to recapture control of Congress. A leading issue in the campaign is the war, which is widely unpopular with voters. U.S. deaths have surpassed 2,780, and President Bush is under growing pressure from lawmakers of both parties to alter his policies.

The secretary also said military commanders will speak with Bush on Saturday to discuss the situation in Iraq, although he said such discussions are not unusual.

He also said the biggest mistake would be to not continue turning regions of the country over to the Iraqis, even if that means the U.S. has to go back and retake control because the Iraqis are overwhelmed.

In recent weeks, the security situation in Iraq has continued to spiral out of control. Shiite militia stormed police stations in Amarah Friday, seizing that southern Iraqi city. Bush noted he was scheduled to speak with U.S. commanders to determine if a change in tactics is necessary to combat the escalating violence.

Bush told The Associated Press that the situation is Iraq is "tough" and that the Iraqi government is going to have to deal firmly with the militias.

On Thursday the U.S. military acknowledged that the latest two-month operation to quell the violence had not met expectations and defense officials were rethinking their strategy there. There are currently 144,000 U.S. forces in Iraq.

Rumsfeld spoke to reporters at the conclusion of meetings with South Korea's defense minister, Yoon Kwang Ung, to discuss a number of issues. They included North Korea's recent nuclear test and the ongoing U.S. commitment to defend the region against a nuclear threat.

Rumsfeld: Iraq Must Stand Up 'Sooner' (WT/UPI)

The Washington Times/UPI, October 21, 2006

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld told reporters Friday that Iraq must take responsibility "sooner rather than later" for its own security.

At a briefing, Rumsfeld refused to say whether a "course correction" is needed in U.S. strategy. He said he prefers to give his advice directly to the president, the Washington Post reported.

Rumsfeld is scheduled to confer Saturday with President George W. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Gen. John Abizaid, head of Central Command. Gen. George Casey, the head of U.S. forces in Iraq, is to join the discussion from Baghdad by video.

October has been an especially deadly month for U.S. forces in Iraq and for Iraqis. Last weekend, sectarian violence erupted in Bladad, a city north of Baghdad, while U.S. troops in a massive base nearby did nothing for several days, the newspaper said.

Exit Vibrations (WT)

By Clarence Page

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

President Bush says it's not true, but recent events related to Iraq indicate the administration is leaning toward the George Aiken option: Declare victory and come home.

Mr. Aiken is the late Republican senator from Vermont who is credited with offering that advice early in the Vietnam War. It could have saved us Americans and the Vietnamese a lot of grief.

A number of observers in recent years, including your humble column-scrivener, have suggested a similar answer to our worsening, no-win situation in Iraq. The White House has not listened, and the Iraq debacle has gotten worse. Iraq has sunk deeper into what looks like a civil war and the Bush administration has sunk deeper into denial.

But recent events indicate that, despite Mr. Bush's mantra about "staying the course" in Iraq, he's looking for an exit strategy.

Former Secretary of State James Baker, a savvy negotiator and reliable Bush family friend, has re-emerged as the Republican co-chairman with former Indiana Rep. Lee Hamilton, a Democrat, of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. With the administration's support, the study group was created at the urging of Congress last March to reassess the war and come up with suggestions.

The group is withholding its report until after the November elections. But Mr. Baker's remarks in recent interviews offer important hints.

DOJ_NMG_0084213

For example, Mr. Baker teased our curiosity in an ABC-TV interview last Sunday with this: "I think it's fair to say our commission believes that there are alternatives between the stated alternatives -- the ones that are out there in the political debate -- of 'stay the course' and 'cut and run.'"

Amid the cacophony of Washington's polarized shouting matches, Mr. Baker's words sounded like the voice of reason Americans took for granted in the years of President George H.W. Bush. Mr. Baker stood with the elder Mr. Bush against those who wanted the U.S. to invade Baghdad during the Persian Gulf war, in defiance of the United Nations mandate. The regional instability Mr. Baker feared from such an invasion has happened with today's Iraq war.

Obviously, the younger Mr. Bush should have listened to Mr. Baker's advice before embarking on his Iraq adventure. Instead, he went along in the heat of post-September 11 passions with Vice President Dick Cheney and other eager neo-conservatives who thought U.S. soldiers would be greeted with flowers and candy.

Author-journalist Bob Woodward and other close observers say the younger Mr. Bush steadfastly avoids turning to his dad for advice, for reasons all his own, despite his father's superior international expertise. Yet, though the younger Bush's often vows to "stay the course" against those who want to "cut and run," he also says he is willing to "change tactics" in Iraq if the Baker-Hamilton group recommends it.

If so, the Baker group could offer cover for the younger Mr. Bush to do something he is loathe to do in public: change his mind.

His promise to "stay the course" in Iraq until "the job gets done" could undergo subtle alteration. If Mr. Baker's group defines a new "job" for America in Iraq, it could "get done" in whatever way the president says it should. Americans could declare victory and come home.

But what next? If Mr. Bush's softened stance offers a light at the end of Iraq's long, dark tunnel, to borrow a Vietnam-era metaphor, let us hope the light is not that of an oncoming train.

In interviews, Mr. Baker has rejected a quick withdrawal from Iraq, fearing "the biggest civil war you've ever seen." Unfortunately, the mounting casualties amid factional fighting indicate Iraq already has a growing civil war.

In fact, Iraq's best direction may come through a partitioning of the country between its dominant Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish factions. President Bush rejected that option this week in expressing support for Iraq's embattled Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

But that's just as well. An American endorsement of partitioning probably would doom its acceptance by Iraqis and their regional neighbors. If Iraq is to be partitioned, responsible Iraqi leaders will have to work that out.

Mr. Baker is right to say Americans cannot be the sole deciders of Iraq's future. There are no perfect or peaceful solutions for Iraq in the short term. There are more hard days to come. But, whether in war or in peace, Iraq's future ultimately must be decided by Iraqis. As that happens, the best thing that Americans can do is to declare victory and get out of the way.

Clarence Page is a nationally syndicated columnist.

Sadr Militia Briefly Seizes Southern City (WP)

By John Ward Anderson, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Deadly Fighting Reflects Rifts Among Iraqi Shiites

BAGHDAD, Oct. 20 -- Members of the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite militia headed by firebrand cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, briefly took over the southern Iraqi city of Amarah and battled with the local Shiite police before withdrawing on Friday, in a bloody feud that illustrated deepening rifts within Iraq's largest sect and the growing turmoil in the south.

As many as 25 people, including 10 policemen, were killed in street fighting and mortar attacks that raged in Amarah, a predominantly Shiite city about 190 miles southeast of Baghdad, from midday Thursday until about 2 p.m. Friday. The militia attacked the headquarters and two stations of the city police department, which is reportedly aligned with the Badr Brigades, an arm of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a powerful Shiite religious party.

Each side blamed the other in a cycle of retaliatory clashes with tribal overtones.

Residents reached by telephone said the conflict began when a police intelligence chief with the Supreme Council was assassinated, and police responded by arresting the brother of a local Mahdi Army chief.

Negotiations to release him broke down, they said, and at about 1 p.m. on Thursday members of the Mahdi Army attacked three police facilities with mortar fire and rocket-propelled grenades. The militia imposed a curfew and patrolled the streets with loudspeakers, ordering residents to stay inside.

The takeover ended, according to Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a British military spokesman, "when Moqtada al-Sadr told them to stop. The situation now is calm but tense."

Burbridge said about 200 to 300 gunmen were involved in the attacks. He said the local police chief said that 10 of his men were killed and that police killed 15 members of the militia and wounded 90.

DOJ_NMG_0084214

Burbridge said police officers were back in their stations and in control of the streets. He said 220 Iraqi army troops were in the town supporting them, and that 700 more Iraqi soldiers and 500 British troops were on standby to go if requested.

British troops withdrew from Amarah, the capital of Maysan province, two months ago after their camp came under repeated mortar fire from Shiite militiamen identified by local residents as members of the Mahdi Army.

Southern Iraq, a Shiite stronghold, has generally been spared the intense bloodletting that terrorist attacks and sectarian violence have brought to much of the rest of the country. But the Mahdi Army's takeover of Amarah, even if only temporary, is another sign that the south is becoming more restive as the rest of the country slips toward open civil war.

It also is a stark illustration of the deepening tension among Shiite leaders as the United States pushes the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to rein in militias, particularly Sadr's. The Mahdi Army has openly fought U.S. forces and has been accused of ruthlessly attacking Sunni Arabs and forcing them from their homes and towns. The fierce struggle between Shiite factions at the local level mirrors that at the national level, where the same groups are flexing their political and military muscle in a battle for control.

Maliki, who heads a government led by Shiite religious parties and was backed by Sadr, sent a ministerial team led by Sherwan al-Wailli, minister of state for national security, to the province to help settle the conflict.

"This was a very serious incident, but the silver lining is that Iraqi security forces were able to deal with it without the need of multinational forces to intervene," Burbridge said. "The Iraqi police and army resolved the situation, and it was conducted through negotiations instead of armed violence."

In Baghdad, a spokesman for the Interior Ministry, Brig. Abdul Karim Khalaf Kinany, said the clashes were not driven by intra-Shiite conflict, but by tribal differences.

"The clashes in Amarah were not between the police and the Mahdi Army," he said. "Police had in fact interfered to settle a tribal dispute between the tribe of the police officer, the head of the intelligence division . . . and the tribesmen of the suspects who were arrested by the police on suspicion of carrying out the assassination."

Burbridge described the gunmen as "a rogue element of one militia" who gave up the fight about 2 p.m. Friday after "their leadership told them to come back into line, and the violence stopped."

Special correspondent Saad al-Izzi contributed to this report.

Siege Of Amarah Reflects Trouble In Baghdad (LAT)

By Louise Roug, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

Deadly clashes between Shiite fighters and police ebb. But two days of mayhem show the Iraqi government's difficulty reining in militias.

BAGHDAD — As hundreds of masked, black-clad men descended on a normally quiet southern city Friday and gunfire echoed outside, Ahmed and Roqayah Jasim locked the doors of their modest home. They prayed for themselves and their three young children.

Then they heard a knock on the door. Ahmed, a 33-year-old teacher, reluctantly opened it. A fighter no older than 20 stood holding a sniper rifle.

"He didn't threaten me," Ahmed said later, still stunned. "He just asked me, like a favor, 'Can I use your roof to shoot from?' And I said, 'No you can't. I have a family.' He seemed to understand, and so he left."

By Friday evening, two days of fighting in the southern city of Amarah between police and the Al Mahdi army militia, which is loyal to anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr, had eased. The national government rushed soldiers and a high-level security delegation to the city, led by national security minister Sherwan Waili. Sadr also sent representatives. Government officials and tribal elders met into the evening, trying to negotiate a solution to the conflict.

U.S. Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said in Washington that he believed Iraqi security forces had regained control of the area.

But the two-day offensive by the Al Mahdi army highlighted how difficult it has become for the central government and its security forces to rein in Shiite Muslim militias, both in the capital and in the south.

The militias fired mortar rounds at police stations where officers had barricaded themselves. When police ran out of ammunition and fled, Al Mahdi militiamen blew up at least two of the stations. During 48 hours of ferocious street battles in the oil-rich city of 300,000, 22 people were killed and almost 100 were injured.

Prime Minister Nouri Maliki visited Sadr this week in the holy city of Najaf to ask for his support in clamping down on bands of militiamen who kill with impunity. But Maliki also depends for political support on Sadr, who controls 30 seats in the Council or Representatives, or parliament. And despite Sadr's intermittent calls for calm, violence has continued unabated.

Amarah residents said they were worried.

DOJ_NMG_0084215

"Today we have those delegations, but what about tomorrow?" asked Khalil Rasheed, a 55-year-old shopkeeper, who said his city was beset by armed thugs bent on enforcing religious rule. "The situation is more dangerous than people imagine."

"I'm worried, seeing those people taking control," said Haitham Sadek, Ahmed Jasim's colleague. "The future will be horrible if these people are going to control" Amarah, he said.

Shiite militiamen have whipped those caught drinking alcohol and killed women accused of adultery, Sadek said. He said he recently saw the funeral of a nurse who was killed after she was accused of adultery.

British troops abruptly pulled out of a base in the city in late August, to hand power to Iraqi security forces and free up the soldiers to patrol the Iranian border. Their camp was promptly pillaged and burned by looters, some of them carrying pictures of Sadr.

At the time, Sadr's militia broadcast messages over loudspeakers throughout Amarah proclaiming victory.

"This is the first Iraqi city that has kicked out the occupier," one announcement said. "We have to celebrate this occasion."

Handing over control to the Iraqi army and police is key to the strategy of U.S.-led military forces, but the Iraqis often have proved inadequate, especially when facing Shiite militias.

During a similar battle between Iraqi forces and Shiite militiamen in the southern city of Diwaniya in late August, American troops eventually had to come to the aid of beleaguered Iraqi soldiers.

Rumsfeld told reporters in Washington that there would be setbacks when U.S. and British forces handed control to Iraqi forces, and that the U.S.-led coalition would step in and try to restore order.

"It is never going to be a straight, smooth, steady path," Rumsfeld said at a news conference. "The biggest mistake would be to not pass things over to the Iraqis, create a dependency on their part instead of developing strength and capacity and competence."

Police officers in Amarah, nearly 200 miles southeast of Baghdad, stood their ground in some cases, defending stations until their ammunition ran out. But in other cases, they simply ran when faced with the heavily armed attackers, witnesses said.

Assailants overran three police stations in the city, blowing up at least two of them. Unknown gunmen burned down the local Sadr office in apparent retaliation, witnesses said.

The fighting began Thursday afternoon. Carrying AK-47s, the black-clad militiamen fanned out across the city. The gunmen stopped one police patrol, telling officers to get out of the car. Watching the officers flee, leaving guns and equipment behind, one doctor said he was sickened by how powerless he felt.

Men using loudspeakers on cars and at mosques advised residents to stay inside.

Like others, Jasim became a prisoner in his house.

"Even standing at the gate, even looking through the window, was impossible because bullets were flying in all directions," he said. When the sniper knocked on the door Friday morning, Jasim and his wife were huddling with their children, Hussein, 5; Zainab, 3; and Fatma, 1; inside the most secure room in the house.

"We were afraid but, thank God, he showed understanding," Jasim said of the sniper.

The fighting was spurred by the killing this week of the provincial head of intelligence, Col. Ali Qassem Tamimi, who died in a roadside bombing along with five of his guards. Members of his tribe accused Sadr's militia and took revenge by kidnapping the brother of the local Al Mahdi army leader.

Shahib Amiri, a Sadr official in Najaf, said the cleric had sent his delegates to try to quell the violence because he "does not accept such acts."

As elsewhere in the south, the security situation has lately deteriorated in Amarah.

When British forces first arrived, southern Iraq was relatively peaceful and troops patrolled the streets without flak jackets, wearing soft hats instead of helmets. But the calm slowly evaporated as Shiite militias became more assertive.

By August this year, just before their departure, British troops were constantly barraged by mortar fire and rockets in their camp in Amarah.

Hamid Rashi, a government official, longed for the days when the British patrolled the city. "They are the only force who can stand in the face of the Mahdi army," he said. "I don't think that the Iraqi army can settle the situation."

Elsewhere in Iraq on Friday, at least 10 people were reported killed in mortar attacks north of the capital near Balad, where sectarian fighting erupted last week. In Baghdad, four people were killed the previous night in a mortar attack, according to police officials. The American military also announced that a soldier died Friday when his vehicle struck a roadside bomb in southwest Baghdad.

louise.roug@latimes.com

Times staff writers Raheem Salman and Saif Hameed in Baghdad and Julian E. Barnes in Washington and a special correspondent in Amarah contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0084216

Shiite Militias Attack Iraqi Government Forces In Amara (MCT)

By Zaineb Obeid And Nancy A. Youssef

McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq - Hundreds of members of Shiite cleric Muqtada al Sadr's militia seized control of three police stations in a southern Iraqi city Friday, in another sign that Iraqi government forces are unable or unwilling to subdue rogue elements.

As many 20 people were killed and another 90 were injured.

Amara residents said the attack was the latest battle in a long fight for control of the city among government forces, Sadr's Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization, which is backed by a rival Shiite party, the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq. Sadr's forces and the Badr Organization receive support from Iran.

Iraqi and British officials said the city was back under control by the end of the day, but many remain worried that sectarian violence is escalating across the country as Shiite militias battle government forces, Sunni Muslim fighters and sometimes one another.

Sadrists appear to have gained considerable influence in several cities in Iraq's largely Shiite south, where they attacked government forces earlier this month in the city of Diwaniyah.

Earlier this week, Shiites and Sunnis killed each other in retaliatory violence around the northern city of Balad, a Shiite community surrounded by Sunni towns. U.S. officials, who'd handed over control of Balad to Iraqi forces last April, had to intervene to stop the violence.

Likewise, British officials had returned control of Amara - the capital of Misan province, which borders Iran - to Iraqi forces in August. They, too, had to help quell an outbreak of fighting Friday.

It's unclear how much control Sadr has over some members of his militia, which has expanded and splintered since he founded it in 2003. During Friday's fighting, some militiamen appeared to defy the firebrand cleric's orders for calm.

"I am asking all to keep quiet and not to be dragged (into) the occupation schemes, which aim to escalate strife," Sadr said in a statement. "Anybody who does not obey this order should consider himself disavowed from the Mahdi Army and bear responsibility for what he did."

The killing Wednesday of the head of police intelligence in Amara spurred a full-scale battle. Police charged that Sadrists killed Lt. Ali al Tamami, a member of the Badr Organization. The next day, his family captured the brother of a local Mahdi Army leader, charging that he was responsible for Tamimi's murder, said Abdul Mahdi Omar, a member of the provincial council.

The Mahdi Army said it would attack if police didn't release the captive by 2 p.m. Friday. When he wasn't freed, hundreds of gunmen stormed the city's two police stations and its major crimes unit, setting them ablaze and destroying the buildings.

"All the police stations in the city and the suburbs and the outskirts have fallen into the Sadrists' hands," Wahid Hammed, 38, a worker in Amara, said in a midday interview with McClatchy Newspapers. "The Sadrists control the city."

Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki sent a delegation to the city to try to calm tensions, and it was negotiating a peace deal along with tribal leaders. After they began meeting and Sadr issued a statement, the situation began to calm down, residents said. But a Mahdi Army Web site said militiamen had to defy Sadr's orders briefly to reclaim control of their Amara office from the police.

In other news, U.S. officials announced that a soldier was killed Friday by a homemade bomb in southern Baghdad, bringing the monthly death toll for the American military in Iraq to at least 74. If the trend continues, October could be the deadliest month for the U.S. since November 2004, when American forces launched an offensive in the mostly Sunni western city of Fallujah.

Amara Unrest Strains Plans For Unified Iraq (FT)

By Steve Negus, Iraq Correspondent, And Agencies

Financial Times, October 21, 2006

A radical Iraqi militia group stormed police stations in a bid to take over the southern provincial capital of Amara on Friday, in a move that threatens to set back British plans to hand over control of the area to local security forces.

Fighters from the Mahdi Army, a movement that is nominally loyal to the Shia radical cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, seized and demolished three police stations, news agencies quoted witnesses and police as saying. Others patrolled the streets and commandeered police vehicles or set up checkpoints on the outskirts of town. At least 15 people were reported killed. The fighting, which appears to be a feud between rival Shia factions, comes amid US attempts to force the government of prime minister Nouri al-Maliki to clamp down on militia activity. Complicating the situation is the fact that a number of seats in Mr Maliki's Shia-led coalition are occupied by politicians loyal to Mr Sadr.

The Iraqi government dispatched an emergency delegation to Amara, a town of 75,000 people, headed by Shirwan al-Waily, minister of state for national security, and also reinforced army units in the region.

DOJ_NMG_0084217

"We're still studying the situation [in Amara] and trying to figure out exactly what's going on," Tony Snow, White House spokesman, said.

Rival groups reportedly clash frequently in Maysan, the lawless province of which Amara is the capital, although Friday's fighting appeared to be far larger than any previous incident. According to wire reports, the fighting broke out after a high-ranking policeman affiliated with another militia, the Badr Brigade, was killed by a roadside bomb, and his family kidnapped the teenage brother of the Mahdi Army's local commander.

The fighters, however, reportedly withdrew from some of their positions after an envoy from Mr Sadr neg-otiated a temporary ceasefire.

The BBC reported that the British Ministry of Defence said UK troops in the area could intervene if the Iraqi government requested it.

The fighting threatens to disrupt British plans to complete the handover of the four Shia-majority provinces in their area of responsibility to local authorities. British and other coalition forces had already pulled out of two of the four provinces in their zone in June and September and withdrew from Amara in August.

A key criterion for full withdrawal would be the ability of local security forces to maintain control of the province themselves, without falling back on foreign troops or the Iraqi army.

Conflicts between Shia militias are also blamed for a surge of lawlessness in the first half of this year in the neighbouring governorate of Basra, the fourth province in the British zone.

The Mahdi Army is also blamed for much of the sectarian killing that has left thousands dead in Baghdad and central Iraq in recent months, although US officials say much of the militia has fractured into smaller cells that do not necessarily answer to Mr Sadr.

The Amara upheaval provides a further sign that the main ethnic and sectarian blocs are not only warring against each other but are fractured internally as well.

Shiite Militia Briefly Seizes Iraqi City (AP-Y)

By Steven R. Hurst, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

Black-uniformed, hooded gunmen loyal to an anti-American Shiite cleric briefly seized the major southern city of Amarah on Friday in an audacious drive against local security forces, largely controlled by Iraq's other main Shiite militia.

Twenty-five gunmen and police died in gunbattles before the Iraqi army moved in to retake the city of 750,000 people at the head of Iraq's famous marshlands where the Tigris and Euphrates rivers draw close together. Amarah is 30 miles from the border with Iran, where the Shiite theocracy is said to be funding, arming and training both rival militias.

The Amarah showdown between the two virtual private armies highlighted the potential for an all-out conflict between them and their political sponsors, both with large blocs in parliament and important to the survival of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's shaky 4-month-old government.

It also underlined the deep underlying rift that exists between the firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's faction, whose forces took Amarah on Friday, and that of the more traditional but powerful Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, or SCIRI, headed by key power broker Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who spent decades in Iranian exile during Saddam Hussein's rule.

The U.S. exit strategy depends on returning military and political control to the Iraqi government, but outbreaks of civil conflict raise doubts about how long that will take and add urgency to a policy review under way among Bush administration political and military officials.

President Bush conceded Friday that "right now it's tough" for American forces in Iraq, but the White House said he would not change U.S. strategy in the face of pre-election polls that show voters are upset. Bush said the war was at a difficult stage and that he was preparing to consult about a change in tactics with key generals — Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and Gen. George Casey, who leads the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said that despite the violence in Amarah, it was not a strategic error for the British to turn over control of the city to the Iraqis in August.

"The biggest mistake would be to not pass things over to the Iraqis, create a dependency on their part, instead of developing strength and capacity and competence," Rumsfeld said.

The clashes marred the Muslim day of prayer for the second Friday in a row in cities where American and British forces had only recently ceded military control to Iraqi security forces and the army. More than 100 people were slain in Balad this past week, most of them by Shiite deaths squads drawn largely from al-Sadr's Mahdi Army.

DOJ_NMG_0084218

The Mahdi Army held Amarah for several hours in an embarrassingly strong showing against the local police and security forces, controlled by the Badr Brigade militia loyal to SCIRI, the country's dominant political force with deep and historic links to Iran.

Elsewhere in Iraq on Friday, police reported the deaths of 34 people, including 10 killed in mortar attacks overnight in Balad, an hour north of the capital, and a family of nine Shiites shot to death when gunmen burst into their home in Aziziyah, 35 miles southeast of Baghdad.

A U.S. soldier was killed when his vehicle was hit by a roadside bomb southwest of the capital. A Salvadoran Army captain was killed and four soldiers were wounded when their convoy hit an explosive device in Wasit province, El Salvador's defense department said.

Until recently, Baghdad had been the focus of sectarian and Sunni insurgent killers, prompting the United States to launch a drive in August to rid the capital of the gunmen and torturers. An additional 12,000 U.S. and Iraqi forces were put on the streets for the task.

But two months into the operation, the U.S. combat death toll in October alone stood at 75 — likely to be the highest for any month in nearly two years. Attacks on Americans jumped by 22 percent in the first three weeks of the holy month of Ramadan, when compared to the three previous weeks. The U.S. military spokesman in Iraq said the bid to cleanse the capital was failing and needs to be refocused.

Against that background, the Amarah turmoil and killings looked more ominous, especially as it marked one of the first serious armed confrontations among Shiites. Most recent killings in Iraq involved tit-for-tat attacks between Shiites and Sunni Arabs, the minority sect in Iraq that dominated the country until Saddam's ouster.

Amarah is a major population center in the resource-rich yet impoverished south and a traditional center of Shiite defiance to successive Iraqi regimes. Its marshlands were drained by Saddam during the 1990s in reprisal for the city's role in the Shiite uprising after the Gulf War. Saddam ordered the killing of tens of thousands of Shiites in retribution.

The British military spokesman in Basra, headquarters for Britain's 7,200 soldiers in Iraq, sought to play down the seriousness of Friday's fighting, noting that 600 Iraqi soldiers were able to force Mahdi Army fighters off the streets, arrange a truce and return quiet to the city by Friday afternoon. Estimates of the number of Mahdi Army fighters ranged between 200 and 800.

"It's like when you take the training wheels off a bike. There are some wobbles. This was a pretty big wobble, but it's still moving in the right direction," said spokesman Maj. Charlie Burbridge.

"They (Iraqi security forces) have applied a solution and at the moment it's holding," he said. "At the moment, it's tense but calm."

Five-hundred British soldiers were on standby if the government called for help. Burbridge said 25 gunmen and police were killed, adding that a British drone overhead the city recorded the events all day.

At the height of the fighting Friday, AP Television News video showed thick, black smoke billowing from behind barricades at a police station, much of it from vehicles set on fire inside the compound. Hooded gunmen roamed the streets with Kalashnikov automatic rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers. Most of the streets were deserted except for the gunmen.

The militiamen later withdrew from their positions and lifted their siege under a truce brokered by an al-Sadr envoy as the Iraqi forces entered the city.

The fighting came just days after al-Maliki met with al-Sadr at the cleric's Najaf headquarters to enlist support for capping sectarian violence and to bolster his government, which is increasingly at odds with the United States for not disbanding the militias, among other issues.

The timing of the violence may have indicated al-Sadr and other Mahdi Army commanders did not have full control over individual units, lending weight to speculation that Shiite gunmen were splitting off from the main organization to pursue their own agendas. The U.S. military said it counts 23 separate militias in Baghdad alone.

The Amarah fighting was believed to have begun over the killing Thursday of Qassim al-Tamimi, the provincial head of police intelligence and a leading member of the Badr Brigade militia.

In retaliation, his family kidnapped the teenage brother of the Mahdi Army commander in Amarah, Sheik Fadel al-Bahadli, and demanded he find and hand over al-Tamimi's killers. The Mahdi Army then stormed into the city overnight and held it for several hours Friday. It was not clear if al-Bahadli's brother was released.

Many Iraqis Look To Gunmen As Protectors (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084219

BAGHDAD, Oct. 20 — Behind the maze of men with guns in Iraq is a very simple truth: their barrels offer protection, something Iraqis say the government has never given them.

On Friday, the web wound tightly around the southern city of Amara, where the two largest and best-armed militias, both made up of religious Shiites, were fighting for control of the city.

But when the prime minister speaks of disarming militias — those mushrooming armies of men with guns that carry out most of the killing here — Iraqi brows begin to furrow.

"He's just talking," snapped Fadhil Sabri, a 37-year-old generator repairman in a grease-stained shop in Sadr City, a Baghdad stronghold of the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia.

"Not now. Not even in 10 years. You need arms to defend yourself," he said.

Iraq is awash in killings, and many are blamed on the Mahdi Army, the militia commanded by a glowering Shiite cleric, Moktada al-Sadr. An indignant Mr. Sadr called his men to fight against the American military twice in 2004. It was bloodied, but survived. Since then the Mahdi Army, and a growing criminal breakaway element, have grown into one of the government's biggest problems and are a major obstacle to the success of the American enterprise here.

Despite its new rogue fringe, Iraqi Shiites see the Mahdi militia as their most effective protector against the hostile Sunni groups that have slaughtered Shiites and driven them from their homes. Shiites say that as long as the government cannot keep them safe, they cannot support the disarming of militias.

That paradox confronts the American military as it presses the Iraqi government to contain militias like Mr. Sadr's: how is it possible to control a militia when trust among Iraqis has vanished and the government is incapable of containing the spiraling violence?

Mr. Sadr and his Mahdi Army have emerged as one of the biggest puzzles of the war. The cleric controls a large and crucial bloc of seats in Parliament. At the same time, 92 percent of the mortar and rocket attacks in August and September on the Green Zone — the protected area in Baghdad that houses the American military and the Iraqi government — came from Sadr City.

As the recent fighting in Amara shows, the group and its rogue elements have settled deeply into the crevices of Iraqi society, filling college security offices and student unions, as well as the ranks of the police and the army. It is often at the center of spasms of sectarian killing, like the violence last weekend in Balad, and it frequently battles rival Shiite groups, as in Amara, and earlier this month in another southern city, Diwaniya.

But in a measure of just how complex Iraq has become, it is impossible to tell where loyalties to Mr. Sadr end and criminal activity begins. Rogue groups of his former followers now run underground fiefdoms of sectarian killing and kidnapping — and even a special market for victims' cars. One of his senior aides was arrested by the American military earlier this week on suspicion of having directed the killing and torture of Sunnis. The Americans later reluctantly released him at the request of the Iraqi government.

The changes in the Mahdi Army are so profound — the American military estimates that as much as a third of it has fallen away — that it is becoming a generic term for Shiite militia. A senior American military official estimated there were 23 militias operating in Baghdad alone.

"It's hard to understand the amount of groups who are moving around and where they are getting their funding," said Col. Thomas Vail, the American commander in charge of eastern Baghdad. "It's very complex right now, more than when we first came."

The mechanisms for killing have become more sophisticated. A senior coalition intelligence official at a briefing last month detailed an example of a Mahdi Army death squad. Group leaders are issued instructions on order forms listing a target person and an address, the official said. A group can consist of special forces, intelligence units and punishment committees, complete with clerics who impose sentences. Some of the leaders may be inside the Interior Ministry, the official said. Others may work with their contacts within the ministry to obtain equipment such as cars.

The American military's task has been vastly complicated by the sheer relentlessness of the violence. Ever larger portions of the Iraqi population have been radicalized in three years of war, chopping ground out from under the moderates. Now, even those whose job requires them to take a position against militias reluctantly back them.

"Right now I support the presence of the Mahdi Army," said a senior judge on Iraq's criminal court, who declined to be named out of concern for his safety. "I know this is unacceptable in law, in politics, in society, but in this unusual time we are living in, this is the reality."

It is a broadly held view among Shiites that the American military has unfairly focused on Shiite militias and has largely forgotten the Sunni militias that they say launched the sectarian war. Groups like the Omar Brigade, formed to kill Shiites and carry out lethal suicide bombings, went unchecked, prompting a Shiite response, they say.

DOJ_NMG_0084220

Just how far Shiite sentiment has shifted can be seen in the words of Qasim Dawood, the national security minister under former Prime Minister Ayad Allawi during Mr. Sadr's fight against the Americans in 2004.

"The support of the militias within the Shiite community comes from the failure of the Ministry of Interior, the Ministry of Defense and the coalition forces to provide security," he said. "The creation of these militias comes as a reaction."

But that reaction spilled over into open carnage in February, when Shiite mobs rampaged through Baghdad, dragging Sunnis out of their homes and mosques and killing them. Shiites' patience had snapped, and they began to take systematic revenge.

As the killing spun off in strange new directions, the Mahdi Army, or those associated with it, was at the forefront.

The Mahdi Army's victims are sad, struggling figures, often stuffed into the trunks of cars. This tactic became so widespread that Iraqi soldiers at checkpoints have been known to stop cars that are playing loud, thumping music, mistaking the sound for a person trying to get out.

In the eastern Baghdad neighborhood of Ur, which is connected to Sadr City by a fast and largely empty road, a worker counted 14 victims on a particularly bad day in August, shortly after an attack on a procession of Shiite pilgrims. He said four were shot in front of him on a dirt road near a high school. The bodies of another 10 were dumped there later that day. Police cars, like hearses, later picked them up.

The killing took place openly, often silently, and without fanfare. Gunmen did not bother to hide their faces. One resident sardonically referred to Ur as gbour, which means graves in Arabic.

Iraqis began referring to the victims, often Sunnis, as sheep. Most condemn the killing, which they attribute to the Mahdi militia.

"I know they are killing Sunnis now — none of us likes this," said Firas al-Saeidi, a 29-year-old Shiite resident of Sadr City, who works in the Ministry of Defense. "But it keeps balance in our sensitive areas. We need that."

"Life was not just cheap, it was free," said Ibrahim, a Shiite from Ur who asked that his last name not be used.

Despite the carnage, Ibrahim sees the militia as providing important protection.

His sparely furnished guest room was subdued last week, after the killing of his brother and the brother's 15-year-old son by Sunni gunmen in September. At the funeral, Mahdi members approached him and offered to kill Sunnis to avenge the deaths. He declined, but said he would draw on their intelligence to find the killers. He could not go to the police station where his brother was shot because the policemen are Sunni, he said.

"If I find who killed my brother, I will tell Mahdi Army to kill him," he said.

The government, on the other hand, refused to even pick up the body of an acquaintance of his in a Sunni neighborhood recently, because the area was too hostile.

"If a government is too scared to pick up a body, is it a government?" Ibrahim asked.

A protector for most Shiites, the Mahdi Army can also be a persecutor. Mahdi members first approached Edrice al-Aaraji, a Shiite, shortly after he moved to a Shiite area in northern Baghdad this spring. The men acted chummy and asked if he and his brother would pitch in on overnight watch shifts on the block.

Mr. Aaraji pretended to be interested, but avoided them. He even traveled to a different neighborhood to make it look as if he was serving on guard duty somewhere else.

The men become more aggressive, particularly after the killing of his uncle, apparently by Mahdi-affiliated gunmen, in August. Later Mr. Aaraji learned that the men had been eyeing the house he moved into as a weapons storage space.

"Now they are after us," he said. "They watch our comings and goings."

In Sadr City, in a darkened room off a sun-splashed courtyard hung with laundry, Sayeed Abdul Zahra, a member of Mr. Sadr's social service committee, dismissed any suggestion of the Mahdi Army disarming: "Impossible."

Besides, he said, Mr. Sadr does not own the guns. "I bought my weapons with my own money."

A short drive north, in Ur, mourners were gathering for the funeral of a man and his 6-year-old son. A bombing on Monday in a nearby market killed them both. The family blamed a puritanical Sunni Islamic sect, the Wahhabis, whose name has become the Shiite codeword for Sunni extremists.

A boy around the age of 8 took money from his father to buy candy at a market across the street. As he walked away, his father called after him: "Be careful of the Wahhabis."

When asked why he had said it, his reply came fast and cold.

"I want to teach him whom to hate," he said.

Iraq's Religious Figures Issue Edicts (AP)

By By
AP, October 21, 2006

In a bid to stop sectarian bloodshed, Shiite and Sunni religious figures met in Mecca, Islam's holiest city, and issued a series of edicts Friday forbidding violence between Iraq's two Muslim sects.

It is uncertain, however, whether the edicts, or fatwas, will find resonance among the country's Sunni and Shiite militants whose tit-for-tat attacks have created a deadly cycle of violence that gains momentum and brutality daily.

Previous attempts to reconcile Iraq's rival sects have failed to stanch the violence.

While Shiites and Sunnis in Iraq usually abide by fatwas issued or endorsed by their top clerics, the sectarian violence is largely perpetuated by militants who abide only by the strict interpretations of the Quran, Islam's holy book, and Hadith, sayings of Islam's prophet Muhammad, that are offered by radical clerics outside Islam's mainstream.

The Mecca meeting had lowered expectations from the outset, with its organizers maintaining that they did not seek a truce in Iraq, where a Sunni insurgency continues to target U.S. and Iraqi forces, but only to stop sectarian killings between rival Sunnis and Shiites.

A final communique, heavy on quotations from the Quran and Hadith, was issued at the end of the two-day meeting. It contained 10 points, the majority of which were edicts forbidding kidnappings, incitement of hatred, attacks on mosques and Shiite places of worship. It also prohibited forcing members of the other sect from their homes and called for the release from detention of Iraqis not charged with specific crimes.

It also stated that differences between the two sects did not touch on the basics of the faith.

Participants included Shiite and Sunni clerics, representatives of Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, and clerics from the Shiite holy city of Najaf, the former leader of Iraq's largest Sunni party and a senior official from the largest Shiite party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq.

None was among the country's top clerics, but spokesman Salah Abdul-Razaq, speaking to The Associated Press from Mecca, said the fatwas were vetted and approved by Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, the country's top Shiite cleric, and radical anti-U.S. Shiite leader Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Sadr is not a high-ranking cleric but he runs the Mahdi Army, a militia blamed for much of the violence against Sunni Arabs.

At the end of the signing ceremony, which was carried live by Iraqi TV stations, a presenter read a message from al-Sistani and other top Shiite clerics supporting the final communique. He also read a letter of support from Sheik Mohammed Sayed Tantawi, the grand sheik of al-Azhar in Cairo, Egypt, Sunni Islam's top seat of learning.

The Association of Muslim Scholars, an influential hard-line Sunni group, did not formally take part in the Mecca meeting, Abdul-Razaq said.

In an interview with the Saudi daily al-Watan, the association's leader, Harith al-Dhari, said he did not expect the Mecca meeting to make a difference on the ground.

"I don't believe ... it will contribute to the narrowing of the gap (between the Shiites and Sunnis) or reduce the suffering of the Iraqi people today," he said. "I am not optimistic." However, a message from al-Dhari read at the end of the signing ceremony said the Mecca meeting was "a step in the right direction."

The root of the current bout of Sunni-Shiite violence dates back to 2003, when the overthrow of Saddam Hussein's regime ended decades of domination by the minority Sunnis and empowering the long-oppressed Shiite majority.

The destruction of a major Shiite shrine in the city of Samarra north of Baghdad last February ignited the worst bout of sectarian violence, and the bloodletting is little diminished.

Differences between the two sides were exacerbated when parliament adopted a Shiite-backed law this week allowing provinces in the Shiite and oil-rich south to establish an autonomous region like the Kurdish one in the north. Sunni Arabs and some Shiites opposed the law, arguing that federalism would lead to the eventual breakup of Iraq.

Underlining the challenges facing any bid to end Iraq's violence and lawlessness, a Sunni organization reported in Baghdad within minutes of the signing ceremony in Mecca that the son of one of the signatories, Mohsin Abdul-Hamid, was kidnapped Thursday by gunmen at a checkpoint in Baghdad.

The son, Yasser Mohsin Abdul-Hamid is the deputy head of the Sunni government department that looks after Sunni mosques and seminaries.

Islamic Clerics Decree A Halt To Sectarian Bloodshed (WT)

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

From combined dispatches

BAGHDAD -- Dozens of Iraqi Shi'ite and Sunni clerics meeting in the Muslim holy city of Mecca yesterday called for an end to sectarian violence that many fear could lead to civil war in Iraq.

Sponsored by the 57-nation Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), the meeting approved a declaration prohibiting the killing of Muslims in Iraq and called for safeguarding the unity of the country.

DOJ_NMG_0084222

It also urged the release of Muslim and non-Muslim hostages.

It was not clear what impact the document signed by the dozens of clerics would have on militias that appear to be outside the control of both Shi'ite and Sunni religious authorities, and others that are affiliated with al Qaeda.

Nevertheless, it marked an unprecedented effort by Iraqi religious leaders -- who gathered in the Saudi Arabian city where Islam was born -- to speak out against the bloodshed that has increased daily throughout the holy month of Ramadan.

Yesterday was no exception as black-uniformed, hooded gunmen loyal to anti-American Shi'ite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr briefly seized the major southern city of Amarah.

Twenty-five gunmen and police died in gunbattles between rival Shi'ite factions before the Iraqi army moved in to retake the city of 750,000 people.

The city is famous for its marshlands along the Tigris river 30 miles from the border with Iran, where the Shi'ite theocracy is said to be funding, arming and training both Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi Army and the rival Badr Brigades.

The Amarah showdown highlighted the potential for an all-out conflict between them and their political sponsors, both with large blocs in parliament and important to the survival of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's shaky four-month-old government.

It also underlined the deep underlying rift that exists between Sheik al-Sadr and the more traditional but powerful Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI).

SCIRI and its Badr Brigades are headed by key power broker Abdul-Aziz al-Hakim, who spent decades in Iranian exile during Saddam Hussein's rule.

The clashes marred the Muslim day of prayer for the second Friday in a row in cities where American and British forces had only recently ceded military control to Iraqi security forces and the army.

More than 100 persons were slain in Balad, a small city north of Baghdad, this past week, most of them by Shi'ite death squads drawn largely from Sheik al-Sadr's Mahdi militia.

The Mahdi fighters held Amarah for several hours in an embarrassingly strong showing against the local police and security forces, controlled by the Badr Brigade.

Elsewhere in Iraq yesterday, police reported the deaths of 34 persons, including 10 killed in mortar attacks overnight in Balad.

Gunmen burst into a Shi'ite home in Aziziyah, 35 miles southeast of Baghdad, killing a Shi'ite family of nine.

A U.S. soldier was killed when his vehicle was hit by a roadside bomb southwest of the capital.

Amarah is a major population center in the resource-rich yet impoverished south and a traditional center of Shi'ite defiance to successive Iraqi regimes.

Its marshlands were drained by Saddam during the 1990s in reprisal for the city's role in the Shi'ite uprising after the Persian Gulf War.

At the height of the fighting yesterday, Associated Press Television News video showed thick, black smoke billowing from behind barricades at a police station, much of it from vehicles set on fire inside the compound.

Hooded gunmen roamed the streets with automatic assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers. Most of the streets were deserted except for the gunmen.

The militiamen later withdrew from their positions and lifted their siege with a truce brokered by an al-Sadr envoy as government forces entered the city.

At the meeting in Mecca, clerics drafted a document they said was inspired by historic Islamic texts prohibiting infighting among Muslims.

"This document takes effect from this moment. ... We hope [religious] authorities and clerics spread the message of the document in mosques ... and that local media make sure it reaches all Iraqis," said Saudi-based OIC Secretary-General Ekmeleddin Ihsanoglu.

He said the document draws its strength from the symbolism of the signing venue.

Neither Sheik al-Sadr nor Iraq's top Shi'ite leader, Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani sent representatives to the meeting.

U.N.: 914,000 Have Fled Homes In Iraq (AP-Y)

By Frank Jordans, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

At least 914,000 Iraqis have fled their homes since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, more than a third since an increase in sectarian bloodshed at the start of this year, the U.N. refugee agency said Friday.

The overall number is likely to be much higher, said Ron Redmond, chief spokesman for the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees. The agency has concluded that 754,000 displaced Iraqis remain in the country, while tens of thousands more have sought refuge abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0084223

"We remain extremely concerned about the rapidly deteriorating situation in Iraq and the ongoing displacement this is creating both inside and outside Iraq," Redmond told reporters.

Redmond told The Associated Press that at least 40,000 Iraqis have arrived in Syria every month for the last four months.

Most of those who have fled their homes since the start of the war came from central areas of the country around Baghdad, Redmond said.

"There are some in the north and south as well, but the majority are in the center. A lot of them are going to Sunni areas, or Shia areas, where they have family, relatives, other social groups that will help them and take care of them," Redmond said.

About 365,000 people — nearly half of those who have fled to other areas within Iraq — have left since sectarian fighting intensified after the bombing of an important Shiite shrine in the city of Samarra in February, Redmond said.

Redmond said the figures were compiled by UNHCR staffers from information provided by government offices and other aid agencies. According to Iraqi government information, 1.5 million people are currently classed as internally displaced, though that includes 800,000 from before the 2003 invasion.

Unlike casualty figures, which vary widely and have been the subject of much criticism from governments and non-governmental organizations working in Iraq, nobody has disputed the overall number of internally displaced, Redmond said.

The flow of refugees into neighboring countries also increased sharply after the Samarra attack, but the governments have so far failed to provide the agency with overall numbers, Redmond said.

UNHCR estimates that there are 1.6 million Iraqis in other countries in the region, mainly Jordan and Syria, but some of those have been outside Iraq for more than a decade.

914,000 Iraqis Displaced By War, U.N. Says (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

GENEVA — At least 914,000 Iraqis have fled their homes since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, more than a third of them since sectarian bloodshed increased early this year, the United Nations refugee agency said Friday.

The Office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees has concluded that 754,000 people are displaced in the country, and tens of thousands more have sought refuge abroad.

"We remain extremely concerned about the rapidly deteriorating situation in Iraq and the ongoing displacement this is creating both inside and outside Iraq," said Ron Redmond, chief spokesman for the agency.

Redmond said that at least 40,000 Iraqis had arrived in Syria in each of the last four months.

Most of the Iraqis displaced by the war came from central areas around Baghdad, he said.

About 365,000 people — nearly half of those who have fled to other areas within Iraq — have been displaced by sectarian fighting that intensified after the February bombing of an important Shiite Muslim shrine in the north-central city of Samarra, Redmond said.

He said the figures were compiled by UNHCR staffers using information provided by government offices and other aid agencies.

According to Iraqi government information, 1.5 million people are classified as internally displaced, though that includes 800,000 who left their homes before the 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

Unlike casualty figures, which vary widely and have been the subject of much criticism from governments and nongovernmental organizations working in Iraq, the overall number of internally displaced has not been disputed, Redmond said.

U.N. Says Iraq Seals Data On The Civilian Toll (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 20 — The United Nations office in Baghdad says that Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, has ordered the country's medical authorities to stop providing the organization with monthly figures on the number of civilians killed and wounded in the conflict there, according to a confidential cable.

The cable, dated Oct. 17 and sent to United Nations officials in New York and Geneva by Ashraf Qazi, the United Nations envoy to Iraq, says the prohibition may hinder the ability of his office to give accurate accounts in its bimonthly human rights reports on the levels of violence and the effect on Iraqi society.

Concern over the numbers of civilians who have died in Iraq has risen sharply at a time when organized attacks by insurgents are swelling the numbers of victims and when a new report from a team of Iraqi and American researchers shows that more than 600,000 civilians have died in violence across Iraq since the 2003 American invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0084224

Mr. Qazi, a former Pakistani diplomat, says that the order to let the prime minister's office take over the release of the numbers came down a day after a United Nations report for July and August showed a serious upward spike in the number of dead and wounded. The leader of the Health Ministry in Iraq appealed to be allowed to continue supplying the figures to the United Nations but was turned down according to a subsequent letter from the prime minister's office, Mr. Qazi's cable said.

The existence of the cable was reported Friday by The Washington Post.

Feisal al-Istrabadi, Iraq's deputy ambassador to the United Nations, said he had not seen the cable and therefore could not comment on its specifics. "But what I can say is what the prime minister is aiming for is to have one voice reflecting accurate information about the statistics of those who are dying every day," he said. "So, the concern was that the Ministry of Health, which has had accurate figures to date, be the official source of the information.

"It is trying to avoid a situation where different agencies, which may have different perspectives, put out sets of numbers that are, in fact, not as accurate as they should be."

The most recent United Nations report, published in September, showed that 3,590 people were killed in July and 3,009 in August in violence across the country. Compiled by statistics from Baghdad's central morgue and from hospitals and morgues countrywide, the report posited an average death rate of 97 people per day.

The United Nations reports have been cited by independent researchers as reliable indicators of the incidence of violence in Iraq and were not disputed by the Iraqi government until the September report that showed sharp rises in the figures.

In his cable, Mr. Qazi described a process by which his office tried to compile the most reliable statistics.

He said that initially his office had been able to overcome Iraqi government reluctance to release figures by obtaining statistics from the Health Ministry's Medico-Legal Institute in Baghdad.

The institute records the number of unidentified civilians killed violently whose bodies are taken to the morgue in Baghdad, but not those killed violently whose bodies are taken to hospitals and later handed over to families for burial. Therefore, Mr. Qazi said, the institute's figures represented only "an indicator, albeit imperfect, of the growing number of civilian victims in the capital."

To come up with a more thorough account, Mr. Qazi said, the United Nations combined the institute's findings with figures from the Department of Operations at the Ministry of Health, which records those killed or wounded as a result of violence from hospitals across almost all parts of the country.

Mr. Qazi noted that the figures "may have contributed to an increased international awareness regarding the severe consequences that the conflict in Iraq is having on civilians."

The cable said that following the release of the last United Nations human rights report on Sept. 20, the prime minister's office "expressed doubts" about its accuracy.

The next day, the Ministry of Health was told that it should no longer release its figures but instead channel them through the prime minister's office. Mr. Qazi said he learned of this on Oct. 12.

Mr. Qazi said the United Nations would continue to seek figures from the Department of Operations at the Ministry of Health and "use our contacts to see what measure of verification may be possible."

Republicans Call CNN Tape 'Enemy Propaganda' (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

SAN DIEGO -- CNN cable news has become "the publicist for an enemy propaganda film" by broadcasting a tape showing an insurgent sniper apparently killing an American soldier, said the chairman of the U.S. House Armed Services Committee here Friday.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., called for the Pentagon to oust immediately any CNN reporter embedded with U.S. troops in Iraq.

"I think Americans like to think we're all in this together," Hunter said. "The average American Marine or soldier has concluded after seeing that film that CNN is not on their side."

CNN said its decision to show the brief tape was motivated by a desire to show the public the growing threat insurgent snipers pose to U.S. troops.

"Whether or not you agree with us in this case, our goal, as always, is to present the unvarnished truth as best we can," wrote CNN producer David Doss in a blog on the network's Web site.

Tony Snow, President Bush's press secretary, said the insurgents were hoping to "break the will of the American people" by slipping the tape to CNN.

The tape was shown first on CNN's "Anderson Cooper 360" program, where Doss is executive producer, and then on several news shows. It remains on the network's Web site.

DOJ_NMG_0084225

Doss said CNN Baghdad correspondent Michael Ware in Iraq received the tape after communicating through intermediaries with Ibrahim Shimar, a spokesman for the Islamic Army.

Doss said the decision to use the sniper tape came after hours of "intense editorial debate" at CNN. One compromise was made: The moment when the bullet hits the soldier's head is blacked out. The soldier's face and unit patches are not clearly visible and so identifying him was impossible, the network said.

Rep. Brian Bilbray, R-Calif., who joined Hunter and Rep. Darrell Issa, R-Calif., in sending a letter to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, called the film "nothing short of a terrorist snuff film."

Snow, at his regular news briefing in Washington, said the video was misleading because it made it appear that Americans were "sitting ducks" and the insurgents were winning. In fact, the insurgents "are dying in much greater numbers and suffering much greater damage," he said.

The Pentagon had no official reaction to the CNN video. Though embedded reporters are made to sign pledges not to show the faces of dead Americans until their families are notified, nothing prohibits the use of pictures where identities are not discernible.

Plea Deal Reported In Iraqi Murder Case (AP)

By Thomas Watkins

AP, October 21, 2006

A Camp Pendleton Marine will plead guilty next week for his role in the killing of an Iraqi man last April, his father said Friday.

Pfc. John J. Jodka, 20, of Encinitas will plead guilty to assault and obstruction of justice, his father, John Jodka, told The Associated Press in a telephone interview.

The elder Jodka said murder, kidnapping and other charges would be dropped in exchange for the plea, but later said it was premature to discuss details of the arrangement.

Attorney Joseph Casas, who represents Jodka, said he could not disclose details of the negotiations but said the deal was "in the best interests of my client and the best interests of justice and the best interests of the Marine Corps."

Casas said that Jodka would testify at his court-martial and that the judge was not expected to sentence his client until Nov. 15.

"J.J. will have his chance to talk about his account of what happened in Hamdania," Casas said, adding he would be calling witnesses during the court appearance.

Jodka is one of seven Marines and one Navy corpsman who were charged in the murder of Hashim Ibrahim Awad in the town of Hamdania, west of Baghdad. As part of a separate plea negotiation, the corpsman recently testified about what he remembers from the incident.

Jodka would be the first Marine to plead guilty in the case.

Petty Officer 3rd Class Melson J. Bacos, a Navy corpsman on patrol with the Marines, pleaded guilty Oct. 6 to kidnapping and conspiracy under a deal with prosecutors. He agreed to testify at his court-martial and during upcoming proceedings about what he witnessed.

Details of Jodka's plea negotiations were not disclosed by order of the judge in the case, Jodka's father said. He added that his son would not be sentenced next week.

Marine Corps spokesman Lt. Col. Sean Gibson said it would be inappropriate to discuss any potential negotiations between the government and the defense.

Marine To Plead Guilty In Killing Of Iraqi Man (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

ENCINITAS, Calif. — Marine Pfc. John Jodka III will become the second defendant accused in the shooting death of an unarmed Iraqi man in April to plead guilty in the case, Jodka's father said Friday night.

Jodka is one of eight troops with the 3rd Battalion, 5th Regiment, who were charged with murder and kidnapping in the shooting death of a disabled 52-year-old Iraqi in Hamandiya, west of Baghdad. The eight were accused of dragging Hashim Ibrahim Awad, whom they suspected of having ties to the insurgency, from his home, tying his hands and feet and shooting him to death.

Under the plea arrangement, Jodka will plead guilty to lesser charges.

"I remain as proud of my son as the day he enlisted in the Marine Corps," said John Jodka II, who lives in Encinitas. "He is my hero."

DOJ_NMG_0084226

In the original indictment, Jodka, who was 19 and on his first tour in Iraq, was listed among the five Marines accused of shooting Awad. He was the youngest and lowest-ranking.

Navy corpsman Melson Bacos, who was a comrade of the troops in the 5th Regiment's Kilo Company, has pleaded guilty to lesser charges and agreed to testify against the Marines. He was sentenced to a year in the brig; with credit for time served, Bacos is expected to be free within five months.

Jodka, who is expected to enter his plea Thursday, is a graduate of San Dieguito Academy, a highly competitive Encinitas high school, and he attended UC Riverside before enlisting.

Jodka was moved from the brig at Camp Pendleton to the Miramar Marine Corps Air Station brig two weeks ago to separate him from other defendants.

Other attorneys in the case have asserted that their clients will not plea-bargain. Victor Kelley said his client, Cpl. Trent D. Thomas, would "never testify against his brothers."

Officer Awaits Fate In Abu Ghraib Case (AP)

By David Dishneau

AP, October 21, 2006

An Army colonel began deliberating Friday whether to recommend a court-martial for an officer accused of abusing Abu Ghraib prisoners by ignoring their mistreatment and then lying to investigators about it.

A decision is expected by early November on whether Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, an Army reservist from Fredericksburg, Va., will stand trial for any of the 12 charges against him, including one count of cruelty and maltreatment and three counts of dereliction of duty.

Col. Daniel Cummings, who presided over Jordan's five-day Article 32 investigation, will make a written recommendation to Gen. Guy C. Swann, commander of the Military District of Washington. Swann will decide whether a trial is warranted.

Jordan, 50, is the highest-ranking U.S. soldier, and the first officer, charged with crimes stemming from the physical abuse and sexual humiliation of Abu Ghraib detainees. He faces up to 42 years in prison if convicted of all counts.

Prosecutors offered little direct evidence at the hearing that Jordan oppressed detainees in fall 2003 by "subjecting them to forced nudity and intimidation by dogs," as alleged in the lone count of cruelty and maltreatment.

The strongest eyewitness evidence that he ignored abuses came from Capt. Donald Reese, the former commander of the 372nd Military Police Company who testified that Jordan was a daily visitor to the prison's "hard site," where some prisoners were stripped naked as an interrogation technique.

Instead, prosecutors relied largely on documents and soldiers' statements to investigators to support the government's claim that Jordan, as titular director of the prison's interrogation center, knew of the abuses and didn't stop them.

"He didn't do the job, which resulted in criminality," Lt. Col. John P. Tracy said in closing arguments Friday.

Defense attorneys said Jordan wasn't in charge of interrogators, despite his director's title, and therefore wasn't responsible for any abuses they committed.

"No direct line, certainly, no dotted line, no blurry line — there has been no line drawn between Lt. Col. Jordan and detainee abuse," Maj. Kris Poppe said in his closing argument.

Jordan, a civil affairs officer with a military-intelligence background, was sent to Abu Ghraib in September 2003 by top intelligence commanders in Iraq to run the newly established Joint Interrogation and Debriefing Center.

But according to witnesses for both sides, Jordan devoted himself mainly to improving soldiers' safety and welfare, introducing himself to incoming interrogators as "the civil affairs officer" and as a liaison between the JIDC and U.S. commanders in Baghdad.

Jordan's case is the last remaining active investigation in the Abu Ghraib scandal, said Lt. Col. Patricia Lewis, deputy staff judge advocate at the Military District of Washington. Eleven enlisted soldiers have been convicted of crimes at Abu Ghraib, and a number of officers have been reprimanded.

Gunmen Execute 8 Afghan Laborers (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — Gunmen ambushed a carload of Afghan laborers heading home from a remote U.S. military base in eastern Afghanistan and executed eight of them, a police official said Friday.

The killings occurred as a statement purportedly issued by fugitive Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar called for stepped-up attacks on Afghan and foreign troops. It told the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to leave Afghanistan, saying alliance members were "losing their soldiers only for America."

DOJ_NMG_0084227

The victims, who worked for the U.S. military in the mountainous Korangal area of Kunar province, were killed Thursday, said Abdul Saboor, the provincial deputy police chief.

Gunmen stopped the workers' car, searched them and took about $6,000 before gunning them down, said Salehzai Didar, Kunar's governor. Two workers escaped, he said.

"This was a shocking attack against these poor people," said Saboor, who did not identify the attackers other than to describe them as "the enemy."

Afghanistan this year has faced its deadliest surge in violence since U.S.-led forces ousted the fundamentalist Taliban regime five years ago for sheltering Osama bin Laden.

The statement attributed to Omar was forwarded by e-mail to the Associated Press by Mohammed Hanif, who claims to speak for the militia. It warned that the Taliban would increase its attacks against foreign and Afghan troops, "which would be a surprise to many."

"I would again ask mujahedin to intensify their attacks, but they should avoid any harm to innocent people and children," said the statement, which was issued just before the Muslim holiday of Eid al-Fitr, which marks the end of the fasting month of Ramadan.

The statement's authenticity could not be verified.

It said that democracy in Afghanistan had failed and that the Western-backed government of President Hamid Karzai was seeking an "exit."

Total Says Executive Questioned Over Iraq Oil Deals Is Innocent (NYT)

By James Kanter

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

PARIS, Oct. 20 — The French oil company Total rallied on Friday to the defense of its second in command and designated chief executive, Christophe de Margerie, after he was taken into custody and questioned about possible illegal payments for Iraqi oil.

Mr. de Margerie, 55, and a former Total executive, Bernard de Combret, 63, were released on bail on Thursday after being held for 48 hours. The two men were questioned by Judge Philippe Courroye, who is investigating possible kickbacks linked to the United Nations-supervised oil-for-food program in Iraq.

“The judge has to prove that he is or is not guilty, and we think he’s not guilty,” said a Total spokeswoman, Catherine Enck.

She said the Total board remained committed to elevating Mr. de Margerie, who is head of exploration and production, to the top job in February.

The oil-for-food program allowed the government of Saddam Hussein to sell oil while the country was under sanctions imposed by the United Nations after Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990. The oil money was supposed to be used to buy necessities for Iraq’s civilians, but reports of corruption in the program prompted several inquiries.

An independent investigation by Paul A. Volcker, former chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, reported a year ago that Russia and France received favored treatment from the Hussein government.

In France, a former interior minister, Charles Pasqua, is among those under investigation.

Ms. Enck said Total had negotiated with the Hussein government to develop the oil-rich Majnoon and Nahr Umar fields in southern Iraq, the site of the world’s third-largest oil reserves, after Saudi Arabia and Iran. She insisted that the company had never signed contracts with the government, and that development of the fields could only have gone forward once the sanctions were lifted.

“The group has never purchased, either directly or indirectly, oil that has been smuggled illegally from Iraq,” Total said in a statement on its Web site.

A Citigroup analyst, Jonathan Wright, brushed off the seriousness of the development, writing in a research note that he expected business as usual at the company.

Total Chief Charged In Oil-for-food Scandal (FT)

By Martin Arnold

Financial Times, October 21, 2006

A Paris investigative judge has charged the incoming chief executive of Total, the French oil and gas group, with corruption during the scandal-plagued United Nations’ oil-for-food programme in Iraq.

Christophe de Margerie, Total’s head of exploration and production, was imprisoned for 48 hours, questioned by judicial police and a judge, before being charged with aiding and abetting corruption of foreign officials and misuse of company property.

DOJ_NMG_0084228

He was released from custody on Thursday night. The surprise move cast a shadow over plans for Mr Margerie to replace Thierry Desmarest as chief executive when the latter steps up to non-executive chairman after the group's annual results in February.

But Total insisted the succession would proceed as planned. "Presumption of innocence is absolute and so life goes on," said Catherine Enck, spokeswoman at Total. The French judicial system can often put people under investigation for years, sometimes without ever going to trial.

"The group would like to reassure Mr de Margerie of its solidarity. Total confirms that at no time did the group circumvent the United Nations embargo against Iraq and strictly adhered to the rules of the oil-for-food programme," the company said on Friday.

The move is a setback for the image of France's biggest company with a market capitalisation just short of €130bn. It employs 95,000 staff and had profits of €12bn and sales of €143bn in 2005. Yet analysts shrugged off the news and Total shares rose €0.50 to €53.70.

Mr de Margerie, 55, was head of Total's activities in the Middle East between 1995 and 1999. He is well respected in the industry as an affable and outspoken expert on the Gulf region's oil sector. His lawyer, Olivier Rosenfeld, said the charges were "without foundation".

Bernard de Combret, Total's former head of trading, who quit in 2001, was taken into custody with Mr de Margerie and charged with the same crimes. The charges add to growing discomfort in Paris political and business circles about the damage being done to France's prestige by the inquiry. Mr de Margerie is due to accompany President Jacques Chirac on next week's state visit to China.

He is suspected of participating in kickbacks to the Iraqi regime of Saddam Hussein from 1996 to 2002. Total is suspected of making the payments via Telliac, the Swiss trading company, to gain better access to Iraqi oil during the UN embargo.

Total said: "All oil acquired by the company, without exception, was purchased officially with the required authorisations under UN within the framework of the oil-for-food programme put in place in 1996. The group has never purchased, either directly or indirectly, oil that has been smuggled illegally from Iraq."

The group has only recently recovered from a big corruption scandal at Elf, the former state oil group it acquired in 1999. The "Elf affair" lasted eight years, becoming France's biggest corruption trial and exposing rampant corruption in the final years of the Mitterrand presidency.

Judge Philippe Courroye has already charged a handful of more junior Total executives with similar offences, as well as leading French diplomats and politicians, most notably Charles Pasqua, former interior minister, and Jean-Bernard Mérimée, France's former UN ambassador.

An independent report by former Federal Reserve chairman Paul Volcker last year accused some 2,253 companies of paying kickbacks to Saddam Hussein's regime, while officials and middlemen around the globe were accused of receiving illicit oil allocations in return for political support.

The payments were in contravention of international law and the rules of the oil-for-food system. Politicians and executives in countries from Germany to India have been snared by the scandal. But France's strong ties to Saddam Hussein's regime seemed to mean it was more involved than most.

The Real 'New Iraq' (WP)

By Colbert I. King

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Christians are being targeted in Iraq. It's not because they are one of the dominant groups vying to run the country. They aren't. Their clerics also are not part of Iraq's religious elite, although Christianity has deep roots in that country.

As the New York Times reported this week, since the Bush administration launched the invasion of Iraq 3 1/2 years ago, church bombings, assassinations, kidnappings and threats have become a daily part of Christian life. And the persecution of Christians began even before Pope Benedict XVI called attention to the words of a 14th-century Byzantine emperor who had some unkind things to say about Islam. Many churches in Baghdad have been forced to cancel services, the Times reports, and some have not met since.

Why? Because religion is moving front and center in Iraq, and to be a Christian in that Islamic nation has become dangerous.

But it's equally risky to be a Shiite living among Sunnis or a Sunni residing in a province dominated by Shiites. These days, if you happen to be in the wrong place at the wrong time, religion can get you kidnapped, tortured and beheaded.

If that isn't enough, toss into this cauldron Americans in military uniform, many in the flower of their youth. Most have no idea why religious extremists are tearing each other apart. Trained to fight wars and combat terrorism, American troops have instead been engaged in sweeps through Baghdad's slums in an effort to uproot religiously chauvinistic death squads hellbent on destroying each other. For rendering that service to the Iraqi people (who should be doing the job themselves), America has been paying a high price in blood and treasure, and with little apparent success.

DOJ_NMG_0084229

Instead of the violence being reduced, sectarian bloodshed and attacks in Baghdad have shot up 22 percent in the past three weeks. American military fatalities are occurring at the highest rate in more than a year, reports The Post. And toward what end?

Look at the post-Saddam Hussein Iraq taking shape.

In the eyes of the Bush administration and its foreign policy allies in Washington, Iraqi reconstruction and the march toward democracy are just a matter of time. All that's needed is for the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and the Iraqi armed forces to quell the sectarian violence. Put together the right alliances and the problem is solved, they believe. They see the answer to Iraq's problems in political terms.

But there are other aspects of Iraq that bother those of us who aren't as smart as the brilliant Washington thinkers who got us where we are today.

Some of us can't forget the prewar talk about weapons of mass destruction and Saddam Hussein's partnership with al-Qaeda, and how wrong the foreign policy elite were about that.

Then there was the rosy post-Hussein world portrayed by the Bush administration, in which Iraqis, liberated from the grip of fear and imbued with a deep and abiding respect for human rights and freedom, would be busy building a better future for themselves.

Now let's return to the Christians.

From Tuesday's New York Times: "Conditions have been especially bleak for Christians in Basra, the southern city that is dominated by radical Shiite militias. Christian women there often wear Muslim head scarves to avoid harassment from religious zealots trying to impose a strict Islamic dress code." An Iraqi woman who attends the country's only Anglican church told the Times that she wears a head scarf anytime she goes outside her neighborhood. "I am afraid of being attacked," she said.

A priest was beheaded last week. A bomb blast at a Baghdad church killed two worshipers recently. From this mayhem, however, the Bush administration averts its gaze.

But the truth has been present all along for those who would dare to see it.

Within months of the U.S. invasion in 2003, The Post's Anthony Shadid and Rajiv Chandrasekaran were reporting on religious fissures in Iraq. The deepening divisions among Iraq's principal religious and ethnic groups were a regular theme in their writing.

But the White House and its cheerleaders would have had us think otherwise -- that the source of trouble was solely foreign infiltrators and remnants of Hussein's Baathist Party.

There is a new Iraq emerging before our eyes.

It is an Iraq that torments Christians, that indulges in unrelenting sectarian bloodbaths, that cheers for Hezbollah, that is no more a friend to Israel than is Iran, all despite the lies sold to the White House and Pentagon by self-serving, power-hungry Iraqi expatriates.

The new Iraq is not what George W. Bush talks about. But that's the Iraq he's got. And, worst of all, that's the Iraq we are in.

kingc@washpost.com

Bush Exploited Americans' Urge For Safety (AJC)

By Cynthia Tucker

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 21, 2006

Americans wanted to believe.

In the weeks and months following the terrorist atrocities of Sept. 11, Americans wanted to believe that we could find our way back to a time when terrorism didn't happen here. They might strike U.S. embassies in east Africa, U.S. Navy destroyers in Middle Eastern waters or tourist hotels on faraway islands, but we wanted to believe we could keep them from reaching us here a second time. So when President Bush offered military invasions against two distant countries as the way back to safety at home, most Americans supported him enthusiastically. Not only did most Americans support the strike against Afghanistan, which had offered a safe haven to al-Qaida, but a majority also backed the invasion of Iraq, which had no link to Sept. 11.

Some armchair hawks supported the effort to topple Saddam Hussein because they wanted cheap revenge, whether or not Saddam had any link to Osama bin Laden. The United States has the strongest military in the history of the world — the most destructive bombs, the fanciest fighter jets, the fiercest tanks. What good is all that high-priced hardware if you don't use it every now and then?

DOJ_NMG_0084230

Just this June, conservative pundit John Derbyshire confessed in a National Review column that he regretted his early enthusiasm for the invasion of Iraq. Quoting a harsh passage he had written earlier, he admitted that his support for that war was hardly based on humanitarian or strategic impulses:

"[M]y attitude to the war is really just punitive, and Iraq was a target of opportunity. I am not a Wilsonian nation-builder. I don't want to 'bring democracy to Iraq.' I don't, in fact, give a fig about the Iraqis. I am happy to leave barbarians alone to practice their unspeakable folkways, so long as they do not bother civilized peoples. When they do bother us, though, I want them smacked down with great ferocity."

Derbyshire was hardly alone. Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld was eager to attack Iraq because it presented better targets for our advanced weaponry than primitive Afghanistan, according to several White House insider accounts.

Perhaps, though, most Americans supported the president because they believed him when he said Saddam had weapons of mass destruction that he'd give to terrorists. Americans also believed Bush when he said repeatedly that Saddam had crucial ties to al-Qaida, ignoring intelligence reports that Saddam and Osama had no relationship.

Bush had a major advantage in persuading Americans to support his Iraqi misadventure: Voters wanted to believe that ousting Saddam would take care of terrorists. The president offered the certainty that the nation craved. It's easier to believe in a highly unlikely proposition if you desperately want it to be true.

But 3 1/2 years after the invasion, with bloodshed escalating, the spell has worn off. A CNN poll this month showed 64 percent of respondents opposed to the war. And while a handful of Republican congressional candidates still try to justify the decision to topple Saddam, most GOP candidates try to avoid the subject.

Meanwhile, we are less secure than we were five years ago. Terrorists are using our invasion of Iraq as a recruiting tool. While Saddam had no weapons of mass destruction, North Korea apparently now has nukes. Iran is on its way to nuclear capabilities. And we have few soldiers left to handle a conflict anywhere else. Even if Bush wanted to invade Iran, he has no brigades to send. They're bogged down in Iraq. Moreover, our international alliances are frayed — where they're not ripped to shreds.

All in all, we've paid a high price for our refusal to see ourselves as we really are, not the way we want to be seen. We wanted to be "the shining city on the hill," set apart from the rest of the world, immune to its problems, better, safer, smarter than anybody else.

The United States is a strong and capable nation, but we are vulnerable to bird flu from Singapore, suitcase nukes from the old Soviet empire and suicide bombers from Saudi Arabia. Our best strategy for protecting ourselves will always be a nuanced and multifaceted approach using diplomacy, strategic alliances, intelligence-gathering, law enforcement and, as a last resort, military force.

That nuanced approach doesn't appeal to the bully boys who want to send other people's children out to blow up a country. But we should have learned by now to stop listening to them.

DOJ:

U.S. Prosecutors Honored (BSUN)

The Baltimore Sun, October 21, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department honored five federal prosecutors in Maryland yesterday with 2006 Director's Awards from the department's executive office for United States attorneys.

Roann Nichols was recognized for her work in negotiating the civil settlement of fraud charges against Serono Laboratories Inc. in connection with illegal schemes to promote, market and sell its AIDS drug, Serostim.

A. David Copperthite and Charles J. Peters, who serve in the U.S. attorney's narcotics and organized crime section, were recognized for their work on the prosecution of Baltimore police detectives William King and Antonio Murray. Stuart A. Berman and Barbara S. Skalla received Director's Awards for their work on the prosecution of international drug dealers from Pakistan, a trial handled in the U.S. District Court in Greenbelt.

[Matthew Dolan]

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ouster Of UnitedHealth CEO Rachets Up Stock Options Scandal (AP)

AP, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084231

WASHINGTON - Chief executives caught in the stock-options scandal may find it harder to keep their jobs now that a CEO as mighty as UnitedHealth's William McGuire has fallen.

The scandal rattling corporate America has claimed more than three dozen executives and board directors at 19 public companies so far. McGuire, whose retirement was announced Sunday, is arguably the most prominent.

The move was quickly followed this week by news that the chairman and founder of computer chip supplier KLA-Tencor Corp. was retiring over options, the top two executives of encryption specialist SafeNet Inc. had resigned, and consulting firm Sapient Corp.'s co-founder had quit as chief executive and co-chairman in a broad management shakeup.

Last week saw the abrupt departures of two well-known Silicon Valley CEOs: George Samenuk of McAfee Inc. and Shelby Bonnie of CNet Networks Inc. McAfee, a leading maker of computer antivirus software, also fired its president, Kevin Weiss.

The spotlight in the scandal has turned from lesser known executives like Jacob "Kobi" Alexander - the fugitive former CEO of Comverse Technology Inc. now in Namibia awaiting extradition to face charges - to more mainstream, established corporate leaders at blue-chip companies.

"Not only are the dominoes falling, but the dominoes are getting bigger," said Anthony Sabino, a business law professor at St. John's University in Queens.

The fall of a big domino like McGuire - the man who engineered UnitedHealth's rise from a regional health insurer into the nation's second-largest - can spark the descent of others like him, Sabino maintained. "Everybody else who's involved is at risk," he said.

A sort of guillotine for corporate executives has been set out in the public square. With more than 100 companies under options investigations by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, many likely are eager to show their cooperation with the authorities and willingness to take remedial action - like firing executives believed to be implicated or responsible and possibly recouping some of their options money.

"The companies are doing their best to anticipate the concerns that the government will raise," said Tim Coleman, a former federal prosecutor who is an attorney at Dewey Ballantine in Washington. Companies' actions "are with a view to what's going to happen on the day of reckoning," he suggested.

At issue in many of the investigations is a practice known as backdating. Stock options are issued retroactively to coincide with low points in a company's share price, potentially fattening profits for options recipients when they sell their shares at higher market prices.

If they aren't properly disclosed, backdated options can falsely inflate corporate profits and result in an underpayment of taxes.

For executives and directors, "If there was knowing and willful participation by individuals, ... there's potential criminal liability for those individuals," said Michael Himmel, also an ex-federal prosecutor now in private practice, at Lowenstein Sandler in New York.

Falsifying documents related to options grants, concealing information from the board - those would be signs of potential criminal conduct by executives, experts say.

Some company officers and directors may contend that lawyers and other advisers gave their blessing to the options dating.

"It isn't criminal to basically end up giving bad advice," said Lawrence Barcella, a former Justice Department prosecutor who specializes in white-collar cases at Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker. It's another matter, he said, if the attorneys or advisers "knowingly and willfully enabled" the company executives to carry out a deceptive options scheme.

Yesterday, Costco Wholesale Corp., the nation's largest wholesale club operator, said that President and Chief Executive Jim Sinegal and Chief Financial Officer Richard Galanti won't get what would would have been almost $300,000 in combined bonuses this year because they were responsible for irregular stock options awards.

Ruling On Convictions Could Help Skilling (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 20 (Bloomberg News) — A federal appeals court has refused to consider reinstating the convictions of four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage in 1999 to help Enron appear to have met earnings targets.

The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit denied a government request for a hearing before all its 15 judges, the online court docket said yesterday. A three-judge panel in August threw out the fraud convictions of the bankers, finding flaws in the prosecution theory that they deprived Enron of their "honest services" in the transaction.

DOJ_NMG_0084232

The decision may help Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey K. Skilling, in his bid to have his guilty verdicts thrown out. Mr. Skilling, 52, had cited the ruling in asking the judge in his case to cancel his fraud convictions. His sentencing begins Monday.

"If the government's theory of prosecution was based on the same theory that's now been overturned and affirmed by the appellate court, we can expect Skilling's lawyers to make this the centerpiece of their appeal," said Robert Mintz, a former federal prosecutor.

Jaclyn Lesch, a Justice Department spokeswoman, declined to comment yesterday.

The Merrill executives were convicted of improperly inflating Enron's 1999 fourth-quarter earnings by disguising a loan as proceeds from the sale to the investment bank of power-generating barges moored off the Nigerian coast.

Prosecutors said the bankers deprived Enron of their honest services by acting against its interest.

The appeals court disagreed, saying the theory cannot be applied when an employer "aligns the interests of the employee with a specified corporate goal" and the employee acts accordingly.

SKILLING MAY GET 20 YEARS IN PRISON (NYPOST)

By Paul Tharp

The New York Post, October 21, 2006

October 21, 2006 -- Jeff Skilling, the last remaining disgraced boss of Enron, faces 20 years behind bars at his sentencing Monday - while his lawyers face an unpaid legal tab of $30 million.

Skilling, 52, is among eight executives snared in the infamous $60 billion collapse of Enron four years ago, and is likely to be in his 70s by the time he leaves prison.

He's already nearly broke, say his lawyers.

But prosecutors say he's got many millions left from his ill-gotten gains, and must fork over $182.9 million in penalties and restitution to his victims.

Thousands of investors and former Enron employees lost more than $2 billion from holding worthless Enron shares wrecked in the cooked-books scandal.

About a dozen of the victims have been permitted to speak at Skilling's sentencing in Houston federal court to admonish him.

Skilling's partner in the crimes, former CEO Ken Lay, was to have been sentenced with Skilling on Monday but Lay cheated justice by dropping dead of a heart attack July 5, six weeks after his conviction.

A judge wiped Lay's record clean earlier this week, since his death leaves him unable to complete an appeal of his conviction.

Skilling also is appealing to have his conviction thrown out because four Merrill Lynch bankers involved in the schemes had their convictions tossed earlier this year by a three-judge appeals panel.

It hasn't stopped prosecutors, however, from going after Skilling to shoulder Lay's $43.5 million penalty plus Skilling's own separate penalties of $139.4 million.

Prosecutors say Skilling still has about $60 million in assets, which have been frozen.

Skilling's lawyer, Dan Petrocelli, said Skilling owes his legal defense team more than $30 million, not counting the $23 million that the Justice Department earlier allowed Skilling to set aside for his defense before his assets were frozen.

Feinstein Asks Justice To Appeal Ruling Vacating Lay Conviction (FRESBEE)

Fresno Bee, October 21, 2006

Sen. Dianne Feinstein is urging the Justice Department to appeal a ruling this week vacating the fraud and conspiracy conviction of Enron founder Kenneth Lay.

Feinstein, D-Calif., sent a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday criticizing the decision to erase the conviction. U.S. District Judge Sim Lake in Houston made the ruling because Lay died before getting to pursue appeals.

"I urge the Justice Department to seek an appeal of Judge Lakes' decision, so that the government can fight to preserve Enron victims' hard-fought right to obtain restitution," Feinstein wrote.

The government wants to recover some $42.5 million in what it says were Lay's ill-gotten gains and the ruling complicates that. Fraud by Enron and other companies drove up energy costs in California by billions during the state's 2000-2001 energy crisis.

A Justice Department spokesman, Bryan Sierra, said the department was considering whether to appeal.

Feinstein also criticized the handling of legislation drafted by the Bush administration to change how the law handles the death of a criminal defendant while his or her appeal is pending. The Justice Department sent the proposed legislation to House

Speaker Dennis Hastert and Vice President Dick Cheney, who is formally president of the Senate, in early September, but it was not brought to the floor before Congress recessed for the midterm elections.

Feinstein, who serves on the Senate Judiciary Committee, told Gonzales she was "dismayed" that the proposed legislation was not circulated to other lawmakers.

Sierra said the legislation was referred to the Judiciary Committee and widely reported in the press.

Feinstein said she planned to introduce legislation of her own once Congress reconvenes to address issues arising from the death of a defendant pending appeal.

Senator Wants Justice Department To Appeal Lay Decision (HC)

By David Ivanovich

Houston Chronicle, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., called on the Justice Department on Friday to appeal a Houston judge's decision to vacate the late Ken Lay's fraud and conspiracy convictions.

U.S. District Court Judge Sim Lake earlier this week wiped out the one-time Enron Corp. chairman's convictions because Lay died before his appeals had been exhausted. Lake's decision followed a precedent set in another case in the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Feinstein, in a letter to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, called on the government to appeal the ruling so "the government can fight to preserve Enron victims' hard-fought right to obtain restitution."

Feinstein argued the 5th Circuit's ruling went beyond a doctrine in common law that does away with punishments after a defendant's death.

"The Supreme Court has never held that it also must wipe out a victim's right to compensatory relief such as restitution," Feinstein wrote.

Justice Department spokeswoman Jaclyn Lesch said: "We have received the letter, and it will be sent to the appropriate persons for review."

Feinstein, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said she plans to introduce legislation during Congress' lame duck session after the elections to try to address the decision.

Lay died July 5, just weeks after a jury found him guilty on six charges of fraud and conspiracy.

Lake also found him guilty of bank fraud.

Grasso Braces For Long Battle Over Pay Ruling (WSJ)

By Aaron Lucchetti And Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

Judge's Decision Means Victory For Foes of Former NYSE Chief; A Legal Monster Is Spawned

The fight over one of Wall Street's biggest paychecks -- the $187.5 million compensation package amassed by former New York Stock Exchange chief Dick Grasso -- is headed for yet another round of nasty court battles.

A judge's decision on Thursday that Mr. Grasso needs to give back as much as $100 million significantly changes the landscape of the battle, handing Mr. Grasso's enemies a key victory.

Mr. Grasso vowed to keep pressing his case. "I believe it was right when I started, and nothing has changed my mind," Mr. Grasso said Friday in an interview.

Mr. Grasso, 60 years old, lost his job at the NYSE in 2003 because of the controversy over the rich pay package. Mr. Grasso says he was paid the bulk of the money in 2003 and about $80 million was left after taxes. He says that cash is "prudently managed in a mix of stocks and bonds." He and his wife also own five homes and apartments in New York and Florida. "There are no boats, no planes," he said.

The case has become a many-headed legal monster. There are no fewer than six separate legal claims being made against Mr. Grasso in New York State courts pertaining to his pay. That proliferation of claims has produced some strange legal twists: For instance, a five-judge panel is already hearing appeals to some parts of the dispute -- even though the case itself has yet to go to trial.

Currently, the trial is slated to start sometime next year.

New York state, which is suing Mr. Grasso, contends that he was overpaid as the chairman of a not-for-profit institution. Back then, the NYSE was set up as a not-for-profit, although since then it has converted itself into a public company, NYSE Group Inc.

DOJ_NMG_0084234

Justice Charles E. Ramos, a New York state-court judge, found that Mr. Grasso withheld details about the scope of his pay from the exchange's board of directors. The ruling was a big victory for Attorney General Eliot Spitzer, who made a name for himself a few years ago by waging a war on Wall Street abuses and is now running for governor.

He is up against the feisty Mr. Grasso, who hails from a mostly working-class neighborhood in the New York City borough of Queens, where his mother was a housekeeper. Mr. Grasso has fought Mr. Spitzer at every step. "If he wants to give us a jury trial tomorrow, we'll be there," Mr. Grasso said.

Mr. Spitzer sued Mr. Grasso in May 2004 after settlement discussions between the two sides went nowhere.

Mr. Grasso turned around and sued the NYSE, claiming he actually was owed another $50 million and also that he was defamed after he left the exchange. Over the past two and half years, he has filed numerous motions to have parts of the case against him tossed out, asking at one point for the judge to be replaced and arguing for a trial before a jury -- something he isn't guaranteed under state law.

All of those motions were denied by Justice Ramos and then sent to the New York appellate court, which is expected to hear arguments next month.

"The motion, cross-motions and appeals are really indicative of what a pitched battled it is," says Zachary Hummel, an attorney at Bryan Cave LLP who has followed the matter.

Mr. Grasso defended his legal tactics as necessary for getting a fair trial. "We were ready to start" months ago, said Mr. Grasso. "What we're not ready to do is give up my right to justice under the law."

In an interview on Friday, Mr. Spitzer said "there will be no settlements" with Mr. Grasso. "These defendants deserve to have their repeated lies and misrepresentations brought out into the open."

Ken Langone, a former Big Board director who ran the compensation committee and was also named by the Attorney General as a defendant in the case, disputes Mr. Spitzer's assertions . "Mr. Langone has been straightforward and upfront from day one about the decisions he made as a director, and those facts have been brought into the open time and again in every deposition," a spokesman for Mr. Langone said in a statement. "Mr. Spitzer's cheap disparagements, while typical, cannot alter the obvious reality that Mr. Langone acted properly in his duties and stands behind his conduct."

Justice Ramos's latest ruling will be the subject of Mr. Grasso's next appeal, which will be heard by New York's appellate court, the second-highest court in New York under the Court of Appeals. If Justice Ramos's opinion stands, Mr. Grasso will have to give back the money, the exact amount of which has yet to be determined.

At that point, Mr. Spitzer could claim victory and call it a day. He has previously said that he felt Mr. Grasso should pay $100 million or more back to his former employer.

The same appellate court is expected to hear arguments after Thanksgiving on Mr. Grasso's motion to have the case decided by a jury. Justice Ramos doesn't support a jury trial for major parts of the case. The main legal question to be decided is whether Mr. Grasso's $187.5 million pay package was "reasonable" under the state laws governing not-for-profits.

Mr. Grasso has also requested that Justice Ramos remove himself from the case, in part because the judge had twice previously sought a board seat on the NYSE. If the appellate court agrees, a different judge will hear the case.

Mr. Spitzer said Mr. Grasso is grasping at straws on this claim: "The last refuge of the guilty is to impugn the integrity of the court," he said.

Legal experts say Mr. Grasso has strong grounds to appeal the Ramos ruling.

"Any time a judge usurps the legal process and makes a summary judgment, the appeals court will take a close look at it," says Thomas Curran, a former Manhattan assistant district attorney.

A settlement seems unlikely. Mr. Grasso "has very little leverage right now," Mr. Curran said. "And Mr. Spitzer is not interested in being conciliatory at this stage. Maybe after January [when Mr. Spitzer leaves office], there will be room for discussions."

Write to Aaron Lucchetti at aaron.lucchetti@wsj.com1 and Paul Davies at paul.davies@wsj.com2

CRIMINAL LAW:

Foley Case A Test For Ethics Panel (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Despite an uncharacteristic spurt of activity, the House ethics committee is unlikely to complete its investigation of the Mark Foley page scandal before the election, but it may issue an interim report on Foley's activities and how the GOP leadership responded to warnings, according to sources.

A committee panel has spent two weeks hearing from an array of witnesses. These included former House clerk Jeff Trandahl, who helped supervise the pages, and House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who said he warned House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) this spring about Foley's inappropriate e-mails to a former page from Louisiana.

Foley (R-Fla.) abruptly resigned his House seat Sept. 29 after being confronted by ABC News with copies of sexually explicit instant messages he had sent to male former pages. The FBI has launched a criminal investigation into Foley's actions, and the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, which has been largely dormant for the past two years, is investigating what, if anything, House GOP leaders did in response to repeated warnings about Foley's conduct.

Next week, the panel is likely to depose members of Hastert's staff, including chief of staff Scott Palmer and counsel Ted Van Der Meid, and possibly the speaker himself.

It may also interview Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.), who is the subject of a preliminary Justice Department inquiry into a camping trip he took with male former pages and others in 1996.

Rep. Tom Cole (R-Okla.), who sits on the ethics committee but is not on the four-member task force investigating the Foley matter, said both political parties have a stake in seeing that the probe is completed as soon as possible. The scandal has become an issue in several races and has cast a pall over the House, an institution that had already suffered a serious decline in public approval, according to polling.

"There's no upside for anybody in dragging this out," Cole said. "It serves us well and it serves [the Democrats] well to actually just do the right thing."

The committee's sudden flurry of activity -- its members have taken sworn depositions from key players in the Foley scandal four days a week for the past two weeks -- contrasts with its failure to respond to a rash of lobbying and political corruption scandals over the past two years. Evenly divided between Republicans and Democrats, the committee sat idle while the two parties feuded over staffing and procedural issues. Some ethics watchdog groups say the outcome of the Foley probe will demonstrate whether Congress can police itself.

"This is a crucial test institutionally," said Rep. Howard L. Berman (Calif.), the top Democrat on the ethics committee and the Foley investigative panel. "If we can't divorce ourselves from the political consequences and come to a bipartisan conclusion, it speaks poorly for the future of peer review in the House."

In April, the ethics committee's ranking Democrat, Rep. Alan B. Mollohan (W.Va.) stepped aside when it became known that he was under federal investigation for funneling federal funds to home-state foundations and possibly enriching himself. A month later, the committee finally announced that it was investigating three people: former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.) and Rep. Robert W. Ney (R-Ohio). Cunningham and Ney have pleaded guilty to accepting bribes, and Cunningham has begun serving a long prison sentence. Jefferson is the subject of another federal bribery probe. The committee has not issued reports in any of those cases.

"Regardless of what happens in the Foley investigation, the ethics process in the House is a failed process and must be fixed," said Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer, a congressional watchdog who supports establishment of an independent investigative body that would answer to the ethics panel. "We have had the most congressional corruption scandals in three decades, and we have had a House ethics committee that did nothing about it."

But Berman and the committee's chairman, Doc Hastings (R-Wash.), have managed to resuscitate the panel to some extent in recent months, doling out private advice to lawmakers behind closed doors and taking on the politically sensitive task of probing whether Hastert and his deputies failed to act quickly enough to stop Foley.

In a statement, Hastings said the task force's "primary focus is on how individuals holding positions of authority in the House -- as well as the overall system, if you will -- handled information concerning improper interaction between members and House pages."

Earlier this month, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) offered a resolution demanding that the panel issue a preliminary report on its work within 10 days. GOP leaders referred the measure to the ethics committee, and it is now clear that the panel will not release its findings that quickly.

The committee has not decided whether to issue an interim report, sources said, but members will weigh the option after concluding depositions in the case.

Hastings said that although he and his colleagues hope to conclude the probe soon, "the American people are entitled to the entire truth about how this incident was handled, and we'll take as long as necessary to make sure they get it.

"You simply cannot pledge to go wherever the evidence takes you and, at the same time, set some self-imposed deadline and expect to be taken seriously," he said.

The task force needs to depose only about half a dozen additional witnesses and does not need to engage in a lengthy document review, but GOP ethics lawyer Jan Baran said it will be nearly impossible for the committee to issue a final report before voters go to the polls.

DOJ_NMG_0084236

Priest Named By Foley Is Barred From All Religious Duties (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

MIAMI, Oct. 20 — The Archdiocese of Miami on Friday barred the Rev. Anthony Mercieca from functioning as a priest anywhere in the world after confirming that he was the clergyman who Mark Foley said molested him in the 1960's.

Father Mercieca, who now lives in Malta, can no longer publicly celebrate Mass, administer the sacraments or wear priestly clothes, said Mary Ross Agosta, a diocesan spokeswoman.

Ms. Agosta apologized to Mr. Foley in a statement and described as repugnant Father Mercieca's intimate contact with him, which the priest disclosed to a Florida newspaper this week. Father Mercieca, 69, worked in South Florida for almost 40 years and remains under the auspices of the archdiocese.

"Such behavior is morally reprehensible, canonically criminal and inexcusable," Ms. Agosta said.

Mr. Foley, 52, resigned from the House of Representatives last month after the release of sexually explicit messages he had sent to teenage Congressional pages. Soon after, his lawyer announced that Mr. Foley is gay, had gone into treatment for alcoholism and had been molested by a clergyman when he was 13 to 15.

"An apology is due to Mr. Foley for the hurt he has experienced," Ms. Agosta said.

So far, she said, no one else had reported sexual misconduct by Father Mercieca. He worked in at least eight parishes in South Florida since 1966, most recently at Blessed Trinity Catholic Church in Miami Springs from 1993 to 2003. Ms. Agosta said he left Florida to retire.

"There were absolutely no other problems," she said in an interview.

Ms. Agosta said the Archdiocese of Miami had begun an internal investigation that could result in further sanctions against Father Mercieca. A spokesman for the archbishop of Malta said an investigation was under way there, too.

Though retired, Father Mercieca was still saying Mass every morning at a cathedral on Gozo, the Maltese island where he was raised and now lives with his brother, also a priest.

The Survivors Network of Those Abused by Priests, an advocacy group, said that both diocesan actions were insufficient and that Father Mercieca should be put in a secure treatment facility while the police investigated.

The Herald-Tribune of Sarasota, Fla., reported Thursday that Father Mercieca said he had skinny-dipped and lounged naked in saunas with the young Mr. Foley, massaged him and roomed with him naked on overnight trips. He said that once, on tranquilizers, he might have gone further with Mr. Foley but could not recall details.

Father Mercieca repeated the claims in interviews with other news outlets, but also said his relationship with Mr. Foley was not sexual.

The survivors group has urged Mr. Foley to press charges, but the statute of limitations has probably expired. His civil lawyer, Gerald Richman, said Friday that he had no idea whether Mr. Foley would pursue the matter.

Mr. Richman identified Father Mercieca to Palm Beach County prosecutors this week as Mr. Foley's molester. Prosecutors shared the information with the archdiocese, but said they would do nothing more unless other victims emerged.

Ms. Agosta said the archdiocese, which includes Broward, Miami-Dade and Monroe Counties, would encourage any other victims to come forward by asking every parish to make an announcement about Father Mercieca.

Just A Quiet Retiree Leading Mass In Malta (NYT)

By Ian Fisher

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

VICTORIA, Malta, Oct. 20 — He is known here as Father Tony, though he does not seem to be known very well, for the Rev. Anthony Mercieca spent his career as a priest far from Gozo, the tiny Mediterranean island where he grew up. And he is not sociable anyway, say people who know him.

"He is a very solitary man," said George Borg, 52, a teacher who described himself as a family friend. "He walks alone."

That quiet ended after Father Mercieca, 69, gave several telephone interviews admitting that he had had possibly inappropriate encounters in Florida in the 1960's with Mark Foley, the congressman who resigned over explicit electronic messages to pages.

In the interviews, Father Mercieca admitted to massaging the boy, skinny-dipping with him and staying in the same room with him on overnight trips. He said, perhaps, too much — and on Friday, he refused to speak to reporters camped out on the narrow street where he lives with his brother, George, also a priest. As the diocese here investigated the accusations, many of those closest to Father Mercieca did not want to address the subject.

DOJ_NMG_0084237

"Leave me alone for five minutes," his brother begged reporters as he left the family house here in the main town on Gozo, the smaller of two principal islands of Malta, a Roman Catholic nation of 400,000 south of Sicily.

The sketchiest of portraits emerged from neighbors and church officials: Father Mercieca retired here a few years ago, having spent his career mostly in Brazil and the United States, and has not been officially active here as a priest. But he said Mass at 9 every morning for several dozen worshipers at the main church here.

While abroad, he returned to Gozo several weeks a year for vacation.

One church official, who requested anonymity because he did not have the authority to speak publicly, said that until the interviews on Thursday the diocese had not known of Mr. Foley's accusations — or indeed any against Father Mercieca concerning abuse.

There seemed to be little anger at Father Mercieca among his neighbors. "There are a lot of people like this," said one, Carmel Grech, 80. "Everybody has sins. What is the big fuss here?"

After 3 Attempts To Convict Gotti, Prosecutors Decide Against Making It 4 (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

John A. Gotti, who three times in just over a year has escaped conviction on federal racketeering charges, will finally be able to pursue what he claims he has long desired: an ordinary life.

After three trials in Manhattan, each ending in a hung jury, federal prosecutors have announced that they will not seek a fourth trial on those charges for Mr. Gotti, a decision federal officials had indicated was likely. It enshrines him as a defendant even trickier to convict than his father, the Gambino family don, John J. Gotti, who beat the rap three times himself before being found guilty in 1992 and dying in a federal prison hospital 10 years later. (The younger Mr. Gotti is not invulnerable: He was convicted in a previous case and served prison time.)

In a terse statement issued yesterday, Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan, said this particular case was over. "The government has concluded that a retrial of defendant John A. Gotti on the pending indictment is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries in the case," it read. "Accordingly, we submitted a proposed order which the court has signed and which ends this prosecution."

That left Mr. Gotti, who has acknowledged through his lawyers that he ran the Gambino family during stretches of the 1990's, to return to a life as normal as his name will allow — for now.

This decision does not preclude the F.B.I. or other authorities from developing new evidence for a different case some day.

At the end of his third trial in September, Mr. Gotti told reporters he wanted to "move on" and expressed a desire to work with children.

His lawyer, Charles F. Carnesi, said Mr. Gotti may turn to academe. "He's interested in pursuing a degree," he said. "In social work or counseling or maybe something with the schools." With the indictment dismissed, he is free to go as he pleases, and the liens on his property securing his bail will soon be lifted, Mr. Carnesi said.

Mr. Gotti's triumph was a stinging defeat for Curtis Sliwa, the radio talk show host whom prosecutors said was a victim in the case. While the jury agreed that Mr. Gotti ordered the abduction and attack of Mr. Sliwa in 1992 after he called the elder Mr. Gotti a drug dealer on the air, they could not agree on the overall charge that this was part of a racketeering conspiracy.

In a statement from the newsroom of WABC radio, Mr. Sliwa called Mr. Gotti a criminal and a drain on society. He also called Mr. Gotti's father a serial killer and a disgrace to the human race. He said he intended to sue Mr. Gotti "for not only the bullets that he ordered put into my body, but for the fear and abuse he has heaped on our law-abiding society over the past 20 years."

He ridiculed Mr. Gotti's plan to "turn over a new leaf" as a charade.

"He claims that he has moved on with his life and just wants to live in peace," Mr. Sliwa wrote. "He wants to write books for children and raise money for charity, he claims. But part of moving on in life is acknowledging the innocent people hurt in the past. The people he extorted, stole from, had beaten and shot."

Federal Prosecutors Decline To Pursue Fourth Racketeering Case Against Junior Gotti (AP)

By LARRY McSHANE, Associated Press

AP, October 21, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - Three mistrials added up Friday to one huge victory for second-generation mobster John A. "Junior" Gotti.

Federal prosecutors announced they would not pursue a fourth racketeering case against Mr. Gotti, son of the late Gambino head John "Teflon Don" Gotti.

DOJ_NMG_0084238

"The decision wasn't unexpected, but obviously it's great to have confirmation," said Mr. Gotti's attorney, Charles Carnesi. "It's a terrific relief."

Mr. Carnesi had not yet spoken with Mr. Gotti, who said after last month's third mistrial that he wanted to take his wife and six children to the Midwest, attend college and lead a quiet life away from the region where his name became synonymous with organized crime.

U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement that retrying Mr. Gotti "is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries in the case."

But more legal problems could lie ahead: Radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa promised a civil suit against Mr. Gotti over his near-fatal June 1992 kidnapping allegedly ordered by the mob scion. Mr. Sliwa was allegedly targeted for his incessant on-air criticism of the elder Mr. Gotti. He survived by diving out the window of a moving cab after suffering a pair of gunshot wounds.

The jury in the third trial unanimously found that Mr. Gotti, 42, had ordered the kidnapping, and the defendant admitted to a lengthy criminal career. But that was insufficient to convict the younger Mr. Gotti of racketeering because the panel was split on his claim of quitting the mob before July 1999.

Mr. Gotti's assertion was the key to the case, because the five-year racketeering statute of limitations expired if he had stopped mob activity by that date. The latest case had a jury divided 8-4, with most believing Mr. Gotti never swore off the mob before the Sept. 27 mistrial was declared.

In Mr. Gotti's September 2005 trial, a jury deadlocked 11-1 in favor of conviction. This spring, a second trial produced the same result - although that panel favored acquittal.

We Give Up On Jr., Say Feds (NYDN)

By John Marzulli, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, October 21, 2006

For John A. (Junior) Gotti, the third mistrial was the charm.

Federal prosecutors announced yesterday they will not retry Gotti for racketeering and will abandon efforts to nail him for trying to kill radio host Curtis Sliwa.

Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement that a fourth trial was "not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries."

That means for the first time in eight years, Gotti, 42, is a free man with no criminal charges hanging over him. That didn't sit well with Sliwa, who vowed to bring a lawsuit against Gotti seeking damages for the 1992 shooting, which allegedly was in retaliation for his on-air attacks on the late Gambino crime boss John Gotti.

"I feel as disappointed as a Mets fan today," Sliwa told the Daily News. "I would have hoped they would have prosecuted him four or five times. But I understand they have to deal with legal technicalities."

Late yesterday afternoon, Gotti - whose father's ability to beat the rap earned him the moniker the Teflon Don - returned to his gated mansion in Oyster Bay Cove, L.I., with one of his sons in a chauffeured sedan, declining to speak to a reporter.

The mob scion has expressed interest in moving out West, returning to school to study child psychology and writing a book, but he needs permission from the feds because he's still on supervised release for his 1998 federal conviction.

"He's been talking about plans for the future and now John has the freedom to go on with his life," sister Victoria Gotti said. "His only option, I think, is to get off the [government's] radar and go off and live somewhere else, like the Midwest or down South."

She said the entire Gotti clan is "beat up and tired" after three trials that have taken a heavy emotional toll on her brother. Gotti already had heard the good news on the radio by the time defense lawyer Charles Carnesi reached him.

"He was thrilled," Carnesi said. "As much as it was expected, it's still different when you finally have confirmation.

"He wants to leave New York as soon as it can be arranged," Carnesi added.

Sliwa said he's owed monetary damages - "I can't tell you the pain I suffer as a result of the rearrangement of my internal plumbing" - and promised to donate any proceeds to charity.

But his lawsuit is probably dead on arrival, legal experts say, for the very same reason the feds failed to convict Gotti - the statute of limitations has passed.

Although the jury in the last mistrial agreed to convict Gotti in the Sliwa attack - which might have created an exception to the one-year statute of limitations for filing a civil suit - there was no verdict because they were hung on the racketeering charge.

Gotti's mother, Victoria, didn't think much of Sliwa's threatened suit.

"I think the victims of all his hoaxes should sue him," she said, referring to Sliwa's admissions that he had staged publicity stunts to get media coverage of the Guardian Angels, including a fabricated claim that he had been kidnapped by a city transit cop.

DOJ_NMG_0084239

Though Gotti insists he left the Mafia behind in 1999, one law enforcement source said it's "pretty impossible" to believe he's going to move away and go straight.

"He sitting on a ton of money which is all ill-gotten gains," the source said. "He knows one life and it's called organized crime. Plus he has to look over his shoulder with the Gambino family because he really upset a lot of people."

But mob expert Jerry Capeci said he doesn't think anyone is gunning for Gotti for speaking to prosecutors, which at one point was a serious Mafia no-no.

"He never hurt anyone, never became a cooperating witness," Capeci said. "Even though three juries could never agree on whether he quit the mob, his Gambino crime family days are gone, if not forgotten."

With John Lauinger

Junior Gotti Won't Face Retrial (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, October 21, 2006

The government dropped the other shoe Friday and said it won't retry John A. Gotti, the son of the late crime boss, on racketeering charges.

It was widely expected that federal prosecutors in Manhattan would drop efforts to convict Gotti after three mistrials. Gotti, 42, of Oyster Bay, the son of the late Gambino crime boss John Gotti, has been free on bail since the latest mistrial on Sept. 27.

"The government has concluded that a retrial of defendant John A. Gotti on the pending indictment is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries in the case," said Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia in a statement released Friday morning. Garcia said Manhattan federal court Judge Shira Scheindlin signed papers that ended the prosecution of Gotti.

"It was just wise to stop," said one federal law enforcement official who asked not to be named.

"It wasn't unexpected, but it is great to have confirmation," said Gotti's defense attorney, Charles Carnesi, of Garden City. "It was the right and responsible thing to do."

"He fully intends to move out of New York" to get away from his former associates, Carnesi said of Gotti.

But Gotti was blasted by Curtis Sliwa, the Guardian Angels founder and radio personality whose 1992 kidnapping was ordered by Gotti, prosecutors charged. Sliwa, who was seriously wounded in the incident, also said he planned to sue Gotti for the attack. But such a suit could run up against the statute of limitations.

During his last trial, Gotti told Newsday that he planned to continue his college studies and work with children. With the dismissed indictment, Gotti's multimillion-dollar bail has been cleared.

Though Gotti couldn't be reached for comment Friday, his sister Angel said her brother might explore the idea of going into a food business with both her and sister Victoria.

"We are all relieved," Angel Gotti said. "Hopefully, they will leave him alone."

Gotti was accused in the indictment of various racketeering offenses, including conspiracy, extortion conspiracy and witness tampering. He faced 20 years in prison on the racketeering charge alone. But in three trials between August 2005 and this year, the government failed to convince a unanimous jury. In the last trial, jurors told reporters the panel sometimes was evenly split on some of the charges.

The only unanimous decision by the jury came in its finding that Gotti was involved in the Sliwa kidnapping, jurors said. But the Sliwa charge was only one racketeering act, of which two had to be proved to sustain a conviction.

Gotti maintained that he left the mob in July 1999, a date that would have put the indictment outside the statute of limitations. Some jurors said Gotti's withdrawal defense was credible.

Sliwa, who said he still suffers from the effects of being shot during the kidnap attempt, vented his anger and frustration in a statement released Friday.

"Today, John Gotti was given a gift he didn't deserve -- release from federal criminal charges, which included his ordering of the plot to kidnap and shoot me in 1992," Sliwa said.

Sliwa said he plans to bring a lawsuit against Gotti "for the harm he has caused to me and my family" as well as "fear and abuse he heaped on law-abiding society."

But intentional tort claims are governed by a one-year statute of limitations, and unless Sliwa has some other legal theory, any lawsuit against Gotti could not go forward, said Robert Kelner, a prominent personal injury attorney in Manhattan.

GIDDY GOTTI JR. DEFEATS THE FEDS (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084240

October 21, 2006 -- Prosecutors in the John "Junior" Gotti case threw in the towel yesterday, announcing they won't seek a fourth racketeering trial for the mob scion.

The son of the late Gambino boss John "Teflon Don" Gotti - who earned his nickname by beating a trio of prosecutions before he was jailed for life in 1992 - got his good news less than a month after his third mistrial in the span of a year.

"The government has concluded that a retrial of defendant John A. Gotti on the pending indictment is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries," U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said yesterday.

"We're very pleased," said Gotti lawyer Charles Carnesi. "The decision wasn't unexpected, but obviously it's great to have confirmation. It's a terrific relief, and I'm very, very pleased for John, his wife and his children."

But Gotti's legal woes are far from over if radio host Curtis Sliwa and the feds have their way.

Sliwa, who was kidnapped and shot in a chilling 1992 plot allegedly hatched by Gotti, yesterday announced plans to hit the former Gambino crime family leader with a civil suit.

"John Gotti was given a gift he didn't deserve," Sliwa said. "I'm bringing a lawsuit against Gotti for the harm he has caused to me and my family. For not only the bullets that he ordered put into my body, but for the fear and abuse he has heaped on our law-abiding society over the past 20 years."

Prosecutors made a written request to have the charges nullified, which was authorized by Manhattan federal Judge Shira Scheindlin - a strategic decision by the feds that could allow them to pursue portions of the case in a future indictment.

The move pre-empted plans by Gotti's lawyers to seek permanent dismissal of the racketeering charges, which included kidnapping, a 2003 witness-tampering plot, loansharking and other crimes.

The sticking point for the divided jury at Gotti's latest trial in September was his claim that he retired from the Mafia in 1999 - before the five-year statute of limitations on most of the charges in the case - splitting the anonymous panel eight to four in favor of conviction.

One charge the jury did agree on unanimously was that Gotti ordered a pair of Gambino goons to kidnap Sliwa, founder of the Guardian Angels, in a stolen taxi.

This wasn't enough for a conviction under racketeering laws, however, since prosecutors must prove at least two criminal acts.

"I'm now convinced that the trial must have occurred in some small, uneducated country, and not in New York City in 2006," said mob-busting former federal prosecutor James Walden. "The notion that John Gotti Jr. withdrew from the Gambino family based on the evidence presented in that trial is gullible in the extreme."

Defense lawyer Gerald Shargel, who represented Gotti, said: "The government had a very weak case, and every time they tried to make it better, it just got worse."

Paul Callan, legal analyst and former deputy chief of homicide at the Brooklyn DA's office, called the failure to convict Gotti a "travesty of justice."

"The prosecution tried him too often and too late," he said.

Sliwa, who nearly died from the bullet wounds after he escaped his attackers by throwing himself out of the speeding cab, said any money he receives from a suit would go to other victims of the Gambino family.

"Knowing John Gotti Jr., the biggest way to hurt him is to force him to give up his money. He's like a miser. He throws nickels around like manhole covers," Sliwa said.

Gotti has vowed to leave the Northeast if the feds abandoned the prosecution.

kati.cornell@nypost.com

Mr. Gotti, You're Free To Go (STNIA)

By Jeff Harrell, STATEN ISLAND ADVANCE

Staten Island Advance (NY), October 21, 2006

After 3 mistrials, prosecutors say they're done trying him

There won't be a fourth trial of John A. (Junior) Gotti.

After three hung juries, federal prosecutors yesterday dropped racketeering charges against the one-time head of the Gambino crime family.

"The government has concluded that a retrial of defendant John A. Gotti on the pending indictment is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries in the case," said U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, whose office first tried Gotti on a series of racketeering charges in August last year -- ending with a hung jury voting 11-1 for conviction.

"Accordingly, [on Thursday] we submitted a proposed order which the court has signed and which ends this prosecution," Garcia said.

Gotti, 42, was tried three times on charges ranging from racketeering and construction extortion to ordering the 1992 abduction of Curtis Sliwa, in which the radio-show host and Guardian Angels founder was shot and wounded in a rigged taxicab.

Had he been convicted, he faced 35 years in prison.

The dismissal -- signed by Garcia; Assistant U.S. Attorney Victor Hou, lead prosecutor during the third trial, and U.S. District Judge Shira A. Scheindlin -- was made public yesterday.

Gotti's attorney Charles Carnesi greeted the news with relief.

"It was not unexpected," Carnesi said. "We were thrilled when we got the outcome that we did -- the excitement was when we got the hung jury.

"We are relieved to get the confirmation."

Carnesi said yesterday afternoon that he had yet to speak with Gotti about the decision.

Jennie Carmona, who served as the defense team's legal assistant during all three trials, said word that the feds would not seek a fourth trial had reached members of Gotti's family, including his mother, Victoria Gotti, and his sister, Angel.

"I'm glad that all the charges have been dismissed," Ms. Carmona said. "And now John Gotti can return and have a normal life, as normal as can be, with his children and family, who he adores."

Following the third mistrial, which was declared on Sept. 27, Gotti maintained that he wanted to take his wife and six children out of New York, perhaps to the Midwest, where he might attend college. He also mentioned Florida, North Carolina and the Pacific Northwest as possible destinations.

"Just let us go," was Gotti's mantra as he stood in the courtroom waiting for court officers to remove the electronic bracelet that he wore for nearly a year as a condition of house arrest. "Let me move on with my life."

In the first trial, only one juror believed that Gotti's defense. In the second trial, held in the spring, eight of 12 jurors voted for acquittal. In his third trial, the jury was unanimous only in finding that Gotti ordered the abduction of and attack on Sliwa as payback for on-air blasts against the elder John Gotti, who was sent to prison for life.

While the feds appear to be done with Gotti, Sliwa isn't.

"I'm bringing a lawsuit against Gotti for the harm he has caused to me and my family," Sliwa said yesterday. "He didn't deserve this break, because a jury found him guilty of nearly killing me."

Throughout the trials, Gotti was held on $7 million bail. That money, put up by family and friends, will be returned.

Jeff Harrell is a news reporter for the Advance. He may be reached at harrell@siadvance.com.

`Junior' Gotti Kidnap Case Is Dismissed By U.S. (Update2) (BLOOM)

By David Glovin And Patricia Hurtado

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

Oct. 20 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. government dropped its racketeering case against accused gangster John A. ``Junior'' Gotti, who was charged with ordering the 1992 kidnapping of radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa.

The dismissal of the case came after jurors deadlocked and a U.S. judge on Sept. 27 declared a third mistrial of the case for Gotti, the son of the late Gambino crime family boss. Gotti faced up to 30 years in prison had he been convicted of racketeering and conspiracy charges.

``The government has concluded that a retrial of defendant John A Gotti on the pending indictment is not in the interests of justice in light of the three prior hung juries,'' U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement today in New York that announced the dismissal, which was approved by a judge yesterday.

The announcement mirrored Garcia's dismissal of several other high-profile cases. Prosecutors in August said they'd withdraw obstruction-of-justice charges against former Credit Suisse Group banker Frank Quattrone if he remains out of trouble. Quattrone's conviction had been reversed by an appeals court. Prosecutors also dismissed charges this year against two New York Stock Exchange specialists accused of illegal trading.

Lauren McDonough, a spokeswoman for Garcia, declined to comment beyond the statement.

Gotti lawyer Charles Canesi didn't have an immediate comment. Gotti lives with his wife and six children in Oyster Bay, New York.

Sliwa

Federal prosecutors said Gotti personally ordered the kidnapping and assault of Sliwa in retaliation for disparaging remarks he made on the air about Gotti's father.

Prosecutors claimed Joseph D'Angelo, a soldier in the Gambino crime family, posing as a taxi driver, picked up Sliwa near his apartment in Manhattan's East Village in a stolen cab.

DOJ_NMG_0084242

Sliwa testified that a second man hiding in the front seat opened fire and shot him repeatedly while they struggled in the moving cab. Sliwa, founder of the Guardian Angels anti-crime group, escaped through the window of the cab with serious wounds in his leg and torso.

The defendant's father, John J. Gotti, who led the Gambino family until his 1992 conviction for racketeering, spent the last 11 years of his life in a federal prison hospital in Springfield, Missouri. He died of throat cancer on June 10, 2002. He was 61.

Exclusive: Feds Probe A Top Democrat's Relationship With AIPAC (TIME)

By Timothy J. Burger, Washington

Time, October 22, 2006

The Department of Justice is investigating whether Rep. Jane Harman and the pro-Israel group worked together to get her reappointed as the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee

Did a Democratic member of Congress improperly enlist the support of a major pro-Israel lobbying group to try to win a top committee assignment? That's the question at the heart of an ongoing investigation by the FBI and Justice Department prosecutors, who are examining whether Rep. Jane Harman of California and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) may have violated the law in a scheme to get Harman reappointed as the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee, according to knowledgeable sources in and out of the U.S. government.

The sources tell TIME that the investigation by Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has simmered out of sight since about the middle of last year, is examining whether Harman and AIPAC arranged for wealthy supporters to lobby House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi on Harman's behalf. Harman said Thursday in a voicemail message that any investigation of — or allegation of improper conduct by — her would be "irresponsible, laughable and scurrilous." On Friday, Washington GOP super lawyer Ted Olson left voicemail messages underscoring that Harman has no knowledge of any investigation. "Congresswoman Harman has asked me to follow up on calls you've had," Olson said. "She is not aware of any such investigation, does not believe that it is occurring, and wanted to make sure that you and your editors knew that as far as she knows, that's not true... . No one from the Justice Department has contacted her." It is not, however, a given that Harman would know that she is under investigation. In a follow-up phone call from California, Olson said Harman hired him this morning because she takes seriously the possibility of a media report about an investigation of her, even though she does not believe it herself.

A spokesman for AIPAC, a powerful Washington-based organization with more than 100,000 members across the U.S., denied any wrongdoing by the group and stressed that it is not taking sides in regards to the committee assignment. Spokespersons for Justice and the FBI declined to comment. The case is a spin-off of a probe that has already led to charges under the Espionage Act against two AIPAC lobbyists, whose case is still pending, and to a 12-and-a-half-year prison sentence for former Defense Intelligence Agency official Lawrence A. Franklin. Franklin pleaded guilty a year ago to three felony counts involving improper disclosure and handling of classified information about the Middle East and terrorism to the two lobbyists, who in turn are accused of passing it on to a journalist and a foreign government, widely believed to be Israel. The two lobbyists, who have denied any wrongdoing but were dismissed by AIPAC in April of 2005, were indicted on felony counts of conspiring with government officials to receive classified information they were not authorized to have access to and providing national defense information to people not entitled to receive it.

Around mid-2005, the investigation expanded to cover aspects of Harman's quiet but aggressive campaign to persuade House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi to reappoint her to the prestigious position on the House intel panel. The alleged campaign to support Harman for the leadership post came amid media reports that Pelosi had soured on her California colleague and might name Rep. Alcee Hastings of Florida, himself a major supporter of Israel, to succeed Harman.

The sources say the probe also involves whether, in exchange for the help from AIPAC, Harman agreed to help try to persuade the Administration to go lighter on the AIPAC officials caught up in the ongoing investigation. If that happened, it might be construed as an illegal quid pro quo, depending on the context of the situation. But the sources caution that there has been no decision to charge anyone and that it is unclear whether Harman and AIPAC acted on the idea.

AIPAC spokesman Patrick Dorton denies that the organization has engaged in any improper conduct. "Both Congressman Hastings and Congresswoman Harman are strong leaders on issues of importance to the pro-Israel community and would be exemplary Democratic leaders for the House intelligence committee," Dorton said. "AIPAC would never engage in a quid pro quo in relation to a federal investigation or any federal matter and the notion that it would do so is preposterous. AIPAC is not aware that the Justice Department is looking into issues involving the intelligence committee, and has not been asked any questions or contacted by the government on this matter, but certainly would cooperate with any inquiry." Dorton added that AIPAC has previously been assured that the organization and its current employees are not being investigated. In this same investigation, the Justice Department has previously suggested that AIPAC had questionable motives in trying to help a valued government contact remain in a sensitive national security post. The Justice Department alleges in its indictment of Franklin that he asked one of the two AIPAC lobbyists to "put in a good word" for him in seeking assignment to the National Security Council. The document says the AIPAC official noted that such a job would put Franklin "by the elbow of the President" and said he would "do what I can."

DOJ_NMG_0084243

AIPAC lists praise from Pelosi among a series of quotes from world leaders on its website: "The special relationship between the United States and Israel is as strong as it is because of your [AIPAC's] fidelity to that partnership..." But congressional sources say Pelosi has been infuriated by pressure from some major donors lobbying on behalf of Harman. In a story touching on tensions between Pelosi and Harman, an alternative California publication, LA Weekly, reported in May that Harman "had some major contributors call Pelosi to impress upon her the importance of keeping Jane in place. According to these members, this tactic, too, hasn't endeared Harman to Pelosi."

A congressional source tells TIME that the lobbbying for Harman has included a phone call several months ago from entertainment industry billionaire and major Democratic party contributor Haim Saban. A Saban spokeswoman said he could not be reached for comment. A phone call pushing for a particular member's committee assignment might be unwelcome, but it would not normally be illegal on its own. And it is unclear whether Saban — who made much of his fortune with the Mighty Morphin Power Rangers children's franchise — knew that lobbying Pelosi might be viewed by others as part of a larger alleged plan.

Saban has donated at least $3,000 to Harman's campaign, according to Federal Election Commission records, and the Saban Center for Middle East Policy, which he sponsors at the prestigious Brookings Institution, boasts Harman among its biggest fans. "When the Saban Center talks, I listen," Harman said at a Saban Center briefing in February on U.S. strategy in Iraq. Harman quipped that, in order to attend the session at Brookings, she had to "blow off" a senior intelligence official's appearance before a House committee.

Rep. Harman Reportedly Under Investigation (WT)

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

The U.S. Justice Department is trying to determine whether Rep. Jane Harman, D-Calif., got improper help from an Israeli lobbying group.

Harman of California is the senior Democrat on the House intelligence committee. Time Magazine reports she may have received a boost from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee when Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi wanted to remove her from the committee.

Harman left a voice mail for the magazine calling any suggestions of improper conduct "irresponsible, laughable and scurrilous." She has retained Ted Olson, the lawyer who formerly served as President George W. Bush's solicitor general.

Olson told Time Harman did not know of any investigation but decided to retain him after news reports of a probe.

The investigation appears to stem from another probe involving AIPAC. Two former employees have been charged with receiving classified information from Lawrence Franklin, a former Defense Intelligence Agency employee who has pleaded guilty in the case.

Abramoff To Do Time In Cumberland, Md (NBC)

By Joel Seidman, Producer

NBC News, October 21, 2006

.Disgraced lobbyist still cooperating in influence-peddling probe

WASHINGTON - Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff will report Nov. 15 to a federal prison in Cumberland, Md., to serve a 70-month sentence for fraud and conspiracy charges in connection with the purchase of Florida-based SunCruz Casinos.

U.S. District Judge Paul Huck granted a request by prosecutors and Abramoff's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, that Abramoff serve his time at the Cumberland facility because it is within driving distance of Washington. They said in a court filing that Abramoff was cooperating in the Justice Department's Washington influence peddling investigation and would continue to assist prosecutors while in prison.

The Cumberland facility, about a two-hour drive from Washington, "will facilitate the government's access" to Abramoff, according to court papers. The government said the proximity to Washington would help prosecutors reduce costs and travel time.

Story continues below ? advertisement

If the Cumberland prison is full, Huck recommended that Abramoff be housed at the federal corrections facility in Morgantown, W.Va., which "is also within driving distance of Washington, D.C."

Abramoff and his partner, Adam Kidan, pleaded guilty in January to defrauding lenders of more than $60 million in the SunCruz gambling casino scandal in Florida.

Abramoff is scheduled to appear at a court hearing Dec. 8 in Washington regarding his guilty pleas in January to charges of fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy to bribe Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio.

Ney pleaded guilty last week to two counts of conspiring to commit fraud and to making false statements. He is expected to serve 27 months based on a Justice Department recommendation.

Ney is the only member of Congress to be charged in the Abramoff lobbying scandal. He has vowed to resign from Congress in the "next few weeks," but as of now he remains in the House.

TAX BREAK: Legislator Lobbied Him On Behalf Of Marlow, Borough Mayor Says. (ADN)

By Lisa Demer, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage Daily News, October 21, 2006

Kohring's work for developer criticized

Last year, state Rep. Vic Kohring sat down with the mayor of the Fairbanks North Star Borough, Jim Whitaker, to talk about changing a state law to increase a tax break for an Anchorage-based developer.

Kohring, a Wasilla Republican, wasn't there to represent a constituent. He was on the payroll of the developer, Marc Marlow, for whom he had been working since November 2004.

To Whitaker, himself a former legislator, Kohring was acting like a lobbyist, not a lawmaker.

The Fairbanks borough had already approved a tax break for Marlow should he buy and renovate the Polaris Hotel, a boarded-up derelict building that is to Fairbanks what the old MacKay Building was to Anchorage.

But in the meeting in Whitaker's office on Nov. 3, Kohring wanted to see if the borough would agree to a change in state law to make the tax break even more beneficial to Marlow, according to Whitaker.

"As far as I could tell, he was functioning as a lobbyist, and lobbyists do that all the time," said Whitaker, who served alongside Kohring from 1999 to 2003 as part of the Republican majority in the state House. "I thought it was inappropriate."

The bill was eventually introduced in the Alaska Legislature by Fairbanks Rep. Jay Ramras, who said he was asked by Kohring to advance the legislation. Marlow said in an interview recently that he drafted the bill.

"I wrote the original language," Marlow said.

TWO-YEAR RELATIONSHIP

Kohring has worked on a half-dozen projects for Marlow since being hired by him in 2004. Several of the projects, including a proposed electrical generating plant in the Mat-Su, are subject to government approvals.

Now their relationship is coming under new scrutiny as part of an FBI investigation into legislators, influence peddling and the oil field service and construction company Veco Corp.

Kohring is one of six Alaska legislators whose offices were searched by the FBI on Aug. 31. Agents took a folder of information on Marlow along with other items, according to a copy of the receipt for property provided by Kohring's attorney.

No one has been charged with a crime. The FBI has said the investigation is continuing.

Kohring, 48, is a Republican seeking his seventh term representing the Wasilla area. He rode the wave of conservatism that swept through the Mat-Su Borough in the 1990s. He is among a handful of state lawmakers who have found work with companies that have business before the Legislature or state agencies. Kohring's business, Vic Kohring Enterprises, has one client, Marlow, according to required financial disclosures. Marlow paid him $38,100 last year and $5,400 in 2004. Kohring won't have to disclose his 2006 income until March, but he said in an e-mail that his pay from Marlow has dropped because he's taking time off for campaigning.

Kohring says he's abiding by all the ethics rules for legislators.

Outside employment is to be expected for part-time legislators, he wrote in one of several e-mails to the Daily News.

"I trust the voter's judgment to evaluate my activities and my constituents are the ultimate judge," Kohring wrote. "I firmly believe I have never compromised my obligations to them or the state because of my personal employment."

The alternative, he said, is either full-time legislators or "those who are rich or retired."

Kohring declined to sit for an interview and answer detailed questions about his relationship with Marlow.

Kohring, who had a drywall business until back surgery four years ago, says he's qualified for his job with Marlow regardless of his role as legislator. He has a master's degree in business administration from Alaska Pacific University and served stints as vice chairman of the board of the Alaska Housing Finance Corp. and chairman of the Wasilla Planning Commission.

'GOOD HORSE SENSE'

DOJ_NMG_0084245

Marlow said he hired Kohring because of his "good horse sense," work ethic and contacts in the Valley from spending his adult life there -- not because he's a legislator.

"There's not a lot of hand holding for him to get things done and analyze situations and figure out ways around roadblocks and that sort of thing," Marlow said. "The things I have him working on primarily are controlled by the state or a public utility."

Marlow, 49, has a knack for projects supported by tax breaks, grants and government-backed loans. The Oregon native came to Anchorage in 1983 as an electrical contractor. He soon branched out.

Marlow rescued the old MacKay building in downtown Anchorage after it had sat empty and ugly for nearly a quarter century and reopened it this year as a fashionable apartment house, McKinley Tower. A city property tax break, plus government loans and guarantees, made it possible. Over the past decade, he's developed a dozen low-income senior housing projects in Alaska with federal grants. He's a part owner of the old Knik Arm Power Plant on Ship Creek and plans to seek a property tax break once he firms up plans to get it running again.

Marlow said there's nothing wrong with hiring a legislator. He's known Kohring since about 1991, three years before Kohring was first elected to the House.

"The rules don't preclude it from happening, and the rules have been followed to the letter," Marlow said. "So if somebody has a problem with it, then they need to change the rules. They don't need to attack the people that are following the rules."

Marlow sounded offended that anyone would take issue with a lawmaker working for a developer and linked his situation to that of an oppressed minority.

"Some people don't like Muslims either or black people or homosexuals, but it doesn't make them right," Marlow said. Asked what that had to do with his situation with Kohring, Marlow said, "There's all kinds of different prejudices or people's different reasons for not liking one thing or another."

In 2002, a couple of years before he started working for Marlow, Kohring sponsored a bill to extend an existing state law allowing tax breaks to developers of deteriorated properties. Without the legislation, the opportunity for such tax breaks would have expired that July 1. The bill passed.

The next year, Kohring introduced a bill sought by Marlow to extend a lease for Alaska Railroad land on Government Hill from 55 to 75 years. The longer lease was necessary, Marlow testified, so a senior housing project proposed for the site would qualify for a government grant. The bill passed the House but stalled in a Senate committee.

In November 2004, Kohring started working for Marlow. He estimates he worked 800 hours last year setting up meetings, making phone calls, developing plans and conducting research on about a half-dozen projects.

In late 2005, Kohring called then-Anchorage municipal attorney Fred Boness on behalf of Marlow. At issue was an untried tax mechanism that Marlow hoped to use to pay for water and sewer lines on land in South Anchorage, around Minnesota Drive and C Street. Boness said he told Marlow the mechanism wouldn't work in Anchorage.

The concept, provided for in state law, is almost a "chicken and egg thing," said the municipality's chief fiscal officer, Jeff Sinz. A local government would issue revenue bonds to pay for improvements that are then repaid through higher taxes generated by the new development.

Asked what he wanted Kohring to accomplish for him, Marlow denied that the legislator ever worked for him on that project.

Kohring also said he didn't remember doing anything regarding any South Anchorage project.

But Boness said in an e-mail to the Daily News that Kohring contacted him for an explanation. He figured Kohring was making the kind of inquiry a legislator would typically make to find out why a law didn't work. Boness said he doesn't recall Kohring disclosing he was on Marlow's payroll.

On Dec. 29, Boness sent a detailed e-mail to Kohring explaining why the tax mechanism wouldn't work even though state law provided for it. Boness referred to Marlow three times in the e-mail. The short answer is that in Anchorage, property taxes are designated for specific services; police taxes shouldn't be used for sewer lines.

FOCUS ON POLARIS BUILDING

In Fairbanks, the tax break at issue was for the infamous Polaris building. The old hotel is Fairbanks' tallest building, but it's been empty for years, a boarded-up embarrassment across the street from the new courthouse.

Marlow doesn't own the Polaris but said he's looking to buy it -- if the finances work out. He said his option has run out; talks continue.

The tax break approved by the Fairbanks borough in September 2005 exempted all but $10,000 a year in property taxes for 10 years and deferred normal property taxes for the five years after that.

Marlow thought he wouldn't have to pay the deferred taxes unless he sold the property. The borough expected the taxes when those five years were up, or when the property sold -- whichever happened first.

DOJ_NMG_0084246

In stepped Kohring, said Whitaker, the borough mayor. Kohring made it clear he was working for Marlow, Whitaker said, and at a Nov. 3 meeting, Kohring wanted to know whether the borough would agree with a change in state law to match Marlow's view. His answer, Whitaker said, was no -- not if it meant the deferred taxes didn't come in as expected.

Kohring then approached Ramras, R-Fairbanks, and asked him to sponsor the legislation. The Polaris is in Ramras' district.

Why not just sponsor the bill yourself? Ramras recalled asking him.

He couldn't, because he had taken consulting fees from Marlow, Ramras said that Kohring told him.

"I further informed Jay that even though the rules would have allowed me to draft and file a bill, I had made a personal decision to limit my involvement with any legislation," Kohring wrote to the Daily News in an Oct. 15 e-mail.

Ramras said he was glad to sponsor the bill if it helped bring back to life the once glamorous hotel. He said he tried to keep his distance from Marlow and told him not to send a card, a campaign donation or anything else.

Fairbanks officials say the bill that passed doesn't provide as lucrative a tax break as Marlow wanted, allowing the taxes to be deferred until the building sells. Marlow insists it does. The final wording says the due date will be as specified by the municipality. The bill also eliminated the expiration date for the law.

On the House floor April 5 and again May 9, Kohring asked to be excused from voting on the measure because he worked for a developer who could benefit. He was directed to vote anyway, standard when conflicts are declared in the Legislature.

Just recently, Marlow said the legislation didn't even benefit him. On Oct. 9, Marlow battled talk radio host Dan Fagan over the issue. The exchange on KFQD went like this:

Marlow: "You said on the radio that I was going to have a direct benefit by the legislation, which is not true."

Fagan: "So that legislation did not in any way save you any money?"

Marlow: "Absolutely not one dime. All that legislation did is set up a situation in Fairbanks wherein the Polaris building could be renovated like the McKinley (the old MacKay) building was ..."

But as the 10-minute duel ran its course, Marlow admitted that he needed the legislation to even consider buying the building.

"You just made my point!" Fagan exclaimed.

Daily News reporter Lisa Demer can be reached at ldemer@adn.com and 257-4390.

Bills helping Marlow

State Rep. Vic Kohring has sponsored two bills that benefited developer Marc Marlow and, after he began working directly for Marlow, asked another legislator to sponsor a third. The bills are:

· HB 389: Sponsored by Kohring in 2002 to extend an existing state law allowing tax breaks to developers of deteriorated properties. Without the legislation, the opportunity for such tax breaks would have expired July 1, 2002. The bill passed, extending the tax breaks to 2006.

· HB 97: Sponsored by Kohring in 2003. Would have allowed Marlow to extend a lease of Alaska Railroad land on Government Hill from 55 to 75 years. Passed the House but stalled in the Senate.

· HB 334: Sponsored by Fairbanks Rep. Jay Ramras this year at the request of Kohring, who said he couldn't sponsor it himself because he was being paid by Marlow. Bill concerned tax breaks to developers of deteriorated properties. Marlow wanted to specify that deferred taxes only came due when the property sold. Bill passed, says that the taxes will be due as specified by the municipality. Also eliminated the expiration date.

FBI Said To Be Investigating Ex-official (APP)

By Keith Brown, COASTAL MONMOUTH BUREAU

Asbury Park Press, October 21, 2006

Records on Tinton Falls' Abrams reportedly sought

TINTON FALLS — The FBI served a subpoena at borough hall late Friday afternoon requesting all records relating to a former Planning Board member's activities while a borough official, a source said.

The source, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the FBI is investigating the activities of Paul J. Abrams and his relationship with the developer of the proposed Heather Glen development, intended for the Tinton Avenue site of the former Communications-Electronic Command building.

Borough officials were tight-lipped Friday.

Borough Administrator W. Bryan Dempsey referred all questions regarding the subpoena to James E. Berube Jr., borough attorney.

Berube would not say whether the borough was served with an FBI subpoena, but he said there was "a development" regarding Abrams, who in 2002 contracted with a New York developer to further plans for an upscale housing development on the 39-acre property.

"We are cooperating fully with the authorities," Berube said.

Berube would not say which authorities the borough is cooperating with but referred other questions to the U.S. Attorney's Office and the Monmouth County Prosecutor's Office.

Mike Drewniak, a U.S. Attorney's Office spokesman, and Peter Warshaw, first assistant Monmouth County prosecutor, declined to comment.

News of the subpoena apparently had not reached Abrams on Friday.

"I have no idea what you're talking about," he said.

Abrams' lawyer, Mitchell Ansell, also said that he had no knowledge of the subpoena but that Abrams did nothing wrong during his tenure as a borough official.

"Paul Abrams committed no crime," said Ansell, of the Ocean Township law firm Ansell Zaro Grimm & Aaron. "Paul Abrams did nothing illegal and conducted himself at all times in a professional and lawful manner, and any allegation to the contrary we deem to be libelous."

Project approved in '05

An Asbury Park Press investigation published in March found that Abrams, a Realtor, in 2002 negotiated a deal worth up to $200,000 with New York developer Abraham Leser to be Leser's consultant in the approval process for the 151-unit housing development that became known as Heather Glen. The development was approved by the Planning Board in 2005.

Abrams worked the deal through his Ocean Township realty company, Saymark Realtors.

He was a Planning Board member from 1997 to November 2002. He also was a member of the Zoning Board of Adjustment until 2005 and the Environmental Commission until 2004.

Under a contract between Saymark Realtors and Tinton Telecom LLC, a company owned by Leser, Abrams' responsibilities included pushing for the zoning change to allow the development and attempting to buy adjoining properties to more than double the project size.

Through his company, Abrams negotiated with adjoining landowners to sell their properties for the project. According to his consultant contract, he also provided "direction to professionals for the proposed development of the property."

In addition to a $10,000 retainer — paid by check to Saymark Realtors on Nov. 19, 2002 — Abrams' firm was to have been paid $20,000 when the property was rezoned, $20,000 when the project was approved by the Planning Board and $1,000 per home once the houses were sold, according to the contract. The total contract could be worth $201,000 if all the homes were sold.

Abrams resigned from the Planning Board Nov. 20, 2002, a day after he received the retainer for his work as Leser's consultant. He remained a member of the environmental commission and the zoning board.

Planning Board suing

The Press also reviewed planning board minutes and application files from late 1997, when Abrams was appointed to the board, through November 2002. That review revealed Abrams took actions that furthered the applications for three developments, homes in which Abrams' realty company later helped sell.

Abrams' involvement with the Heather Glen development prompted the Planning Board in May to sue the former board member, saying Abrams was "unjustly enriched" by his financial arrangement with Leser.

It also says Abrams breached his "duty of trust" to "the people of Tinton Falls" by accepting, through his company, payment from a developer while still a borough official. The lawsuit seeks hundreds of thousands of dollars in fines and the dissolution of Abrams' realty company. It also names Leser, six "John Does" and six "John Doe businesses" that ostensibly knew of the financial relationship among Abrams, Saymark, Leser and Tinton Telecom.

Ansell, Abrams' attorney, has said the claims in the lawsuit are shocking, meritless and "wholly without any type of basis in fact."

No work on the Heather Glen project has begun, pending the resolution of the planning board's suit against Abrams and other lawsuits involving the development.

Video: FBI Examines Records At West Warwick Town Hall (WJAR-TV)

WJAR-TV, October 21, 2006

NBC 10 has learned that the FBI has subpoenaed records from the West Warwick Town Hall and confirmed that the records taken involve land deals that Senate President Joseph Montalbano conducted for the town.

The land deals include two parcels in the West Warwick industrial park.

The state Ethics Commission is still looking into a complaint accusing Montalbano of failing to disclose legal work he did for West Warwick before a vote on a constitutional amendment that would allow a casino to be built in the town.

The complaint, filed by Operation Clean Government, a citizens group, accused Montalbano of failing to disclose more than $86,000 that his law firm received for work done for West Warwick town authorities.

The complaint also accused Montalbano of having a conflict of interest while the Senate debated and ultimately passed a constitutional amendment allowing the Narragansett Indian tribe to open a casino in West Warwick.

"Montalbano did this work while at the same time voting on the casino up on the General Assembly as senate president and urging passing of the bill," said Bob Arruda, president of Operation Clean Government.

While Town Manager Wolfgang Bauer confirmed the records were subpoenaed, he emphasized that none of the properties that Montalbano handled fell within the footprint of the Harrah's casino plan.

Arruda said he wasn't surprised that federal officials are now looking into the case.

"I think at this stage of the game, the only time that anything substantive is done in Rhode Island is when the feds come in," he said. "The feds need to be involved in this to make certain that has been no criminal activity. And I'm not alleging that there has been. But this needs to be cleaned up one way or another."

Montalbano said he had no comment.

FBI Grabs Montalbano Records In W.W. (PAWTIMES)

By Tracy Scudder, Special to The Times

Pawtucket Times, October 21, 2006

WEST WARWICK - The FBI has seized documents related to work that state Senate President Joseph A. Montalbano (D-Dist. 17, Pawtucket, North Providence, Lincoln) has done for the town, according to West Warwick Council President John J. Flynn.

Flynn confirmed that records like tax titles were turned over to the FBI by Town Manager Wolfgang Bauer, who received a confidential subpoena last week.

Montalbano worked on the tax title for property that is adjacent to the proposed Narragansett Indians casino site; however, town officials would not confirm if the documents subpoenaed included that property.

News of the FBI's interest in the records came as a report began spreading that the FBI had seized the records in Town Hall.

Several town employees Friday denied reports of FBI agents serving a subpoena for records. Flynn said he also received a call about a report that the FBI raided the town hall early yesterday afternoon.

"I have talked to both the town manager and the town clerk, who would obviously be in charge of the records," said Flynn. "There was no FBI presence in town hall and there certainly wasn't a raid."

"There hasn't been an FBI agent in West Warwick Town Hall in I don't know how long, unless they were here in disguise," he said. "Nothing has been seized and everything is still intact."

The FBI would not confirm or deny if or what documents were subpoenaed from the town.

"We can only speak to what is public record. I have nothing in my records that indicates any activity that is of public record," said FBI spokesperson Gail Marcinkevich.

Television news reports, however, said that Bauer confirmed it was the FBI that subpoenaed records from town hall. And Flynn said the documents were related to Montalbano's work.

"The records were turned over in a timely manner. I'm confident when all the records are reviewed they'll find no criminal activity," said Flynn.

Montalbano's spokesman would not comment on the matter. Montalbano and Bauer could not be reached for comment.

The Secret Life Of An Informant (WSJ)

By Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

To secure a lighter sentence, Garland Hardeman taped friends, associates and a lover Surviving a .22 caliber shot to the head

Garland Hardeman had many awkward moments in his four-year career as a government informant, such as the time he got shot in the face, and the time he wiretapped one of his oldest friends. He also recorded a conversation with his girlfriend in their hotel bedroom, deactivating the device only when their pillow talk turned steamy.

Mr. Hardeman, a Los Angeles cop-turned-lobbyist, was "working off a beef," as prosecutors say -- hoping to reduce his own jail time by acting as a government witness. Earlier, he had been busted for attempted bribery in a Los Angeles garbage-hauling scandal. He continued to work as a lobbyist, using the job as cover to trick friends and business associates into admitting their part in one of the most widespread cases of public malfeasance in the U.S., spanning nine cities and five states.

DOJ_NMG_0084249

The double life of an informant is a peculiar one, filled at the same time with tedium and betrayal. Mr. Hardeman wore a wire to record 17 people, many of whom were subsequently convicted. That included his girlfriend. He testified in four grand juries and three trials and accounted for a "substantial" part of the evidence used in "the most pervasive corruption case this district has ever seen," says Tom McConville, a federal prosecutor in the Central District of California. Many of the cases involved paying bribes and kickbacks in return for municipal contracts.

Mr. Hardeman also complained about the petty indignities of life undercover. He had to pay for most of his travel costs before filing expenses to his boss, in this case, the Federal Bureau of Investigation. "It took them up to three months to reimburse me sometimes," he griped during one of a series of interviews this summer.

The feds are now among Mr. Hardeman's few remaining supporters. In February, Mary Butler, a top prosecutor from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., took the unusual step of speaking on his behalf in court. She praised his meticulous record-keeping and noted that he stood up under "serious cross-examination" when he took the stand.

Mr. Hardeman's account of his double life is largely confirmed by three current or former federal prosecutors, two of his defense lawyers, FBI officials, court documents and transcripts.

The government has long relied on informants and wiretapping to pursue drug rings and organized crime syndicates. But the government's use of cooperating witnesses spiked after 1987 when Congress enacted federal sentencing guidelines that largely usurped judges' discretion in doling out prison time.

Defendants quickly learned that the only way to escape the rigid penalty structure was to cooperate in return for a lenient sentence. In fraud cases, snitches are especially valuable because they can give life to the sometimes complex documents that lie at the heart of many cases. These days it is standard procedure in white-collar cases for the government to try to "flip" defendants if they have something to offer.

Cooperators' testimony is most useful when prosecutors can corroborate it with hard evidence; juries aren't predisposed to like or trust such witnesses. Mr. Hardeman, 49 years old, was ideal in this regard. He provided the feds with hotel receipts, old photos and secret recordings that backed up his version of events.

Mr. Hardeman grew up in a tight-knit African-American Catholic family in Detroit with two brothers, including a twin, and three sisters. He was an altar boy.

Carlos Jones, Mr. Hardeman's college roommate, and a family friend for 30 years, remembers the young Mr. Hardeman as "very gregarious," athletic and popular. "I was surprised he was caught up in that because for the most part he was an up-and-up type of person," says Dr. Jones, who is also Mr. Hardeman's dentist.

After graduating from Michigan State in 1982, Mr. Hardeman moved to L.A. and became a policeman, remaining on the force for 14 years. In 1987, while still part of the Los Angeles Police Department, he won the first of three terms as a councilman in Inglewood, a working-class area in southwestern L.A., where he earned a reputation for being outspoken. Risking retribution from colleagues, he testified about discrimination in the force at a commission set up after the beating of black motorist Rodney King.

After Mr. Hardeman lost his seat in 1999 -- he supported closing the local fire department -- he switched to lobbying. Using his knowledge as a public official, he helped companies bid for municipal contracts. Two big-name clients were M.R. Beal & Co., a minority-owned New York investment bank, and Waste Management Inc., a giant garbage-hauling company based in Houston.

Municipal contracting has expanded rapidly in recent years as cities turned to private companies to provide basic services. Last year municipalities issued $408 billion in bonds to pay for filling potholes, laying sewers, wiring street lights and picking up trash -- nearly double the sum of a decade earlier.

It is a business notorious for corruption, in part because of the clubby nature of city governments. As federal authorities cracked down on no-bid contracts and payrolls padded with employees who don't work, corruption shifted to areas that had escaped federal scrutiny, such as minority set-aside programs. In such programs, which expanded rapidly in the 1970s and 1980s, cities seek out firms owned by women or minorities, or those with a substantial minority staff. Most of the cases in which Mr. Hardeman testified directly or indirectly related to this area, prosecutors say.

Cases involving minority set-aside contracts are little different from earlier forms of wrongdoing. "African-Americans and women did not invent municipal corruption in this country," says Steve Dettelbach, a partner at Baker & Hostetler LLP in Cleveland. Mr. Dettelbach, a former federal prosecutor, tried one of the cases involving Mr. Hardeman.

As Mr. Hardeman began his lobbying career, he became adept at introducing companies to local, often African-American politicians who could help them win business. After barely a year, he found himself on the wrong side of the law.

The FBI was investigating the mayor of City of Carson, Calif., as part of a wide-ranging corruption probe. Based on a tip from someone in the city council, agents started looking at consultants and lobbyists who did business with the city, including Mr. Hardeman.

DOJ_NMG_0084250

Mr. Hardeman says he often thinks back to the events leading up to the day he was busted. "I should have followed my inner voice," he says, the one that told him "to go the road less traveled." Instead, he says, "I fell prey to the temptations of money."

The sting operation that nabbed him could have been written by a Hollywood scriptwriter. To play the part of the corrupt official extorting bribes, the FBI recruited Manual Ontal, a City of Carson councilman. He volunteered to cooperate with the government after he was caught in a previous municipal-bribery scandal.

First, Mr. Ontal tried to interest Mr. Hardeman in participating in a gun-smuggling venture he claimed to be running out of the Philippines. When that didn't work, Mr. Ontal introduced him to "Uncle Jerry," a burly white man who wore a ponytail and gold-plated jewelry, and traveled by limousine. "He looked like a white Mr. T," recalls Mr. Hardeman.

Uncle Jerry was working in some way for the FBI, which won't explain his exact role or identity. Uncle Jerry spent lavishly on Mr. Hardeman and, after putting his target at ease, tried coaxing the lobbyist to talk about criminal acts he might have committed, such as paying bribes. Uncle Jerry paid for expensive dinners at Josh Slockum's, a restaurant owned by basketball star Dennis Rodman, and took Mr. Hardeman marlin fishing off Marina Del Rey. But Mr. Hardeman didn't say anything incriminating.

Eventually, the FBI recorded Mr. Hardeman -- in a roundabout way -- offering Mr. Ontal a $50,000 bribe to steer city contracts to two clients, Waste Management and Klistoff & Sons, another trash-hauling company.

Nine people were convicted in what the FBI dubbed "the trash-talkin' case," including the City of Carson mayor. Neither Waste Management nor any of its employees were charged with a crime. In a written statement, the company's lawyer says Waste Management cooperated with the probe, "including providing information on Mr. Hardeman's activities." Klistoff & Sons was hit with a big fine in another corruption case and no longer exists. Waste Management later bought its assets.

In June 2005, a judge sentenced Mr. Ontal to one year probation. He couldn't be reached for comment and his attorney didn't return calls.

Facing up to three years in prison for attempted bribery, Mr. Hardeman swiftly agreed to cooperate. Soon he was wearing a recording device disguised as a pager and was reporting daily to an FBI agent.

To begin with, however, he was a reluctant snoop. "He didn't take to it well initially because he was mad that he got caught," says Craig Howland, the FBI special agent who worked with Mr. Hardeman during his cooperation with the government. "There was always that inner struggle with him on snitching out his friends."

Among his first assignments was to betray Tyrone Smith. Mr. Smith was a director of the West Basin Municipal Water Authority, the City of Carson's water district. The pair had been friends for 15 years.

The two had met when they were young city councilmen moving in Los Angeles's close circle of African-American politicians. Later, not knowing he had been betrayed by Mr. Hardeman, Mr. Smith continued to introduce business clients to Mr. Hardeman, recalls Mr. Hardeman. "Our kids went to school together," Mr. Hardeman says. "It wasn't a good position to be in."

The FBI wanted to hear Mr. Smith talking about a bribe Mr. Hardeman had given him a year earlier. According to both men, Mr. Hardeman paid Mr. Smith $25,000 -- half of a $50,000 payment from Mr. Hardeman's client, investment bank M.R. Beal. In exchange, Mr. Smith agreed to vote to award a $142 million debt-restructuring contract to M.R. Beal's partner on the deal, Rice Financial Products Co., another minority-owned finance firm in New York.

During a May 2002 conference in Palm Springs, Calif., Mr. Hardeman recorded about 10 conversations with his friend, during which he chatted about family matters to relax Mr. Smith and "ease it out of him," Mr. Hardeman recalls. Eventually Mr. Smith described on tape how he had given the money to his wife.

In August 2003, Mr. Smith pleaded guilty to extortion and money laundering; he was one of 12 defendants who were convicted in the City of Carson and West Basin cases. In March 2005, he was sentenced to two years in prison. His lawyer, Mark Albrecht of Ivie McNeill & Wyatt, declines to comment. Mr. Smith, who is in Lompoc Federal Prison Camp in Lompoc, Calif., couldn't be reached for comment.

An M.R. Beal spokesman says, "M.R. Beal was not aware, did not authorize, and does not condone illicit payments to elected officials." Rice Financial, which is contesting a related civil suit in Superior Court of the State of California, County of Ventura, declines to comment on Mr. Hardeman.

As a former policeman, Mr. Hardeman knew how cooperators could be reviled by their peers -- and even by some cops. He scoured his memories to justify his actions. Revenge turned out to be a good motivator.

"I knew I was doing something to betray these people, but they weren't very good to me either," he says. Mr. Smith, for example, hadn't voted in his favor when he was bidding for a consulting contract with the water district.

In June 2002, a month after he taped Mr. Smith, Mr. Hardeman came close to getting uncovered as a snitch. He was sitting in a new, red pickup truck with a low-level former Waste Management official. The driver of the pickup seemed nervous, Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0084251

Hardeman recalls. The former official cranked up the music to drown out conversation. Then, he grabbed a pen and scribbled out a note to his passenger: "Are you going to snitch?"

After writing the note, the driver ripped it up and tossed it out the window as the pair drove through Inglewood. A few minutes later, Mr. Hardeman says, he returned to the scene with Mr. Howland, his FBI case agent, who had been tailing the pickup. The two men searched in vain for the scraps, which they wanted as evidence.

That summer came the most complex betrayal: Mr. Hardeman had to tape his girlfriend.

Monique McGilbra was a newly divorced mother of two when the pair met in April 2000 at a convention for African-American public administrators in Charlotte, N.C. Statuesque and an immaculate dresser, she held a senior job in the Houston mayor's office, running the city's energy and environmental business.

"I fell in love," says Mr. Hardeman. "She had power and influence in government. I was very attracted to her."

At the time, Ms. McGilbra was being wined and dined by consultants who wanted Houston contracts. Nate Gray, a lobbyist based in Cleveland, treated her to $1,000 dinners, Super Bowl tickets in New Orleans, and a $700 Louis Vuitton wallet, according to her later court testimony. Mr. Hardeman accompanied her to some of the events.

Ms. McGilbra later steered a city contract toward Honeywell Inc., a big industrial conglomerate that was a client of Messrs. Gray and Hardeman. (Honeywell gave up the work when the scandal broke.)

Investigators in Cleveland had been wiretapping Mr. Gray for months, during which time Mr. Gray was recorded complaining about Ms. McGilbra's expensive tastes. They wanted Mr. Hardeman to record his girlfriend admitting to taking the gifts, which were considered bribes by prosecutors because she was a public official. Prosecutors say Mr. Hardeman broke down in tears when they told him he would have to wear a wire.

In August 2002, Mr. Hardeman met Ms. McGilbra in Houston. During their evening out, they talked briefly about the gifts. Later, alone in their hotel, Mr. Hardeman brought up the topic again. He says Ms. McGilbra playfully patted him down, as if checking for a wire, before talking about her pay-to-play relationship with Mr. Gray.

"Before sex, there was some good information," Mr. Hardeman recalls.

Mr. Hardeman says he drew the line at keeping the recording device running once things got too steamy. The trick, he says, was to find an excuse to slip into the bathroom to stop the tape, a task that required sticking a paper clip into a button at the bottom of the fake pager. "I was always thinking, how do I get back to the bathroom to turn it off?" he says.

Ms. McGilbra, through her attorney Robert Rotatori, says she didn't detect anything suspicious about Mr. Hardeman's behavior when he was wearing the wire. She says she couldn't believe Mr. Hardeman was capable of "using her that way," Mr. Rotatori says, adding: "The government went to bed with Garland Hardeman. He's a scoundrel, a liar, a thief and a cheat."

Based in part on the taped conversations, Ms. McGilbra pleaded guilty last year to conspiracy to commit various types of fraud in Houston and Cleveland, and was sentenced to three years in prison. At her sentencing, Ms. McGilbra told the judge she was led to break the law because of her relationship with Mr. Hardeman. She says she accepted the gifts to help her boyfriend get to know Mr. Gray. "I loved him very much," she testified. Mr. Gray, one of nine people convicted in this case, was sentenced to 15 years in jail.

At the trial, Mr. Hardeman again suggested revenge as a reason for his cooperation with authorities. Ms. McGilbra had demanded he hand over a $3,000 monthly retainer he had won from one of her consultant friends, Mr. Hardeman testified. "It felt really like I was being used," he said in an interview. Mr. Hardeman said in court that they eventually agreed she would receive a 20% cut.

In April 2003, Mr. Hardeman was watching a Lakers basketball game on TV at Cabo's barbecue restaurant in Houston -- "I liked the shrimp at Cabo's," he says -- when he was suddenly knocked to the floor, unable to see. He had been hit directly above his right eye with a .22 caliber bullet. The shot was fired from a distance and caused no permanent damage after lodging in the space between his eyelid and his eyeball. Mr. Hardeman still has the bullet.

The shooting, rare in a white-collar crime case, threw prosecutors and the FBI into a tizzy. After an FBI investigation, no arrests were ever made and officials ultimately categorized it as a random event.

Mr. Hardeman doesn't buy that explanation. He thinks someone put a hit on him, perhaps Ms. McGilbra.

Ms. McGilbra's lawyer, Mr. Rotatori, denies it. "There are probably a million and one reasons someone would want to shoot him," he adds.

Despite the many anxieties of leading a double life, the subject to which Mr. Hardeman most often returns is the injustice of the FBI's expense-reimbursement system. A meticulous man -- he keeps business cards and receipts from every restaurant he visits -- the money issues gall him. "I was working full time, but I wasn't getting paid," he says.

He maintains a long list of affronts, including the time he was ordered to spend $85 at Radio Shack for a tape recorder, a special cord for recording phone conversations, and tapes. "I bought the best tapes, not cheap tapes," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0084252

The FBI office in Los Angeles, which was responsible for reimbursing Mr. Hardeman, says the process may have seemed slow to him because he was often on the road and had to delay filing expenses.

Mr. Hardeman expected the real payoff to come when he was sentenced. He wanted probation, like Mr. Ontal, the councilman who lured him into giving a bribe in the first place. His prosecutors not only took the unusual step of recommending probation -- he was facing three years -- but also spoke out on his behalf at sentencing. Both Ms. Butler, the trial attorney from Washington, D.C., and Mr. McConville, the Assistant U.S. Attorney, said Mr. Hardeman deserved a break because of his extensive cooperation.

That didn't work out. This summer in Central District Court in Los Angeles, Judge Percy Anderson sentenced Mr. Hardeman to a year and a day in a federal penitentiary, plus three years of supervised release. The judge said he wanted to "send a very clear message" about public corruption.

"It's just totally unfair," Mr. Hardeman says. "I gave four years of my life to working for the government, and now I have to give another four."

The night before he had to report to the prison, Mr. Hardeman spent time with his dentist-friend in Detroit. Dr. Jones gave him a free, emergency root canal.

On Aug. 30, Mr. Hardeman was driven by an old friend to the Taft Correctional Institution federal prison camp, which is located in an isolated patch of California desert, to begin his sentence. Among Taft's other inmates are a former mayor and his onetime attorney, both of whom Mr. Hardeman helped put there.

Write to Karen Richardson at karen.richardson@awsj.com1

Columnist Settles Education Dept. Case (AP)

AP, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Columnist Armstrong Williams has reached a settlement with prosecutors regarding payments he received by the Education Department to promote President Bush's agenda.

Under the settlement, Williams admits no wrongdoing but will have to pay $34,000. The deal was reached last week by Williams, the Education Department and its subcontractor, Ketchum Communications.

"The department is happy to see this matter come to a close," Katherine McLane, a spokeswoman for Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, said Sunday. "One of the first steps Secretary Spellings took when she came to office is to establish guidelines to prevent future occurrences of this type of situation."

A message left at Williams' office was not immediately returned Sunday.

The settlement brings to a close a yearlong investigation into the case after reports emerged that the Education Department contracted with several radio, television and print commentators to promote the No Child Left Behind Act.

Lawmakers criticized the contracts as an improper use of taxpayer dollars. Congressional auditors concluded the department engaged in illegal "covert propaganda" by hiring Williams without requiring him to disclose he was paid.

In the settlement, the Justice Department examined whether Williams actually performed the work that was promised in his $240,000 contract signed in late 2003 and cited in his monthly reports to the Education Department.

Ultimately, prosecutors determined he was overpaid $34,000. Their review did not examine whether he improperly promoted the Bush administration's agenda.

ON THE NET

Education Department: http://www.ed.gov/index.jhtml

Justice Department: http://www.usdoj.gov

Glenview Man Linked To Cop Killing In Poland (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters. Tribune Staff Reporters Andrew Zajac And Dave Wischnowsky And Tribune News Services Contributed To This Report

Chicago Tribune, October 21, 2006

Investor held in high-profile murder for hire

A Glenview businessman wanted in Poland for soliciting the gangland-style murder of a former national police chief was taken into custody Friday morning at his home, an arrest billed as a breakthrough in a case of enormous significance in that country.

A man identified in court records as Edward Mazur, 60, appeared in federal court in Chicago on Friday afternoon, and was ordered held pending an identification and extradition hearing Wednesday. The arrest came on the heels of a high-level meeting in Washington this month between Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales and Polish Justice Minister Zbigniew Ziobro.

Officials said Ziobro met with Gonzales to discuss Mazur's extradition for the 1998 murder of Marek Papala.

The wealthy investor is accused in Poland of scheming with organized crime figures to kill Papala, a one-time police commander general who was gunned down in front of his home in Warsaw as he got out of a car.

Mazur was arrested by federal agents Friday on a provisional warrant from the Polish government, FBI spokesman Ross Rice said.

A judge in Warsaw issued a warrant for Mazur's arrest in February 2005 on a charge of soliciting a man named Artur Zirajewski to carry out the murder with a third person in exchange for $40,000.

The case has been the subject of intense media scrutiny in Poland, where there has been much speculation about the crime and Mazur's possible connections to it. Mazur had been briefly arrested in Poland in 2002 in connection with the slaying, but was released.

His arrest Friday made national headlines in Poland.

Ziobro held a news conference there Friday to announce that prosecutors had gathered "hard evidence" against Mazur that includes statements from Zirajewski and other witnesses, and to call his arrest "good news."

In 2002, Mazur filed a libel suit in Chicago against a Polish-language publication in Washington that he claimed unfairly accused him of contracting Papala's murder and exercising undue influence over the prime minister of Poland.

"Mr. Mazur did not contract the murder of Mr. Papala and was not involved in Mr. Papala's murder in any way," his attorney, Michael Stiegel, wrote at the time.

Stiegel further wrote that Mazur has never been involved in or charged with involvement in any illegal activity or `shady dealings.'" The lawsuit was later dropped.

In an interview late Friday, Stiegel said he believed the accusations against Mazur were politically motivated. The recently victorious Polish conservative party won elections in that country in part on a promise to solve the Papala murder case.

Stiegel said he had "grave doubts" that Mazur was involved in the crime and understood that Papala was in fact a friend of Mazur's.

"He had set up an opportunity for this guy to come to the United States and study English," Stiegel said.

In the suit, Mazur included a number of personal details. He stated he immigrated to the U.S. from Poland in 1962 and graduated from a school listed as "Chicago Tech" with a degree in electrical engineering.

His career involved working for a number of international companies as well as staking a claim in several businesses, from a medical products company to a yogurt manufacturer in Poland, the suit states.

Illinois records show Mazur was the president of a firm called Demarex Inc., which was registered at his Glenview home until it dissolved in May. A recent Securities and Exchange Commission filing showed Mazur has had multimillion-dollar dealings with a Canadian cable company that does a large amount of business in Poland.

Mazur also was involved in a number of Polish organizations locally and nationally, according to court records.

In the suit, Mazur stated that he was director of the American Center of Polish Culture in Washington, D.C., and was the president of WISLA, "a social and athletic club in Chicago founded by Polish immigrants in 1927."

In the 2002 suit, Mazur stated that he lived in Glenview and had three sons.

Neighbors on Mazur's upscale Glenview street said he lived in his home on Lawson Road with his wife, a son who is a junior in high school and the teen's grandfather.

A woman who answered the door there declined to comment as members of Chicago's Polish-language media waited outside.

The U.S. Embassy in Warsaw on Friday issued a statement that "Mazur is currently being held by U.S. authorities awaiting his formal extradition to Poland."

"I can assure the Polish public that this matter is receiving a great deal of attention from the U.S. government," the statement quoted U.S. Ambassador Victor Ashe as saying.

At the Dirksen U.S. Courthouse in Chicago, U.S. Magistrate Judge Arlander Keys delayed a proceeding to formally identify the man in custody as Mazur, because he did not have a criminal attorney to represent him.

A hearing will be held Wednesday afternoon for Mazur, "or whomever is under arrest in this case," Keys said.

The judge advised the man identified by prosecutors as Mazur of his rights, and ordered that he remain in custody until the hearing. If his identity is confirmed, Mazur would be extradited under a 1999 extradition treaty between the U.S. and Poland, officials said.

Assistant U.S. Atty. Mitchell Mars outlined the charges against Mazur. The man who appeared in court answered "I understood" when asked by the judge if the accusations were clear. Evidence against Mazur was spelled out in a 10-page complaint that was unsealed Friday.

The key witness, Zirajewski, allegedly has told authorities he met with an organized crime figure along with Mazur and another man a couple of months before the killing.

"The ensuing conversation lasted for about an hour, Mazur doing most of the talking," the complaint states. "Mazur said that he was interested in killing Papala, who `was a big obstacle to further business.'

"Mazur displayed a newspaper clipping featuring a picture of Papala," the complaint states.

Zirajewski allegedly told authorities Mazur told him Papala was under surveillance and asked questions about a hit man's skill.

Natalia Papala, daughter of the slain chief, was quoted on a Warsaw police Web site Friday.

"[The] arresting of Edward Mazur allows us to have hope that now will occur a turning point in the conducted investigation," the statement read. "Initiating the extradition procedure creates a chance to complete the investigation and press charges against other people who also stand behind this homicide."

---

jcoen@tribune.com
rrbush@tribune.com

FBI Arrests Businessman Wanted In Poland Over 1998 Police Official Slaying (AP)

By Mike Robinson, The Associated Press

AP, October 21, 2006

CHICAGO - A businessman wanted in Poland on charges of soliciting the murder of a former superintendent of police was arrested Friday at his suburban home, federal officials announced.

Edward Mazur, 59, was taken into custody by the FBI, Drug Enforcement agents and police without incident at his home in affluent north suburban Glenview, FBI spokesman Ross Rice said.

He appeared briefly before U.S. Magistrate Judge Arlander Keys, who ordered him held in the federal government's Metropolitan Correctional Center pending an extradition hearing set for Wednesday.

Keys warned the defendant that if he proved to be the Edward Mazur named in an arrest warrant issued by a court in Warsaw, "the officials from Poland will come to Chicago and take you in custody to Poland."

Helen Kim, a federal defender who represented Mazur at the brief hearing, said she knew little about him and expected him to hire another attorney. A civil attorney, Bruce Tinkoff, said he and Mazur's wife were searching for a criminal defense lawyer to handle the case.

Tinkoff declined to answer questions about Mazur.

A complaint unsealed Friday said the arrest warrant issued by a Polish court in February charged that, in April 1998, Mazur had offered another man $40,000 to murder Warsaw's police chief superintendent Marek Papala.

Papers submitted by Polish authorities said that Mazur made the offer to an Artur Zirajewski at a meeting in a hotel in Gdansk, according to the complaint. It said that members of organized crime in Poland and narcotics traffickers might have been involved in plotting to murder Papala.

The Polish documents said that Mazur also solicited another man, Andrzej Zielinski, to kill the police official.

Papala, who was the commander general of the Warsaw Department of Police, was shot and killed on June 28, 1998, as he got out of a vehicle in front of his Warsaw home.

Before that, however, both Zirajewski and Zielinski had been arrested, according to the complaint. It said that the two men were among four witnesses who have given accounts of the case in statements to police.

The 10-page complaint traced a complex series of meetings between Zirajewski and an array of other alleged plotters at the Gdansk hotel and at a marina to solicit and plan the Papala killing.

"From the discussion at the marina, Zirajewski learned that the conspirators were waiting for a signal from someone at the Ministry of Internal Affairs, who was somehow connected to the policeman," it said.

It said that another man at the meeting told Zirajewski that "other highly placed persons were behind this murder plot."

There was nothing further in the complaint to suggest which highly placed officials, if any, might have been involved in such a conspiracy.

At a news conference in Warsaw, Justice Minister Zbigniew Ziobro said Polish prosecutors have gathered "hard evidence" that Mazur played a "very important role" in the killing of Papala.

Ziobro met with Justice Department officials in Washington earlier this month to present the evidence and request action in the case.

Papala's wife and daughter said that the arrest gave them hope that there could be a breakthrough in the eight-year investigation.

"Opening of the extradition procedure provides a chance for closing the investigation and bringing charges against other people who are also behind this killing," Malgorzata and Natalia said in a statement posted on the national police website.

DOJ_NMG_0084255

Associated Press Writer Monika Scislowska in Warsaw contributed to this report.

YouTube Shared User Data With Studio Lawyers (MRKTWTCH)

By Ben Charny, MarketWatch

Market Watch, October 21, 2006

Video site helped Paramount Pictures track down and sue filmmaker

SAN FRANCISCO (MarketWatch) -- It's no secret that millions of Internet users every day watch copyright-infringing video clips on YouTube, the upstart Web site that Google Inc. has agreed to acquire for $1.65 billion.

What's less known is that YouTube has been watching the watchers.

YouTube's actions in response to a subpoena it received in May show that it has been keeping tabs on users who post copyrighted material to its site -- and in one case shared the name of a user with lawyers from a Hollywood film studio.

On May 24, lawyers for Viacom Inc.'s Paramount Pictures convinced a federal judge in San Francisco to issue a subpoena requiring YouTube to turn over details about a user who uploaded dialog from the movie studio's "Twin Towers," according to a copy of the document.

'I was happy to utilize YouTube when it was still not clearly established. It felt a bit utopian, even though the days for that were clearly numbered.'

— Chris Moukarbel, filmmaker

YouTube promptly handed over the data to Paramount, which on June 16 sued the creator of the 12-minute clip, New York City-based filmmaker Chris Moukarbel, for copyright infringement, in federal court in Washington.

That YouTube chose to turn over the data, rather than simply remove the offending video from its site -- as it did Friday when it agreed to take down 30,000 videos at the request of a group of Japanese media companies -- came as a surprise to copyright experts.

"YouTube seems to have given up too easily," said Laurence P. Colton, an intellectual-property lawyer at the firm of Powell & Goldstein LLP in Atlanta.

Its prompt legal capitulation suggests that YouTube users who post copyrighted material should not expect the company to protect them from media-business lawsuits, said Colton, whose firm wasn't involved in the Paramount subpoena or lawsuit and who learned of them from a MarketWatch reporter.

The "Twin Towers" episode is reminiscent of the way the entertainment industry vanquished the first version of Napster Inc. and other digital-music sites that made it easy to download copyrighted songs over the Internet.

Music company lawyers first warned and then sued individual users who downloaded their songs. Now it looks like piracy hunters for the movie studios are using the same technique against YouTube users.

YouTube's decision to help Paramount track down Moukarbel stands in stark contrast to the philosophy of Google, which has fought the U.S. Justice Department over attempts to access data about consumers who use its search services.

Google has balked at releasing even the most innocuous information about its users' behavior to the U.S. government in the past. Also, it's now battling requests for user details coming from Brazilian and Indian government investigators.

Google declined repeated phone and e-mail requests for comment for this story. Julie Supan, YouTube's senior marketing director, declined comment.

The end of 'utopia'

With more media companies signaling that they will come after YouTube for compensation over copyrighted material, Moukarbel's experience suggests that some of those among the Web site's 40 million users who post copyrighted material can expect legal trouble.

Moukarbel settled the suit after he admitted making the film and agreed to remove it from his own Web site and from YouTube, according to a copy of a court order that was part of the settlement. He also agreed to make an effort to remove it from other sites where it had been posted.

Moukarbel told MarketWatch in an interview that YouTube's actions signaled to him the end of an era for the video site.

"I was happy to utilize YouTube when it was still not clearly established. It felt a bit utopian, even though the days for that were clearly numbered," Moukarbel said.

It remains to be seen if this has any chilling effect on the phenomenal growth of YouTube, which was founded just 20 months ago by former executives of PayPal, the electronic payment firm that was eventually acquired by eBay Inc.

The freewheeling nature of the site - and its apparent cloak of user anonymity -- has helped the upstart become a top 20 Web site whose users watch up to 100 million video clips every day.

A slew of lawsuits like those filed against individual digital music pirates could change that atmosphere, and perhaps the growth rate, of YouTube's online community.

DOJ_NMG_0084256

"This community was built as a kind of free-for-all, where people could have a lot of fun and do it rather anonymously," Colton said. "You don't get that kind of community by saying, 'Here, sign up and at the simplest drop of a subpoena, we'll give that information away.' "

To be sure, Google, which hopes to close the YouTube purchase by year's end, has already taken steps to reduce the copyright liability it will inherit from the private firm. Just before it announced the acquisition of YouTube, the two companies signed licensing agreements with several large media firms, including Vivendi's Universal Music Group, Warner Music Group Corp., Sony BMG and CBS Corp.

Several large entertainment industry providers are now teaming up to request compensation from the site, according to The Wall Street Journal. Viacom , which owns Paramount, estimates that pirated versions of video clips from its MTV, Comedy Central and Nickelodeon channels are watched 80,000 times a day on YouTube, according to the Journal.

Paramount Pictures spokeswoman Nancy Kirkpatrick said that the company's actions against Moukarbel "in no way means we're targeting YouTube." She declined further comment on the lawsuit against Moukarbel.

When asked about YouTube, a spokeswoman for the Motion Picture Industry Association said "we continue to pursue those who violate copyright laws on all levels, and we will continue to monitor YouTube for copyrighted material."

That means YouTube users who post such material could face legal problems similar to Moukarbel's.

Moukarbel, meanwhile, said he harbors no hard feelings toward YouTube about the incident.

"I was happy with its run on YouTube, and, frankly, I was surprised it lasted as long as it did," he said. "That they eventually offered my information to Paramount doesn't bother me at this point." Ben Charny is a MarketWatch reporter based in San Francisco.

Former Youth Pastor Faces Child Porn Charges (SLPD)

By Sandi Villarreal

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, October 21, 2006

Authorities tipped off by someone from church

A former youth leader at Grace Baptist Church in St. Charles was indicted Thursday on federal child pornography charges.

According to the indictment, Michael Gulley, 45, of the 3600 block of Ehlmann Road in St. Charles, had seven files of child pornography on his computer.

Terri Dougherty, assistant to U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway, said the files were sent from Gulley's work computer to his home computer.

Capt. Gerry Pollard, spokesman for the St. Charles Police Department, said the investigation began in November 2005.

"A person involved with the church became alarmed at what was going on," he said.

Tom Bossch, a deacon at Grace Baptist Church, said it was church staff members who discovered what they believed to be a crime and immediately notified the police department. Bossch said the church has a system of checks that make sure that type of behavior is not tolerated.

The St. Charles County Sheriff's Department's computer forensics unit also was involved in the investigation. When a department seizes a computer, investigators in the unit process hard drives to uncover the information.

Gulley was indicted on one felony count of possession of child pornography. If he is convicted, he could face a maximum of 10 years in prison, fines up to $250,000 and supervised release for life.

Dougherty said Friday afternoon Gulley was in the process of being released on a $20,000 bond.

The case is part of Project Safe Childhood - a nationwide initiative created by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

According to the U.S. Department of Justice Web site, the project aims to protect children from exploitation on the Internet through coordinated and comprehensive efforts at a national and community level.

"Nothing we do is more important than protecting children from these predators," Hanaway said in a news release.

"We can only make these cases when we have the commitment of local law enforcement," she said. "I am very grateful to the St. Charles Police Department for their investigation in this case."

Federal $$ To Help Purchase Bulletproof Vests For NYPD (STNIA)

By Rob Hart, Advance Staff Writer

Staten Island Advance (NY), October 21, 2006

The NYPD is finally on course to receive a federal grant of more than $538,000 to purchase about 1,000 bulletproof vests, under a funding stream approved yesterday by the Department of Justice.

The money comes from the Justice Department's Bulletproof Vest Partnership Grant Program, funded at $30 million in the Fiscal Year 2006 Science, State, Justice, and Commerce Appropriations bill.

DOJ_NMG_0084257

Earlier this year, the Bush administration proposed drastic cuts in the funding, from $30 million to $10 million.

Over two years, that reduction would have cost the city the money to buy 1,000 replacement vests. It was among a series of cuts the White House pushed to rein in spending and reduce the budget deficit.

However, a bipartisan effort in Congress opposing the cuts, joined by Rep. Vito Fossella (R-Staten Island/Brooklyn), was successful.

And Rep. Stephen Lynch (D-Mass.) submitted an amendment to the House, which was passed in June, which increased funding for the vest program to $32 million for Fiscal Year 2007.

"This funding will help ensure our law enforcement officers have necessary lifesaving equipment to do their jobs protecting the citizens of our city," Fossella said in a statement. "Cities like New York rely on federal assistance to purchase necessary equipment and resources for first responders."

"The Bulletproof Vest Partnership will ensure that we can provide the latest technology in protective vests to police and correction officers," Mayor Michael Bloomberg said.

Rob Hart covers state government for the Advance. He may be reached at rhart@siadvance.com.

Off-label Drug Marketing: Missing The Mark (MERCN)

By Steve Johnson

The San Jose Mercury News, October 21, 2006

The heart-failure drug Natrecor seemed sure to become a blockbuster after Scios of Fremont put it on the market in 2001.

Besides its use in hospitalized patients, many clinics began giving it to walk-in patients in weekly sessions dubbed ``tuneups." Some people -- including prominent heart specialist Dr. Eric Topol -- say Scios encouraged this with a hotline and brochure explaining how to bill Medicare for the sessions.

There was only one problem: Some medical experts contend Natrecor was never approved for such tuneups. Some also say it may not be as safe as initially thought.

Scios says studies show the drug is safe. And it has launched a campaign to clarify to doctors that the drug is not recommended for repeated use in patients in a clinic setting.

Nevertheless, the drug's sales have sagged and the company is under investigation by the U.S. attorney in San Francisco for allegedly engaging in ``off-label" marketing, promoting drugs for uses not approved by the government.

Since this case came to light, critics in two major medical journals have cited Natrecor as an example of how easy it is for drug companies to peddle their medicines for unapproved purposes. Although doctors are allowed to prescribe drugs for off-label treatments, companies are forbidden from promoting their drugs for such uses.

``The system is faulty, and there are numerous leaks in the pipe," said Aaron Kesselhelm, one of three Harvard medical specialists who published an article this summer in the journal Health Affairs that criticized the use of Natrecor for tuneups.

But executives at Scios -- which Johnson & Johnson bought for $2.4 billion in 2003 -- maintain they and Natrecor have been unfairly tarnished.

Scios spokeswoman Chris Ernst wouldn't comment about the off-label claims, except to say the company is cooperating with the federal probe. But she stressed that ``patients are our first priority" and noted that 15 studies of Natrecor in people turned up no cause to believe the drug is risky.

Nonetheless, Scios said in June it will do another massive study over the next couple of years to definitively assess Natrecor's safety.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration approved Natrecor for treating patients with congestive heart failure who have trouble breathing even while doing minimal activity or resting. It has been given to hundreds of thousands of people and its sales hit $395 million in 2004. But since then, the drug has run into trouble.

After reanalyzing past studies of Natrecor, New York heart specialist Dr. Jonathan Sack- ner-Bernstein published two reports in 2005, warning the drug seemed linked to worrisome rates of kidney problems and death.

In disputing Sackner-Bernstein's conclusions, Scios has reported finding only a slightly increased death rate among those taking Natrecor after 30 days. Moreover, after tracking some Natrecor patients over six months, the company said it found virtually no difference in their death rate compared with patients on other medicine.

Although many patients are given drugs for off-label uses, the practice worries some critics. Doctors often prescribe medicines for purposes not approved by the government based on preliminary studies suggesting they might be effective for such uses. But one expert has said the evidence supporting off-label use is questionable.

A study published in May by Dr. Randall Stafford, an associate professor of medicine at Stanford University, found about 20 percent of the drugs in a national prescription database were given for off-label purposes. And in most of those cases, he determined, there was little or no evidence the drug was effective for those uses.

DOJ_NMG_0084258

Companies, on the other hand, can face heavy fines for promoting drugs for off-label purposes. But the FDA's ability to halt abuses is limited, said Dr. Sidney Wolfe, who directs Public Citizen's Health Research Group.

``They do not have anywhere near the budget they should," Wolfe said. ``That is a major reason the drug industry is able to get away with what they do."

FDA and Justice Department officials said they don't track how many companies have been prosecuted for off-label marketing. But Ioana Petrou, chief of major crimes for the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, said federal authorities have been paying increasing attention to such practice, given the grave danger it can pose to the public.

``In the vast majority of the cases prosecuted, there are misleading statements being made to the medical community by the pharmaceutical companies," she said. ``So the patients can't rely on their doctors to tell them what is safe and effective."

Petrou said the first off-label case the Justice Department ever prosecuted involved Protropin, made by Genentech of South San Francisco. Although Protropin was approved for treating children with a growth hormone deficiency, the company was accused of promoting it for healthy short children. Genentech denied the charges, but paid $50 million to settle the case in 1999.

Now Genentech is under investigation for off-label marketing again, this time over Rituxan. In 1997, the FDA approved the drug for treating non-Hodgkin's lymphoma and in February this year also approved its use for rheumatoid arthritis.

It's unclear what the current investigation by the U.S. Attorney in Philadelphia involves. But a lawsuit by a former Genentech employee has accused the firm and its partner, Biogen Idec, of promoting Rituxan for rheumatoid arthritis before it was approved for that purpose.

Genentech spokeswoman Caroline Pecquet said the company is cooperating with prosecutors, who she said are expected to call current and former Genentech employees before a grand jury.

``We are committed to ethical and legal promotional practices," Pecquet added.

Yet another Bay Area company accused of off-label marketing is InterMune of Brisbane. In July, its executives announced they had created a $30 million reserve in hopes of settling a federal investigation into claims the firm improperly promoted Actimmune. The drug is approved for treating a bone disorder and a condition that makes people prone to infections. But InterMune also was accused of marketing it as a treatment for lung disease.

InterMune spokeswoman Pam Lord said the probe focuses on former employees.

The marketing of Natrecor has aroused particular concern because of questions about its safety, especially given the claims that people were receiving repeated injections of the drug in tuneups.

Using Natrecor occasionally to treat people in out-patient clinics wouldn't necessarily be considered an off-label use of the drug, said Dr. Norman Stockbridge, who directs an FDA division overseeing heart and kidney drugs. But he said giving such patients frequent doses of Natrecor would be an unapproved use.

Responding to the criticism, Scios convened a panel of medical experts last year to review Natrecor's safety. The group concluded more studies of the drug were warranted. But until then, it recommended that Natrecor should be given only to the seriously ill in hospitals and not in frequent doses to people in outpatient clinics.

Since the Natrecor controversy erupted last year, doctors familiar with the drug say its use has dropped dramatically. That troubles some doctors who swear by Natrecor, also known as nesiritide.

``I am absolutely enthusiastic," said Dr. John Luber Jr., a Tacoma, Wa. heart specialist involved in a Scios-sponsored study this year that found Natrecor lessened the likelihood of death among heart surgery patients.

But in the New England Journal of Medicine last year, Topol, former chair of the Cardiovascular Medicine Department at the Cleveland Clinic in Ohio, cited Natrecor as an example of a serious and widespread public health issue.

``We need a tuneup of our procedures to eliminate indiscriminate use of drugs, such as nesiritide, when there is not proper evidence of their safety," he warned.

CIVIL LAW:

Naval Shipyard Kickback Suit Settled For $4.2M (DPHR)

By Peter Dujardin 247-4749

Newport News (VA) Daily Press, October 21, 2006

The suit originated with a complaint filed by the head of a freight forwarding firm in Newport News.

NEWPORT NEWS -- An Illinois transportation firm has agreed to pay $4.2 million to settle U.S. Justice Department accusations that it deliberately overcharged Norfolk Naval Shipyard for delivering cargo.

The original whistle-blower - who runs a competing freight forwarding firm in Newport News - is sharing the winnings.

DOJ_NMG_0084259

AIT Worldwide Logistics of Itasca, Ill., had been accused of scheming with its agent in Hampton Roads and a transportation officer at Norfolk Naval Shipyard to bilk the government in exchange for giving kickbacks to the transportation officer. Paul Watkins runs the Oyster Point division of Target Logistic Services, a Baltimore-based company that competes with AIT for freight forwarding contracts. He was the original whistle-blower, gathering evidence of the scheme three years ago and reporting it to the Naval Criminal Investigative Service.

Under the terms of the federal whistle-blower act, Watkins and his lawyer will split 18 percent of the amount of the Justice Department winnings.

Watkins will get $502,000, or 12 percent of the total, before taxes. Bryan Schempf - an attorney with the Newport News firm of Jones Blechman Woltz and Kelly - and his firm will get the remaining 6 percent, or $251,000 before taxes.

The Justice Department alleged that Thomas A. Perry Jr. - owner of Air Cargo Expediters Inc., as AIT's agent in Hampton Roads - provided illegal gratuities to people working in the transportation office at Norfolk Naval Shipyard. Those included Gene Boyce, the yard's transportation officer.

Perry, of Virginia Beach, and Boyce, of Elizabeth City, N.C., pleaded guilty last year to conspiracy in the scheme, which the Justice Department described as Boyce getting gratuities in return for awarding freight contracts to AIT between 1999 and 2004.

Boyce was sentenced to 44 months in prison and ordered to pay $543,055.36. Perry was sentenced to eight months in prison and ordered to pay $543,055.

Watkins said he heard rumors for years about kickbacks at the shipyard and always found it difficult to win contracts forwarding its air and truck cargo. "I couldn't ever get it," he said.

But then - simply by looking at public records at a government freight management Web site - Watkins began noticing that AIT was, at times, charging Norfolk Naval Shipyard as much as five or 10 times the going rate to ship spare aircraft and ship parts around the world.

There were thousands of shipments, with various levels of overcharging. In some cases, for example, a 10,000-pound air shipment delivered by AIT might be costing $50,000 - or $5 a pound - when it should have been costing only about $10,000, or $1 a pound, Watkins said.

"They were outrageous numbers, compared with what I would've charged," he said.

At first, Watkins said, "all the reasons were selfish - I was trying to grow my own business. But I finally got so disgusted in it. It was going on continually. Maybe daily."

He started printing out and tabulating what he found - at one point determining how many armored kits for soldiers in Iraq that the government could buy with the savings.

In the fall of 2003, Watkins e-mailed a Navy inspector general fraud line that he found on the Web and contacted several other Navy officials. He never heard back. But he persisted, calling the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, which began investigating immediately, he said.

"I talked to the head of it over there in Chesapeake," Watkins said.

"He told me, 'Hang up the phone. Someone will call you in 10 minutes.' And so I showed it all to them, ... and they responded."

The investigation was aggressive from the beginning, Watkins said, with the Justice Department getting involved in October 2005. Payments of gifts and cash payments were uncovered in the probe.

In addition to paying the fine, AIT has also been barred from providing federal freight forwarding to the government.

Tentative Settlement Reached In Va. Jet-noise Case (NAVYT)

By William H. McMichael, Staff writer

Navy Times, October 21, 2006

The U.S. government has reached a tentative settlement with more than 3,000 southern Virginia homeowners over their claims that excessive Navy jet noise reduced the value of their properties beginning in 1999, according to a court order filed Tuesday.

The published order cancels the trial that was scheduled to start Thursday in Chesapeake, Va., under the auspices of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims. Judge Victor J. Wolski also halted all proceedings in all the matters and ordered that the parties file a joint status report on the settlement process within 90 days.

Settlement details or proposals for same have not been released. Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson cautioned that “nothing has been finalized.”

A total of eight cases are covered by the ruling and involve a total of 3,400 property owners, Magnuson said. That figure likely includes husband-and-wife co-owners, according to Kieron Quinn, one of the attorneys representing the plaintiffs, who said that 2,098 properties are affected.

The claims vary slightly based on the level of exposure alleged by each plaintiff. But the general government and plaintiff positions are set out in motions filed in April and May in Carole and Robert Testwuide et al v. the U.S.

The Testwuide complaint is based on a claim of excessive jet noise in the areas around Virginia Beach's Oceana Naval Air Station and nearby Fentress Auxiliary Landing Field in Chesapeake, to the south of Oceana. The noise increased dramatically, the plaintiffs allege, when 10 squadrons of F/A-18 Hornet fighter jets were transferred from Cecil Field in Florida to Oceana between December 1998 and June 1999, the result of a federal base-closing decision.

The plaintiff response in the Testwuide case held that the transfer "caused an enormous increase in noise in the neighborhood" surrounding Oceana and that residents have recorded backyard noise levels "that are at the threshold of pain."

The brief cited the experience of former Virginia Beach resident Betty Capps, who lived in the city from 1981 to 2005. Capps said she formerly had no problem with the jet noise but as a result of the increased noise in 1999, "she cannot conduct phone conversations or hear the television," according to the brief.

The government's motion to dismiss that case argued that the plaintiff claims are "factually unsupported." It argued that overflight rights — known as avigation easements — should have been taken and in place at least since 1981, when, the government said, flight activity was far greater than in 1999. As a result, the asserted claims should be barred under the six-year statute of limitations that governs claims made before the Court of Federal Claims, it said. The government also argued that some plaintiffs didn't own their property at the time.

The plaintiffs in the Testwuide case responded that the government provided no proof that a "taking" of overflight rights occurred in 1981 and that the selection of that year is arbitrary and based on the number of aircraft estimated to be flying out of Oceana at that time.

Feds Getting Tough On Utah Bankruptcy Fraud (SLT)

By Steven Oberbeck, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 21, 2006

Shortly after emerging from a Chapter 7 bankruptcy in 2000, Deseree Dyer of West Valley City borrowed $26,000 from Wells Fargo Bank and purchased a new Jeep Grand Cherokee.

In less than a year, she defaulted on the loan.

Wells Fargo repossessed and sold the vehicle, then went after the 29-year-old Dyer to collect the rest of the money she owed. To get out of paying that debt, Dyer mailed the bank a copy of her bankruptcy papers, fraudulently dated to indicate the court had freed her from paying Wells Fargo.

She pleaded guilty to one count of bankruptcy fraud last week, days before the U.S. Department of Justice announced the result of a nationwide investigation aimed at rooting out similar bankruptcy fraud cases nationwide.

Prosecutors have filed criminal charges against 78 people in 36 judicial districts nationwide. Three of them were in Utah.

"Bankruptcy fraud must not be tolerated, if our bankruptcy system is to serve its purpose of helping the honest debtor in need of financial relief," Clifford White, acting director of the Executive Office of U.S. Trustees, said in announcing the results of the probe dubbed "Operation Truth or Consequences."

Among those charged as a result of the nationwide sweep were nine attorneys, two bankruptcy petition preparers and a former law enforcement officer. The Justice Department estimates fraud is involved in approximately 10 percent of all bankruptcy petitions.

Advertisement

Collectively, the charges alleged defendants concealed more than $3 million in assets, used false Social Security numbers and identities, submitted fraudulent documents and fraudulently received government loans and benefits, the Justice Department said. In many states such bankruptcy fraud prosecutions are rare, but that's not the case in Utah.

Three years ago, the U.S. Attorney's office in Utah teamed up with the U.S. Trustee's office to make bankruptcy-fraud prosecutions a priority. The result: Over the past several years attorneys from those offices in Utah have brought a big percentage of the indictments filed nationwide.

"We made a conscious decision to make it a priority," said Barbara Bearnson, chief of the Criminal Division at the U.S. attorney's office in Utah. "In other districts, though, bankruptcy fraud cases are regularly brought."

To bolster the government's investigation and prosecution efforts, then U.S. Attorney Paul Warner in 2003 named Assistant U.S. Trustee Cy Castle in Salt Lake City as a special assistant U.S. attorney.

Castle's presence brought an additional element of experience and manpower to the U.S. attorney's office, which takes the lead in prosecuting bankruptcy-fraud cases referred to it by the courts or U.S. trustee's office. As a special assistant U.S. attorney, Castle has taken the lead in prosecuting the cases as well.

DOJ_NMG_0084261

Dyer will be sentenced in January and faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. Among the three Utahns charged in the sweep were Kathleen Heath, 51, of West Bountiful, indicted on one count of concealing assets and two counts of filing a false bankruptcy oath.

She filed a Chapter 7 bankruptcy in May 2005 and listed assets worth just $230. But prosecutors say she failed to disclose she owned a 2001 Honda Accord and a home in which there was approximately $80,000 in equity.

"We've been seeing fewer bankruptcy cases filed [this year], but the fraud hasn't decreased," Bearnson said. "And we're going to continue to make [prosecutions] a priority."

Response Rates To FOIA Requests Improve (FEDT)

By Aimee Curl

Federal Times, October 21, 2006

Agencies are improving the way they disseminate information to the public thanks to a presidential directive that requires them to review and revamp how they respond to Freedom of Information Act requests.

The executive order "has had an immediate and widespread positive effect on the operations of the federal agencies that administer the FOIA," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wrote in a report issued Oct. 16. However, he noted that a large backlog at many agencies "still remains an area of concern."

The order, issued by the president in December 2005, requires agencies to name chief FOIA officers at the assistant secretary level and create improvement plans to streamline the processing of requests. The order also directs agencies to establish one or more service centers and designate one or more public liaisons to this effort.

Gonzales said agencies, in their FOIA improvement plans, have embraced a number of critical elements — expanded use of technology, active disclosure of information, improved customer service and backlog reduction.

In reviewing agency improvement plans, Gonzales said he discovered a number of best practices worth sharing. He said some agencies, including the Small Business Administration and Energy and Defense departments, have implemented in-house, training programs for both FOIA and non-FOIA employees.

Other examples include the Commerce Department's use of intranet FOIA sites so agency personnel can share information and the General Services Administration's plan to simplify the standard acknowledgment letter and send out postcards to FOIA requestors instead.

In his recommendations, Gonzales suggested all agencies switch to postcards.

"The simple use of postcards rather than standard written letters for this basic, universal step in the FOIA process could save countless hours (and funding), freeing FOIA personnel for more substantive activities," he wrote.

Gonzales also recommended agencies work together to maximize the use of technology in order to make responding to FOIA requests more timely and cost-effective.

Rep. Todd Platts, R-Pa., said he was glad to see that the report discussed the issue of FOIA backlogs. Platts, who chairs the House Government Reform subcommittee on government management, finance and accountability, held a hearing in July to examine the executive order.

"Improving the operational aspects of the Freedom of Information Act has been an important goal of the subcommittee," Platts said in a statement. "I'm pleased to see that the attorney general's report provides a fair accounting of actions that federal agencies have taken to help citizens in their quest for information."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Calif. Candidate's Office, Home Raided (AP)

By Peter Prengaman

AP, October 21, 2006

Garden Grove, Calif. (AP) -- For two days, a Republican congressional candidate had promised to explain how a threatening letter was sent by his campaign without his knowledge to thousands of Hispanic immigrant voters. As about 200 people gathered Friday in front of his campaign headquarters seeking answers, Tan D. Nguyen was a no-show at his own news conference. Instead, 10 uniformed California Department of Justice police officers arrived with a search warrant and pounded on the glass of Nguyen's storefront headquarters.

Agents spent two hours sifting through cabinets, boxes and computers. They left carrying several boxes and plastic bags of evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0084262

Hours later, they searched a home in nearby Anaheim listed as belonging to one of Nguyen's staffers, emerging with a computer hard drive and a small box. Nguyen's neighbors in a gated community in Santa Ana said law enforcement officers also spent several hours searching his home.

Nguyen, a Vietnamese immigrant trying to unseat a popular Democratic incumbent, has acknowledged his campaign sent the letter, which wrongly said immigrants could be jailed if they voted. He blamed an unidentified staffer whom he said he has fired.

Nguyen has resisted calls from leaders in his own party to quit the race, saying he did not approve the letter and did not know about it.

Many mulling around his office Friday were supporters.

"He's the No. 1 man because his No. 1 issue is kicking out all the illegals," said Ernie Sqarlata, 86.

State and federal officials have been investigating the mailing for possible violations of election or civil rights law. It is illegal to use threats to try to dissuade anyone from voting.

The letter, written in Spanish, was mailed to an estimated 14,000 Democratic voters in Orange County. It warns, "You are advised that if your residence in this country is illegal or you are an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that could result in jail time."

In fact, immigrants who are adult naturalized citizens are eligible to vote. Secretary of State Bruce McPherson said Friday his office will send letters to homes that received the mailing to clarify voters' rights.

Nguyen's attorney, David Wiechert, cautioned against jumping to conclusions.

"A search doesn't mean the person whose office is being searched is guilty," said Wiechert, standing outside Nguyen's office. "This is a political firestorm of high-ranking Republicans and Democrats speculating about an investigation they have no knowledge of."

Orange County Republican Chairman Scott Baugh has said that after speaking with state investigators and the company that distributed the mailing, he believes Nguyen expedited the "obnoxious and reprehensible" letter. The party's executive committee voted unanimously to urge Nguyen to drop out, he said.

State Democratic Chairman Art Torres said party leaders were planning a rally for Orange County on Tuesday. "It's a hate crime as far as we are concerned," Torres said.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger said he planned to visit the country and meet with Hispanic leaders Saturday.

Phil Angelides, the Democratic candidate for governor, said: "They've got a real problem. They've got to clean it up because it's not good for California."

Illegal immigration has been a centerpiece of Nguyen's campaign to oust Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez, a five-term congresswoman.

Nguyen was born in 1973 in Vietnam, where his family fled the communist regime. In 2004, he unsuccessfully ran in the Democratic primary to challenge GOP Rep. Dana Rohrabacher. He later changed his party affiliation and declared his bid to upset Sanchez.

On Friday, Hispanic and Vietnamese leaders joined the chorus condemning the letter, saying it should not become a wedge that drives their communities apart.

"This letter reminds us of what we were running away from in Vietnam, where people can't vote the way they want," said Xuyen Dong, who heads the Orange County chapter of the Vietnamese Professional Society.

Associated Press writers Michael R. Blood in Los Angeles, Don Thompson in Sacramento and Ana Beatriz Cholo in Santa Ana contributed to this report.

Nguyen's Campaign Office Raided (OCR)

By NORBERTO SANTANA Jr., The ORANGE COUNTY REGISTER

Orange County (CA) Register, October 21, 2006

State investigators take computers from the workplace and search the candidate's home.

News media converged on Tan Nguyen's Garden Grove campaign office Friday expecting to hear from the Republican congressional candidate about a mailer sent out this week warning immigrants against voting in the November election.

Instead, the media horde got a front-row seat to a half-dozen agents from the state Attorney General's Office serving search warrants and combing through Nguyen's office.

Officers confiscated three computer hard drives, checked for fingerprints, leafed through files and interviewed Nguyen's attorney. Agents also searched Nguyen's Santa Ana home and a campaign worker's Anaheim home.

Despite burgeoning state and federal probes into the flier, Nguyen's attorney said Nguyen has no plans to withdraw as the Republican nominee for the 47th Congressional District race against incumbent Democrat Loretta Sanchez.

Dave Wiechert, an attorney representing Nguyen, said: "Mr. Nguyen has indicated that he did not authorize or approve the mailing" and would not discuss specifics because of the investigation. Wiechert said misinformation was fueling "a political firestorm."

That firestorm has included widespread condemnation from GOP leaders such as Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Orange County Republican Party Chairman Scott Baugh. On Thursday, Baugh accused Nguyen of being directly linked to the letter.

Wiechert, citing his experience as a former prosecutor, said: "You see statements by high-ranking Republicans and Democrats speculating about an investigation that, I'm sure, based on my experience, that they have little or no knowledge about."

The controversy was fueled Friday when county officials halted Registrar of Voters Neal Kelley from sending out a letter setting the record straight to the 14,000 households targeted by Nguyen's mailer. The state attorney general and the secretary of state had contacted Kelley as part of discussions about sending out such a letter.

Several Republican county supervisors argue that the Registrar of Voters Office should not get involved in correcting campaign mailers.

"The registrar of voters is not supposed to be the arbiter of truth in elections," Board of Supervisors Chairman Bill Campbell said.

Campbell added that having the county elections office track and respond to such fliers would set a bad precedent.

Supervisor Lou Correa, the board's lone Democrat, argued that "ignoring this type of letter is a precedent that I'm concerned about being set."

Correa has demanded that supervisors publicly debate the issue at their meeting Tuesday. He wants a letter sent out. "This, in my opinion – this is not like every other mailer," Correa said. "The issue here is voter suppression, especially given the history here in Orange County."

On Friday, Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, whose office is also conducting an investigation into the suspect mailer, announced he would send out a letter.

"I want all eligible voters in California to cast their votes without fear or misinformation. I am outraged that anyone would try to rob eligible Californians of their right to vote. Any attempt to intimidate voters is unacceptable" McPherson said.

Santa Ana Councilman Jose Solorio indicated Friday that the voter-intimidation efforts may extend beyond the mailer. Solorio presented a copy of a sign he said was distributed throughout Delhi Park that read: "Are you a resident or illegal? If you vote, you'll get deported." The signs also carried the moniker of a group called Alizanda Pro-imigrados (Pro-Immigrants Alliance).

Solorio said he had forwarded the signs to the Attorney General's Office and has been assured that they would be investigated.

"(The signs) shows that it's more widespread than this one single rogue incident," Orange County Democratic Party Chairman Frank Barbaro said.

Meanwhile, pressure for a federal probe into the mailer continued to mount.

Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., wrote U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday seeking a full report from the Department of Justice on its probe.

"This shameful and dishonest scheme to discourage Latino citizens from voting is a blatant violation of the Voting Rights Act, and all those involved should be held accountable as soon as possible," Kennedy said.

CONTACT US: Register staff writers Annie Burris, Dena Bunis, Jeff Overley and Martin Wisckol contributed to these reports.

State Police Raid Home Of California Congressional Candidate (MCT)

By Norberto Santana Jr., The Orange County Register

McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

SANTA ANA, Calif. - News media converged on Tan Nguyen's campaign office Friday expecting to hear from the Republican congressional candidate about a mailer sent out this week warning immigrants against voting in the November election.

Instead, the media horde got a front-row seat to a half-dozen agents from the state Attorney General's Office serving search warrants and combing through Nguyen's office.

Officers confiscated three computer hard drives, checked for fingerprints, leafed through files and interviewed Nguyen's attorney. Agents also searched Nguyen's home and a campaign worker's home.

Despite burgeoning state and federal probes into the flier, Nguyen's attorney said Nguyen has no plans to withdraw as the Republican nominee for the 47th Congressional District race against incumbent Democrat Loretta Sanchez.

Dave Wiechert, an attorney representing Nguyen, said that "Mr. Nguyen has indicated that he did not authorize or approve the mailing" yet declined to discuss specifics because of the ongoing investigation. Wiechert added that misinformation was fueling what he called "a political firestorm."

That firestorm has included widespread condemnation from GOP leaders such as Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and Orange County Republican Party Chairman Scott Baugh. On Thursday, Baugh accused Nguyen of being directly linked to the letter.

Wiechert, citing his experience as a former prosecutor, said, "You see statements by high-ranking Republicans and Democrats speculating about an investigation that, I'm sure, based on my experience, that they have little or no knowledge about."

The controversy was fueled Friday when county officials halted Registrar of Voters Neal Kelley from sending out a letter setting the record straight to the 14,000 households targeted by Nguyen's mailer. The state attorney general and the secretary of state had contacted Kelley as part of discussions about sending such a letter out.

Several Republican county supervisors argue that the Registrar of Voters Office should not get involved in correcting campaign mailers.

"The registrar of voters is not supposed to be the arbiter of truth in elections," Board of Supervisors Chairman Bill Campbell said.

Campbell added that having the county elections office track and respond to such fliers would set a bad precedent.

Yet Supervisor Lou Correa, the board's lone Democrat, argued that "ignoring this type of letter is a precedent that I'm concerned about being set."

Correa has demanded that supervisors publicly debate the issue at their weekly meeting Tuesday. He wants a letter sent out.

"This, in my opinion - this is not like every other mailer," Correa said. "The issue here is voter suppression, especially given the history here in Orange County."

On Friday, Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, whose office is also conducting an investigation into the suspect mailer, announced he would send out a letter.

"I want all eligible voters in California to cast their votes without fear or misinformation. I am outraged that anyone would try to rob eligible Californians of their right to vote. Any attempt to intimidate voters is unacceptable" McPherson said.

Santa Ana Councilman Jose Solorio indicated Friday that the voter-intimidation efforts may extend beyond the Nguyen campaign mailer. Solorio presented a copy of a sign he said was distributed throughout Delhi Park that read: "Are you a resident or illegal? If you vote, you'll get deported." The signs also carried the moniker of a group called Alizanda Pro-imigrados (Pro-Immigrants Alliance).

Solorio said he had forwarded the signs to the Attorney General's Office and has been assured that they would be investigated.

"It (the signs) shows that it's more widespread than this one single rogue incident (the letter). This stuff does not happen in a vacuum," Orange County Democratic Party Chairman Frank Barbaro said.

Meanwhile, pressure for a federal probe into the mailer continued to mount.

Sens. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., wrote U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales on Friday seeking a full report from the Department of Justice on its investigation.

"This shameful and dishonest scheme to discourage Latino citizens from voting is a blatant violation of the Voting Rights Act, and all those involved should be held accountable as soon as possible," Kennedy said.

Raids Widen 'Immigrant' Letter Probe (LAT)

By Jennifer Delson, Christopher Goffard And Mai Tran, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

Agents take evidence from candidate Tan Nguyen's home and office, seeking details of note about voting status sent to O.C. residents.

Even as he prepared to step before the cameras Friday in an effort to mend his tattered candidacy for Congress, the worst week of Tan Nguyen's political life got bleaker still, as state agents raided his Garden Grove campaign headquarters and Santa Ana home, hauling off computers and bags of evidence.

The investigation by California Department of Justice agents stems from a racially charged letter that Nguyen admits his office sent to about 14,000 registered voters in central Orange County. The letter, which warned "immigrants" they could be jailed or deported if they tried to vote, has spurred condemnation across the political spectrum and an investigation into possible voting rights violations.

DOJ_NMG_0084265

Nguyen, a Vietnamese immigrant who is running to unseat Democratic U.S. Rep. Loretta Sanchez, maintains that he neither wrote nor authorized the instantly infamous letter, claiming it was the work of a campaign manager he refused to name. According to the head of the Orange County Republican Party, however, the mailing house that sent the letter said Nguyen had a direct hand in it.

State agents arrived both at Nguyen's campaign office and his home about 1 p.m. Friday with search warrants, scouring files, plumbing cabinets and bagging evidence.

Nguyen had to cancel a planned afternoon news conference, which his lawyer, David Wiechert, said would be rescheduled for next week.

"I do not believe he'll be arrested," said Wiechert, who specializes in white collar criminal defense work. "My belief is he'll be cleared. He's asserted his innocence."

The lawyer said agents from the state attorney general's office had questioned Nguyen for two hours Thursday and that he was cooperating fully with their investigation.

"A search doesn't mean the person whose office is being searched is guilty," Wiechert added. "This is a political firestorm of high-ranking Republicans and Democrats speculating about an investigation they have no knowledge of."

According to a source close to the investigation, the attorney general's office has determined that an LAPD officer, who is a friend of a worker in Nguyen's office, paid $4,000 on a credit card for the bulk mailing of the letter and used an alias.

In addition to the letter, the attorney general's office is investigating a racially charged poster that was recently hung in Santa Ana's Delhi Park. Translated from Spanish, the poster reads, "If you are a resident or are illegal, if you vote, you will be thrown out."

Park regulars say there were dozens of the posters hanging in the park for nearly a week. "They were put on just about every tree and pole around here," said Juan Cabrera, who was visiting the park Friday.

Santa Ana Councilman Jose Solorio found one of the posters on the ground in the park Friday and passed the information on to the attorney general's office. Solorio wondered whether there was a link between the letters sent out by Nguyen's office and the park posters. "The rhetoric in the signs sounds similar to the letters, so I have my suspicions," Solorio said.

State attorney general spokesman Nathan Barankin said the posters were "under review" but would not say whether that probe would be tied to the letter investigation. "We can't rule [the posters] in or out," he said.

Javier Gonzalez, executive director of Strengthening Our Lives, a union-based voter drive campaign, said the poster's use of the word "resident" was deceptive. He said his mother, a naturalized U.S. citizen, considers herself a U.S. resident, and might think from reading the letter that she should not vote.

Meanwhile, the letter from Nguyen's office, which has prompted the GOP to disown him, continues to generate howls of indignation. "When you tell immigrants who have become citizens they can go to jail for voting, you are spreading lies, not liberty," said an ACLU news release, calling for Orange County Registrar Neal Kelley to send out letters correcting misinformation in the original letter.

Said Mai Cong, president of the Vietnamese Community of Orange County: "I was distressed to learn that someone in our immigrant community is involved in a case of voter intimidation. This is like 'a single worm that spoils that soup,' as we Vietnamese Americans used to say."

Among the recipients of the letter was Kristen Panagua, a Disneyland Hotel worker, who said it angered her. "I respect and love this country," said Panagua, who registered to vote six years ago after becoming a U.S. citizen. "They are trying to intimidate us to keep us from being part of it."

Isabel Procopio, a janitor and volunteer for Strengthening Our Lives, said she was knocking on doors in Garden Grove on Saturday as part of a campaign to encourage voter participation. Of the 30 doors she approached, she found 10 residents who had received the letter. "Many people told me they are really afraid," she said. "They also said they were angry. I'm telling them not to let racist Republicans intimidate us."

Gustavo Arellano, the OC Weekly staffer who writes the syndicated "Ask A Mexican!" column, said the letter would generate a massive backlash among Latino voters, who would be galvanized to defeat Republicans in local elections in November.

"Latinos are going to hear about this [and say], 'Oh, Republicans: anti-immigrant,' " he said. "They're not going to pay attention to the fact that the Republican Party has denounced the letter, or that Gov. Schwarzenegger has called it a hate crime. They're just going to chalk it up as another instance of GOP xenophobia."

jennifer.delson@latimes.com
christopher.goffard@latimes .com
mai.tran@latimes.com

*

DOJ_NMG_0084266

Staff writer Christine Hanley contributed to this report.

California: Offices Searched Over Letters (NYT)

By Cindy Chang

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

State investigators searched the offices of a Republican Congressional candidate, a day after he acknowledged that a campaign worker was responsible for a letter sent to as many as 14,000 Latino residents in an effort to keep them from the polls. The candidate, Tan Nguyen, left, will stay in the race against the incumbent, Loretta Sanchez, even though the Republican Party has urged him to withdraw, said his lawyer, David Wiechert. Mr. Nguyen has denied having any knowledge of the letter, which stated that immigrants could be jailed if they voted.

Discrimination Claims Hurt Business Even If False (TSSC)

By Jim Duplessis

The State (SC), October 21, 2006

Experts say Cracker Barrel gained one more business risk when the mother of comedian Chris Rock accused Cracker Barrel of racial discrimination for her treatment at a restaurant Tuesday.

The risk isn't so much that Lebanon, Tenn.-based Cracker Barrel might lose a lawsuit, if one is filed.

The real risk is that it will set back the company's ability to lure one of the most lucrative sources of increasing its business: drawing more minority customers.

In customer relations, perceptions can be just as dangerous as reality for a company, said Jerome D. Williams, professor of advertising at the University of Texas at Austin.

"Whether they're true or not is irrelevant: They're true in the minds of the customer," Williams said. "Companies cannot stick their heads in the sand."

How restaurants — or any other business — treat minorities became a major topic in business circles 12 years ago when the Spartanburg-based Denny's restaurant chain reached a consent decree with the U.S. Justice Department that required it to take a series of steps to prevent discrimination.

Similar lawsuits led Cracker Barrel to reach a consent decree in 2004. The Justice Department cited widespread discrimination within the chain. In some restaurants, black diners routinely were given tables apart from whites, were seated after white customers who arrived later and were given inferior service.

The decree led Cracker Barrel to establish a discrimination policy. It now handles customer complaints, regardless of race, by:

· Reporting the complaint to the manager on duty
· Requiring the manager to listens to the complaint
· Requiring complaints to be reported to company headquarters
· Requiring complaints to be investigated thoroughly

The company also posts its anti-discrimination policy on wall signs, in their menus and on its Web site. The postings include a toll-free number that customers can call to reach a company representative 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

But one of Cracker Barrel's 19 S.C. restaurants left Rose Rock and her daughter feeling they had been singled out for bad service because of their race.

Rock, who lives near Georgetown, and her daughter arrived at Cracker Barrel in Murrells Inlet May 14. They were seated, but waited about 30 minutes before a server or manager spoke with them.

Rock alleges racial discrimination, noting that she and her daughter were the only black customers in the restaurant, and they watched as white customers at other tables were served.

Diana Wynne, senior vice president of corporate affairs for Cracker Barrel, explained Rock and her daughter were seated during a shift change, and no server picked up their table. As a result, no one gave her a menu or took her order.

After Rock got the attention of the manager, he apologized and offered to expedite her order. She declined. The manager followed up with a letter of apology, a gift basket and free meal coupons.

"Ms. Rock is a valued guest of Cracker Barrel," Wynne said. "This is not a case of discrimination. We let a customer down."

"I can assure you we will take appropriate action, including termination if our policies were violated," she said. "We do not tolerate discrimination of any kind."

Blacks and other minorities represent about 30 percent of the nation's population — and base of potential customers.

"Companies can no longer afford to operate business as usual. They're going to lose future opportunity for growth," said Geraldine R. Henderson, associate professor at Northwestern University.

DOJ_NMG_0084267

But many companies still do just that, Williams said.

"You have people in management from that generation who allow people to get away with it, or give them a slap on the wrist," Williams said.

Spartanburg-based Denny's set a new standard for coping with racial discrimination after 1993, when it reached a consent order with the U.S. Justice Department over a series of complaints of poor service given to black customers.

Shortly after the consent decree, Denny's conducted a poll that found about half of black respondents said they would never eat at a Denny's restaurant again. But by 2004, company polling found that number had fallen to 15 percent.

"Denny's is an excellent example of a company that turned things around," Williams said. "They made changes and the minority community was very receptive."

Danielle Holley-Walker, an assistant law professor at the University of South Carolina, said companies should establish practices to prevent discrimination, and respond to allegations immediately.

That starts with apologizing.

"Most people don't settle their everyday disputes by filing lawsuits," Holley-Walker said. "For most people, getting an apology or a voucher for a free meal is enough."

Incidents in which customers report bad service should be reported up to top management, including the company's lawyers, so that the company can adjust its policies to better prevent discrimination and improve overall service, Holley-Walker said.

"In order to learn from your mistakes, you have to have some reporting," she said.

"From an economic, capitalist standpoint, you would not want to alienate anybody and leave money on the table because of the way you treat people," Williams said.

Reach DuPlessis at (803) 771-8305.

ABOUT CRACKER BARREL

Cracker barrel has 548 restaurants in 41 states, including 19 in South Carolina. Each store serves about 1,100 guests per day. Most of its restaurants are by interstate highways, and all are company owned.

Nevada: Street Solicitation (NYT)

By Carolyn Marshall

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

A federal appeals court in San Francisco struck down a Las Vegas ordinance barring solicitation on city streets, calling it unconstitutional. The decision, by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, stems from a 1997 case brought by the American Civil Liberties Union and several religious and political groups challenging Las Vegas ordinances that barred certain groups from distributing leaflets or using vendor tables along a five-block pedestrian promenade. The court also ruled that the city violated the A.C.L.U.'s constitutional right to free speech when it forbid it to set up a vendor table. "We hold that the erection of tables in a public forum is expressive activity protected by our Constitution to the extent that the tables facilitate the dissemination of First Amendment speech," Judge Richard A. Paez wrote.

FBI: No Hate Crimes Recorded In Alabama In 2005 (MR)

By Susan Daker, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), October 21, 2006

No hate crimes were recorded in Alabama in 2005, according to statistics released this week by the FBI, but law enforcement agencies representing about 10 percent of the state's population were the only ones providing information for the survey.

Alabama and Mississippi were the only states in the nation that reported zero hate crimes, according to the FBI. Hawaii did not participate in the study, which included 49 states and the District of Columbia.

"The idea that Alabama had no hate crimes is not believable," said Mark Potok, a director of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which is based in Montgomery and tracks hate crimes and monitors extremist groups.

The FBI reported that nationally more than 7,000 criminal incidents recorded in 2005 occurred as a result of bias toward a particular race, religion, sexual orientation, ethnicity/national origin, or physical or mental disability. In 2005, California reported the most hate crimes, recording 1,379. New Jersey reported the second most with 738, according to the FBI.

A more accurate survey of hate crimes, according to Potok, is the U.S. Department of Justice's "Hate Crimes Reported by Victims and Police" publication, which was released in Nov. 2005.

In contrast to the FBI's report, the Justice Department found that between 2000 and 2003 there was an annual average of 191,000 hate crime incidents nationally involving one or more victims.

DOJ_NMG_0084268

The Justice Department's survey shows "a serious social problem," Potok said.

Thirty-two jurisdictions from Alabama submitted information to the FBI; these agencies represent a population of about 455,247. The state population is nearly 4.5 million.

Citronelle, Atmore, the University of South Alabama and Loxley were the only southwest Alabama police agencies that reported, according to the FBI. All those agencies reported zero hate crimes. The Mobile Police Department, the Prichard Police Department, the Mobile County Sheriff's Office and the Baldwin County Sheriff's Office did not participate in the study, the statistics show. Participation is voluntary, according to the FBI.

Potok said the difference between the Justice Department and FBI numbers shows the "ludicrous" nature of the FBI's report.

"I'm not attacking the FBI," he said. The FBI is only reporting what is reported to it.

Potok said the FBI study's numbers fall short for a variety of reasons.

Many hate crimes are never reported to the police, he said. Some district attorneys will not prosecute under the enhanced penalties for hate crimes, so police do not bother to investigate whether race, sex, sexual orientation or religion were the motive for the crimes, Potok said.

Many law enforcement personnel do not agree with the idea of hate crimes. To them, murder is murder and all crimes are hate crimes, Potok said.

Some local law enforcement officials said they did not report to the FBI because they did not believe they had any hate crimes to report.

Hate crimes are "something that we obviously monitor," said John Murphy, spokesman for the Baldwin County Sheriff's Office. "We've been fortunate in Baldwin County not to have any."

In Mobile, police spokesman Officer Eric Gallichant said, "We did not report because we did not have any in that reporting period."

Kate Johnson, the spokeswoman for the Mobile County Sheriff's Office, said that the sheriff's department does not know of any hate crimes last year in the county. She said, however, under the new administration of Sheriff Sam Cochran, who was appointed to the post this year, the department will participate in the study.

Citronelle police Chief Conrad Reid said that he submitted the report because the FBI needs to know where hate crimes are and are not occurring so that it can provide extra support where needed.

"Any agency that asks me for something like that, I try to do it," he said.

Reid said he cannot recall Citronelle ever having had a hate crime, but he noted that the hate crime designation has existed only since 1994 when Alabama passed a law mandating longer minimum sentences for crimes committed because of a victim's race, color, religion, national origin, ethnicity, or physical or mental disability. The Alabama law does not include sexual orientation.

For the 2004 FBI report, Alabama law enforcement agencies submitted three hate crimes to the FBI. One of them occurred in Atmore, the report showed. A call for the Atmore police chief was not returned. Other instances of Alabama hate crimes occurred in Jefferson County and in the city of Greensboro in Hale County.

U.S. Asked To Watch Election In Chesterfield (RTD)

By Tyler Whitley, TIMES-DISPATCH STAFF WRITER

Richmond Times-Dispatch, October 21, 2006

The American Civil Liberties Union of Virginia asked the U.S. Justice Department yesterday to send election observers to Chesterfield County on Election Day. The ACLU claims the county's actions could discourage minority voters.

Kent Willis, director of the ACLU, cited four incidents over the past two years, including a new allegation that the registrar, Lawrence C. Haake III, refused to issue an absentee ballot to a registered voter because the prospective voter would not give his Social Security number.

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the department has received the letter from Willis. It does not disclose which localities it will monitor until 24 hours before an election, she said.

Haake said he believes he is following the law.

But the State Board of Elections yesterday said Social Security numbers are not required. It said the Chesterfield Electoral Board, which supervises the registrar, should meet as soon as possible to consider the matter.

In a news release explaining his letter to John Tanner, chief of the Justice Department's Voting Rights Section, Willis said, "Chesterfield seems to be Virginia's No. 1 trouble spot for irregular voting procedures."

DOJ_NMG_0084269

He cited Election Day practices two years ago that the ACLU said disproportionately affected minority voters, such as the registrar asking for armed guards at the polling places. Haake said that because of heavy voting, he just wanted to maintain order.

Willis also said that in the same presidential election, county election officials misinformed voters that they must show identification to vote. If voters don't have identification, they are allowed to cast a provisional ballot after signing an affidavit that they are who they say they are.

Last year Haake refused to count provisional ballots submitted by people who had registered on time but whose applications were not processed in a timely manner.

Haake said he disagrees with the State Board of Election's interpretation of the law on Social Security numbers.

"The state board deals in abstract concepts, and we deal in realities," he said.

Contact staff writer Tyler Whitley at twhitley@timesdispatch.com or (804) 649-6780.

Citing Minority Voting Concerns, ACLU Seeks U.S. Poll Observers (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, October 21, 2006

CHESTERFIELD, Va. -- The Virginia chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union is asking federal officials to monitor the Nov. 7 elections in Chesterfield County because of what the ACLU called a pattern of minority voter intimidation.

"My request stems from several recent incidents in Chesterfield, indicating that officials there may implement voting procedures that will have an adverse impact on minority voters," the ACLU's Kent Willis wrote to John Tanner, chief of voting rights for the U.S. Justice Department. The letter was sent Friday.

Willis cited several actions since 2004: --In October 2004, the county's general registrar, Lawrence Haake III, announced plans for security reasons to place armed guards at every polling precinct, a tactic Willis said was used in the past to intimidate black voters. --In November 2004, ACLU officials received complaints that county poll workers were restricting voters lacking identification. Willis said Virginia law allows voters to cast ballots without identification, provided they sign an affirmation of identity. --Requiring absentee voters to provide Social Security numbers. The State Board of Elections has said registrars can ask for Social Security numbers, but they cannot deny a ballot. --Refusing to count provisional ballots of voters who registered through the state Department of Motor Vehicles prior to registration deadlines, but whose applications had not been forwarded to the registrar.

"Chesterfield seems to be Virginia's number one trouble spot for irregular voting procedures," Willis said Friday of the suburban Richmond county. "The Justice Department ought to be present on Election Day in Chesterfield to ensure that racially fair procedures are in place."

Haake called the claims baseless and insisted he has followed state laws.

"We actually worked with the (U.S.) Department of Justice over the summer in a training program," he said.

"Federal observers can come or not, it doesn't matter," Haake said. "Everything we've done is consistent with the law."

Arizona May Use Voter-ID Law, High Court Says (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled yesterday that Arizona may enforce a new state law requiring voters to show a photo identification card at the polls on Election Day this year, despite a pending lawsuit by opponents who say the measure will disenfranchise the poor, minorities and the elderly.

In its unanimous five-page ruling, the court did not decide whether the Arizona law was constitutional. Rather, it overturned a federal appeals court in San Francisco that would have blocked enforcement of the law until the opponents' suit could be decided.

That would take too long, the court said, noting that, "in view of the impending election," Arizona needed "clear guidance."

The actual impact of the Arizona law, which was approved in a statewide referendum two years ago but has not yet been applied, was still too unclear to justify changing the state's plans so close to Nov. 7, the justices said.

Most states permit voters to present alternative forms of identification such as a bank statement or utility bill.

But Arizona, which borders Mexico and has seen a surge in migration in recent years, is one of several states that have recently enacted a photo-ID requirement in response to reports that illegal immigrants and other ineligible voters have been casting ballots.

DOJ_NMG_0084270

The Arizona law requires voters not only to present proof of citizenship when they register but also to present a photo ID when they go to the polls. Those without a photo ID may cast a provisional ballot, but their votes do not count unless they can produce a valid identification card within five days.

Similar statutes in Georgia and Missouri have been struck down in court. An Indiana law was upheld, but a federal appeals court in Chicago is currently considering an appeal by opponents.

The Republican-controlled House recently approved the Federal Election Integrity Act, which requires voters in federal elections to present a photo ID at the polls. It also requires states to make such an ID available free of charge.

Because of the various lower-court cases, the Supreme Court may soon have to rule on the constitutionality of the photo-ID requirements.

The justices emphasized the limited scope of their decision yesterday. There are good arguments both for and against the Arizona law, the court said, but "we express no opinion here on the . . . ultimate resolution of these cases."

Opponents say that the ID requirement imposes an extra burden on minorities, the poor and the elderly, who are less likely than other citizens to have a driver's license, the most common form of state-issued photo ID. Opponents say that because states charge fees for photo IDs, requiring one to vote is tantamount to an unconstitutional poll tax.

Supreme Court Allows Arizona To Use New Voter-ID Procedure (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 20 — The Supreme Court ruled unanimously late Friday that Arizona could put its new voter-identification rules into effect for the Nov. 7 election while challenges to those rules proceed in the lower federal courts.

In an unsigned opinion, the court granted Arizona's request to overturn an injunction issued this month by a two-judge federal appeals panel. The judges, A. Wallace Tashima and William A. Fletcher of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, had acted at the request of a group of Arizona Indian tribes, the League of Women Voters and other groups who have joined to challenge the constitutionality of the rules.

The Supreme Court opinion made clear that it was not ruling on the merits of the case, in which the plaintiffs contend that Proposition 200, adopted by Arizona voters in 2004, places an unconstitutional burden on members of minorities and others who do not have ready access to the forms of identification required to register and to vote.

Justice John Paul Stevens filed a one-paragraph concurring opinion that offered an explanation for the court's action. "Allowing the election to proceed without enjoining the statutory provisions at issue will provide the courts with a better record on which to judge their constitutionality," Justice Stevens said.

The opinion criticized the appeals court judges for not providing "any factual findings or indeed any reasoning" in their four-sentence order granting the injunction, which had previously been denied by the federal district court in Phoenix.

Proposition 200 requires proof of citizenship before a person can register to vote. To receive a ballot at the polls, a voter must present a single form of photo identification or two forms of identification with the voter's name and address like a bank statement or utility bill.

Voters without proper identification can cast provisional ballots and provide identification within five days. No identification beyond a signature is required for those who cast an "early ballot."

Court: Ariz. Can Seek Photo ID For Vote (AP-Y)

By Mark Sherman

AP, October 21, 2006

The Supreme Court ruled Friday that Arizona may require voters to provide photo IDs when they cast their ballots next month.

The justices cautioned that they were not issuing a ruling on the constitutionality of Arizona's law. "As we have noted, the facts in these cases are hotly contested," the court said in an unsigned five-page order.

The ruling merely allows the Nov. 7 election to proceed with the photo ID law in place. Federal courts still will have to resolve a lawsuit contending that the law will disenfranchise numerous voters, particularly the elderly and minorities.

"This decision eliminates all confusion about what rules will be followed for the Nov. 7 general election," Arizona Attorney General Terry Goddard said.

Courts in Georgia and Missouri have blocked similar laws.

Justice John Paul Stevens, in a brief concurring opinion, said the high court's action makes it more likely that the constitutional issues "will be resolved correctly on the basis of historical facts rather than speculation."

DOJ_NMG_0084271

The law requires voters to prove citizenship when registering to vote and to show photo IDs when they go to the polls. The law was meant to make sure illegal immigrants weren't casting ballots.

Opponents of the law contend it discourages some people from voting, including the elderly, poor and disadvantaged who don't always carry IDs. Nina Perales, an attorney for the Mexican American Legal Defense and Educational Fund, said the ruling "means many voters will be turned away from the polls on election day" because they lack the required ID.

Arizona residents, Indian tribes and community groups filed suit in May.

A federal judge ruled the state could enforce the law. But the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals later blocked it from taking effect for the Nov. 7 election.

In his bid to allow the state to go forward, Goddard told the justices that "voter registration at the polls is an emerging issue of national importance. States have a compelling interest in curbing fraud and protecting the integrity of elections."

Voters without proper ID may cast provisional ballots and furnish identification within five business days of the election.

Lacking photo identification, voters still can cast ballots during the state's early voting period. State officials said there is ample time to compare signatures on the ballot with those on registration rolls.

___

Associated Press writer Paul Davenport in Phoenix contributed to this report.

High Court Allows Arizona To Enact New Voter ID Law (LAT)

By David G. Savage, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

The ruling reverses one by the 9th Circuit. It is expected to benefit Republicans at the polls.

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court cleared the way Friday for Arizona to enforce a new rule for next month's election that requires most voters to show proof of identification before casting a ballot.

In an unsigned and apparently unanimous opinion, the justices reversed a ruling by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco that had blocked the Arizona law from taking effect this year.

The justices emphasized that they were not ruling on the still-pending constitutional challenge to the law. They also noted that the law included some exceptions for eligible voters without photo identification.

Nonetheless, Friday's order is likely to be seen as a benefit for Republican candidates and a setback for Democrats.

In recent years, Republicans in Congress and in many state capitals have pressed for voter-identification requirements at the ballot box. They say these rules are needed to combat fraudulent voting.

These laws have been opposed by Democrats and civil rights advocates. They say that there is little evidence of such fraud and that the requirements are designed to suppress voting by poor, elderly, disabled or minority persons who do not have a government-issued photo identification, such as a driver's license.

Courts in recent weeks have blocked new voter ID laws in Georgia and Missouri. A challenge to an Indiana law is before an appeals court.

The Arizona measure was approved in 2004 by 56% of the vote as part of Proposition 200. Most of the controversy over this initiative involved its provisions for cutting off public benefits to immigrants.

Under Arizona's law, eligible voters who do not have the required identification may vote as many as five days before election day. This gives election officials time to match their signatures with voter rolls. Voters without identification may cast a provisional ballot on election day, but their vote will be counted only if they furnish the required identification within five days.

In May, the American Civil Liberties Union, the League of Women Voters and several other civil rights groups sued to block the voter identification rule from being enforced Nov. 7. They called the rule a "21st century poll tax" because it could force some poor voters to purchase photo ID cards. Some voting rights experts also said this requirement could significantly depress voting by the state's Navajos.

A federal judge refused to block the law from taking effect, but on Oct. 5, a two-judge panel of the 9th Circuit issued an order saying the law could not be enforced for the upcoming election. The appeals court did not explain its ruling.

Arizona's attorney general asked the Supreme Court to intervene. And on Friday afternoon, the high court issued a six-page opinion that set aside the 9th Circuit's order. It noted that the 9th Circuit's "bare order" did not give a good reason for blocking the law from taking effect.

The court, however, said its decision was not intended to express an opinion on the outcome of the case, which must still be argued.

The opinion cites arguments on both sides. A state has "a compelling interest in preserving the integrity of its election process," the court said. At the same time, it noted that the "possibility that qualified voters might be turned away" required careful consideration of a challenge to the law.

DOJ_NMG_0084272

david.savage@latimes.com

ANTITRUST:

Groups Balk Over Buyout (AP)

By John Dunbar

AP, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON - Consumer groups say concessions offered by AT&T Inc. as it seeks government approval of its buyout of BellSouth Corp. fall far short of what's needed for the deal to be in the public interest.

The Justice Department has signed off on the deal, but the Federal Communications Commission has not voted on it.

AT&T contends it has offered a full range of accommodations, including $10-a-month Internet access, free modems, promises to temporarily freeze prices for competitors that use the company's networks and even a program to return to the United States some jobs that were shipped overseas.

Gene Kimmelman, vice president of federal and international affairs for Consumers Union, the publisher of Consumer Reports magazine, described AT&T's conditions as "things they think make them look good" and part of a marketing strategy rather than a sincere effort to preserve competition.

Opponents of the deal, whose views often closely track those of the commission's two Democrats who managed to delay a planned FCC vote, would like to see AT&T beef up its offer in three main areas:

· Stronger assurances by the company that it will not discriminate against certain kinds of Internet traffic, a concept known as "network neutrality."

· Offer "naked DSL," or stand-alone digital subscriber line service, that is priced competitively.

· Lower prices for "special access" customers -- service offered to capacity-hungry customers, such as large businesses and Internet service providers, that guarantee a dedicated high-capacity link to distribute voice and data.

Robert Quinn Jr., AT&T's vice president for federal regulatory affairs, briefed reporters Friday to defend his company's offer in advance of a Tuesday deadline for comment. He said AT&T has put a "full slate of conditions on the table" tailored to satisfy the public interest.

He pointed to two major benefits of the BellSouth buyout: greater availability of low-priced high-speed Internet access to customers in the AT&T-BellSouth service area, and the future benefits of video services for BellSouth customers to compete with the cable industry.

The deal would unite AT&T, which dominates much of California, Texas and the Midwest, with BellSouth, whose home base is in Atlanta and provides local phone and Internet access to the Carolinas, Florida, Georgia and Louisiana.

A vote is expected at a commission meeting on Nov. 3, though it does not appear that AT&T and consumer groups agree on the three major issues.

On network neutrality, AT&T says it has promised to adhere to a set of FCC principles that bar discrimination in the handling of Internet traffic.

On "naked DSL," Quinn said the company doesn't want to make guarantees about pricing that might hurt it competitively.

AT&T also says its rates for special-access customers are competitive and have even dropped in some areas.

AT&T To Fight Calls To Jettison Airwaves (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

They will be used to carry wireless high-speed Internet service.

AT&T Inc. will fight calls by opponents of its $81 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. to divest airwaves intended for wireless high-speed Internet service, a company lobbyist said.

AT&T, the biggest U.S. telephone company, plans to use the airwaves for emerging "WiMax" broadband services, Senior Vice President Robert Quinn said Friday.

"Mobility is a feature that people are going to want to have," Quinn said. "We have every incentive in the world to utilize that spectrum."

Clearwire Corp., a wireless Internet service provider founded by mobile-phone pioneer Craig McCaw, is among the companies urging the U.S. Federal Communications Commission to force AT&T to sell WiMax spectrum that it would gain through the BellSouth deal. Without divestitures, the combined company could thwart independent carriers seeking to offer nationwide advanced broadband service, Clearwire told the FCC in an Oct. 18 letter.

DOJ_NMG_0084273

Spectrum divestitures weren't among the conditions that San Antonio-based AT&T proposed last week in an effort to persuade at least three of the FCC's five members to support the BellSouth purchase.

"The commitments we put on the table were basically to expand the WiMax trials that we have," Quinn said. "We can't both divest spectrum and expand our offerings in those markets."

FCC approval is the last regulatory hurdle AT&T must surmount to finish the transaction. The Justice Department and 18 states have cleared the deal without conditions.

Judge: Petco Vote Can Go Ahead (SDUT)

By Frank Green, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 21, 2006

Dissident shareholders fail to stop meeting

A judge declined yesterday to block a Monday meeting at which Petco shareholders will vote on the proposed sale of the company to two private investment firms.

Attorneys representing dissident shareholders had wanted a temporary injunction halting the meeting so that shareholders could, among other remedies, be provided with additional information on how the company's board chose Leonard Green & Partners and Texas Pacific's $1.8 billion bid over a higher offer from PetSmart.

In turning down the injunction request, San Diego Superior Court Judge John S. Meyer said there was not enough time "to add some discrete information to the proxy" with Monday's meeting looming.

He added that he was not sure whether an injunction was appropriate. He voiced concern during the hearing about possible damage to Petco's stock price if there should be a delay in the vote.

Petco shares rose a penny yesterday to close at $28.84 on the Nasdaq.

The San Diego-based pet supplies firm, which has more than 800 stores, announced July 14 that it had a $1.8 billion stock and assumed debt deal with Leonard Green and Texas Pacific, which had previously owned Petco.

Petco would be bought for $29 a share – a 49 percent premium over the trading price of $19.45 a share the day before the announcement. The two private equity firms plan to make Petco a private company.

During the negotiating process, Petco's board passed on a $33-a-share offer by rival Pet-Smart, which has about 860 stores, because of what Petco said were concerns that antitrust questions could delay a deal indefinitely.

Darren Robbins, a partner in the law firm of Lerach Coughlin Stoia Geller Rudman & Robbins representing shareholders, expressed disappointment in the judge's decision to allow the shareholders' meeting to go forward.

He said that the class-action lawsuit brought by his clients against Petco's directors and executives in July would proceed. It seeks between $300 million and $400 million in damages from the company, claiming that Petco's board and management were unduly influenced in their decision by their close ties to Leonard Green and Texas Pacific. A trial date has not yet been set.

Some Petco directors and executives have been with the company for many years, and several were on hand when the two private equity firms spent $600 million to acquire Petco stock in October 2000 to take the com pany private. Petco said in its proxy statement that it anticipated its current managers would hold similar positions following the sale.

Analysts expect shareholders to overwhelmingly approve Petco's sale to the two firms. The meeting is scheduled for 10 a.m. Monday at Homewood Suites by Hilton, 11025 Vista Sorrento Parkway, San Diego.

"I don't see any point in shareholders voting this down," said Joan Storms, an analyst who covers Petco for Wedbush Morgan Securities in Los Angeles.

After taking Petco private, Leonard Green and Texas Pacific are likely to pare costs as they prepare the firm for a possible sale or a new public offering in the next several years, analysts said.

The deal is being financed largely by debt that Petco will repay, so it will need to maintain a strong cash flow to make the payments, added analysts.

In a typical leveraged buyout, the buyer "sees some asset that is undervalued," said Paul Kedrosky, executive director of the von Liebig Center for Entrepreneurism and Technology Advancement at the University of California San Diego. "They aren't buying the company because it's efficiently run."

Regions, AmSouth Merger Wins Fed Approval (HT)

By Wayne Smith, Times Business Editor Wayne.smith@htimes.com

The Huntsville Times (AL), October 21, 2006

$10 billion deal expected to close in early November

Regions Financial Corp. and AmSouth Bancorp. said late Friday that the Federal Reserve Board has approved their planned merger.

The announcement came one day after AmSouth said it had reached an agreement with federal regulators to sell 52 branches in Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee. That agreement resolved antitrust concerns raised by the Department of Justice after the two Birmingham-based banks said last spring they planned to merge.

The offices for sale include five in Madison County, one in Decatur and one in Fayetteville, Tenn.

"We are pleased we have received the key regulatory approvals required for this merger and expect to complete the transaction in early November," Jackson W. Moore, Regions chairman, president and CEO, said in a prepared statement. "This moves us one step closer to creating a top regional financial services provider."

The combined bank will keep the Regions name. Moore will serve as chairman of the new Regions.

AmSouth and Regions announced plans in May to merge, and shareholders of both companies approved the $10 billion deal earlier this month.

The combination will create a bank holding company with more than $140 billion in assets, about $100 billion in deposits and nearly 2,000 branches in 16 states across the South, Midwest and Texas.

"Once we complete this merger, we can begin providing our customers with a wider range of products and services as well as more convenient locations," C. Dowd Ritter, chairman, president and CEO of AmSouth, said in a prepared statement. Ritter will serve as president and CEO of the new Regions.

Combined, the two companies employ about 37,000 people.

Officials have said as many as 10 percent of the employees of the combined bank, or some 3,700 workers, could lose their jobs.

Ripplewood Ponders Bid For Delphi (WSJ)

By Ianthe Jeanne Dugan

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

Offer for Auto-Parts Maker Could Surpass $10 Billion; Stallkamp Leads the Effort

Ripplewood Holdings LLC, a large New York-based buyout firm, is preparing a likely bid for Delphi Corp., the auto-parts giant that filed for bankruptcy protection last year, according to people familiar with the matter.

Ripplewood has examined the possibility of taking over the entire auto-parts maker, but a bid for just part of Delphi also is possible, these people said. The effort is being led by Thomas Stallkamp, a Ripplewood partner who formerly was president of Chrysler Corp.

A bid for all of Delphi likely would far surpass $10 billion, people involved in the discussions said. Delphi's enterprise value -- the value of all its stocks and bonds combined -- is estimated to total between $13 billion and $14 billion when it emerges from bankruptcy protection, according to stakeholders and officials who have been negotiating a restructuring for several months.

If Ripplewood makes a bid, it will join a short list of official contenders jockeying for stakes in Delphi. Appaloosa Management, a hedge fund that owns more than 9% of Delphi, has proposed pumping in several billion dollars in a deal that would give that firm more than a third of Delphi's stock after it emerges from bankruptcy. Also jockeying for a significant stake is Cerberus Capital Management LP, a large private-equity firm. It is unclear whether these investors could work out a deal in which they coexist or if one investors' bid would put the others out of the running.

No deal is likely to come together before mid-November. Delphi has indicated it is trying to come to an agreement with unions and General Motors Corp. by Nov. 8 over proposals to cut costs. It is working closely in that effort with GM, Delphi's former parent. GM also has provided financial assistance to Delphi, which has offered buyouts and early-retirement incentives that have been accepted by about two-thirds of its workers. in offering buyout. It's unclear what full role GM may play in assessing any bids for Delphi.

Any proposal would have to be approved by Delphi's board, which is meeting in early November. The board would likely seek input from creditors, shareholders and union representatives, who have been negotiating for months over the framework for the company's restructuring. Any deal will also need approval of the bankruptcy court. Delphi has said it intends to emerge from bankruptcy protection by early 2007.

Write to Ianthe Jeanne Dugan at ianthe.dugan@wsj.com1

Tops Sale Of Stores To Rival Defended (CLPD)

By Janet H. Cho, Plain Dealer Reporter

The Cleveland Plain Dealer, October 21, 2006

Ohio groceries lacked viable buyer, official says

Tops Markets LLC insists there was never a financially viable offer to buy all 46 of its grocery stores in Northeast Ohio.

DOJ_NMG_0084275

John Barrett, a senior vice president for Tops Markets in Williamsville, N.Y., said if Tops had received what it considered a legitimate proposal to keep all its stores open and hire all 4,000-plus employees, it would have taken it.

"We have a responsibility to our employees and our landlords to sell the stores to someone who has a business plan, a track record" and financial backing to ensure the deal wouldn't fall through, Barrett said. "There was nobody who could do it, nobody who had a track record of operating even one store successfully."

Barrett's remarks came at a meeting Friday with U.S. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, who is raising antitrust questions about Tops' decision to sell 18 of the stores to its principal competitor, Giant Eagle Inc.

Kucinich said he knows of at least two groups that have offered to buy all 46 stores and honor existing union contracts. When he pulled out a letter dated Oct. 18 from a private equity fund, Retail Group Partners Inc. of Kennesaw, Ga., Barrett said that group submitted its bid 10 days after Tops announced the Giant Eagle deal.

Barrett also hand-delivered a letter to Kucinich from Max Henderson Jr., Tops' executive vice president and general manager, explaining Tops' decision to exit Northeast Ohio after years of declining sales.

Barrett said Tops was increasingly being squeezed between mass discounters like Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and local competitors such as Marc's Deeper Discount Stores, Aldi, Save-A-Lot and Heinen's Fine Foods.

"The competition will become even more fierce as Wal-Mart moves forward with its planned Supercenter expansion into the area," Henderson wrote, referring to Wal-Mart's planned opening next year at the Steelyard Commons shopping center under construction in Cleveland. "Tops suffered considerably from the competitive environment, which contributed to declining sales. This, coupled with extremely high labor costs, made it impossible for Tops to continue to be operated in the area, especially in light of the oncoming onslaught from non-union operators, like Wal-Mart."

Barrett said "legacy labor contracts" in the Cleveland market meant it paid higher labor costs here than in its other union markets in New York, Boston and Washington, D.C. He said Tops couldn't afford to keep offering premium wages and benefits and compete with supermarkets that pay much lower salaries, offer fewer benefits and no pensions.

Tops watched its market share shrink and its net sales decline "in the double digits" in Northeast Ohio to the point where it had no alternative but to withdraw from the market, Henderson said.

Although Henderson did not directly address Kucinich's antitrust charges, he said the agreement to sell 18 stores to Giant Eagle "ensured that customers will have excellent stores in which to shop; has protected good jobs for the vast majority of employees . . . and has contributed to the ongoing economic well-being of the communities where these stores are located."

Barrett said Tops has 1,770 employees in the 18 stores Giant Eagle is buying, and Giant Eagle plans to hire 2,300 people, including butchers and bakers. He said Giant Eagle has received more than 3,000 applications from Tops employees for those jobs.

Tops aims to sell the remaining 28 stores to buyers who will keep the businesses as supermarkets and hire Tops employees.

"We're close to some agreements to get more stores sold," Barrett said.

To reach this Plain Dealer reporter:

jcho@plaind.com, 216-999-5069

States Battle Weyerhaeuser Argument (OREG)

By Dylan Rivera, The Oregonian

The Oregonian, October 21, 2006

Competition - The U.S. Supreme Court will hear the timber giant's appeal for a tighter test on predatory bids

The U.S. Supreme Court will hear arguments next month about a ruling that Oregon and seven other states say is critical in stopping big companies from getting away with illegal monopolies in forest products, agriculture and high-tech goods.

Attorneys general from Oregon, California, Arizona, Iowa, Louisiana, Montana, West Virginia and Wisconsin recently submitted a court brief that comes down against an argument by Weyerhaeuser Co., the timber giant.

The case led to a $79 million judgment against Weyerhaeuser, prompting settlements and judgments totaling about another $50 million.

The states did not explicitly support a 2003 Portland federal jury verdict that found Weyerhaeuser had created an illegal monopoly in the market for alder sawlogs. But they wrote stridently against a tough new legal standard for antitrust plaintiffs that Weyerhaeuser is seeking. Rejection of Weyerhaeuser's argument and adoption of a more lenient one, the states wrote, could bar a single firm from dominating government timber auctions, protect small businesses and ensure competition for government contracts.

DOJ_NMG_0084276

"It's always significant when a government body, especially a major government body, signs on in support of a private plaintiff," said Jack Kirkwood, an antitrust expert at Seattle University School of Law who has consulted for the case's plaintiffs. "The states represent a public interest that the private plaintiff may not."

The states' chiming in raises the profile of a case that was fought mostly in obscurity until the last year or so. In part, it caught little attention because it dealt with alder, a native Northwest hardwood species used in musical instruments and furniture. It is not nearly as widespread as softwood lumber, such as Douglas fir, used in home construction.

It also mainly affects instances in which one competitor has at least 55 percent market share, one of many prerequisites for antitrust concern.

The case has caught national attention as a rare antitrust case to make it to the nation's highest court. As with all cases before the Supreme Court, the Weyerhaeuser case could set a precedent governing business competition nationwide.

Other elements, legal and political, add to the interest. It will be among the first major antitrust cases to be decided by a court that includes Chief Justice John Roberts and Justice Samuel Alito, and so could point to their position on antitrust issues.

The Weyerhaeuser case also presents questions about business conduct in competition for supplies, what economists call "inputs," for industrial processes. Antitrust cases more commonly turn on whether a large company unfairly reduced prices to undermine competitors, with the aim of controlling a market and, in the long term, using that power to increase prices.

The New York Times editorial board, in a critique of Bush administration antitrust enforcement last week, cited the alder log case.

"Not only has the government failed to bring many significant cases, it is opposing one brought and won by a third party," the newspaper wrote.

Trial in Portland

In a federal trial in 2003 in Portland, Ross-Simmons Hardwood Lumber Co. of Longview, Wash., alleged that Weyerhaeuser's Portland-based hardwoods division unfairly forced Ross-Simmons out of business.

Weyerhaeuser officials crafted exclusive contracts that guaranteed it could buy logs from some of the Northwest's largest landowners, causing log shortages for competitors, Ross-Simmons alleged. Weyerhaeuser bought alder sawlogs, even when it didn't need them, in some cases letting the logs rot rather than letting them to go to competitors, Ross-Simmons said.

The timber giant established a dominant presence in the market for alder logs, and plaintiffs say internal Weyerhaeuser documents showed a long-term plan to use that presence to force down the price it paid for logs.

Weyerhaeuser has denied all allegations in the lawsuit. It has settled cases that used the Ross-Simmons case as a precedent.

The issue before the Supreme Court pivots on how juries should decide when a dominant company's purchasing practices constitute illegal "predatory bidding."

Two-part test

The court has a well-established test for "predatory pricing," a more common illegal strategy in which companies offer products for below-cost prices to pressure competitors. In a 1993 case called Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., the Supreme Court established that plaintiffs in predatory-pricing cases must meet a two-part test: They must show that a monopolist lost money by reducing prices and that it was likely to recoup its losses later by increasing prices.

Weyerhaeuser's attorneys say the Brooke Group test should apply to predatory bidding. But in the Ross-Simmons trial, they wrote, Judge Owen Panner used an unduly vague subjective test, like "throwing a marshmallow" at a jury.

Panner asked the jury to decide whether Weyerhaeuser bought more logs than it "needed" and whether it paid a higher price than "necessary" to prevent competitors from obtaining logs "at a fair price."

"Under the Ninth Circuit's wholly subjective rule, it is impossible for businesses to know what pricing decisions conform with the law," Weyerhaeuser wrote. "Firms accordingly will be forced to curb aggressive -- and desirable -- competitive bidding for fear of triggering unwarranted liability; and baseless litigation will be encouraged."

Other factors

The states attorneys general and Ross-Simmons' attorneys say the jury weighed more than just those few phrases, looking at Weyerhaeuser's dominance in the alder log market and evidence that the company intended to force competitors out of business.

The Brooke Group test is unworkable, the states argue. Monopolists could use other subsidiaries to offset losses in a given market so that they would not need to operate at a loss.

And, the states ask, what if the higher input cost is relatively small as a percentage of the product cost? Under that scenario, monopolists still could make profits while paying a much higher price for the input. And, if the input is essential to production of the end product, the increased price could cut off competitors and push them out of business.

Such a test would be too difficult for small companies to meet, the states wrote.

"You have a standard that we contend is not workable and will produce a lot of false negatives," said Emilio Varanini, deputy attorney general for California. "It will let a lot of people off who should not be getting off."

Varanini and Tim Nord, assistant attorney general for Oregon, co-wrote the states' brief, submitted Oct. 12.

Dylan Rivera: 503-221-8532, dylanrivera@news.oregonian.com

Feds Accuse Avaya In Antitrust Lawsuit (AP)

By LINDA A. JOHNSON, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, October 21, 2006

Communications company to appear at Nov. 14 hearing

TRENTON -- Business communications systems provider Avaya is accused in a federal antitrust lawsuit of illegally blocking competitors from providing maintenance and repairs to telephone equipment and software sold by Avaya.

Continuant of Fife, Wash., which operates a telephone system maintenance business throughout North America, said Wednesday that it countersued Bernards-based Avaya after the AT&T spinoff sued Continuant this summer.

The two parties are scheduled to appear in federal court in Trenton, where the two lawsuits were filed, for a hearing Nov. 14.

Avaya spokeswoman Lynn Newman declined to discuss the case.

Continuant's lawsuit asks the court to permanently bar Avaya "from continuing its anti-competitive conduct," including bundling service contracts with the sales of its telephones, cables and other telecom equipment, and keeping secret from competitors passwords necessary for maintaining the communications systems. Continuant also is seeking compensatory and punitive damages, legal fees and other costs.

"Avaya's the only company that has a policy like this," said Bruce Shelby, Continuant's vice president of sales.

"They say a customer doesn't have the right to access their system to perform maintenance."

Shelby said his company believes that is illegal and that Avaya is overcharging its customers for maintenance when its service level has declined because of a series of major layoffs.

Avaya filed suit against Continuant and two sister companies on June 5, accusing them of misappropriating trade secrets, interfering with contractual relations, misrepresentation, libel and other offenses.

Avaya later amended its complaint, and Continuant filed a countersuit on Aug. 21, but did not announce it until Wednesday.

Like other telecommunication equipment makers, Avaya has been trying to boost the continuing revenues that come from maintaining communication systems, rather than relying heavily on one-time sales. The company has been struggling with rising costs, falling profits and a depressed share price, culminating with the replacement of its president and chief executive, Donald K. Peterson, in July.

Update: Vista Security Discussions Off To Bad Start (IDG)

By Robert McMillan, IDG News Service

IDG News Service, October 21, 2006

Technical glitch keeps key security rivals from joining first online discussion of contentious Vista kernel seccurity

Security vendors looking to gain insight into Microsoft's plans for opening up the Vista operating system kernel were frustrated Thursday morning when a technical glitch kept many from joining the first online discussion of this issue.

"Oops," wrote Microsoft Senior Product Manager Stephen Toulouse in a blog posting on the subject. "We had a glitch where we sent out a messed up link. ... We're very sorry about that, it certainly was not intentional and we definitely see that was not a good thing for people to experience on such an important topic."

Microsoft set up the meeting to talk about how it plans to give security vendors access to Vista's kernel on 64-bit systems. This has been a contentious issue, as Microsoft had initially planned to lock software vendors such as Symantec and McAfee out of the kernel, claiming that this would make Vista more secure. The security vendors said this would harm their products, and Microsoft finally capitulated, after first being warned by European Union regulators.

Microsoft rescheduled its Thursday morning Web conference after it realized it had sent out a bad LiveMeeting link to participants, but in the end some security vendors were shut out of the meeting.

Most of Symantec's team, for example, was unable to attend. "It turned out that everybody on our team was not able to make the first meeting but one guy," said Cris Paden, a Symantec spokesman.

Microsoft has set up a second meeting for later in the day Thursday to take questions from those who missed the first, Paden said. A further meeting is also planned for Monday, according to Toulouse.

DOJ_NMG_0084278

Late Thursday, McAfee said there was "little indication" that Microsoft planned to live up to its promise, made late last week, to work with security vendors on several issues relating to Vista. "We have been greatly disappointed by the lack of action by the company so far and Microsoft has not lived up, either in detail or in spirit, to the hollow assurances offered by their top management," said Christopher Thomas, McAfee's outside legal counsel in Brussels, in a statement. Thomas is a partner with the Lovells law firm.

Sunbelt Software President Alex Eckelberry said that the mix-up was due to an honest mistake with Microsoft's conferencing software. "Someone at Microsoft accidentally sent out the LiveMeeting presentation invites as "presenter," which if you've ever used LiveMeeting, is an invitation to chaos," he said in a blog posting. "Realizing their error, the meeting was rescheduled for 30 minutes later, and that didn't all come together, because the meeting had been originally setup to end at 12:30, [Eastern time] so we were promptly all kicked off."

"While I have my disagreements with Microsoft on the PatchGuard issue, I must defend them in this instance," he added. "It was a case of a few honest mistakes made by well-intentioned people, probably working under a tremendous amount of stress."

Microsoft has said it expects to make new kernel APIs (application programming interfaces) for security products available as part of the first major, "service pack," update to Vista. Security vendors are pushing to have them included sooner.

Microsoft Partners Fume Over Vista Security Stance (AP)

By Jordan Robertson

AP, October 21, 2006

Microsoft Corp. is no stranger to antitrust skirmishes and complaints from competitors about unfair business practices.

But the latest fight over its upcoming Vista operating system pits Microsoft against an unlikely adversary: the security software vendors who are some of its most intimate partners in protecting its notoriously vulnerable systems from attacks.

As Vista's planned release nears, the company is facing a backlash from such vendors as Symantec Corp. and McAfee Inc., which argue that even the concessions Microsoft recently made to appease European antitrust regulators won't do enough to help them best protect their customers.

"We've been talking to them for over two years on this issue," said Rowan Trollope, Symantec's vice president for consumer engineering. "And now (with) basically a very short amount of time before the operating system comes out, we're not in a good position to provide that security to our customers."

Ultimately, consumers will decide whether Microsoft's own security measures are adequate to combat increasingly sophisticated Internet threats and keep personal data safe from hackers and online criminals.

But the showdown also marks an important turning point in how computer users buy security software.

Microsoft now competes directly with Cupertino-based Symantec and Santa Clara-based McAfee with its own product, called OneCare, posing a substantial threat to vendors who have been vital to protecting generations of Microsoft operating systems.

European antitrust regulators have warned Microsoft not to shut out rivals in security software and other markets, and the European Union so far has fined the Redmond, Wash., company $970 million over the current flavor of Windows.

To quell EU concerns about Vista, Microsoft pledged to make key changes, but the vendors remain unsatisfied and have threatened antitrust lawsuits. McAfee issued a statement Thursday complaining of the company's failure to live up to "hollow assurances."

Industry analysts said Microsoft's new dual role could inadvertently make the operating system more vulnerable.

"Microsoft's priority should be simple: Fortify the operating system, make it secure, make it as impenetrable as possible, but work with the third parties," said Joe Wilcox, a senior analyst with Jupiter Research.

Vista will be Microsoft's first major upgrade to its flagship operating system since Windows XP's release in 2001. The company touts Vista's sleeker looks, improved search capabilities and simplified organization as key upgrades over previous systems.

But several key security changes prompted Symantec and McAfee officials to launch withering public attacks in recent weeks.

Executives accused Microsoft of unfairly promoting its own security software with a dashboard that couldn't be disabled by vendors. The company pledged technological information to turn off the feature, designed to help customers easily see what protections are switched on.

Vendors also howled over an icon on the welcome screen linking to Microsoft security products. Microsoft refused to remove the link but has vowed to link to other security companies.

DOJ_NMG_0084279

The biggest - and currently unresolved - fight hinges on vendors' claims they have been locked out of access to the core, or kernel, of higher-end, 64-bit versions of Vista.

A new feature called PatchGuard is meant to protect the most sensitive information in the guts of the system. While blocking out hackers, PatchGuard also keeps out security vendors that have traditionally been allowed inside to retrieve necessary information.

Vendors said their products will thus lack advanced security features for 64-bit users (The 32-bit version that consumers are likely to get does not include PatchGuard and thus offers access to the disputed data).

Microsoft said the methods previously used were undocumented and unsupported and left the system less secure and less stable. Customers, the company said, demand better security.

The company has agreed to permit limited kernel access, but will not provide a "blanket exception" or turn off the feature entirely, said Stephen Toulouse, a senior program manager in Microsoft's Security Technology Unit.

"We did look at that, but we got consistent feedback that that wouldn't be a good option for the customer," he said. "We want to make clear that we will work with those vendors. It will take some time, but we're committed to making that happen."

Microsoft held online briefings with security vendors on Thursday to address their concerns, though technical difficulties booted some vendors out.

Security vendors said their engineers are going to have to scramble to update their software once the technical tools they need become available, which could be months away.

Vista begins shipping to computer manufacturers and larger businesses next month. Consumers should be able to buy the new operating system in January.

"We're turning blue holding our breath waiting for something to happen," McAfee chief scientist George Heron said in an interview. "And frankly so are the users. This is the 11th hour. Now is not the time to crack open the designs."

In the meantime, third-party vendors said their products will work but won't have maximum protection. Microsoft said its products will adhere to the same rules and won't have an unfair advantage.

Security experts said it's unclear whether Microsoft's stance on protecting the kernel will make Windows more secure, though it will likely challenge hackers to try to crack it.

"No matter how secure any operating system is, if it has been built by man, it can be broken by man," said Ken Dunham, director of the rapid response team at VeriSign Inc.'s iDefense Intelligence. "While it might be a major improvement, there is no silver bullet."

Vendors said customers are likely to agree.

"It's a little bit like the fox guarding the hen house," Symantec's Trollope said. "If Microsoft can control the ways that companies can innovate, if they can control the dialogue of security with the customer, you end up with a security monoculture. And that's unacceptable."

Gartner: Vista Antitrust Tweaks To Take Years (CNET)

By Joris Evers, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, October 21, 2006

Analyst firm says changes to the 64-bit version of the OS update could also cause compatibility trouble in the interim.

Antitrust related changes to security in Windows Vista 64-bit will take years to complete and will cause compatibility trouble in the interim, according to Gartner.

Users of security technologies such as host intrusion-prevention systems, or HIPS, should postpone buying 64-bit versions of Vista, Gartner analyst Neil MacDonald wrote in a research note published on Wednesday. MacDonald also noted that many integrated security products today include HIPS functionality.

"Recognize that many of these products will not deliver full functionality using 64-bit Vista," MacDonald wrote. "Do not plan for initial use of 64-bit Vista if you are using incompatible products for which no suitable alternative exists." People should ask their security vendor for Vista compatibility guarantees, he suggested.

In response to antitrust concerns from the European Commission, Microsoft last week said third-party security software will be able to interact with the kernel of 64-bit versions of Vista. Security companies had requested that capability, but Microsoft had denied it until it capitulated under pressure from regulators.

Security companies now have unfettered access to the core of 32-bit versions of Windows. But they complained that a kernel shield called PatchGuard in 64-bit versions of Vista, which is intended to stop hackers, blocks security products, too. 64-bit Windows is expected to eventually supplant 32-bit versions.

While Microsoft has promised to give its security rivals controlled access to the Vista kernel, the programming interfaces to do so still need to be developed.

"Our goal is to provide an initial set of documented, supported kernel interfaces in the Windows Vista SP1 (Service Pack 1) timeframe, recognizing that this will require collaboration from our industry partners," Ben Fathi, the outgoing corporate vice president of Microsoft's Security Technology Unit said in a statement late Thursday.

Gartner expects SP1 to be released in early 2008 and predicts that more programming interfaces related to the kernel will be delivered with SP2 or later. All these changes could have a negative effect on Vista, MacDonald wrote.

"Any kernel changes may have a 'ripple effect' up the software stack and will require retesting of all of Windows Vista applications," he wrote.

The timing is much to the dismay of some security companies, including McAfee. "Microsoft has not lived up, either in detail or in spirit, to the hollow assurances offered by their top management last week," Christopher Thomas, a partner at McAfee's Brussels-based law firm Lovells, said in a statement Thursday. Vista is scheduled for release to manufacturers in November and for sale to the public in January.

Access to the Vista kernel is one of two concessions Microsoft made. The Redmond, Wash., software giant has already provided security companies with a way to disable alerts sent out by the Windows Security Center, if their third-party protective software is installed.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Sunny Side Up (NYT)

By Claudia H. Deutsch

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

General Motors liked the idea of using the sun to power its buildings. But until recently, one immutable economic fact held G.M. back: The upfront costs were simply too high to justify the ultimate payoff.

G.M. is not alone. Even solar energy's biggest fans concede that the high investment costs have kept companies from pursuing what is arguably the cleanest, most renewable and least politically sensitive energy source around.

But now, G.M. and a small but growing number of other companies and municipalities are getting solar energy from systems installed by others. Even though the installations are right on their own roofs, they buy the electricity much as they would from a utility's grid. And because the companies that paid for the systems will get a steady income, they can provide power from the sun at competitive electricity rates.

Since June, the roof of G.M.'s parts warehouse in Cucamonga, Calif., has been host to a photovoltaic array with the ability to generate as much as 1.5 million kilowatt hours of electricity a year. The installation, which G.M. expects will provide half of the building's electricity, cost G.M. nothing.

A solar developer called Developing Energy Efficient Roof Systems — commonly called Deers — bought the equipment with money it raised from private financiers. Deers and its investors own the cells; G.M. signed a long-term contract to purchase the solar-generated electricity from them, at a discount to the prevailing rate for electricity in the region.

These days, that rate is 9 cents to 10 cents a kilowatt hour; G.M. expects that the solar system will reduce its overall electricity costs by 10 percent a year.

"We assume the risk, because we know that companies like G.M. have budgets to buy electricity, not to spend millions of dollars generating it," said Jack P. DeLiddo, president of Deers.

G.M. is already negotiating with Deers to put a similar solar array on a warehouse in nearby Fontana. "The savings are small, but it's exciting to create such an environmentally sound project without any need to shell out capital," said Kamesh Gupta, manager of planning and programs for General Motors Energy and Utility Services, which purchases all the energy used by G.M.

Similar deals are cropping up elsewhere. Some specify that the users pay the solar developers a fixed rate for electricity, while others specify a fixed discount to the going rate.

Other factors are involved as well. The parties generally negotiate who will retain potential credits for reducing carbon emissions. When the developers and their backers keep the carbon abatement credits, they generally plan to sell them to companies that might otherwise have trouble complying with rules planned in California and expected elsewhere aimed at limiting global warming.

The electricity users could do that, too, but some of them might also use the credits to offset emissions from other parts of their operations.

But the same logic underpins all of the deals: The electricity users get a clean, reliable source of energy. The developers and their backers get an equally reliable return on their investment — which can be as high as $6,000 per kilowatt hour of capacity — as well as the tax credits and rebates that California and other states offer for renewable energy projects.

DOJ_NMG_0084281

"Corporations like solar energy, but they would rather make sizable investments in their core businesses," said Craig Hanson, head of the Green Power Market Development Group, a consortium of large companies working under the auspices of the World Resources Institute to promote renewable energy. "But for the financiers, it's like buying the bond of a triple-A-rated company. It may not offer a 20 percent return, but it's a stable and secure investment."

The "solar services model," as Mr. Hanson calls the solar contracts, is drawing interest from a diverse group of companies and financiers.

Alcoa is negotiating with developers to put solar cells on a manufacturing plant, although it will not specify details. General Electric Energy Financial Services has installed solar roofs that provide half the electricity used by 23 San Diego schools.

Kevin Walsh, the G.E. unit's manager for renewable energy, said the company was installing another seven. "For a financier like us, it's a nice, steady stream of revenue with the risk virtually eliminated," Mr. Walsh said. His unit, he said, is negotiating with a "big box retailer" to install solar roofs on some of its stores.

Retailers, which normally operate with the kind of razor-thin margins that cannot support large capital investments on anything but the core business, have been particularly receptive to the solar services model.

Whole Foods Market, in a deal with SunEdison, a solar project manager financed by a group of investors that includes Goldman Sachs, has solar cells providing about 10 percent of the energy it uses in three stores and one warehouse, and plans many more. "There's just no downside," said Jennifer McDonnell, green mission specialist for Whole Foods.

Staples, which has two distribution centers in California that derive about 15 percent of their electricity from 280 kilowatt solar arrays installed by SunEdison, also plans new ones. It recently put a 120 kilowatt system on an office building in Englewood, N.J., and is planning a large solar array for a distribution center in Killingly, Conn.

Mark Buckley, vice president for environmental affairs, said he had identified 140 stores that seemed to be prime candidates for similar installations.

"We are a frugal business with low margins, so we cannot justify the cost of a solar system," he said. "This way, we've got no capital investment, no operating expenses, and we're lowering our energy costs even as we reduce our carbon emissions. This is a true win-win."

That does not mean the deals are free of risk. They are not feasible in locations where the sun does not shine consistently through the year, or in states that do not offer tax incentives and rebates.

The economics do not work for the many industrial companies that have negotiated below-market electricity rates. Users must commit to buying a set amount of energy for at least 10 years.

Older buildings often have aged roofs that cannot support conventional photovoltaic cells (although Mr. Walsh of G.E. Energy Financial Services said his group used a technology that embedded the photovoltaic cells in a new, and removable, roof).

Companies must also persuade their own managements — or in the case of leased buildings, their landlords — to allow the installations. And, of course, the economics only make sense to people who think that prices for conventional energy will keep rising.

"We have an incentive to make sure the systems work well, because that's how we make our money," said Jigar Shah, who founded SunEdison in 2003 and is generally thought to have pioneered the solar services model. "But let's face it, we are putting a hole in their roof, so they have to trust we can do it properly. And if you think electricity rates will go down, these long-term contracts don't look good."

But few economists are predicting that electricity rates will plummet. And, even if they do, solar energy would still appeal to companies worried about carbon emissions and looking at ways to improve their public image.

"The energy is clean, and the fixed-price agreement doesn't fluctuate," Ms. McDonnell of Whole Foods said. "Seeing whether solar would work is now on our check list for every one of our new stores."

Future Forecast: Extreme Weather (WP/AP)

By Seth Borenstein

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

The world -- especially the Western United States, the Mediterranean region and Brazil -- is likely to suffer more extended droughts, heavy rainfalls and longer heat waves over the next century because of global warming, a new study forecasts.

But the prediction of a future of nasty extreme weather also includes fewer freezes and a longer growing season.

In a preview of a major international multiyear report on climate change that comes out next year, a study from the National Center for Atmospheric Research details what nine of the world's top computer models predict for the lurching of climate at its most extreme.

"It's going to be a wild ride, especially for specific regions," said the study's lead author, Claudia Tebaldi, a scientist at the federally funded academic research center.

DOJ_NMG_0084282

Tebaldi pointed to the Western United States, Mediterranean nations and Brazil as "hot spots" that will get extremes at their worst, according to the computer models.

Some places, such as the Pacific Northwest, are predicted to get a strange double whammy of longer dry spells punctuated by heavier rainfall.

As the world warms, there is likely to be more rain in the tropical Pacific Ocean, and that will change the airflow for certain areas, in much the same way that El NiÃ±o weather oscillations now do, said the study's co-author, Gerald Meehl, a top computer modeler at the research center. Those changes will affect the Western United States, Australia and Brazil, even though it's on South America's eastern coast.

For the Mediterranean, the issue has more to do with rainfall in the tropical Atlantic Ocean changing air currents, he said.

"Extreme events are the kinds of things that have the biggest impacts, not only on humans but on mammals and ecosystems," Meehl said. The study, to be published in the December issue of the peer-reviewed journal Climatic Change, "gives us stronger and more compelling evidence that these changes in extremes are more likely," he said.

The researchers took 10 international agreed-upon indexes that measure climate extremes -- five that deal with temperature and five with precipitation -- and ran computer models for the world through 2099. What Tebaldi called the scariest results had to do with heat waves and warm nights. Everything about heat waves -- their intensity, length and occurrence -- worsens.

"The changes are very significant there," Tebaldi said. "It's enough to say we're in for a bad future."

The Population Boon (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

"How will we house the next hundred million Americans? . . . How will we educate and employ such a large number of people? How will we provide adequate health care when our population reaches 300 million?"

-- President Richard Nixon, 1969

President Nixon didn't live to see his questions answered, but this week the U.S. population surpassed the 300 million mark. And surprisingly, given the tenor of the reaction to the last hectomillion milestone, reached in 1967, the 300 millionth American was not greeted with the same wailing and gnashing of teeth as the 200 millionth. Call it progress.

Around the time the country's population hit 200 million, biologist Paul Ehrlich, always good for a bit of doom and gloom, compared "America's pride in her growing population . . . to a cancer patient's pride in his expanding tumor," according to Time magazine. Stewart Udall, a former Secretary of the Interior, thought 100 million sounded like a better number than 200 million. Messrs. Ehrlich and Udall are still among our 300 million, but their population bomb has conspicuously failed to explode, which may go some way toward explaining why, in the popular imagination at least, this week's milestone did not prompt widespread anxiety about the future.

HOT TOPIC

The United States: 300 Million and Growing1

In Japan and Western Europe, population implosion has become the crisis of the moment. Birth rates in most Western European countries are now so low that governments are busily looking for ways to avoid a very different kind of demographic catastrophe. The problem posed by Europe's aging population is exacerbated by its reliance on intergenerational transfer payments to support its public pension systems; America, with both a greater emphasis on wealth accumulation and a higher birth rate, is comparatively better off. Demographics and Social Security are on a collision course here as well, but Europe's difficulties in this regard make America seem fortunate by comparison.

China, thanks to its draconian one-child policy, also faces a demographic challenge, embodied in the oft-heard refrain that the Middle Kingdom risks becoming the first country ever to grow old before it grows rich. Population-control measures have resulted in a shortage of women and girls, one of many unintended consequences of the population-control hysteria of the 1960s and 1970s.

At bottom, the debate over population revolves around a single question: Are human beings a burden, or a resource? The former view is embodied by the Ehrlich and Nixon quotes above. More bodies mean more mouths to feed, house and provide for. At a certain point, in this perspective, you run out of stuff.

The latter view holds that people don't just consume things. They make them too. More bodies mean more minds, more innovation, more dynamism and more progress. The history of the world as America went from 100 million or 200 million to 300 million lends a lot more support to the humans-as-resource view than the humans-as-burden view. In the middle of the last century, the fathers of the population-control school of thought warned darkly that when world population reached seven billion, the "carrying capacity" of the planet would be reached. Mass starvation and political upheaval would be the inevitable result. Well, we're getting right up there, but the bread lines are getting shorter, not longer.

DOJ_NMG_0084283

Simply put, the reason is prosperity. For decades, economic growth has easily outstripped population growth, giving the U.S., and much of the rest of the world, both more people and more prosperity, something presumed to be impossible by the Malthusians. Meanwhile, the slowdown in population growth brings a whole new set of challenges. To meet them, America and the world will need more minds generating new ideas. Four hundred million, here we come.

Court Limits U.S. Authority At Casinos (AP-Y)

By Erica Werner, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

The federal government can't make rules for the ways Las Vegas-style games are played at Indian casinos, an appeals court ruled Friday in a blow to efforts to regulate the booming, $22 billion tribal gambling industry.

The decision by a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit arises from a dispute in Arizona between the Colorado River Indian Tribes and the National Indian Gaming Commission, the federal agency that oversees Indian casinos.

The commission tried in 2001 to audit the tribe's casino in Parker, Ariz., to ensure compliance with recently enacted federal standards for how games like blackjack and slot machines are run. The tribe objected, contending the commission was overstepping its authority under the National Indian Gaming Regulatory Act.

A federal district court sided with the tribe, and the appeals court agreed in an 11-page ruling. While federal law gives the gaming commission some authority over games like lotto and bingo on Indian land, the big moneymakers like blackjack and slots — classified as "Class III" games — are outside the commission's jurisdiction, said the ruling written by Judge A. Raymond Randolph.

"What is the statutory basis empowering the commission to regulate Class III gaming operations?" the ruling asked. "Finding none, we affirm" the lower court's decision.

Tribes can open Las Vegas-style casinos only after they sign a "compact" with their state's governor, and the court asserted there was no federal role in regulating the game-playing.

Tribal gambling has grown explosively since Congress established the legal framework for it in 1988, and there are now more than 400 Indian gambling facilities operated by 223 Indian tribes in 28 states.

With the growth have come conflicts as tribes have asserted their sovereignty as independent governments. Local and state governments have sought to sketch out some authority, and the federal government increasingly has attempted to regulate aspects of Indian gambling from labor to slot machine standards.

The National Indian Gaming Association welcomed the ruling as a victory for tribal sovereignty.

"Today, the federal court of appeals told us what Indian tribes always knew — it is not the NIGCs job to establish federal regulations that override the sovereign decisions of tribes and states made through Class III gaming compacts," the association's chairman, Ernest Stevens, Jr., said in a statement.

Officials with the National Indian Gaming Commission did not immediately return calls seeking comment.

___

On the Net:

The court: http://www.cadc.uscourts.gov/internet/internet.nsf

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Plead Guilty To Gun Trafficking Charges (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), October 21, 2006

Flea market dealers will be sentenced in Jan. to federal prison

Move over, Wal-Mart. Forget about it, Bass Pro Shops.

When it comes to peddling guns, these guys had a sales pitch the big retail boys just can't match - low prices and no questions asked.

There was only one hitch in the business plan for gun salesmen George Manus, 71, and Timothy Cobb, 49. It was illegal.

Now, this pair of flea market dealers is headed to federal prison.

Manus and Cobb pleaded guilty in U.S. District Court earlier this week to gun trafficking charges and face sentencing in January.

DOJ_NMG_0084284

In paperwork prepared as part of their pleas, Assistant U.S. Attorney Tracee Plowell described a profitable gun peddling business where the only thing that mattered was cash.

"Manus told (a police snitch) that he doesn't care so long as he gets his money out of it," Plowell wrote.

Manus and Cobb were nabbed as part of a U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives probe. It isn't the first time the ATF has gone after flea market gun dealers. The agency headed a roundup of more than a dozen unlicensed dealers in 2002.

But that case turned out to be a bit of a public relations nightmare for the ATF because many of the gun peddlers were gray-haired retirees with clean records who insisted they had no idea selling a few guns in their personal collections was a crime.

This go-around, the ATF built cases against Manus and Cobb that left little room for a casual-sales defense.

Plowell wrote that the agency used snitches to buy lots and lots of guns from the pair.

Cobb once met a snitch in the parking lot of a fast-food restaurant on Tazewell Pike to seal a deal, but most of the gun sales at issue in the case occurred at what has been identified as the 407 Flea Market in Sevier County.

The snitches made sure to tell Cobb and Manus they were criminals barred from owning or buying guns. One snitch made it clear he sold marijuana. Cobb and Manus made it equally clear they didn't care so long as the snitches masquerading as customers had cash.

Cobb and Manus also told the informants that the guns they were peddling were not part of their private stashes, Plowell wrote. Instead, the pair said they bought guns to resale at a profit, she wrote.

Jamie Satterfield may be reached at 865-342-6308.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Limits On Aide In Leak Case Are Protested By Democrat (NYT)

By Scott Shane

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

The senior Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee yesterday sharply protested the chairman's decision to suspend a Democratic staff member's access to classified information in a leak inquiry.

The congresswoman, Jane Harman of California, called the action a groundless act of political retaliation.

Ms. Harman's complaint to the chairman, Representative Peter Hoekstra, Republican of Michigan, involved his internal investigation of the possible source of an article on Sept. 24 in The New York Times about a National Intelligence Estimate saying the Iraq war had become a cause célèbre for terrorists.

Ms. Harman said she was appalled by Mr. Hoekstra's move against the staff member, Larry Hanauer.

"There is no evidence to suggest that the professional staff member in question did anything wrong," she said in a statement.

Ms. Harman said Mr. Hoekstra had admitted to her that his action against Mr. Hanauer was payback for her release on Tuesday of a report on actions by former Representative Randy Cunningham while he was on the Intelligence Committee. Mr. Cunningham, a California Republican, is serving an eight-year prison sentence for taking bribes.

"If you have a problem with me, why not deal with me directly?" Ms. Harman asked Mr. Hoekstra in a letter sent on Wednesday.

In his response sent yesterday, Mr. Hoekstra said he felt obliged to investigate the question. "This is an issue of national security," he wrote, inviting Ms. Harman to help decide how to conduct the inquiry.

The mutual accusations deepened the partisan tensions that have repeatedly gridlocked the House committee and its Senate counterpart for two years, a period of intense debate on intelligence policies.

On Tuesday, acting at the suggestion of another panel member, Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois, Mr. Hoekstra banned Mr. Hanauer, the staff member, from the committee's high-security offices and from access to classified documents.

Mr. LaHood said Mr. Hanauer had requested a copy of the National Intelligence Estimate and received it two days before the article in The Times appeared on the Web.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. LaHood conceded he had no evidence of a leak beyond the coincidence of timing.

"But some of us think it's more than a coincidence," he said.

Democrats on the committee and a lawyer for Mr. Hanauer said Mr. LaHood's sleuthing was off base.

Representative John F. Tierney, Democrat of Massachusetts, said in an interview that he requested a copy of the National Intelligence Estimate last month after The Times had called his office. When a committee security officer could not immediately locate it, Mr. Hanauer requested the document from the office of the director of national intelligence, John D. Negroponte, and a copy was delivered.

DOJ_NMG_0084285

"I didn't talk to The New York Times, and I don't think he did either," Mr. Tierney said of Mr. Hanauer. "I want the committee to clear his name as soon as possible."

Mr. Hanauer's lawyer, Jonathan Turley, said his client had nothing to do with any leak of the intelligence estimate and would offer a sworn statement to that effect. Mr. Turley said Mr. Hanauer was collateral damage in a pre-election squabble.

"He simply got the document and gave it to a member," the lawyer said.

Mr. Hanauer, who joined the committee staff last year after working for the Defense Department and the Booz Allen Hamilton, the consulting firm, remains on the panel payroll and retains his security clearance.

The estimate on terrorism had a relatively low-level classification, "secret," and was made available in May to hundreds of people in multiple agencies and Congressional committees. The Times has previously reported that its article about the estimate was based on interviews with more than 10 officials and outside experts.

The dispute on the panel appears to result from the argument over the report on Mr. Cunningham, which Michael Stern, a special counsel appointed jointly by Mr. Hoekstra and Ms. Harman, wrote. That report found that Mr. Cunningham had used his committee position to help steer $70 million in contracts to favored companies.

On Tuesday, when Ms. Harman released an unclassified summary of the counsel's report, Mr. Hoekstra called that "disturbing and beyond the pale." He wrote to Ms. Harman on Tuesday that he had suspended Mr. Hanauer, implicitly linking her releasing the report on Mr. Cunningham to the reported leak.

"It has become clear to me by your continuing and unauthorized release of information received and maintained by the committee," Mr. Hoekstra wrote, "that the Democrats are not willing to protect committee information."

Suspecting Leak, Chairman Suspends Panel Staffer (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

The Republican chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence suspended a mid-level Democratic staffer Tuesday based on a suspicion that he may have been connected to the leak of a politically damaging intelligence report almost a month ago, according to Republican and Democratic congressional sources.

The action by Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.), which has drawn sharp criticism from Democratic panel members, was described by legislators of both parties as another example of the increased partisan infighting that has damaged the workings of the intelligence panel during this election year.

"The chairman's unilateral action is without basis and an abuse of his power to provide security accesses," Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), ranking Democrat on the panel, said yesterday. "There is no evidence to suggest that the professional staff member in question did anything wrong," she added.

Late yesterday, Washington lawyer Jonathan Turley sent a letter to Hoekstra and Harman saying he represented the staff member involved, Larry Hanauer, whose name had been leaked to the media. Turley wrote that he wanted an expedited review of his client's role "to clear his name at the earliest possible date." He said there was "not a single scintilla of evidence suggesting that Mr. Hanauer had any role in the leaking of the NIE," or National Intelligence Estimate, and that he was drafting a sworn statement to that effect.

Adding to the political overtones, several Republican lawmakers issued news releases yesterday condemning leaks and praising Hoekstra -- including House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (Ohio), House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) and Sen. John Cornyn (Tex.).

The initial accusation against Hanauer was made to Hoekstra more than three weeks ago in a letter from Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), a committee member. The charge was based on a "coincidence" that the Democratic staffer obtained the document, at the request of a member, two days before stories about its contents were published. "I have no credible information to say any classified information was leaked from the committee's minority staff. . . . This may in fact be only coincidence and simply 'look bad,' " LaHood said in his letter, but he requested a formal inquiry.

LaHood defended his letter in a telephone interview yesterday. "Why was there this coincidence? . . . That's what the investigation should be about," he said.

LaHood also linked Hoekstra's decision to suspend the staff member on Tuesday to Harman's unilateral release that day of the summary of a special counsel's report about how former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) manipulated the committee to benefit contractors who had bribed him.

"We are in the political season. . . . If the ranking member wants to play politics," LaHood told Fox News yesterday, referring to Harman, "there are some of us on the other side that can play politics, and I'm not afraid to do it."

Yesterday, Hoekstra sent a letter to Harman saying he thought the suspension was necessary "given the current 'zero tolerance' atmosphere for any indication . . . that suggests the potential for wrongdoing." He also referred to the coincidence of timing as a "red flag" suggesting a leak of classified information. The special counsel's report criticized the committee for failing to act on "red flags" about Cunningham.

Three days earlier, on the day of the suspension, Hoekstra wrote Harman that he had "thought carefully about this and have come to the conclusion that I cannot assume that this was mere coincidence." Hoekstra added that the staffer "could have been involved in, or confirmed the leak of, the classified NIE information."

At issue is the leak of selected contents, harmful to the Bush administration, from a classified April 2006 National Intelligence Estimate titled "Trends of Global Terrorism." The New York Times first published a story about the NIE, with the headline "Spy Agencies Say Iraq War Worsens Terrorism Threat," on Sept. 23 on its Web site and again in its Sept. 24 print edition.

Intelligence community sources, speaking anonymously because the NIE remains classified, have told The Washington Post that Times reporters were asking questions about the contents of that NIE weeks before publication of the story. In his story, Times reporter Mark Mazzetti wrote that over the weeks he had interviewed "a dozen United States government officials and outside experts . . . for this article." He added that all "had either seen the final version of the document or participated in the creation of earlier drafts."

Three days before publication of the Times story, on Sept. 20, Rep. John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), a member of the intelligence panel, received a media inquiry about the NIE, according to a statement his office released yesterday. Tierney said yesterday that he knew nothing about it but called over to the Democratic staff and asked whether such a report had been received. The staff member talked to the committee security officer, who said such reports had not been put on an internal, secure Web site because of technical problems, according to a committee staff member who asked not to be identified.

Hanauer and the security officer called the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, which had produced the NIE, and a copy of the secret document was delivered the next day, Sept. 21. The staff member took a hard copy to Tierney, and the committee security officer scanned it into the panel's classified Web site, making it available to all committee members. Tierney said that after he read it and saw it was classified he refused to discuss it with reporters.

"I don't know why they came down on this fellow," Tierney said.

Democratic Aide's Access To Intelligence Is Cut Off (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the House Intelligence Committee has suspended a Democratic aide's access to classified materials, citing concerns the staffer might have leaked parts of an intelligence assessment on terrorism to the media.

The highly unusual move drew sharp protest from the panel's ranking Democrat, Jane Harman of Venice, who said in a statement Friday, "There is no evidence to suggest that the professional staff member in question did anything wrong."

With an election in less than three weeks that could swing control of Congress, the exchange reflects a major deterioration in relations on a committee that traditionally has sought to avoid partisan clashes. One congressional official said the committee was in "meltdown."

Committee Chairman Peter Hoekstra (R-Mich.) said he suspended the aide's access to secret intelligence documents after learning that the employee had requested a copy of a high-level intelligence estimate days before details of the document showed up in the press.

In a letter to Harman released by Hoekstra's office Friday, Hoekstra said, "I cannot assume that this was mere coincidence."

The aide was identified by other congressional officials as Larry Hanauer. The officials, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of a pending investigation into the leak, said Hanauer had held positions with the departments of Defense and Homeland Security before joining the professional staff of Democrats on the House intelligence panel about two years ago.

A spokesman for Harman said Hanauer was not available to comment. His attorney, Jonathan Turley, expressed anger that Hanauer was named in news reports Friday and said there was no evidence the aide leaked the intelligence report.

Turley wrote to committee leaders, "When a staffer can become fodder for politics in this way, it discourages qualified people from seeking to join public service."

Other Democratic aides said Hanauer was familiar with rules surrounding classified materials and said they were skeptical he would leak information.

DOJ_NMG_0084287

The document he requested — on behalf of committee member John F. Tierney (D-Mass.), according to Turley — was a National Intelligence Estimate on global terrorism trends that suggested the Iraq war had exacerbated terrorism. Disclosure of the analysis last month was a political embarrassment to the Bush administration.

The analysis was disseminated to government officials and multiple congressional committees months before some of its findings were reported Sept. 24 in the Los Angeles Times and New York Times.

Hoekstra's suspension of Hanauer's access was the latest in a series of showdowns between the committee's senior members. Hoekstra was angered earlier this week when Harman publicly released an unclassified summary of an internal committee investigation into abuses by former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Rancho Santa Fe), who served on the panel and is now in prison for taking bribes.

In his letter to Harman, dated Tuesday, Hoekstra alluded to the release of the Cunningham report and said he had suspended Hanauer's access in part because he was concerned that "Democrats are not willing to protect committee information." Hoekstra said Hanauer's suspension would remain in effect until a panel investigation of the Iraq analysis' leak was complete.

Writing to Hoekstra on Wednesday, Harman said the suspension of Hanauer was "in retaliation for my decision to release an unclassified summary" of the Cunningham probe.

"If you have a problem with me, why not deal with me directly?" she wrote.

A Democratic aide familiar with the Hanauer matter agreed: "He didn't do anything. He is a pawn in a retribution."

An aide to Harman said Hanauer remained on the committee payroll, working outside the main committee offices on unclassified matters.

Democrats Back Staffer Suspended Over Iraq Leak (WT/AP)

The Washington Times/AP, October 21, 2006

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Democrats say the Republican head of the House intelligence committee had no grounds to suspend a staff member who has come under scrutiny for the leak of a secret intelligence assessment.

The unidentified staff member, a Democrat, was suspended this week by Chairman Peter Hoekstra and is being denied access to classified information pending the outcome of a review. Mr. Hoekstra yesterday said the step was the least aggressive he could take while the committee investigates.

The Michigan Republican said the committee aide will be interviewed and other information will be collected. That could include correspondence, phone records and interviews with people who interacted with the aide.

For now, Mr. Hoekstra said, he has not involved the FBI, which would normally handle investigations into leaks of classified material.

"We ought to be able to resolve this very, very quickly," he said.

The House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence's top Democrat, Jane Harman of California, said Mr. Hoekstra's "action is without basis and an abuse of his power" in overseeing security access.

"There is no evidence to suggest that the professional staff member in question did anything wrong," she said. She depicted Mr. Hoekstra's move as political payback, saying the chairman was angry that Mrs. Harman had released a report about a former Republican congressman jailed for taking bribes.

The leak to the New York Times of a National Intelligence Estimate on global terror trends caused a political uproar last month. In the assessment, completed in April, analysts from the government's 16 spy agencies concluded that the Iraq war has become a "cause celebre" for Islamic extremists, breeding deep resentment of the United States.

President Bush, who suggested the document was leaked for "political purposes" weeks before the midterm elections, later made public four pages of the estimate's key findings.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales yesterday would not discuss whether the Justice Department is investigating who leaked the information about the intelligence assessment. But he described the government as "concerned about the disclosure of classified information, particularly during a time of war."

"Certain kinds of information are protected by law and should remain so," he said.

In a letter to Mr. Hoekstra dated Sept. 29, Rep. Ray LaHood, Illinois Republican, a committee member, said the Democratic staffer requested the document from Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte three days before a Sept. 23 story by the Times on its conclusions.

"I have no credible information to say any classified information was leaked from the committee's minority staff, but the implications of such would be dramatic," Mr. LaHood said in the letter, a copy of which was obtained by the Associated Press. "This may, in fact, be only coincidence, and simply 'look bad.' But coincidence, in this town, is rare."

DOJ_NMG_0084288

A conference call to the committee's nine Democrats on Wednesday to inform them of the aide's suspension prompted outrage, said two congressional officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about internal committee business.

The officials said that the National Intelligence Estimate was marked "secret," rather than "top secret" or another more restrictive classification. Mrs. Harman said thousands of people across government would have had access to it, and noted the assessment was also posted on the committee's internal Web site days before the story was published.

Mr. Hoekstra said he does not think that any committee Republicans had access to the intelligence assessment before it was leaked, citing a computer malfunction that prevented committee members and staff from realizing it had been transmitted to them.

"We are pretty confident that the number of people on the committee who had access to this report is very, very limited," he said.

Bush Urges GOP On Medicare Drug Benefit (AP-Y)

By Kevin Freking

AP, October 21, 2006

President Bush said Friday that Republicans are missing an opportunity if they're not talking up the Medicare drug benefit while campaigning this election season.

"I think this is a fantastic program, but more importantly, so do the seniors," he said in an interview with The Associated Press.

The drug program was rife with problems at the outset, but reports indicate that in recent months it has been operating smoothly. The administration estimates that the average elderly or disabled person will save about $1,100 annually on medicine.

Polls indicate that most participants are satisfied.

"My own view is our candidates and the people who voted for this ought to be out there traveling to senior centers all over their districts and their state saying, 'Look what we did,'" Bush said.

Democrats, however, say revising the plan would be a first order of business if they regain control of Congress.

The program allows seniors and the disabled to enroll in private plans that negotiate drug prices with manufacturers. The program is subsidized by the federal government and is expected to cost taxpayers about $30 billion this year.

Democratic lawmakers say the government should do the price negotiations, using its considerable purchasing power to lower the cost for seniors. Also, many Democrats would like to simplify the program by letting the government administer a plan instead of relying on dozens of private insurers.

Seniors would flock to the government-administered plan, Democrats say, because it would more closely resemble how they use Medicare to pay for visits to the family doctor.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., promises that Democrats would move quickly to give the secretary of health and human services negotiation powers, similar to the way the Veterans Affairs Department negotiates prices for the drugs that it covers.

"As pharmaceutical companies reap record profits, it's clear the president's flawed prescription drug plan is working better for drug companies than it is for America's seniors," Pelosi said Friday. "It is no wonder that the Republican prescription drug bill actually bars Medicare from negotiating lower drug prices for seniors."

But the president said that he likes having dozens of private insurance plans competing for business — that the competition leads to better prices and service.

"There is a fundamental disagreement and that is: Who should be making decisions for consumers?" Bush said. "Obviously there's a group of folks that feel like the government can do a better job than the consumers themselves. We strongly believe that empowering consumers is the appropriate way to promote quality in health care."

"As a matter of fact, we will resist any changes to weaken the program."

Bush participated in a small roundtable on the drug benefit with a couple from Springfield, Va., pharmacy representatives, a caregiver who helped her aunt enroll and the administrator of a non-profit agency that helps low-income beneficiaries enroll.

Karen Smith, a pharmacist in Washington, told Bush that she believes the program has helped many of her customers.

"I would actually have customers who could only buy five pills at a time because of the cost of their medication. Since Medicare, I don't see that any more," Smith said.

Dr. William "Barker" Hardison and his wife Lois estimated they had saved about $1,700 through September on the cost of their medicine. The rate of savings will decline because Lois is now in the coverage gap known as the doughnut hole. Still, the couple estimated they will have save about $2,000 for the year.

"There's been a doughnut hole forever. It just used to start at zero," Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said.

DOJ_NMG_0084289

Bush asked Medicare officials about 630,000 seniors and disabled people who were recently notified that they would not be considered dual-eligibles, which means they would not be automatically enrolled in a plan that covers virtually all of their prescriptions for almost no cost.

Leslie Norwalk, the acting administrator for the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, told Bush that the people will remain in the plans they are currently enrolled in. But if they want extra help in paying for their medicine, as they receive now, they need to apply for the low-income subsidy.

The Kaiser Family Foundation says its polling shows more than eight in 10 seniors who are enrolled in a Medicare drug plan are satisfied, although almost two in 10 say they have encountered a major problem in using it.

Michael Gerson Mr. Compassionate Conservatism (WSJ)

By Naomi Schaefer Riley

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

ALEXANDRIA, Va. -- Amid the cut and thrust of the midterm elections, two questions have frothed up within the recesses of the GOP -- almost as an arcane distraction from the squalid business of holding on to House and Senate: Has compassionate conservatism worked? And should Republicans try it again?

Former House Majority Leader Dick Armey has made his position plain. In a recent open letter from his organization, Freedomworks, he assailed some leaders of the religious right, suggesting that if Republicans lose in November it would be because they have abandoned the principle of limited government in favor of embracing government for supposedly conservative ends. Meanwhile, David Kuo, former deputy director of the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, has complained in recent interviews and op-eds that the biggest promises of compassionate conservatism, especially the support of faith-based initiatives, have been broken.

Perhaps the best person to sort out this business is Michael Gerson, George W. Bush's chief speechwriter from the beginning of his presidential campaign through the end of his first term, and then White House senior policy adviser until June. Now a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, Mr. Gerson is plotting a book about the future of conservatism. He has been giving a lot of thought to its history.

Known around the White House as "Mr. Compassionate Conservatism," Mr. Gerson tells me: "I think it's a political truth that one reason we won the 2000 election was that Republicans finally had a message on education and welfare. In 2008, they will have to have something other than a simplistic antigovernment message." In Mr. Gerson's view, "compassionate conservatism is the theory that the government should encourage the effective provision of social services without providing the service itself." It was, in effect, a conservative twofer: limiting the scope of government and empowering faith-based institutions by entrusting to the latter services that had traditionally been performed by the former. Or so the thinking went. * * *

We're in the sparsely decorated living room of Mr. Gerson's modest Alexandria home. An unassuming man who sits on the edge of his seat and nervously shakes his legs, he is regarded by people on both sides of the aisle as one of the most influential modern speechwriters. His rhetoric, they say, didn't just describe the president's policies, it helped shape them.

Mr. Gerson acknowledges that the antigovernment impulse "has a lot of intellectual energy" and has produced some "very healthy institutions and smart people with important policy prescriptions." But he is more interested in the strain of conservatism that is drawn from Catholic social thought, which stresses that human beings are responsible for others' welfare, and that the functions of society ought to be performed by the most local authority possible.

Yet Mr. Gerson is an evangelical, not a Catholic. And before being hired by the president, he worked for two other prominent evangelicals, both of whom he counts among the pioneers of compassionate conservatism: Prison Fellowship founder Chuck Colson and Sen. Dan Coats of Indiana. Mr. Colson plucked Mr. Gerson from Wheaton College (Billy Graham's alma mater) in 1986, where he studied theology. Wheaton has no Catholics on its faculty, but has led an intellectual charge to get evangelicals to think more about Catholic teachings. "It's almost a shame to say," Mr. Gerson laments, "but evangelicalism doesn't have that rich a tradition, and so you look for other sources that represent an authentic Christian witness in society."

Mr. Gerson's debt to Catholic teachings is also apparent on issues such as immigration. I asked him why, when most religious groups lined up this year to support the president's immigration proposals, evangelicals were noticeably absent. "There has been a significant history of Catholic reflection on immigration," Mr. Gerson says. He believes that a more "conspicuously global church" like the Catholic one is more likely to realize "that human beings in every culture and across every border have a radical equality before God." He also believes that evangelicals (and many secular Republicans) have succumbed "to one of the traditional temptations of conservatism": defining our national identity in terms of culture instead of ideals.

Mr. Gerson sees this temptation "reflected in our argument about democracy in the Middle East." Must there be a "democratic culture" before one can have a democracy? Mr. Gerson says that democracy took hold despite Confucianism in Asia, Catholicism in southern Europe and Orthodoxy in Eastern Europe. "All of these," Mr. Gerson notes, "were regarded as cultural impediments to democratic progress. In fact our ideals, the ideals of freedom, turned out to be more appealing than we thought." Mr. Gerson is confident that the same will prove true in Iraq and Afghanistan. "I have a deep belief that liberty improves human life. . . . People eventually find that to be true, but that doesn't mean they immediately find it to be true."

DOJ_NMG_0084290

Mr. Gerson looks back on the last few years of trying to spread freedom as "a time of exhausting international engagement on a variety of fronts." And he doesn't see it ending any time soon. But if the war on terror is really going to occupy our focus for the foreseeable future, why should Republicans run on improving education and ending poverty? Did 9/11 spell the end of compassionate conservatism?

Mr. Gerson believes the answer is no; the administration's foreign policy, he says, represents an expansion of the philosophy of compassionate conservatism. Bringing freedom and democracy to other parts of the globe has required military action, but Mr. Gerson is annoyed by Mr. Bush's critics on the left who say the president only uses force to solve global problems. "The administration's increases in foreign assistance have percentage-wise been the largest since the Marshall Plan," he notes.

He is more defensive, though, when it comes to domestic spending. Mr. Gerson justifies the ballooning federal budget in two ways. First, he notes that a lot of the spending has been on security: "I think it's largely and unfairly ignored that much of the spending increases that have occurred took place in the first term as a reaction to 9/11."

But Mr. Gerson also acknowledges that "there is a genuine argument about the role of government that is going on." And he asserts that the president has been nothing if not honest about where he comes down in that argument. "It should not have surprised anyone that President Bush was going to sign on to the Medicare prescription-drug benefit because he campaigned on it in 1999. And it should not have surprised anyone that he was going to define a federal role in education to raise standards because it was one of his main promises as a candidate."

Other proposals, though, like Social Security reform, which would have appeased the party's more libertarian wing, have fallen by the wayside. He suggests that the country's polarization is a significant part of the problem. The war has contributed to this embittered atmosphere, but Mr. Gerson believes that religious divisions in this country are also a factor. "I think religion raises the temperature of a lot of debates, and it becomes a cultural clash." He blames the religious right for "taking Republican policy prescriptions and baptizing them -- making them into requirements of conscience."

Of course, this "baptizing" has helped Republicans, not least the president, to garner votes. But he also observes "an abdication on the part of the Democratic Party, [which has] an almost active hostility to people of faith and religiously informed reasoning in public debate."

As a young man -- I picture a slightly more awkward and more agitated version of the one sitting before me -- Mr. Gerson was a fan of Jimmy Carter, but he broke ranks over abortion. Still, he believes that Democrats could win back religious folks some day. "There was a time in American history not too long ago where the most prominent evangelical was also the leading Democrat in the country. [William Jennings Bryan] didn't see any inconsistency in those things and I don't, to some extent."

Whatever its benefits for the Republicans, Mr. Gerson believes it is "unhealthy" that one party is secular and one party is religious. "My view" he tells me, "is summarized by Martin Luther King, Jr., who said that the church should not be the master of the state, or the servant of the state. It should be the conscience of the state."

He believes that conscience is especially needed for bioethical questions. He compares the utilitarian arguments of the president's critics -- "they believe that medical research should proceed with very few limits because it will benefit many people" -- with the supporters of popular sovereignty during Lincoln's time. "Yes we're a democracy," he acknowledges, "but we're a democracy that believes all men are created equal and endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights."

Mr. Gerson punctuates his speech, the way he punctuated the president's speeches, with biblical references, and he has been accused of making the president speak in a kind of religious code -- indeed, Mr. Kuo recently suggested this. But Mr. Gerson says he isn't trying to hide anything and there are "tens of millions of people" for whom references to the Bible are "very familiar." * * *

But the president's rhetoric has come under fire from the right as well. After the second inaugural, this newspaper's Peggy Noonan criticized what she saw as the president's utopianism: "Tyranny," she wrote, "is a very bad thing and quite wicked, but one doesn't expect we're going to eradicate it any time soon. Again, this is not heaven, it's earth." Mr. Gerson again has little patience for this argument: "There is always tension between the ideals of rhetoric and the messy circumstances of the world." But he argues, as our conversation reaches crescendo, "I have no idea why that would argue that you give up on setting out the ideals."

And here is where you see Mr. Gerson's gift. The president's critics, he knows, decry America's use of power as hypocritical -- that this country claims to look out for the oppressed when really we're the oppressor. In reply, Mr. Gerson picks the Founder many now think of as the biggest hypocrite of all: Thomas Jefferson. "Even though he was inconsistent in his own life, he set out an ideal that improved and motivated and guided American history from that day to this." That, he says, "is the best role of political rhetoric."

DOJ_NMG_0084291

The Woman Who Would Be Speaker (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

On election night 2004, Nancy Pelosi faced a painful reality: Her party was again a big loser, failing to win the presidency and losing three more House seats. Pundits were suggesting Pelosi should accept her fate as the leader of a permanent House minority.

But the California legislator had a different idea. Instead, she reached out to advertising executives, Internet moguls and language specialists to ask how Democrats could rise from the ashes and challenge President Bush and the Republicans. The advice that came back was unabashed: "You must take him down" and then hammer away at the differences between the two parties, Pelosi recalled.

Today the Democrats appear capable of taking back leadership of the House after 12 years in the minority, for reasons largely beyond Pelosi's control: an unpopular war, an unpopular president and a series of scandals that have left the Republicans highly vulnerable.

Nevertheless, if the Democrats win, experts say, much credit is due this 66-year-old woman, whose notable fundraising abilities (she raised $50 million this election cycle) and scorched-earth strategy of refusing to negotiate with the GOP have put her on track to become the first woman to be speaker of the House.

Dismissed by her critics as too liberal, too elitist and too lacking in gravitas, Pelosi, serving her 10th term, has proved to be a tough-minded tactician who has led her caucus from the political center and kept the fractious House Democrats in line. Pelosi and House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) rarely work together, and the Democrats voted along party lines 88 percent of the time last year -- the most unified voting record in 50 years -- according to a Congressional Quarterly study. By hanging together, the Democrats have thwarted many GOP initiatives, including the centerpiece of Bush's second-term agenda, restructuring Social Security.

That approach, while emboldening the Democrats, has earned Pelosi the enmity of House Republicans, who claim she is an obstructionist. Pelosi, who is married to a wealthy San Francisco businessman and wears designer suits, is a favorite target of conservatives. Throughout the campaign, Republicans have sought to scare voters by portraying Pelosi as a liberal extremist who would be weak on national security and prone to raises taxes if her party were back in control.

On his Web site, Majority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) calls the prospect of Pelosi becoming speaker "just plain scary" and says: "While Republicans fight the War on Terror, . . . House Democrats plot to establish a Department of Peace."

Even before the Democrats' disappointing showing in the 2002 midterm elections, Pelosi began making calls to line up support for a minority-leader bid, in case then-Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.) decided to step aside to run for president. Within days of Gephardt's decision to retire from the House, she locked up the post convincingly, by a vote of 177 to 29.

She took charge with a burst of energy and quickly developed a Democratic message that highlighted shortcomings in the Bush agenda. Later, she criticized the administration's decision to go to war in Iraq. Her strategy was to unite Democrats behind non-threatening, core issues such as the minimum wage, health care, Social Security and energy independence while steering clear of divisive social issues such as abortion rights and gun control.

While Pelosi appears at ease and chatty in informal gatherings, she often comes across as stiff and tentative in public, and she rarely projects well on television. After a halting performance on NBC's "Meet the Press" in May, Pelosi worked with media experts to polish her style and shorten her answers.

Some conservative Democrats say she has given them a voice in forming policy by creating a number of advisory groups that focus on, among other things, rural issues and faith. "It's much easier to hold the party together if the people who feel the most disaffected feel well-treated," said David Rohde, a professor of political science at Duke University.

Rep. Collin C. Peterson (Minn.) is one of those conservatives. "I have always believed that it takes someone of the same political persuasion to convince the folks on the left that we're not going to be able to govern if we don't come to the center," he said.

This summer, as Republicans were demonizing Pelosi as a liberal liability, Peterson invited her to his rural district -- where she looked comfortable eating a pork chop on a stick and vowed to direct energy money to the Midwest, instead of the Mideast.

Colleagues say Pelosi's polished Pacific Heights exterior belies an iron-fist management style. One of her first moves as leader was to take control over who gets seats on the most coveted committees -- Ways and Means, Appropriations, and Energy and Commerce.

DOJ_NMG_0084292

The newspaper Roll Call said in December that Pelosi threatened to remove Rep. Edolphus Towns (N.Y.) from the Energy and Commerce Committee for siding with Republicans on a key trade bill. And despite objections from the Congressional Black Caucus and others, she demanded the removal of Rep. William J. Jefferson (La.) from the Ways and Means Committee after authorities caught him on tape accepting $100,000, allegedly in bribe money. The ousting of Jefferson startled even Republicans.

Pelosi's biggest challenge was in trying to forge a consensus on the war in Iraq, a near-impossible task given the sharp divisions among Democrats in the House and Senate and the political danger of openly challenging Bush on the war. She had been highly critical of Gephardt's support for the war in the fall of 2002 and helped line up 126 Democratic votes against the resolution authorizing an invasion of Iraq.

But as the new minority leader, Pelosi knew she could not impose her views on her caucus and instead initially took the position that it was the Republicans' war, for the Republicans to fix. Privately, however, she spent months conferring with Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.), a decorated Vietnam War veteran and prominent voice on military matters, who had voted for the war but was now souring on it. Pelosi knew that her voice would not be as credible as Murtha's.

The two planned Murtha's surprise turnaround a year ago, when he demanded immediate withdrawal of U.S. troops. Two weeks later, Pelosi followed his lead.

Should the Democrats win in November, Pelosi said, their new majority will push for the immediate start of a phased withdrawal of troops, to be completed by the end of 2007.

At the same time, she said, the new majority would quickly move to raise the minimum wage, allow the government to negotiate directly with drug companies for lower prices for seniors, repeal corporate incentives to take jobs overseas, make college tuition tax-deductible, and implement all the recommendations of the commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, securing nuclear material from former Soviet states to keep it from terrorists.

Some Democrats complain that Pelosi relies on too tight a coterie of advisers, chief among them Reps. George Miller and Anna G. Eshoo of California. Others include Murtha, Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), Rosa L. DeLauro (Conn.), David R. Obey (Wis.), John M. Spratt Jr. (S.C.) and Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), who heads the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "The biggest complaint is that if you were not with her in the beginning you can't get in," a former leadership aide said.

Pelosi has signaled that she would not rely totally on seniority in appointing committee chairs. She has, however, told ranking members on the most powerful panels, Ways and Means, Rules, Energy and Commerce, and Appropriations, that she supports them.

And, after studiously avoiding cooperating with the Republican leadership for years, she has vowed to reach out to Republicans and be more inclusive. She said, for example, that she would allow Republicans to bring bills to the floor and have a say in conference committees. But many are skeptical.

"That would not happen," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga). "I have never seen Nancy Pelosi reach out to a Republican."

Pelosi was first elected to the House at 47, after she raised her five children. She grew up as a member of a prominent Maryland political family and developed an interest in politics at an early age. Her father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., was mayor of Baltimore for 12 years, and her brother, Thomas J. D'Alesandro III, later served as mayor for four years.

She attended Trinity College in Washington, a Catholic girls school, and met and married Paul Pelosi, today a millionaire investor. The couple settled in San Francisco, and Pelosi honed her political skills and developed a name while driving carpool -- as a fundraiser, state party chairwoman and Democratic National Committee member.

Markey said Pelosi was "no ordinary freshman" when she arrived through a special election. She was someone who could pick up the phone and call first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton and raise millions when asked. Substantively, colleagues said she proved herself on key committees, including Appropriations and Intelligence.

In 2001, she successfully challenged the old boys' network by running for minority whip against the favored Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (Md.), because, she said, she saw "more of the same" ahead for Democrats.

She quickly consolidated her power, sending a strong message to those she saw as adversaries. "If someone is her enemy, she shuts them out. She closes them down," Murtha said.

Members took note when Pelosi gave $10,000 to former Democratic representative Lynn Nancy Rivers of Michigan, whom reapportionment had pitted against a Democratic lion of the House, John D. Dingell, who had voted for Hoyer. "She was with the people who supported her," said Miller, her friend.

Murtha and others said she never brought Hoyer into her circle, although he is her No. 2 in the House Democratic leadership. Hoyer said in an interview that "Nancy and I have worked very effectively together."

Pelosi said she holds no grudge against Hoyer, but members said there was no missing her intentions when she did not dissuade Murtha from challenging Hoyer for the No. 2 leadership post.

DOJ_NMG_0084293

In describing her dealings with fellow Democrats, Pelosi said, "I expect a certain level of discipline when we have agreed on where we're going." Some members, she said, "mistake sometimes my courtesy for a lack of strength, and they ought not to do that."

Madam Speaker? Pelosi Likes The Sound (LAT)

By Faye Fiore

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

SEATTLE — It's only 9 a.m. and Nancy Pelosi has already had two breakfasts and a bowl of chocolate ice cream. The House minority leader has met with a couple of donors in a hotel dining room, run back up to her room for a live radio interview, down to the dining room again for a sit-down with the local newspapers, and up to her room for a phone strategy session.

She is, as ever, exquisitely dressed, in a stylish pale-green suit that she will wear three times in the next three days. Packing light saves time. Everything must fit into one carry-on and a garment bag, which she lugs herself, clacking across airports in her high heels.

With less than three weeks before an election that will decide control of Congress, the Democrats are within tantalizing reach of a House win that would almost certainly make Pelosi the first female speaker of the House — second in line to the presidency — and the first from California.

They need to gain 15 seats to take control, and Pelosi falls asleep at night crunching the numbers. It is her single burning obsession to lead her party to victory, and she devotes nearly every waking minute to it, coaching candidates, raising money and calculating in which districts to spend it.

In three years as minority leader she has raised record amounts of cash and preached party unity that has helped bring 201 unruly Democrats to the brink of power.

Yet Pelosi is not necessarily the public face most Democrats would have chosen to represent a party struggling to look strong in these unsettled times — a 66-year-old liberal congresswoman from war-protesting San Francisco who looks too demure to stand up for national security and isn't great on TV.

Republican ad campaigns cast her as a caricature of liberal excess; depicted with eyes bulging and mouth agape, she looks like she's about to pop a blood vessel or bite somebody.

"Look, if I weren't effective, I don't think they would try to take me down. You're in the arena, you're in the ring. That's what happens," Pelosi says on the way to another fundraiser as she crisscrosses the country, her cellphone affixed to her ear in the car, at breakfast and in the beauty salon, where she recently dropped it into a pedicure bowl.

She has raised more money than any congressional Democrat — $100 million since she was elected leader nearly four years ago — half of it in this election cycle alone, tapping her wealthy ideological soul mates and cultivating small donors with direct mail and the Internet.

She brought vases of white lilies to the minority leader's office, but also a discipline that Democrats had not seen in years, threatening consequences for anyone who strayed from the party line. The result was unity 88% of the time on such votes as energy policy and President Bush's budget. The famously unified Republicans did only slightly better.

"Prior leadership did not discipline the troops in the way Nancy has," said Vic Fazio, a former Democratic congressman from West Sacramento, now a Washington lobbyist. "And she brought a lot of new donors to the table."

Pelosi proved herself in the backrooms and trenches of Washington, not on the Sunday morning talking-heads circuit. She tends to speak in scripted talking points — one columnist likened her delivery to "a compendium of bumper stickers." She leans toward mind-numbing alliteration: The only three excuses for breaking from the party line are "conscience, constituents, Constitution."

Most agree she has improved with practice and occasional guidance from media coaches to slow down and smile. She was more relaxed during a recent appearance on the "Late Show With David Letterman" and drew applause more than once with jabs such as: "Mr. President, 'stay the course' is not a strategy, it's a slogan, and we need more than that."

Unlike previous party leaders from both sides — Democrat Richard Gephardt and Republican Newt Gingrich, most notably — Pelosi isn't running for president. Her raucous but loyal district has sent her to Washington 10 times, by margins so huge that she doesn't campaign; she's never needed national exposure and says she would rather spend her time promoting her party than herself.

"I could stay in Washington all the time and go on Sunday morning shows, but I don't have time for that. I need to be traveling and raising money and be at home," she says from the back seat of a black SUV on her way to yet another fundraiser. "At the beginning of all this 23 months ago, we were told we were a permanent minority…. I'm fighting a battle here. I'm not getting my hair done."

DOJ_NMG_0084294

Pelosi learned her political skills from her father, Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., a New Deal congressman and revered mayor of Baltimore. He taught "little Nancy" — one of six children and the only girl — how to build a grass-roots campaign, cultivate relationships and call in favors. In the living room of their brick row house there were usually constituents looking for work or a financial assist — along with the now-famous "favor file" that kept track of every good deed; it was consulted when her father or the party needed help in return.

Her time-management skills were honed on another training ground: the San Francisco home where she and her husband, Paul Pelosi, a wealthy investment banker and her college sweetheart, raised four girls and a boy, born in six years. Nancy Pelosi was the driver, cook, Halloween-costume seamstress and disciplinarian — putting out fires and making every minute count, not unlike life in Congress.

While the children were small, Pelosi served as California state party chair and learned the art of raising money. People would ask how she managed to do so much with so many kids. "I told them I couldn't have done it without the children," Pelosi says now.

Each one had a job addressing envelopes, stuffing, sealing and stamping. Their hard work at the Democratic Party office earned them a bowl of French onion soup across the street at the old Liberty House department store in San Francisco. Not to mention occasional recognition at church, where they belted out: "He's got the stuffers and the sealers, in his hands … "

Raising her children taught Pelosi to think strategically, whether putting together a puzzle with her grandchildren at the family's Napa Valley vacation home (sort by color and edges and consult the picture on the box) or plotting to foil Bush's plan to privatize Social Security (kick him in the shins and give him nothing to attack).

Acting on advice from marketing gurus after the 2004 presidential election, Pelosi ordered her ranks to assail the Bush privatization plan while offering nothing of their own that the Republicans could counterassault. Week after week impatient Democrats asked, "When can we propose a plan?" and week after week she intoned, "Never."

When the Bush team visited 60 cities in 60 days to sell Medicare prescription coverage — the centerpiece of his second term — Democrats were on the ground too, with a message of higher drug costs and industry perks.

In eight months, support for Bush's idea among seniors had dropped significantly, marking the beginning of his decline in national public opinion polls.

"We had to make them pay … for trying to do that to the American people," she explains, displaying the bite that has made her reputation as a political pit bull.

It is a side of Pelosi that has earned her both admirers and detractors, depending on who happens to be on the receiving end of her wrath. She is known to have a long memory for slights. A bitter and protracted House leadership battle with Rep. Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) has left lasting divisions between her backers and his.

"About 75% of the caucus are her rabid supporters, the other 25% not so supportive," one senior Democrat said, asking to remain anonymous to avoid offending the leadership. "A lot of people just don't like to be led. And to some degree, people perceive her as being too focused on her enemies and not sufficiently willing to open up a new dialogue and move on."

Some believe Pelosi is held to a higher standard in maledominated Washington. When the men in the leadership stick to talking points, they are "on message." When Pelosi does, she is redundant and shrill.

"There is still a double standard," said Democratic strategist Anita Dunn, who has given Pelosi tips on media presence. "There have been some comb-over jokes about male members of Congress, but by and large people just accept what they look and sound like. That is still not the case with females."

Though she is probably the second most lampooned woman in U.S. politics — after Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) — Pelosi is far from a household name. "I don't think most people know who I am," she says.

That could change in one historic moment if Pelosi is pulled from the trenches and plopped into the spotlight.

She sees it as an opportunity to change the culture of Washington.

"I think the fact that I am a woman will raise expectations in terms of more hope in government, and I will not disappoint," she says.

"The gavel of the speaker of the House is in the hands of special interests, and now it will be in the hands of America's children. I don't mean to imply my male colleagues will have any less integrity…. But I don't know that a man can say that as easily as a woman can."

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Nancy Pelosi

1940: Born Nancy D'Alesandro in Baltimore; her father served five terms in Congress ending in 1947, then 12 years as Baltimore mayor

1962: Graduates from Trinity College (now called Trinity University), Washington, D.C.

DOJ_NMG_0084295

1977-1981: Northern chair, California Democratic Party
1981-1983: State chair, California Democratic Party
1985-1987: Finance chair, Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee
1987-present: Elected by California's 8th Congressional District, which includes most of San Francisco; served for 10 years (until early 2003) on the intelligence committee
2001: Elected minority whip by House Democrats
Oct. 2002: Leads Democratic faction opposed to authorizing military force in Iraq, bucking the House Democratic leader
Nov. 2002: Elected minority leader by House Democrats
Nov. 2004: Democrats lose House seats as Bush wins reelection
Sources: Almanac of American Politics 2006; office of Nancy Pelosi
Los Angeles Times

Rank Would Guide Pelosi As She Chose Chairmen (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman
The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

If Democrats win control in November, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) has decided to award committee chairmanships based almost entirely on seniority, ensuring that the House would feature far more minority faces, and some liberal firebrands, in key posts.

But, mindful of the growing power of an expanding band of Democratic moderates and conservatives, Pelosi has also vowed that she would keep her chairmen on a tight leash, according to leadership aides and current and former Democratic lawmakers. She has assured conservative Democrats that she would personally temper the legislative impulses of her most liberal chairmen while keeping close tabs on the investigations that could dominate the final two years of the Bush presidency.

House Democratic leaders and their would-be chairmen are careful to say in public that they are focused only on the Nov. 7 elections and have not begun to plan for a possible takeover. But privately, Pelosi has had several conversations with the senior Democrats on the House's most powerful committees, as well as with conservative "Blue Dog" Democrats, who have sought assurances that they will have a voice after the polls close.

"We've inched our way back toward the majority by replacing Republicans with conservative-to-moderate Democrats, and you're going to see a lot more of that November 7," said Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.), one of the leaders of the Blue Dog coalition. "Do I believe Blue Dogs will have a greater voice in the Democratic leadership? You betcha."

The Blue Dogs could hold the balance of power in a Democratic House. With 37 members, the group already has clout; 16 Democratic candidates have the Blue Dogs' endorsement, and a dozen of them could win. That would give them numbers surpassing the Congressional Black Caucus's 43 members.

Rep. Dennis Cardoza (D-Calif.), a Blue Dog co-chairman, promised that the group would be "a moderating influence on any excesses that might be brought forth by other wings of the party."

"That's not a threat," he said. "That's just the facts of life."

For Republicans in this campaign season, however, the face of the Democratic Party is not the Blue Dog wing but what Cardoza called those "other wings." Committee chairmanships would appear to be an unlikely campaign issue, but Republicans are using it with gusto, especially to rally dispirited conservatives to the polls.

Republicans have attacked Rep. Charles B. Rangel (N.Y.), the senior Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, as a tax hiker. The Republican National Committee called Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), the would-be chairman of the Education and Workforce Committee, "a liberal partisan" who "would launch criminal inquiries into the Bush administration."

In Topeka, Kan., last week, Vice President Cheney singled out three of the most liberal Democrats in the House as foils -- Reps. John Conyers Jr. (Mich.), the would-be Judiciary Committee chairman; Henry A. Waxman (Calif.), who is in line to take over the Government Reform Committee; and Barney Frank (Mass.), the senior Democrat on the Financial Services Committee.

"In all the decisions that will come in the next two years, it's going to matter a great deal which party has the majority on the floor and the gavel in committee," Cheney said.

In a debate between six-term Rep. John N. Hostettler (R-Ind.) and his challenger, Sheriff Brad Ellsworth (D), Hostettler warned that if Democrats take over, "Charlie Rangel will be the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee."

Some Republicans have steered clear of those lines of attack. House Government Reform Committee Chairman Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) said he has "worked closely" with Waxman, the ranking Democrat.

Misgivings exist in Democratic ranks as well. Several moderate-to-conservative Democrats in the House, who spoke on the condition of anonymity for fear of fraying party unity, specifically mentioned two members: Conyers, who has already laid out what he says are grounds to impeach President Bush, and Alcee L. Hastings (Fla.), a senior Democrat on the intelligence committee, who was impeached and removed from his federal judgeship in 1989 for conspiring to take a $150,000 bribe and give light sentences to two convicted swindlers.

DOJ_NMG_0084296

Hastings has already become something of a campaign issue. At a recent event featuring Democratic challenger Heath Shuler, an aide to his opponent, Rep. Charles H. Taylor (R-N.C.), called out that a Democratic majority would let Hastings into the inner sanctums of the intelligence world.

Such concerns have placed Pelosi in a squeeze between conservative Democrats, who could be responsible for swinging the balance of power next month, and minority lawmakers who are demanding that Pelosi respect the seniority system.

For now, she is largely siding with the congressional black and Hispanic caucuses, whose ranks would provide at least half a dozen chairmen by seniority. Three black lawmakers have already received pledges: Pelosi aides gave strong assurances that Conyers would become Judiciary Committee chairman and that Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) would become chairman of the Homeland Security Committee. In a private meeting, Pelosi told Rangel that he would take over the Ways and Means Committee.

In the same meeting, she assured Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.) that she would back his return to the chairmanship of the Energy and Commerce Committee, a post he used in the 1980s and 1990s to become one of the most powerful and feared figures in Congress.

She also told Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) that he would have her support to take back the reins of the Appropriations Committee.

But there are caveats. Parts of Dingell's former domain that Republicans took away from the energy committee, such as oversight over the Securities and Exchange Commission, will not be returned, leadership aides said. And Pelosi has made it clear that she wants Waxman, on the Government Reform Committee, not Dingell, to take the lead on investigations.

The intelligence committee remains the biggest problem. The senior Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), wants the chairmanship and has the strong backing of the Blue Dogs. But personal friction between Harman and Pelosi virtually ensures that Harman will not remain on the committee, according to lawmakers and aides close to Pelosi.

Hastings would be next in line, but conservative Democrats are adamantly opposed. Skipping over him would be problematic, however. Rep. Sanford Bishop (D-Ga.) was the last black lawmaker in line for the sensitive committee chairmanship. But to lure Harman out of retirement in 2000, Pelosi and then-House Minority Leader Richard A. Gephardt (Mo.) promised she would get the top Democratic slot on the panel. Bishop was eased off the committee with a plum seat on the appropriations panel.

In light of that history, skipping over Hastings might cause a real rupture with the Congressional Black Caucus, Pelosi aides fear. Tensions between Pelosi and the caucus flared earlier this year when she successfully pushed to remove the ethically tainted William J. Jefferson (D-La.) from the powerful Ways and Means Committee. Jefferson is under federal investigation as part of a bribery and corruption case.

Leadership aides have begun floating a compromise, Rep. Silvestre Reyes (Tex.), the third-ranking Democrat on the intelligence committee, hoping that a minority choice would soothe bruised feelings.

"Reyes would be a fabulous choice," said one Blue Dog lawmaker. "It would show no lack of sensitivity to minorities, and it would be a compromise that would take care of a lot of issues."

The Congressional Black Caucus, headed by Rep. Melvin Watt (D-N.C.), is having none of it, however.

"The CBC would not look kindly on that," said caucus spokeswoman Myra Dandridge. "The first order of business of the CBC chairman would be to protect his members, and Alcee Hastings has the seniority, the knowledge and the experience to be chairman of the intelligence committee."

Staff writer Juliet Eilperin contributed to this report.

At Play In The Realm Of Political Animals (NYT)

By Kayleen Schaefer

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

POOLESVILLE, Md.

THE gravel driveway for the Potomac Polo Club is unmarked, but the 200 young men and women who traveled here, 45 minutes from Washington, knew they were at the right place when they spotted the black Hummer limousine and saw the crowd at the beer bong.

They had arrived at the fall party, Swine on the Vine, of the Capital Club, a Washington group of 100 politically connected young men, who are known for partying like they're back at a fraternity kegger.

For a certain set of young Washington, the parties are a raucous antidote to the restrained fund-raisers and embassy cocktail gatherings that otherwise make up the district's social life.

"The Capital Club has no mission except to show its members and their many dates a good time," said Jayne Sandman, associate publisher of the Washington magazine Capitol File. "It's hedonistic relief from a city of suits and ties."

Among the club members and their guests, most in their 20's and 30's, were White House staff members, Capitol Hill aides, lawyers, publicists and lobbyists. About 90 percent of club members are Republican, and 80 percent work in government. Barbara and Jenna Bush have been known to show up at some of the parties, six a year, which provide a glimpse of Washington's young power elite with ties loosened, six years into the Republican domination of government.

When the cover band took a break at Swine on the Vine, guests crowded around the beer bong, eager to take their turn guzzling a can of beer poured down a funnel. A young man shook a portable outhouse because he knew his buddy was inside.

The dress code was preppy enough for a polo ground: women in pearl necklaces, lightweight wrap sweaters and jeans tucked into riding boots. Men favored oxford shirts with sunglasses strung around their necks. Jeff Kimbell, a lobbyist who is a former club president, wore a belt buckle made from a car's gearshift handle (with options for "drive and reverse," he said suggestively). Josh Overbay, who works for the United States Chamber of Commerce, wore a camouflage hat that said, "Support Wildlife. Drink Wild Turkey."

"Girls love to hate them," observed Bridget Bunner of the Capital Club's 100 men. Ms. Bunner, a 23-year-old fund-raiser for Democratic Congressman Alan B. Mollohan of West Virginia, added, "They're the kind of guys their moms want them to marry."

This summer, members sent each other Internet links to a Smirnoff ad on YouTube that parodied every cliché of the WASP elite, down to their seersucker suits and the popped collars of their polo shirts. It featured three blondes in pearls and tennis clothes, with young men rapping "where my WASP's at?" and calling haters "jealous because our families run the nation." Capital Club members said it reminded them of themselves.

Members of the club have connections throughout government, and in some cases are wired right into the brain trust at the White House: the Republican lobbying firm DCI Group, which has strong ties to the Republican Party chairman Ken Mehlman and the White House senior adviser Karl Rove, has sponsored its parties. But club members insist their gatherings are not about networking or advancing anyone's career or political agenda.

"If you want networking," said Jonathan Grella, 32, a public relations executive and Tom Delay's former press secretary, "go to a fund-raiser or a charity event, or go to Sally Quinn's house."

Even if this generation had a version of Ms. Quinn's house, the Capital Club partygoer would rather not drop by. "There's no one talking about issues in the beer line," said Jessica Clement, who dates a past president of the club and works for the DCI Group.

Jessica Cutler, the former congressional staff member whose blog, written under the pseudonym Washingtonienne, exposed several Washington men's sex lives, said she attended one party — uninvited — in 2004, and that was enough for her. But Washington is not like New York, she said, and there are not many opportunities for the young and ambitious to establish themselves on the social scene.

"Either you're dealing with college kids," she said of Washington's night life, "where you feel you're the oldest person there. Or you feel like you're way too young to be there because they're all old men."

Still, the Capital Club seems contrived, Ms. Cutler said. "It feels like these guys are young and they just came up with it, as opposed to it being an institution."

"That didn't appeal to me," she said, "but I can see why it appeals to the D.C. type. They do want to be on the board of the museum."

Many members do come from privileged backgrounds; Mississippi Gov. Haley Barbour's son, Reeves, is a member, as are West Virginia Rep. Shelley Moore Capito's son, Moore, and Georgia Senator Saxby Chambliss's son, Bo, a lobbyist, all Republicans. Billy Bush, President Bush's cousin and a host of "Access Hollywood," is a former member, as is John Breaux Jr., a lobbyist whose father is the former Democratic Louisiana senator.

But the club is, in some ways, populist. Annual dues are only $250. Anyone who buys a ticket can come to the parties. The cost for Swine on the Vine for nonmembers was $50 for men, $40 for women. At the end of the year, the club donates about $5,000 to charities like the American Red Cross.

"I hate when we get painted with that picture of a bunch of bratty kids or of a privileged young Republicans' club," said George Vincent, 25, a real estate developer. "I know a lot of the guys fit that, but not all. The Republican part works, but I'm not pretentious."

The club was formed in 1980 — the year Ronald Reagan was elected president — by five graduates of the University of Virginia and Washington and Lee, with the intent of recreating their fraternity parties.

"The first one, as it has been described to us, was three kegs of beer in a hotel ballroom in Crystal City, Virginia," said Mat Lapinski, 26, the current club president and a lobbyist with a Washington law firm.

DOJ_NMG_0084298

The Clinton years were not good for the club; according to some members, it tried to become too exclusive, restricting access to its parties. It could hardly refill its membership ranks. The return of the Republicans to Congress in the mid-90's marked the club's resurgence.

The club says 60 to 70 men try to join each year for the dozen spots that open up. A thousand people went to the Sinatra Soiree in July, where the "summer ahoy" dress code must have prompted a run on the J. Crew catalog. More than one guest carried a polo mallet as a walking stick.

Even with the polls this month showing Democrats threatening the Republican majority in Congress, and the House leadership under attack, members insisted that a shift in the balance of power in Washington would not dim the club's appeal, or its party-hearty spirit. The next gathering, a Halloween costume affair on Oct. 28, is 10 days before Election Day. Some members said they were looking forward to it as a timeout from the tense political season.

"It wouldn't matter if the Democrats controlled Congress or if Ralph Nader were president," said Mr. Kimbell, 35, the former president. "The club isn't about politics. It is precisely the opposite, as it gives members an opportunity to get away from politics for at least a little while, listen to some live music, throw down a few shots of Patrón and have a few howls with the boys. And perhaps enjoy the fruits of some of our lady guests."

The parties aren't so wild that anyone will be forced to issue a public apology the next day. This being Washington, Capital Club members are aware that once you damage your reputation, it's not easy to repair it. A lesson was learned from an experience with the Madison, a women's club similar to the Capital Club, after a member told The Hill newspaper that she "would be the ultimate trophy wife."

The same article called the Madison the female equivalent of the Capital Club. The Capital Club rushed out an e-mail message to the Madison's board insisting they "do not want the Madison to be referenced as the female equivalent to the club."

Mr. Lapinski, the Capital Club's president, said: "We have always welcomed everyone to our events. And some members worried that referring to the organizations as equivalents would have a negative impact on attendance at our events by our friends in the Junior League and other non-Madison ladies."

When the sun went down at Swine on the Vine, a few couples retreated to blankets by the bonfire, but the majority jammed together in front of the stage to hear the band, as if they were at a high school dance. Men on the sideline fired up cigars.

At the end of the night, 10 empty kegs were lined up as people danced to the last song, Journey's "Don't Stop Believin'." A young man stumbled out of the darkness while rebuttoning his untucked white shirt. Guests left in pairs, holding hands, while some single women consoled each other. "He's a dirtbag," one said.

"I just want to get out of here," her friend said.

A boisterous group piled into the Hummer limo, and all of the cars headed back to Washington together.

U.S. Treasury's Paulson Sells New York Condo For $8 Million (BLOOM)

By Sharon L. Crenson

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

Oct. 20 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, the former chief executive officer of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., sold his 50th floor condominium near Manhattan's Lincoln Center for almost $8 million, according to public records.

Paulson paid a total of $2.88 million for two apartments he bought and combined on West 67th Street, one in 1996 and the other in 1998. Tax on the re-sale was about $112,000, according to the New York City Register.

The median price for four-bedroom Manhattan apartments like Paulson's was just under $7 million in the third quarter, according to Miller Samuel Inc., the borough's largest appraiser. On the Upper West Side, it was about $7.2 million, and prices in that neighborhood may be poised to rise further, said Gregory J. Heym, chief economist for Terra Holdings, the parent company of New York City real estate brokers Brown Harris Stevens and Halstead Property.

``The West Side market in our latest report looked a little weak," Heym said ``The prices over there are going to shoot up."

Goldman, the world's most-profitable securities firm, last year paid Paulson $38.3 million in salary, stock and options, making him Wall Street's most highly-compensated executive in 2005. After he was confirmed on June 28 as Treasury secretary, the firm said it would give him an $18.7 million cash bonus for the first half of 2006. As Treasury secretary, he earns $183,500 per year. Treasury spokeswoman Brookly McLaughlin didn't immediately return a call seeking comment from Paulson.

The apartment sale was first reported in the New York Post.

Nine-Room Condo

Paulson and wife Wendy J. Paulson sold their nine-room condo for $7,995,000 just as that type of apartment building is becoming more popular in New York. About 70 percent of the city's multi- family stock is in co-operatives where residents sit on boards that review the finances and private lives of potential buyers. Condos don't require such approval and are more likely to be newly constructed.

DOJ_NMG_0084299

The number of Manhattan apartment sales, both condominium and co-op, rose 9.3 percent to 2,113 in the third quarter, gaining 5.8 percent from a year ago, according to the Miller Samuel report.

Fueled by Wall Street bonus money, New York apartment prices gained 73 percent over the past five years, making Manhattan the most expensive urban market in the U.S.

Investment banks such as Goldman Sachs and Morgan Stanley handed out a record $21.5 billion in bonuses at the end of 2005, according to New York State Comptroller Alan Hevesi.

The Paulsons have another home in Barrington, Illinois, according to New York City documents.

U.S. new-house prices will fall this year for the first time since 1991 and existing homes will have the smallest gain ever, the National Association of Realtors said this month. The U.S. median price for a new home probably will dip 0.2 percent to $240,500, the first decline since a drop of 2.4 percent 15 years ago. The price for previously owned homes likely will rise 1.6 percent to $223,000, the smallest gain on record.

Neil Binder, co-owner of Manhattan's Bellmarc brokerage, said media coverage of the slowing U.S. housing market has sparked sales.

``When the press came out that the world was coming to an end, it stimulated a lot of activity,'' he said.

Flexing Our Muscles In Space (NYT)

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

The Bush administration has adopted a jingoistic and downright belligerent tone toward space operations. In a new "national space policy" posted without fanfare on an obscure government Web site, and in recent speeches, it has signaled its determination to be pre-eminent in space — as it is in air power and sea power — while opposing any treaties that might curtail any American action there.

This chest-thumping is being portrayed as a modest extension of the Clinton administration's space policy issued a decade ago. And so far there is no mention of putting American weapons in space. But the more aggressive tone of the Bush policy may undercut international cooperation on civilian space projects — a goal to which the new policy subscribes — or set off an eventual arms race in space.

The new policy reflects the worst tendencies of the Bush administration — a unilateral drive for supremacy and a rejection of treaties. And it comes just as the White House is desperately seeking help to rein in the nuclear programs of North Korea and Iran. That effort depends heavily on cooperation from China and Russia, two countries with their own active space programs.

The administration regards the policy as a necessary update to reflect how important space is becoming for the American economy and defense. But outside experts who have parsed the language are struck by how forceful and nationalistic it sounds.

Whereas the 1996 policy opened with assurances that the United States would pursue greater levels of partnership and cooperation in space, the new policy states: "In this new century, those who effectively utilize space will enjoy added prosperity and security and will hold a substantial advantage over those who do not. Freedom of action in space is as important to the United States as air power and sea power."

The only solace is that the new policy does not endorse placing weapons in space or fighting in, through or from space, as the Air Force has been urging. But neither does it rule out these activities.

In keeping with the more muscular stance, the administration is also opposing any negotiations on a treaty to prevent an arms race in outer space — arguing that it may impede America's ability to defend its satellites from ground-based weapons. That seems shortsighted. An international treaty to keep space free of weapons might well provide greater security than a unilateral declaration that we will do whatever we have to do to preserve our own space assets.

Michael Griffin, the NASA administrator, insisted he did not intend to sound jingoistic when he addressed a conference in Spain this month — but he sure came across that way. He wondered aloud what language future settlers of the Moon and Mars would speak. "Will my language be passed down over the generations to future lunar colonies?" he asked. "Or will another, bolder or more persistent culture surpass our efforts and put their own stamp on the predominant lunar society of the far future?"

We fear the old notion that space might provide the perfect arena for international cooperation may be yielding to a new era of competition — one not seen since the cold war race to the moon.

Farm Insurance Racket (WP)

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

IF WE ASKED Congress to spend billions making the newspaper business a risk-free enterprise, our editorial would be laughed out of the Capitol. Yet that is essentially the deal American farmers -- and the insurance companies that profit from their government-sponsored premiums -- get from the federal government every year. The result, according to a two-part Post investigation published this week, is billions of federal dollars wasted in unfair and uncompetitive handouts, many of which go to farmers working land that would be left fallow in a freer market.

DOJ_NMG_0084300

The Post's study found that many farmers benefit not only from government-backed, cut-rate farm insurance but also from federal disaster relief funds. This double-dipping means that farmers who lose 35 percent or more of a crop can recoup up to 95 percent of the money they would have gotten from selling their harvest. Ironically, Congress approved a complex public-private scheme that offers cheap farm insurance to all comers in order to wean farmers off disaster aid. Yet even now that the federal government pays, on average, 60 percent of farmers' premiums, lawmakers continue to pass redundant emergency aid for afflicted farmers.

Because of the government largess, farmers in parts of the country that are less than hospitable to productive agriculture continue to plant -- and eat up federal money. Post investigators Gilbert M. Gaul, Dan Morgan and Sarah Cohen revealed, for example, that over the past four years, Mark Orebaugh, a farmer in parched southwestern Kansas, paid $81,730 in insurance premiums and received $295,796 back in claims, more than 3 1/2 times what he put in. He has also taken disaster aid on top of that, as significant portions of his crop were destroyed in four of the past six years. In the past 10 years, four of every 10 dollars in disaster relief went to only four states -- Kansas, North Dakota, South Dakota and Texas. More than half of all farm payouts are concentrated in 25 congressional districts.

Unproductive farmers are not the only ones taking advantage. The insurance companies that work with the government to provide farm disaster coverage have seen their profits balloon in recent years. The federal government sets the price for coverage, helps farmers pay it and reimburses insurers for administrative costs. The insurance companies then shift the liability for their most risky accounts onto taxpayers. Last year, these farm insurers posted profits of $927 million and took $829 million in administrative fees from the government.

Nevertheless, North Dakota farmer Terry Aronson unpretentiously defended the system to Post reporters. "Taxpayers are funding something good, the rural life." Yet most Americans -- removed from "the rural life" in urban and suburban communities -- pay not only the opportunity cost of funneling money to farmers but also the incalculable costs of failed trade talks, which hurt the American consumer. America has a sentimental attachment to its farmlands. But preserving the rural life of a few, unproductive farmers is not worth the price it pays to do it.

OTHER NEWS:

Dow Closes Out Week Riding Crest Of 12,000 (WP/AP)

By Tim Paradis

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

NEW YORK, Oct. 20 -- Wall Street ended a record-setting week narrowly mixed Friday, with the Dow Jones industrial average falling to close at slightly more than 12,000 after a lackluster profit report and forecast from Caterpillar Inc. prompted many investors to retreat.

Caterpillar, one of the 30 blue-chip stocks that make up the Dow, unnerved investors who have bet that the slowing economy would pull off a soft landing rather than tip into recession.

"Caterpillar must have taken about 60 to 70 points off the Dow," said Stephen Carl, head of equity trading at Williams Capital Group.

It was optimism about the economy and rising hopes for strong third-quarter earnings that had lifted the Dow into uncharted territory this week. The blue chip index, reaching its first 1,000-point milestone in 7 1/2 years, traded past 12,000 for the first time Wednesday and had its first close above that mark on Thursday.

On Friday, the Dow closed down 9.36, or 0.08 percent, at 12,002.37. Broader stock indicators showed modest gains after spending much of the session with losses. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index rose 1.64, or 0.12 percent, to 1,368.60. The Nasdaq composite index rose 1.36, or 0.06 percent, to 2,342.30 after a strong earnings report from Google Inc.

For the week, the Dow rose 0.35 percent, the S&P gained 0.22 percent and the Nasdaq fell 0.64 percent. The Dow had shown triple-digit point gains in each of the previous three weeks.

Despite the overall gains in the market, the S&P stands about 10.4 percent below its high close of 1,527.46 and the Nasdaq is even further off, about 54 percent. All three indexes had peaked in early 2000 before plunging in response to the dot-com bust, recession and the aftermath of the 2001 terror attacks.

Joe Battipaglia, chief investment officer at Ryan Beck & Co., contends that while earnings reports have been sound over all companies are coming in with more guarded forecasts. He also is concerned that falling oil prices could indicate the economy is slowing too quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0084301

"Caterpillar today was sort of a splash of cold water on the notion that this economy is in the perfect place and will continue to be in the perfect place," Battipaglia said.

Caterpillar fell $10.02 or 14.5 percent, to $59 despite a 15 percent increase in its third-quarter profit. Though the company sold more construction and mining equipment, it warned increased operating costs and weaker-than-expected sales would cut into its full-year profits.Movers

Merck rose $1.15, to $45.64, after reporting stronger-than-expected earnings and revenue, though earnings were down 34 percent and sales were flat.

Vical rose 53 cents, to $5.88. The developer of gene-based therapies said a trial of its bird flu vaccine effectively protected ferrets against a lethal strain of the virus. It hopes to begin testing the vaccine in humans soon.

SanDisk fell $12.59, to $49.15. The maker of flash-memory chips posted a 4 percent decline in third-quarter profit and forecast prices would fall as much as 20 percent in the fourth quarter.

Arch Coal fell $2.22, to $32.04, after the company lowered its full-year profit forecast because of weakness in the domestic market. Arch Coal also said that its third-quarter profit nearly tripled as its operating costs fell.Indexes

New York Stock Exchange composite index rose 1.22, to 8,702.03.

American Stock Exchange index rose 3.58, to 1,936.66.

Russell 2000 index of smaller-company stocks fell 5.26, to 762.13.Volume

NYSE: 2.57 billion shares, down from 2.65 billion on Thursday. Declining issues outnumbered advancers by about 3 to 2.

Nasdaq: 1.88 billion shares, down from 1.97 billion. Decliners outnumbered advancers.Commodities

Crude oil for November delivery: $56.82, down $1.68.

Gold for current delivery: $593, down from $599 on Thursday.

Blue Chips Pause For Oxygen At 12000 Level (WSJ)

By Michael Hudson

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average paused in its march to new records but finished above the 12000 level for the second straight session -- just barely.

After trading lower for much of the session, the blue-chip average rallied in the waning minutes of trading Friday afternoon to finish at 12002.37, down 9.36 points, or 0.1%. It ended the week up 41.86 points, or 0.3%, and is up 12% for the year.

"The mood swings have been pretty intense," said Edward Yardeni, chief investment strategist for Akron, Ohio, money manager Oak Associates Ltd., "Nobody wants to believe that things are as good as they are."

After 10 upward moves in the last 14 trading sessions, some market watchers think the Dow industrials are poised to take a breather, at least for the short term.

The stock market is "still nervous and jittery and will likely be so for the next week or so, until we're done with earnings season," said Brian Reynolds, chief market strategist for M.S. Howells, a Scottsdale, Ariz., brokerage firm. "Eventually we'll work through that and start moving up again."

The blue-chip average was dragged down Friday by heavy-equipment maker Caterpillar, one of 30 Dow components, which fell nearly 15% after reporting earnings below analysts' expectations.

Other indexes rose yesterday. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained 0.1%, or 1.64 points, to finish at 1368.60, up 0.2% for the week and 9.6% for the year. The Nasdaq gained 0.06%, or 1.36, to 2342.30, down 0.6% for the week but up 6.2% year-to-date.

Despite the disappointing earnings report from Caterpillar, most companies have been reporting solid numbers, according to data provider Thomson Financial. Earnings of companies in the S&P 500 are now projected to have jumped 16% in the third quarter over last year, Thomson said.

In major market action:

Stocks rose; bonds were mostly flat. The price of the 10-year Treasury note stayed pat, yielding 4.788%. The 30-year bond rose 1/32, or 31.25 cents for every $1,000 invested, to yield 4.909%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 118.69 yen, compared with 118.16. The euro fell against the dollar to $1.2619 from $1.2618.

U.S. Stocks Rise As Google, 3M Beat Profit Estimates, Oil Falls (BLOOM)

By Nick Baker

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084302

Oct. 20 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. stocks preserved their fourth straight weekly gain as earnings at Google Inc. and 3M Co. beat analysts' estimates and oil dropped below $57 a barrel, lifting companies that depend on consumer spending.

``Everyone's waiting for things to slow down here, but the information we are getting from corporate America is that things are fine," said Philip Tasho, who helps manage $450 million as chief investment officer at Tamro Capital Partners in Alexandria, Virginia.

Merck & Co. reached a two-year high after saying earnings will rise more than previously forecast. Coca-Cola Co. rallied after Merrill Lynch & Co. put it on a list of favored stocks.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell after Caterpillar Inc., the best-performing member during the past four years, said a slowing U.S. economy may reduce earnings growth. The average slid 9.36, or 0.1 percent, to 12,002.37. Caterpillar knocked 80 points off the measure for the day.

The Standard & Poor's 500 Index rose 1.64, or 0.1 percent, to 1368.60. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 1.36, or 0.1 percent, to 2342.30.

For the week, the S&P 500 increased 0.2 percent, while the Dow average gained 0.4 percent and the Nasdaq fell 0.6 percent.

Google soared $33.61, or 7.9 percent, to $459.67 for the S&P 500's biggest gain. Net income at the world's most-used Internet search engine almost doubled to $733.4 million. Profit excluding stock-based compensation costs was $2.62 a share. On average, analysts predicted $2.42, according to Thomson Financial.

Google's Prospects

Citigroup Inc. raised its price estimate for Google shares by 9.1 percent to $600. ``If retail this holiday season shapes up to be exceptionally strong, then Google could be a major beneficiary," analysts including Mark Mahaney wrote.

3M, maker of products from Post-it Notes to electronic road signs, advanced $2.07 to $78.47. Third-quarter net income rose 6.4 percent on acquisitions and sales of optical film for flat- panel television screens. Per-share profit was $1.17 excluding some items, topping analysts' $1.12 average estimate in a Thomson survey.

Merck gained $1.15 to $45.64. It raised its 2006 earnings forecast for the third time this year, to $2.18 to $2.25 a share from the prior $2.10-to-$2.24 projection.

With today's rally, the drugmaker's shares reclaimed all of their losses after Merck in September 2004 withdrew Vioxx, the world's second-best selling painkiller at the time, because of a potential link to heart attacks and strokes.

Coca-Cola's Gain

Coca-Cola gained $1.84 to $46.75. Merrill Lynch added the shares to its ``Focus 1" list, a day after profit at the world's biggest soft-drink maker beat analysts' estimates. Merrill's Christine Farkas increased forecasts for 2006, 2007 and 2008 earnings.

Caterpillar, the world's biggest maker of earthmoving equipment, tumbled more than 14 percent, the most since October 1987. The shares lost $10.02 to $59.

The company's results come a day after financial companies including Citigroup posted disappointing earnings and a report on leading economic indicators signaled a slowdown.

A weakening economy may soon put an end to a streak of 10 percent-plus growth in quarterly earnings. S&P 500 profit will increase 8.8 percent in the first three months of 2007, according to Thomson today. Double-digit rises in the third and fourth quarters would push the winning streak to 14 quarters, the longest in five decades.

Caterpillar Forecast

In 2007, Caterpillar's revenue will be little changed to up 5 percent, with per-share profit little changed to up 10 percent from the middle of its 2006 forecast. The company's third-quarter profit rose less than analysts' forecasts.

Crude for November delivery declined 2.9 percent to $56.82 a barrel in New York, the lowest close since Nov. 29, as traders said the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries will fail to cut production by 1.2 million barrels a day as planned. Prices have plunged 28 percent from a record of $78.40 reached July 14.

Exxon Mobil Corp., the world's biggest oil company, lost 18 cents to $69.55. Valero Energy Corp., the largest U.S. refiner, slipped 85 cents to $52.09.

Telephone, health-care and so-called consumer-staples companies, which have a reputation as havens in an economic slump, led the S&P 500's advance. The Russell Top 50, a gauge of 50 of the largest U.S. companies, added 0.6 percent on expectations the group will also weather a slowdown.

AT&T, Verizon

AT&T Inc., the biggest U.S. phone company, gained 69 cents to $34.44. Verizon Communications Inc., AT&T's closest rival, added 59 cents to $37.80.

Food, beverage and other consumer-staples stocks gained.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. added 88 cents to $49.37. The world's largest retailer is ``changing for the better, rapidly," Oppenheimer analyst Bernard Sosnick wrote.

Airlines gained following oil's decline and a debt-rating upgrade by Fitch Ratings for AMR Corp. and Continental Airlines Inc. The risk of a ``liquidity crisis" at the pair has been ``reduced dramatically," according to Fitch.

The AMEX Airline Index rose 3.1 percent. AMR, the parent of American Airlines, advanced $1.42 to $27.70. Continental added $2.40 to $35.05. JetBlue Airways Corp. climbed 26 cents to $10.92.

Steelmakers in the S&P 500 declined 1.2 percent after India's Tata Steel Ltd. agreed to buy Corus Group Plc, creating the world's fifth-largest steel producer, for less than some investors expected. U.S. Steel Corp., the biggest U.S.-based steel company, fell $1.37 to $66.18.

S&P 500 shares, called Spiders, increased 3 cents to $136.84. Nasdaq-100 tracking shares, known by their QQQQ symbol, added 10 cents to $42.

S&P 500 futures expiring in December advanced 0.60 to 1374.90 on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. Nasdaq-100 Index futures slipped 4 to 1718.75.

The Russell 2000 Index, a benchmark for companies with a median market value of $642.7 million, fell 0.7 percent to 762.13. The Dow Jones Wilshire 5000 Total Market Index, the broadest measure of U.S. shares, added 0.1 percent to 13,690.51. Based on its gain, the value of stocks increased by $23.9 billion.

AMR Corp. (AMR US) AT&T Inc. (T US) Caterpillar Inc. (CAT US) Coca-Cola Co. (KO US) Continental Airlines Inc. (CAL US) Exxon Mobil Corp. (XOM US) Google Inc. (GOOG US) JetBlue Airways Corp. (JBLU US) Merck & Co. (MRK US) 3M Co. (MMM US) U.S. Steel Corp. (X US) Valero Energy Corp. (VLO US) Verizon Communications Inc. (VZ US) Wal-Mart Stores Inc. (WMT US)

Oil Tumbles Below $57 On Skepticism OPEC Will Make Output Cuts (BLOOM)

By Mark Shenk

Bloomberg, October 21, 2006

Oct. 20 (Bloomberg) -- Crude oil fell below $57 a barrel in New York for the first time this year as traders said OPEC members will fail to cut production by 1.2 million barrels a day as planned.

The 4.4 percent reduction starting Nov. 1 will be based on how much members were pumping last month, rather than quotas, United Arab Emirates Oil Minister Mohamed al-Hamli, who will become president of the group in 2007, said after members met in Doha, Qatar. Prices have plunged 28 percent from the record of $78.40 a barrel reached July 14.

``I'll be surprised if we see them cut even half the volumes promised," said Michael Lynch, president of Strategic Energy & Economic Research in Winchester, Massachusetts. ``If prices stay at this level for a few weeks we'll probably see some of the weaker members such as Venezuela and Algeria forget about their pledges."

Crude oil for November delivery fell $1.68, or 2.9 percent, to $56.82 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange, the lowest close since Nov. 29. Futures are down 3 percent this week and 6.9 percent from a year ago. The November contract expired today. The more-active December contract fell $1.17, or 1.9 percent, to close at $59.33 a barrel.

``The OPEC announcement may help explain why the spread between the November and December contracts grew today," said Jason Schenker, an economist with Wachovia Corp. in Charlotte, North Carolina. ``OPEC's cuts may have an impact but we won't feel it until December at the earliest."

Expected Reduction

OPEC's cutback was larger than the reduction that ministers had been talking about for the past two weeks and was endorsed by OPEC's biggest producer, Saudi Arabia, which will trim output by 380,000 barrels a day.

``We needed more to stabilize the market," Algerian Oil Minister Chakib Khelil said after the meeting. Members are ``unanimous" that they need to ensure price stability, OPEC President and Nigerian Oil Minister Edmund Daukoru told reporters today in Madrid. OPEC ministers are concerned about falling prices and rising U.S. stockpiles, Abdullah bin Hamad al-Attiyah, Qatar's oil minister, said in a phone interview on Oct. 11.

``When we advertised 1 million, the market didn't respond, so something more had to be done," Daukoru said in an interview.

OPEC may need to cut an additional 300,000 barrels a day when the group meets Dec. 14 in Abuja, Nigeria, Venezuelan Oil Minister Rafael Ramirez said today.

Appropriate Cut

``The cut seems appropriate given the increase in stockpiles," said Aaron Kildow, a broker at Prudential Financial Derivatives LLC in New York. ``The most bullish thing to come out of the meeting was the announcement that they may cut again when they meet in December."

DOJ_NMG_0084304

Prices may fall next week on doubts the producer group will cut production enough to reduce excess supplies, according to a Bloomberg News survey yesterday, before OPEC announced its decision. Twenty-one of 49 analysts, traders and brokers, or 43 percent, said prices will decline. Fourteen forecast an increase and 14 predicted little change.

``A cut of 1 million barrels was factored in so it looks like they decided to cut more to get the market's attention,'' said Rick Mueller, an analyst with Energy Security Analysis Inc. in Tilburg, the Netherlands. ``I doubt there will be a dramatic up-tick in prices because inventories are so high and uncertainty about what the members will actually cut.''

U.S. crude oil inventories surged 5.02 million barrels to 335.6 million last week, the Energy Department reported Oct. 18. It was the biggest increase since March and left stockpiles 14 percent higher than the five-year average for the week, the department said. The U.S. consumes 25 percent of the world's oil.

Heating Season

``Demand should rise in coming weeks because of the approach of heating season,'' Kildow said.

Global consumption peaks during the Northern Hemisphere winter, when furnaces are stoked. The International Energy Agency, which advises 26 industrialized nations on energy policy, said OPEC's decision was ill-timed because demand will increase as the heating season nears.

``I think this cut comes at the worst time possible,'' IEA Executive Director Claude Mandil said today in a phone interview. ``I don't like the idea of OPEC trying to defend prices of $60 a barrel.'' That is not ``helpful'' to consumer nations and poorer countries, he said.

Brent crude oil for December fell $1.19, or 2 percent, to close at $59.68 a barrel on the London-based ICE Futures exchange.

Oil Prices Drop Despite OPEC Call To Cut Output (WP)

By Steven Mufson, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

If yesterday was a test of the power of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, the cartel flunked.

Hours after the world's leading group of oil producers vowed to cut output by 1.2 million barrels a day to stop a three-month-old slide in petroleum prices, oil prices on world markets continued to head downward. Crude oil slipped $1.68 a barrel yesterday to close at less than $57 a barrel in New York markets for the first time this year.

Oil traders and analysts said they remained unconvinced that OPEC members would have enough discipline to trim production by more than half the amount announced. And it remained unclear whether that smaller amount would be enough to stabilize prices as OPEC hopes.

"There's still a lot of skepticism about the extent to which they'll cut or not," said Adam E. Sieminski, chief energy economist of Deutsche Bank AG.

Meanwhile, the drop in oil prices continued to provide a boost to the U.S. economy, especially for companies sensitive to fuel prices. The shares of major airlines, for example, jumped after analysts boosted earnings estimates for several big carriers. They cited lower prices of jet fuel, one of the industry's biggest costs. Shares of American Airlines parent AMR Corp. rose $1.42 a share, or 5.4 percent, to close at $27.70. Continental Airlines Inc. set a new 52-week high for a second consecutive day.

Even if the cuts materialize, it will take weeks for them to work their way through the supply chain. OPEC said the cuts will take effect Nov. 1, but it would be several weeks before any change showed up on U.S. shores.

"The market is going to wait until it sees evidence that OPEC has cut back supply to a significant degree. And that's going to take time," said James Burkhard, managing director of the global oil group at Cambridge Energy Research Associates. He said that supply agreements for November had already been set. "So we're not likely to see much evidence of a cut until December," he said.

In the absence of a measurable supply effect, the initial verdict on the production cuts was rendered by traders and investors based on psychology and expectations. "We are in the throes of momentum traders," said the head of commodity trading at a U.S. hedge fund, who requested anonymity so as not to disclose his position to competitors. "They don't care about demand for oil. All they care about is whether trends are broken. Those guys are in full control."

And the trend lines are pointing the opposite direction from the way they were looking earlier in the year. As a result, many of the speculative investors and hedge funds that were buying from February through August are now selling their energy positions.

"OPEC says it will defend a number and the assumption everyone makes is that $60 [a barrel] is that number," Sieminski said. "So there's a temptation to sell below that to force their hand and say, 'Let's see how many aces you're holding.' So what the Saudis and OPEC have to do to convince the speculators is to show that they have more than deuces in their hand."

DOJ_NMG_0084305

Even analysts trying to look past today's market and calibrate real supply and demand two or three months from now were uncertain about what the balance would be. OPEC's own forecasts for next year are relatively pessimistic from the cartel's point of view. It sees world oil consumption rising by a relatively modest 1.3 million barrels a day and non-OPEC oil production rising by 1.8 million barrels a day, thus cutting demand for OPEC's oil.

But the Energy Department's Energy Information Administration sees a bigger increase in usage and a smaller increase in non-OPEC demand, resulting in a small increase in demand for OPEC oil.

Burkhard said that the uncertainty stems from an unclear picture of world economic growth and the conservation response to oil prices that have been very high for more than a year. Additional supplies next year will be coming from Canada; Brazil; West Africa, mostly Angola; and the Caspian Sea region, from Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan.

Even if OPEC succeeds in cutting world production below global consumption, which this year is running around 84.6 million barrels a day according to the International Energy Agency, ample inventories will soften the impact for a while. The IEA estimates that the 30 members of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development have 55 days of oil in storage, up one day from last year and slightly more than usual.

Burkhard said that another factor in prices would be the gradual buildup of spare production capacity. In 2002, the world had about 7 million barrels a day of spare oil production capacity, about 10 percent of consumption then, that could be tapped if a geopolitical crisis disrupted supplies somewhere. By some estimates, that cushion had shrunk to about 1 million barrels a day while consumption had grown. That contributed to what many called a "fear factor" in the oil price, especially as tensions rose between the United States and Iran over Tehran's insistence on continuing its nuclear program without international restrictions.

Burkhard estimated that OPEC's current spare capacity is about 2.4 million barrels a day and would rise to 2.8 million barrels a day next year, without counting production capacity currently shut in by violence in Iraq and Nigeria.

"One of the reasons prices rose so high earlier this year was the fear about what could happen," Burkhard said. "It was driven by the thin cushion of spare production capacity. If OPEC now cuts back on production at the same time that it is adding capacity, then we are likely to see a bigger cushion of spare capacity, which would diminish the impact of geopolitical fears on the oil price."

Texas Justice Who Spoke For Bush Pick Is Cleared (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 20 — A Texas Supreme Court justice who championed a longtime friend and fellow Republican, Harriet E. Miers, for the United States Supreme Court last year was cleared Friday of charges that his efforts had violated state rules of judicial ethics.

The justice, Nathan. L. Hecht, 57, who is running for re-election, had received a public admonition, the mildest form of sanction, from the State Commission on Judicial Conduct. It said he had discredited the judiciary by giving about 120 interviews that amounted to an endorsement of another candidate and a lending of judicial prestige to a private interest.

But three appellate justices appointed as a Special Court of Review to hear Justice Hecht's appeal overturned the reprimand, which had carried no civil or criminal penalty.

The true villain, a court majority said, was the ambiguity of the rules adopted by the Texas Supreme Court, the state's highest civil court, on which Justice Hecht has sat since 1989. Two of the three justices agreed with Justice Hecht that the ethics rules were improperly vague and did not apply to what he had done, at the urging of the White House, to further Ms. Miers's bid for the nation's highest court.

A third member of the special court found that Justice Hecht had violated the rules, but that they were unconstitutional because they limited his freedom of speech.

"I'm grateful to see it; I think they reached the right decision," Justice Hecht, the longest-serving member of the Texas Supreme Court, said by telephone after the ruling. He said he had expected to be vindicated, but the court would now have to grapple with rewriting the ethics code.

"We never thought about judges having free speech rights," he said. Revisions of the rules are "already in the mill," he added, "but there's still a lot of fog out there."

The case raised some perplexing questions. Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania and chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has said he had been prepared to call Justice Hecht as a witness if the Miers nomination had not faltered.

Would it have been proper for the justice to speak forcefully for Ms. Miers in the hearing room, but not outside it? If he had stayed silent in the face of questions about Ms. Miers, the justice testified, would that, too, not have been taken as a powerful negative comment, in view of their close 30-year friendship?

DOJ_NMG_0084306

And most peculiarly, Justice Hecht testified, if the rules prevent judges from speaking out in support of a candidate, why do they allow comments in opposition?

The opinion by the special court, an appellate panel drawn at random by the Texas Supreme Court, found that the ethics code, or canons, had “a complete lack of definitions of critical terms” involving what judges cannot do to support or endorse candidates for public office.

“There is no bright line of demarcation between acceptable and prohibited conduct,” the ruling said. “We decline to come down on the side of condemnation in the face of what we perceive as undeniably obvious: the ambiguity, confusion and apparent contradictions in the content, interpretation and application of the canons.” It was signed by Justices Kerry P. Fitzgerald and Amos L. Mazzant, both Republicans from Dallas.

The third justice, Ann Crawford McClure, a Democrat from El Paso, agreed to reverse the admonition of Justice Hecht, but for different reasons. In her concurring opinion, Justice McClure wrote that Justice Hecht had broken the rules by appealing for support for Ms. Miers, thereby “endorsing” her and authorizing the use of his name and judicial office “to sell the Miers nomination.” She also found that it had been in Ms. Miers’s “private interest.”

Moreover, Justice McClure said, because Justice Hecht said he had seen nothing wrong with his conduct and would do it again, “the evidence supports a finding that Justice Hecht willfully violated the canons.”

Still, she said, since judges can make political contributions — “a Texas judge may put his money where his mouth can’t go,” as she put it — she agreed that the rules imposed unconstitutional limits on his freedom of speech. And so, she said, the sanctions had to be reversed.

Because the majority opinion did not rely on constitutional issues, it left little ground for an appeal to the United States Supreme Court.

The case also left much unclear. “Thirty-seven-hundred judges want to know what to do,” Justice McClure wrote. New rules would have to be devised, she said, but she suggested to her fellow jurists: “Our ability to speak does not mean that we should speak. I haven’t and I won’t.”

No Reprimand In Judge's Support Of Miers (AP-Y)

By Angela K. Brown

AP, October 21, 2006

A three-judge panel dismissed the reprimand of a Texas Supreme Court justice who publicly endorsed his friend Harriet Miers after her short-lived U.S. Supreme Court nomination.

In a ruling announced Friday, the panel of appeals court judges said Nathan Hecht did not violate state rules that bar judges from lending their office's prestige to boost the private interests of themselves or others, and from using their names to endorse candidates for office.

"This is complete vindication for Justice Hecht," said his attorney, Chip Babcock. "It removes the only blemish on a 20-plus-year record of service to the state."

The State Commission on Judicial Conduct had admonished Hecht in May after two complaints were filed against him.

Hecht had told White House staff to send him all media inquiries about Mier's career and campaigned for her in about 120 newspaper, radio and television interviews, the commission said.

Mark Greenwald, an attorney for the commission, said the panel had expected that outcome and was glad that Hecht got his day in court. But he said that the commission had no guidance on rules for the conduct of other judges.

"It does signal our fears will be realized of endorsement shenanigans," he said.

Hecht had argued that he did not violate any ethics codes and had the right to free speech.

Miers was nominated last October by President Bush to replace the retiring Sandra Day O'Connor, but she dropped out under fire from conservatives who questioned her qualifications and would not support her.

Hecht, who worked with Miers in a Dallas law firm starting in the 1970s, said he didn't mean to endorse her, rather he wanted to provide information about her qualifications. He said he felt compelled to comment because being silent would have been perceived as trying to hide something about Miers.

Bush Drops In At Italian-American Dinner (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 21, 2006

President Bush made a surprise appearance Friday night at a National Italian American Foundation dinner show featuring Frankie Valli and the Four Seasons.

"I'm sorry I'm not going to be around to hear you," said Bush, who stunned the crowd when he slipped on stage.

DOJ_NMG_0084307

The president recognized famous faces in the audience, including Justices Samuel Alito Jr. and Antonin Scalia, New York Yankees baseball legend Yogi Berra and Tommy Lasorda, the longtime manager of the Los Angeles Dodgers. Then his remarks turned serious.

Bush recognized one prominent Italian American, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who was missing from the annual gathering that attracted more than 1,000 people to a Washington hotel. Bush said he would be meeting with Pace and other military leaders on Saturday to discuss the U.S. strategy for addressing ongoing violence in Iraq.

"We're in a titanic struggle between extremists and radicals who cannot stand the way of life of America," Bush said. "They don't like the thought that people from different backgrounds are able to live under a nation and work together and achieve greatness. They can't stand the thought of free societies flourishing in their midst."

The National Italian American Foundation promotes the contributions of nearly 25 million Italian Americans, who represent the fifth largest ethnic and voting group in the nation. Bush's appearance continued a three-decade tradition of every president attending the annual convention.

____

On the Net:

National Italian America Foundation http://www.niaf.org

White House http://www.whitehouse.gov

Ads Accuse Dems Of Not Protecting Kids (AP-Y)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, October 21, 2006

The text is white against a black screen. The sound is the electronic warbling of a video game. But in this political ad, the message is in the faceless voices of cheerful children engaged in mayhem.

"Hit the hooker with the tire iron!" "Steal the old lady's car." "Shoot her first!"

The ad accuses a Democratic candidate of voting against banning the sale of violent and sexually explicit video games to children. Another ad, in Connecticut, says a Democrat voted to permit convicted sex offenders in public housing. Yet another, in Arizona, linked a candidate's work as a lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union to the ACLU's defense of a pedophile's group.

In the fallout from former Rep. Mark Foley's electronic sex scandal, Republicans are turning the tables on Democrats, airing ads and leveling public accusations claiming their opponents have failed to protect children against sexual imagery, sexual violence or sexual predators.

It's a case that Republicans have made against Democrats for some time. But the portrayal of Democrats as weak in the defense of children now also serves as a counterpoint to Democratic charges that GOP leaders did little to protect teenage congressional pages against Foley's sexually explicit electronic messages.

"I don't think it would be getting much national attention if it wasn't for the Foley case," said Tom McClusky, vice president of government affairs for the conservative Family Research Council.

To be sure, the attention to sex and allegations of sex in this election is not limited to Foley or the voting records or professional associations of certain candidates. In Pennsylvania, Republican Rep. Don Sherwood has been dogged by an extramarital affair he acknowledged last year. In Nevada, a cocktail waitress accused Republican Rep. Jim Gibbons, who is running for governor, of propositioning her and assaulting her in a parking garage. Gibbons on Thursday denied the accusation.

In a handful of other races, Republicans have raised the image of a fringe organization, the North American Man Boy Love Association, and tried to link Democrats to it through their votes or their association with the ACLU. The civil liberties organization defended NAMBLA in a 2000 First Amendment case.

In Arizona, Republican Rep. Rick Renzi aired an ad citing his challenger's work for the ACLU and the ACLU's defense of the man-boy love organization. In California, Republican Rep. John Doolittle accused his challenger, Charlie Brown, of supporting NAMBLA because he has an ACLU membership. And in Ohio, Republican gubernatorial candidate Ken Blackwell accused his Democratic opponent, Rep. Ted Strickland, of siding with NAMBLA because he voted against a resolution condemning an article in a psychology journal about child sexual abuse.

"Republicans are running a hyper-negative campaign to close out this election season because they are so far behind," said Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "But voters are smarter than these ridiculous Republican charges give them credit for."

The ad featuring children playing a violent video game is aimed at Rep. Baron Hill, a Democrat and former House member who is trying to recapture his seat from Republican Rep. Mike Sodrel. It cites Hill's vote in 1999 against an amendment to a juvenile crime bill that would have prohibited the sale of violent and sexually explicit movies and video games to teenagers. The amendment failed after lawmakers argued against it on First Amendment grounds. Ninety-two Republicans also voted against the measure.

DOJ_NMG_0084308

But Democrats are seeking to inoculate themselves against such charges. In New Mexico, state Attorney General Patricia Madrid, a Democrat who is challenging Republican Rep. Heather Wilson, has run an ad highlighting the work of her office's Internet sex crimes prosecution unit. In Colorado, Democratic House candidate Ed Perlmutter aired an ad emphasizing his commitment to children.

"In Congress," he says, "I'll fight to pass laws protecting kids from online predators and violent video games."

Helping Democrats Bridge The 'God Gap' (WP)

By Daniel Burke

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

At a meeting of the House Democrats' Faith Working Group, a perplexed congressman turned to his colleagues for pastoral guidance. How could he counter a local preacher who argued that all of Jesus's moral teachings were about the world to come, not the here and now?

Rep. David E. Price (D-N.C.) stood amid the sympathetic sighs and "you can't convert everyone" comments to offer a new spin on an old parable.

The Good Samaritan is walking down the road and cares for a stranger who has been beaten and robbed, Price said. The next day, on the same road, another person has been beaten and robbed. So it goes for another week -- more robberies, more victims.

"How long is it going to take before the Samaritan says, 'Hey, maybe we ought to patrol this road,' " Price said. In other words, the lawmaker argued, there are some problems that individuals can't solve on their own. They require the resources of a morally responsible government.

As Democrats seek to reframe America's debate over moral values and close their "God gap" with religious communities, conversations such as these are blowing like a mighty wind through party circles.

Gone are the days when "faith outreach" meant visiting African-American churches two weeks before an election, party leaders say. Instead, Democrats are seeking -- and getting -- regular meetings with megachurch pastors T.D. Jakes, Joel Osteen and Rick Warren.

Rather than cede red states to Republicans, the party is buying airtime on Christian radio stations, with the message that Democrats are indeed a party with deep moral convictions.

No longer leaning on 1960s-era preachers to guide progressive politics, Democrats are now also turning to young voices such as strategist Mara Vanderslice, 31, and writer Amy Sullivan, 33, who offer new perspectives and fresh ideas.

While Republicans learned long ago how to connect with religious voters, Democrats are just now starting their efforts.

After interviews with dozens of politicians, strategists, the think-tank set and a Noah's ark of religious leaders, Religion News Service has identified 12 of the most influential voices in helping Democrats reach people of faith. Those on the list are whispering in the ears of the powerful and playing matchmaker between religious and political pace-setters.

They are:

Â· The House Trinity : Reps. James E. Clyburn (S.C.), Rosa L. DeLauro (Conn.) and David Price, who lead the effort on Capitol Hill to frame legislative debates in moral terms.

Â· The Theologian : Shaun Casey, an ethicist at Washington's Wesley Theological Seminary, who provides a moral and historical framework for progressive faith-based politics.

Â· The Preacher : Leah Daughtry, chief of staff at the Democratic National Committee, who champions outreach to religious voters at party headquarters.

Â· The Model : Timothy M. Kaine, governor of Virginia, who showed Democrats how a faith-infused campaign can turn a red state blue.

Â· The Insider : Michael McCurry, former White House press secretary, who coaxes Washington Democrats into sharing their spiritual sides.

Â· The Blessed One : Barack Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, who challenges his party to make room for religion in the public square.

Â· The Prophet : Rabbi David Saperstein, head of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, who is one of Washington's most articulate voices in liberal politics.

Â· The Matchmaker : Burns Strider, a staffer who shepherds the House Democratic Faith Working Group and corrals lawmakers into meetings with the religious community.

DOJ_NMG_0084309

Â· The Agitator : Amy Sullivan, an independent but opinionated journalist who pens passionate pleas for Democrats to "get religion."

Â· The Strategist : Mara Vanderslice of the consulting firm Common Good Strategies, who works the campaign trail, helping candidates build relationships with diverse religious communities.

In some ways, these 12 people reflect the diversity for which Democrats pride themselves. They include a former Churches of Christ minister, a Pentecostal preacher, two Catholics, a Methodist Sunday school teacher, an Episcopalian, a progressive evangelical, Baptists and a rabbi.

Some at Democratic Party headquarters are taking an under-the-radar approach to religious outreach and are reluctant to divulge all the party's plans and advisers.

"Our focus is not in putting someone behind a pulpit," said Leslie Brown, the DNC's "faith in action" coordinator. But after conducting polls, meeting with state party chairs and undertaking an "internal education," Democrats are building a "message-driven machine," Brown said.

"We want to talk about things in ways we can relate to the faith community," said Rep. Clyburn, who heads the Faith Working Group. "I don't talk about the environment just as keeping things green, I talk about it in terms of stewardship."

But while recent polls suggest evangelicals may be growing disillusioned with Republicans, many are still reluctant to pull the lever for Democratic candidates, said the Rev. Richard Cizik, vice president of the National Association of Evangelicals.

"Simply using 'faith language' won't redound to the benefit of any candidate, Republican or Democrat, without some authenticity there," Cizik said.

"When evangelicals think about the reputation of the Republican Party, which isn't too good right now, at least it does have a record of reaching out to those voters and it does have a record on Capitol Hill of at least trying to carry water for their issues," Cizik said.

Still, there are issues such as the environment, poverty, war and health care on which Democratic positions dovetail with those of many religious Americans, party leaders say.

"It's not always pretty," Casey of Wesley Theological Seminary said of Democrats' fledgling efforts to reach these voters. "But the good news is everybody realizes the party has to do a better job."

Politics Why The Center Matters In This Election (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

BILLINGS, Mont. -- As candidates head into the final two weeks of midterm election campaigns, Democrats see an opportunity as wide as the Rocky Mountain skies. The question, here and elsewhere, is whether they can hold high ground in the place that matters most in 2006.

That place, oddly enough, appears to be the political center. Polls suggest Republicans so far have lost the center -- in overwhelming proportions. To maintain their grip on power in Congress, they need to find some way to woo a big chunk of it back in the next 17 days.

Prevailing political wisdom holds that the only things that matter are each party's "base" -- that there is no center anymore, and no more swing voters worth chasing. But look at what has happened among independent voters in the latest Wall Street Journal/NBC Poll1, taken this past week: Support for Republicans has collapsed. Just 24% of them say they want President Bush's party to control Congress after Election Day. Independents disapprove of Mr. Bush's job performance by 2 to 1.

That's a big change from 2004, when Mr. Bush and John Kerry split the votes of independents. The president won for two reasons. He maintained higher allegiance within his own party -- just 6% of Republicans backed Mr. Kerry, while 11% of Democrats crossed over to support Mr. Bush -- and he generated sufficient partisan enthusiasm that Republicans matched Democrats as a proportion of the electorate.

Although Democrats display greater zest about this election, the "base" of Mr. Bush's party appears solid: Just 5% of Republicans want Democrats to take over Capitol Hill. Just 2% of Democrats want Republicans to win. By the standards of modern political history, those are extraordinary levels of partisan cohesion. In the landmark midterm elections of 1974 (when Democrats won big), 1982 (ditto) and 1994 (big Republican gains), more than twice that many voters crossed party lines.

Here in Montana, Democrats have nominated Jon Tester for the Senate. With a flat-top haircut, an ample farmer's belly and a hand that was mangled in a meat grinder when he was a boy, he appeals to locals. He attacks incumbent Sen. Conrad Burns for having lost touch with Montana while cozying up to lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

"My first priority will be not what any Democrat or Republican wants, but what the state of Montana needs," Mr. Tester says. Popular Democratic Gov. Brian Schweitzer, who has revived his party's fortunes in this red state, says Sen. Burns has developed "senator-itis."

DOJ_NMG_0084310

But Sen. Burns hasn't won three terms by lacking political skills. He'll try to make up a deficit in the polls these last two weeks by accusing his opponent of favoring tax increases. He won't rail against "earmarks" the way some Republicans are doing to court their disaffected right wing. In a classic appeal toward centrists, Sen. Burns will invoke his clout as an appropriations subcommittee chairman. "When it comes to the state of Montana, seniority is important, effectiveness is important, and experience is important," he says. The odds may appear to be against him and his party, but his campaign's close will be pointed toward the voters who count most in campaign 2006.

McCain Tries To Trump Republican Woes (WSJ)

By Greg Hitt And Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

John McCain is one of the few Republicans to find a silver lining in an otherwise dreary political season for his party.

That is because the Arizona senator has capitalized in an aggressive and systematic way by using the 2006 fight for control of Congress to lay the groundwork for a probable run for the presidency in 2008.

Mr. McCain is crisscrossing the country on behalf of beleaguered Republicans, tapping his position as one of his party's most popular figures at a time when the image of President Bush and other administration officials is slumping. The senator has steered $1.2 million of campaign funds so far to Republican candidates and political committees. He is enlisting influential grass-roots supporters in Iowa and New Hampshire, pivotal early battlegrounds in the presidential-nomination fight.

And he is firing up the party's conservative foot soldiers, picking a fight with New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, a likely top Democratic presidential candidate, over whether her husband's administration took adequate steps to contain North Korea's nuclear ambitions.

McCain aides say he isn't doing anything differently than in years past, when the combative senator helped rally the Republican faithful during midterm elections. What is different now is that Mr. McCain is the biggest name in the ranks of Republicans considering a run for the presidency. Much of the work he has done this year for others can also help solidify his own status as the likely Republican front-runner.

"Obviously, we'd be committing malpractice as his advisers if we weren't laying the groundwork for a campaign," says longtime McCain strategist John Weaver. "I don't think anyone outside of perhaps the president has put more on the line and worked harder for the party and candidates than John has."

Republican consultant Greg Mueller said the political spadework by Mr. McCain, long considered an outsider within his own party, is helping him build ties with the conservative activists and party mandarins who play a key role in determining the Republican nomination. "McCain right now is leveraging the midterm elections to position himself as the national candidate and national front-runner," Mr. Mueller said.

Meanwhile, the senator's role as a critic of the administration's handling of Iraq -- from troop levels to reconstruction to the treatment of detainees -- has earned him credibility with a wider swath of voters. And while this has put welcome distance between him and a weakened White House, he hasn't wavered from defending his own vote in favor of toppling Saddam Hussein.

The Arizona senator isn't the only Republican with higher ambitions who is trying to forge alliances. Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee and New York Gov. George Pataki are among the potential Republican presidential hopefuls traversing the country to make campaign appearances with, and distribute contributions to, state and federal candidates.

"Everybody's pretty much equal" in terms of visibility in New Hampshire, said that state's Senate president, Ted Gatsas, referring to the potential Republican hopefuls. But Mr. McCain made a big splash at a Republican fund-raiser in the state earlier this year, raising more than $80,000. "It was probably the single most successful fund-raiser the Senate Republican PAC [political-action committee] had this year," Mr. Gatsas said.

Indeed, no one appears to be working as hard as Mr. McCain and his political team, which now includes Terry Nelson, political director of the 2004 Bush-Cheney campaign. "McCain's got something going almost everywhere," said Charles Black, a veteran Republican strategist.

McCain aides said the senator won't make a formal decision about seeking the presidency until early next year. Should he enter the 2008 race, he would find a much different landscape than in 2000, when he jousted unsuccessfully with Mr. Bush for the Republican nomination. Then, the war hero-turned-politician was the underdog, while then-Texas Gov. Bush traded on his famous last name to become the early favorite of the party establishment.

Now it is Mr. McCain who is working to assume the establishment mantel.

Since Labor Day, the senator's team has worked hard to create a sense of momentum. Every week has brought new announcements of local officials who have aligned themselves with the senator's political-action committee, known as Straight

DOJ_NMG_0084311

Talk America. Many are in battleground states such as Michigan, New Hampshire and Iowa. If Mr. McCain decides to run for the presidency, Straight Talk America would effectively serve as a launch pad for his candidacy.

Mr. McCain's ties with Mr. Bush have been strained since 2000. But recently, he has been at pains to stress that many of his new grass-roots supporters have been past backers of Mr. Bush. In Michigan, former Bush fund-raiser James Nicholson, one of the president's top moneymen, has agreed to lead fund raising in the state for Mr. McCain. Mr. McCain's team in Iowa is being led by Dave Roederer, who served as state chairman of the Bush-Cheney re-election team in 2004.

Mr. McCain has plans to campaign almost daily through Nov. 7. He has already been on the road for weeks, recently visiting Wisconsin, South Dakota and Iowa. Though many voters are taking a dim view of the Republican Party, Mr. McCain remains a big draw. On a recent stop in Sioux Falls, S.D., a 17-year-old student interviewer asked for Mr. McCain's autograph. "I couldn't miss the chance to get him to sign my poster," the student said.

Embattled Republican candidates campaigning with Mr. McCain, meanwhile, are benefiting from his carefully cultivated image as an iconoclast who nonetheless remains loyal to the party. In Virginia, incumbent Sen. George Allen, who until recently had harbored his own presidential ambitions and is in an unexpectedly tough race, has featured Mr. McCain in television ads.

The relentlessly bad news from Iraq, along with voter outrage over the Foley-page scandal and unease about the economy, have given Democrats the best chance in more than a decade to retake Congress.

In the months ahead, demand is likely to grow among Republicans for new leadership and a message that broadens the party's reach. That could benefit Mr. McCain, said Fred Greenstein, a scholar at Princeton University. "There is a market for someone who seems to transcend the very sharp cleavages in politics," he says. "McCain has a lot of that."

Questions remain about how much Mr. McCain's work in 2006 will matter as the 2008 fight unfolds and whether he has put at risk his image as an independent voice by entwining himself with the Republican establishment. The answers won't become clear for many months.

Scott Reed, who managed Republican Sen. Bob Dole's presidential campaign a decade ago, says Mr. McCain's work in 2006 will no doubt help down the line. "It is a good time to build a foundation, to put together a real nomination fight," Mr. Reed says. "He's getting some chits."

In Debate, Clinton Deflects Questions About 2008 (NYT)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

ROCHESTER, Oct. 20 — Facing a barrage of questions about her national ambitions during the first Senate debate on Friday night, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton firmly maintained that she was focused on her work in Congress and had made no decisions about running for president.

But her Republican opponent seized on her aspirations at every opening, accusing her of already abdicating her responsibilities to New York.

In a lively but cordial hour of exchanges, Mrs. Clinton steered toward substantive answers about foreign and domestic policy, and was sharply critical of the Bush administration's handling of the war in Iraq.

One of the most spirited exchanges came when she repeated her call for President Bush to replace Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld.

"You know, in the middle of the Civil War, Abraham Lincoln did not hesitate to change generals," Mrs. Clinton said, drawing applause from the audience at the University of Rochester auditorium.

"You're not president yet, Mrs. Clinton," her opponent, John Spencer, the former mayor of Yonkers, shot back, noting that Lincoln was the president, not a senator, when he made critical decisions about that war.

The debate put the former first lady and her little-known challenger on an even stage for the first time in the campaign. But the question of Mrs. Clinton's ambitions beyond Election Day hovered over the event, with the debate considered a rare chance to see how the former first lady might perform in a political ritual common to presidential races.

Mr. Spencer, who is far behind in the polls, alluded to the difference in their national stature, joking that he, for one, had no intention of running for president if he won the Senate race.

Yet Mrs. Clinton, despite her far greater celebrity and resources in a race she appears poised to win, seemed to take her rival's criticisms seriously. She grew visibly defensive at one point, interrupting the line of questioning to respond to his accusations that she had not taken national security seriously enough and had weakened the nation's defenses by raising questions about the administration's secret wiretapping program.

"So many attacks, so little time," she said.

The underlying tone, nonetheless, was civil. Mr. Spencer took the stage first, greeting the crowd somewhat awkwardly. Mrs. Clinton then strode out to meet him, calling Mr. Spencer by his first name and telling him she was glad to see him.

DOJ_NMG_0084312

When it was over, the two sides dispersed, barely bothering with the "spin room" where political strategists traditionally try to convince reporters that their candidates won.

The debate, the first of two, is scheduled to be replayed on C-Span on Saturday at 8 p.m. A second debate is set for Sunday morning, a time slot that, like Friday night, is unlikely to draw a sizable audience.

The debate setting proved critical for Mrs. Clinton in her first campaign six years ago: When her Republican rival, Rick A. Lazio, approached her onstage during their first debate and demanded she sign a pledge refusing soft-money donations, he appeared harsh and in turn made her look vulnerable. Strategists later blamed the incident for Mr. Lazio's defeat, saying the moment had helped Mrs. Clinton with female voters who had started out wary of her.

Mrs. Clinton ultimately beat Mr. Lazio by double digits, a relative breeze compared with what might have been a close race with Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani if he had not dropped out.

And she has faced hardly a ripple of trouble in the years since. Her popularity is high statewide, her political opposition minimal; even some Republicans in upstate areas appear to have warmed to her as a senator, a fact her advisers intend to trumpet if she performs well on Nov. 7 and then turns to run for president.

A Quinnipiac University poll released this week showed Mrs. Clinton at 65 percent and Mr. Spencer at 30 percent, with 5 percent of voters undecided. That is an almost exact reversal of the state electorate's feelings about President Bush: 64 percent said they disapproved of his job performance as president, and 29 percent said they approved.

"Barring some cataclysmic reversal, Clinton-for-president can start cranking up for real on Nov. 8," said Maurice Carroll, director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute.

Mrs. Clinton's smooth trajectory since becoming a senator has been a shift after her turbulent years as a political wife. Few expected that she would court Republican allies after the bitter impeachment of her husband, or have the patience, after eight years in the White House, to focus on the minutiae of constituent work.

Similarly, Mr. Spencer has been in an unexpected spot as Mrs. Clinton's Republican challenger — abandoned financially by the national party, hardly recognized throughout the state. Mr. Spencer, a former mayor of Yonkers, had less than $475,000 in campaign funds at the end of September, a pittance compared with her approximately $15.8 million in the bank. Mrs. Clinton has raised nearly $50 million and spent about $35 million; both the infrastructure she has built and whatever money is left at the end can be transferred into a presidential race if she decides to run.

Mr. Spencer appears poised to win a good part of the third of the state that tends to vote Republican. With strong anti-abortion views and his ardent support for the Bush administration, he has run a lonely race, with little aid even from other Republicans in New York.

"I've been stabbed in the back," Mr. Spencer told the conservative columnist Robert D. Novak, who wrote that Mrs. Clinton was getting a "free pass to pursue both national party-building and her own presidential ambitions."

Mrs. Clinton, who turns 59 on Thursday, has insisted she is focused on running for re-election, a line that has become something of a comic refrain in her office. Yet she has run television and radio spots in her race, part of an effort to drive up Democratic turnout and run up her score.

During the Democratic primary season this year, Mrs. Clinton refused to debate her antiwar challenger, Jonathan Tasini, all but ignoring his candidacy and sidestepping his attacks on her vote to authorize the invasion of Iraq.

Yet Mrs. Clinton did recalibrate her tone on the war, growing much sharper in her criticism of its handling — a move that not only secured her landslide victory in the August primary, but also helped lay the groundwork for a possible run in a presidential primary in 2008.

Clinton, Spencer Hold Debate In New York (AP-Y)

By Marc Humbert

AP, October 21, 2006

The Republican seeking to unseat Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton went on the attack against her in their first debate Friday, accusing her of putting presidential aspirations ahead of voters.

"I'm the only one standing on this platform who wants to be a United States senator for New York for the next six years," said John Spencer, a former Yonkers mayor, in his opening remarks.

Clinton acknowledged that she has thought about running for the presidency in 2008, but said she is committed to running for Senate re-election.

"As you might guess, I've been asked that a few times before," she said of her possible White House aspirations. "I am focused on this election. I am focused on my work in the Senate. Obviously, people are talking about whether I will or should be running for president, and I'm flattered by that."

DOJ_NMG_0084313

The debate attracted attention because Clinton, whose re-election appears increasingly likely, is the front-runner among potential 2008 Democratic presidential candidates. Analysts say the debates could be an important dress rehearsal for Clinton as she prepares to step onto the national stage.

Spencer is an ultraconservative former mayor of the New York City suburb of Yonkers, battling anonymity and a national party that has forsaken his candidacy.

He bashed Clinton throughout during the debate, attacking her on issues including immigration, North Korea and Iraq.

In Spencer, Clinton faces an abortion-hating, anti-gun-control conservative who has been vocal in his support of President Bush and the war in Iraq. Though she voted for the war, Clinton, who supports abortion rights, has strongly criticized Bush's conduct of the conflict.

Spencer said he favored changing war strategies, while Clinton said she favored changing course. She said that Bush's stay-the-course stance was not a strategy and that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld is not credible any longer.

"In the middle of the Civil War, Abraham Lincoln did not hesitate to change generals," she said.

Spencer scolded Clinton for taking such a position because Rumsfeld serves the president, and "you are not president yet," he said.

Clinton stressed the need for diplomacy on such issues as the nuclear situation in North Korea — something she said the Bush administration has failed to do.

"This administration doesn't like to talk to people they disagree with," Clinton said.

But she said she would not rule out using military force against North Korea.

Spencer showed flashes of humor, such as when he was asked about speculation that he was using the Senate race to set himself up for another run for mayor of Yonkers.

"I'm not going to leave a six-year term in the Senate to run for mayor of Yonkers again," he said.

A statewide poll released on the eve of the debate by Quinnipiac University's Polling Institute had Clinton leading Spencer 65 percent to 30 percent. She has also far outspent him.

The timing of the one-hour televised debates accepted by Clinton, Friday night in Rochester and Sunday morning in New York City, appeared designed to attract small television audiences. Spencer had sought a series of debates all across the state.

Spencer has been complaining loudly for months that the national GOP has left him hanging.

"Running for U.S. Senate against Hillary Clinton is a lot like walking point," said the decorated Vietnam War veteran. "You find out who your buddies are real fast."

Friday's debate was sponsored and moderated by Time Warner cable television news channels and was aired across the state.

Focusing On Opinions, Slipping On Some Facts (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

The art of politics often calls upon more opinion and generalization than specific factual claims that can be disproved. So it went for most of the first half of last night's debate between Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and her Republican challenger, John Spencer.

In fact, on the question hanging over the race, and the first to arise in the debate — will Mrs. Clinton, a Democrat, run for president in 2008? — there is no provable answer, though it would be hard to find a politically minded American without an opinion.

But as the debate in Rochester wore on, Mr. Spencer — the more heated, less rehearsed of the two — made questionable statements on a number of issues, including the fruits of the Bush administration's warrantless wiretapping, North Korea's nuclear program and Mrs. Clinton's voting record on security matters. At one point, he contradicted his own Web site on the subject of a proposed fence along the Mexican border.

Mrs. Clinton had her own slips, notably in insisting that her failed 1993 health care plan would not have been government-run, but with a lead of about 30 points in voter surveys, she has the luxury of sticking to her script, and she is adept at that. More often it was Mr. Spencer making the doubtful claims.

He derided a deal made in 1994 by the administration of Bill Clinton that was supposed to halt the nuclear weapons program of Kim Jong Il, the North Korean dictator. "He was duping us," Mr. Spencer said of Mr. Kim. "He was taking care of his military, starving his people and making plutonium."

In fact, intelligence officials say that as long as that deal stood, North Korea was not taking plutonium from its nuclear power plant and processing it for use in nuclear weapons, in part because United Nations inspectors were monitoring the program.

DOJ_NMG_0084314

The 1994 pact fell apart after George W. Bush became president, a development that became known to the West in 2002, when it was revealed that Mr. Kim's regime had been secretly enriching uranium — another element that can make the core of an atomic bomb — in violation of the agreement.

On Oct. 8, North Korea detonated an atomic bomb for the first time, and United States government officials say that the fuel used was plutonium, processed either before the 1994 agreement, or since the agreement collapsed.

Mr. Spencer defended the Bush administration's program of wiretapping some communications of people within the United States without first obtaining warrants, and said Mrs. Clinton had voted against it. In fact, there has been no vote, in part because the administration says it does not need Congressional authority. Mrs. Clinton has said that she would vote to give the president some ability to conduct warrantless wiretapping, though she has also said that in many cases warrants should be obtained.

One of the debate panelists, in asking Mr. Spencer a question, stated that he favored building a 2,000-mile fence along the Mexican border to keep out illegal immigrants. Mr. Spencer interrupted to say that was not his view.

It was pointed out that his campaign Web site takes that position, saying, "Build a 2,000-mile-long fence to span the U.S.-Mexico border to slow border crossings and aid the efforts of those patrolling the border."

Mr. Spencer, a former mayor of Yonkers, shrugged and said, "First of all, I haven't looked at my Web site in about six months."

Late in the debate, Mrs. Clinton was asked if she still favored the kind of government-run health care she proposed in 1993. She countered that that plan "is not government-run."

But under the 1993 proposal, the federal government would have required employers to buy health insurance, the government would have established health care cooperatives for buying insurance, and the government would have regulated premiums.

As for Mrs. Clinton's presidential aims, Mr. Spencer said that of the two candidates, only he intended to serve a full six-year term.

Mrs. Clinton replied, "I don't know what the future holds and I have no decision ready to be made or even waiting in the wings."

People may believe or disbelieve her, but only one person knows for certain whether she is telling the truth.

Elizabeth Edwards Apologizes To Clinton (AP-Y)

By Philip Elliott

AP, October 21, 2006

Elizabeth Edwards, wife of White House hopeful John Edwards, apologized to Sen. Hillary Clinton after saying her choices in life have made her happier than the senator, a Clinton aide said Friday.

Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Elizabeth Edwards called the New York Democrat on Friday night just after she finished a debate in Rochester, N.Y., against Republican challenger John Spencer.

"Elizabeth Edwards called her and apologized," Wolfson said. "They had a good conversation."

Wolfson said the two spoke only for a couple of minutes.

"The senator thanked her for the call and wished her well on her book tour," Wolfson said.

The apology followed remarks by Elizabeth Edwards on Thursday at a luncheon sponsored by Ladies' Home Journal.

"She and I are from the same generation," she said of the senator and former first lady. "We both went to law school and married other lawyers, but after that we made other choices. I think my choices have made me happier. I think I'm more joyful than she is."

Clinton and Edwards, the former North Carolina senator and Democratic vice presidential nominee in 2004, are potential rivals for their party's presidential nomination in 2008.

Edwards said she didn't know the New York senator very well but said Clinton would be "a formidable opponent" for her husband.

Before the apology, she released a statement Friday evening disputing reports about the event.

"Unfortunately, large portions of the material released by (Ladies' Home Journal) as quoted statements by me were erroneous and nearly all the statements, either because of significant omissions, or editing, or error, give a misimpression about what I said," Edwards said. "This is particularly true with respect to my comments about Sen. Clinton, who holds a serious and demanding public office while I am largely home, joyfully I must admit, with two lovely children."

Edwards also said she has "great respect" for the senator.

Asked for specific examples of errors, a spokeswoman for Edwards' One America Committee said the magazine's transcript combined answers to two questions into one quote. Also, her comments about being joyous referred to previous experiences and were not meant to be a contemporary comparison, said the spokeswoman, Kim Rubey.

DOJ_NMG_0084315

Later, Rubey said Edwards called Clinton "to explain that her words had been taken out of context and to express her regret for the misunderstanding."

Ladies' Home Journal, which provided a transcript, said the quotes were accurate.

Edwards, who is promoting her memoir, "Saving Graces," recalled how as first lady Clinton deftly answered questions on Capitol Hill during testimony on President Clinton's health care proposal.

"As a woman, you couldn't help cheering from the sidelines," Edwards said. "That will be a factor for John. She will be a formidable opponent."

___

Associated Press writer Marc Humbert in Rochester, N.Y., contributed to this report.

Lieberman Gets A Boost From A Republican And A Lift From A Recent Survey (NYT)

By Jennifer Medina

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

HARTFORD, Oct. 20 — United States Senator Joseph I. Lieberman won the backing of a top Republican in the Senate on Friday as Howard Dean traveled here to rally Democrats behind Ned Lamont's effort to unseat Mr. Lieberman.

On the same day, a new independent poll was released showing Mr. Lieberman, who lost the Democratic primary to Mr. Lamont and is running as an independent, with a substantial lead as he seeks a fourth term.

Mr. Lieberman appeared at the New London City Pier with Senator Susan M. Collins, a Republican from Maine, to highlight the need for port security — and to campaign together. Ms. Collins said her support for Mr. Lieberman, a one-time Democratic vice-presidential candidate, marked the first time she was backing a "non-Republican."

Ms. Collins said she admired his ability to work with both parties in Washington. "There are certain leaders, and certain issues, that transcend partisan politics and require work across party lines, and Joe Lieberman is that leader, and homeland security is that issue," she said.

While Ms. Collins said she wanted nothing more than to see Mr. Lieberman win, she added that she did not want the Democrats to win back the Senate, where she heads the Homeland Security committee.

"As much as I love Joe Lieberman, I like being chairman," she said, embracing Mr. Lieberman with a laugh.

"This is one area where we have a slight disagreement," said a smiling Mr. Lieberman, who is the ranking minority member on the committee. He has said he will caucus with the Democrats if he wins.

Mr. Dean, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, appeared at a sports bar in the state capital to rally support for Mr. Lamont and other Democratic candidates, including John DeStefano, the mayor of New Haven, who is running for governor, and Christopher S. Murphy, who is trying to unseat Congresswoman Nancy L. Johnson, a Republican.

His stop in Connecticut coincided with the release of a Quinnipiac University poll that showed Mr. Lamont trailing Mr. Lieberman by 17 percentage points, widening a 10-point lead he held in a Quinnipiac poll last month. The poll showed a 52 to 35 lead among likely voters and was conducted from Tuesday through Thursday. It had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

The Republican candidate for the Senate, Alan Schlesinger, trailed with 6 percent of the vote. Another 7 percent said they were undecided.

Mr. Lieberman was ebullient about the results, saying it showed that his bipartisan message was working. The polls suggest that Mr. Lieberman has overwhelming support from Republicans, but has also maintained a large chunk of Democratic support.

But Mr. Dean, along with other state party leaders, used the day to rally for a change in Washington, maintaining that Mr. Lamont's victory in the primary was a sign of progress. "Your state has done something extraordinary," he said. "Your state had a courageous person step up when nobody thought he could win and take on folks who supported the Bush policy." The Democrats are also challenging Republican incumbents in three competitive House seats in Connecticut.

Mr. Lamont took a veiled jab at Mr. Lieberman, who said earlier this week that Democrats should take control over Congress only if they ratcheted down the tone of partisanship in Washington.

"I don't know why it is, but it sure seems like George Bush and Dick Cheney really want Joe Lieberman in the U.S. Senate," Mr. Lamont said in brief remarks at the rally, prompting the audience to boo at the mention of the president's name.

On Thursday, President Bush used Mr. Lieberman's loss in the primary to roundly criticize the Democratic Party, saying that it showed that "if you want to be a Democrat these days, you can be for almost anything, but victory in Iraq is not an option."

Mr. Lieberman dismissed the president's remarks on Friday, saying that "people who are for giving up on Iraq" and "people who don't want to give up" have both tried to use the results of the Connecticut primary to their advantage.

DOJ_NMG_0084316

Senate Candidate Confronts Opponent (AP-Y)

By Beth Rucker

AP, October 21, 2006

Democratic Senate candidate Harold Ford Jr. turned up at a news conference Friday in Memphis called by his opponent, Republican Bob Corker, leading to a confrontation about Ford's large, politically active family.

Ford, a Memphis congressman, and Corker are locked in a tight race that could help determine whether Democrats gain control of the Senate.

Corker, a former Chattanooga mayor, has said he wouldn't make Ford's family an issue in the race, but in recent debates said the Fords engaged in "machine-type politics."

Corker has questioned the work of Ford's father, former U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Sr., as a lobbyist for Fannie Mae while Ford Jr. sat on the House committee overseeing the mortgage giant's activities.

Ford Jr. said that no one in his family has ever lobbied him on congressional issues and that he would refuse them if they did.

Corker had scheduled the Friday morning news conference at a Memphis airport to discuss a proposal to prohibit relatives of senators and representatives from lobbying their family members. The Ford campaign had said the congressman would also be there.

The meeting between the two men was captured by WREG-TV in Memphis. It was unclear whether the confrontation happened before or after the news conference.

Ford, who was speaking with reporters, spotted Corker in the parking lot and began walking toward him. Ford told Corker that he wanted to debate him on the Iraq war, then mentioned Ford's plan to partition Iraq into three regions.

But then Corker stopped him and said he had come to talk about ethics. Corker called Ford's visit to the news conference "a true sign of desperation."

Ford replied, "I could never find you...." Corker said he was in Jackson, northeast of Memphis, on Thursday night, but Ford brought the conversation back to Iraq.

"Tell me, what do you think about this Iraq thing?" Ford asked. "I know you're here to talk about my family. I thought you made a promise right after ..."

"No, no, no. I'm here to talk about you, and this race," Corker said before walking away.

The Ford campaign issued a statement Friday afternoon.

"I fully support prohibiting family members from lobbying members of Congress," Ford said. "As Mr. Corker knows full well, I have never been lobbied by any member of my family at any time on any matter before the Congress."

Playboy And Pastors Enlisted For Attack Adverts (FT)

By Caroline Daniel In Washington

Financial Times, October 21, 2006

The Republican attack advertisement starts with a clip from the rival candidate's campaign. It shows Harold Ford, sitting in church, saying he will not be painted as someone he is not. "Fair enough," intones the announcer. "So what kind of man parties with Playboy playmates in lingerie, then films political ads from a church pew?"

Cue: images of Mr Ford, the Democrat candidate for a Tennessee Senate seat, with James Bond-style silhouettes of Playboy bunnies, to highlight his hypocrisy. Then it cuts to images of Osama bin Laden and shadowy mig-rants darting through a forest.

The barbs are typical of a mid-term election campaign that experts say is unprecedented in its negative advertising. Candidates have been accused of all known earthly sins: mistress throttling, paedophile protecting, corruption, caring more about the sex habits of "the Two Spirited Aleutian Eskimos, whoever they are" than body armour.

In the Virginia Senate race, George Allen, the Rep-ublican, accused his opponent of trading on his brief period in the Ronald Reagan administration, invoking a letter from the secular saint, Nancy Reagan, to get him to stop doing so. In return the Democrats charged Mr Allen with failing to disclose stock options and of allowing the "corporate financing of terrorist states".

Such adverts are nothing new in American politics. The Tennessee advert had a precedent in one for another Ford: Gerald Ford, weaving the same twin themes of Playboy and church. President Ford's 1976 re-election campaign advert took a swipe at the Democrat Jimmy Carter for giving an interview to the magazine. It shows a pastor in church saying he had asked Mr Ford if he would have given such an interview and was told "no". Mr Ford is shown nodding from the pews.

DOJ_NMG_0084317

John Geer, professor of political science at Vanderbilt University and author of In Defense of Negativity, said: "2006 marks the most negative mid-term campaign in recent memory. In September the Republican party admitted early on that they would invest heavily in attack adverts. They don't normally say they are going negative."

The Republican national committee will spend 90 per cent of its $50m (€40m, £27m) budget on negative adverts. The toughest come from the national parties: outsourcing attacks offers a veneer of respectability to candidates. The national Republican senatorial committee paid for the Ford ad. When Bob Corker, the candidate, was asked, he demurred: "I haven't seen the ad."

Congressional campaign adverts tend to be nastier than presidential ones, says Mr Geer. "Many are not exactly prime-time candidates and the quality of their advertising teams tends to vary more. Weak consultants and weak candidates do weak adverts."

Negative adverts are usually more accurate, and informative, than positive adverts that offer woolly endorsements of abstract ideals such as peace, democracy or, in the ironic case of Michael Steele, the Senate candidate in Maryland, puppies. "For the record, I love puppies," one advert says. Instead, negative ads cite specific votes or documents.

In the Pennsylvania Senate race, Rick Santorum skewered his rival with facts about how much work Bob Casey had skipped, such as failing to complete 800 audits as governor. "Before running for a new job, shouldn't he show up for the one we already pay him for?"

Getting facts wrong can be fatal. Another Santorum ad-vert depicts Mr Casey's campaign team as shady crooks. The Democratic senatorial campaign committee points out: "Two have even contributed to Santorum's 2006 campaign. One of the alleged 'team' died two years ago."

In Mr Ford's case, the Play-boy advert was grounded in truth. Although he denied he had ever been to a "Playboy mansion party", he did go to one in Jacksonville after the SuperBowl last year. Even so, the advert could still backfire – and get him the sports and the church vote. As Mr Geer notes: "A lot of people would like to go to a SuperBowl party and go to church the next day."

Allen, Webb Are Not Spotlighting Their Positions On Immigration (WP)

By Karin Brulliard

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Millions of protesters took to the streets this year to demand amnesty for unauthorized immigrants. Congress debated immigration bills for months before approving a 700-mile border fence. In several fiercely contested political races nationwide, illegal immigration has taken center stage.

The candidates in Virginia's Senate race, meanwhile, have barely touched it.

Republican Sen. George Allen and his challenger, Democrat James Webb, have stark differences on the issue. While both call for sealing the borders, Allen brooks no sympathy for illegal immigrants and favors guest-worker plans. Webb supports legalization for some immigrants and opposes broad programs for temporary foreign labor.

Analysts say the relative absence of immigration in the race reflects the increasingly tricky proposition of campaigning on polarizing topics, especially in a traditionally conservative state with a changing political landscape. In recent elections, Northern Virginia voters' allegiance has shifted toward Democrats.

"Statewide in Virginia, I think it's a lot thornier," said Mark J. Rozell, a public policy professor at George Mason University. "With the divide . . . it's really hard to say that someone can play this issue one way and know that he's going to benefit."

Studies show that Virginia's illegal immigrant population has swelled in recent years and that growth has been densest in Northern Virginia. Herndon voters this spring ousted Town Council members who backed a hiring site for immigrant day laborers, but Republican Jerry W. Kilgore lost the Northern Virginia suburbs -- and the governor's race -- after a campaign in which he vowed, among other things, to crack down on illegal immigrants.

In a recent Washington Post poll, 59 percent of likely Virginia voters said immigration would be important in their choice for senator -- but only after issues such as terrorism, Iraq, the economy, ethics in government, health care and taxes.

Nationally, most candidates campaigning on immigration are of the tough-on-illegal-immigration persuasion, like Allen. But Allen has battled accusations of insensitivity to minorities since the summer, when he called an Indian American campaign worker for Webb a "macaca."

"Immigration, like it or not, is an issue that touches on race," said Steven A. Camarota, research director at the Center for Immigration Studies, which favors limiting immigration.

Asked about the Herndon day-labor center at a Richmond debate this month, Allen responded: "We should not be rewarding illegal behavior because all that will do is encourage more illegal behavior."

DOJ_NMG_0084318

Parting ways with President Bush, Allen voted this session against a failed Senate bill that would have given some illegal immigrants a path to citizenship. The senator leans toward House Republicans on immigration, favoring enforcement-only approaches that aim to close the borders.

"First and foremost, Virginians want our borders secured," said Dick Wadhams, Allen's campaign manager. He said Allen considered Congress's final border fence bill a "good start."

To address the question of the nation's estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, Allen wants stepped-up punishment of their employers, Wadhams said. Strict enforcement, Allen reasons, will dry up the source of jobs over time. Allen backs expanded guest-worker programs that supply migrant labor to farms and skilled employees to tech companies.

That position is a key difference between Allen and Webb, who rails against corporate interests and bemoans the struggle of the middle class. He criticizes large-scale guest-worker programs, saying more oversight is needed so jobs do not go to cheaper foreign labor. Unlike Allen, Webb supports giving a path to legalization to immigrants who have been in the United States long enough to have planted deep roots.

"That in some way means sorting out people who have long ties with their community in the name of fairness and reality," Webb said. But he added: "I'm not for amnesty. I want to make that clear."

Webb said the Herndon day-labor center is an acceptable way to locally manage the effects of a failed federal immigration system. On his Web site, he calls for the United States to strengthen border security above all else and to turn next to the questions of illegal immigrants and a guest-worker plan. In an interview, he did not emphasize the need for border security as strongly. And he added a fourth component: pressuring -- and helping -- Mexico to stem migration through economic development.

Webb has been endorsed by a group of Latino leaders called Adelante Con Webb, which chose Webb in part for his vision of a broad overhaul of immigration laws, said Arlington County Board member Walter Tejada (D), a member of the group.

But Tejada said the endorsement came only after Webb met with the group and justified his views on affirmative action, which he has called "state-sponsored racism." Now Webb says he supports it for blacks but not for other ethnic minorities, unless poor whites are included. Webb says the position is based on fairness and hews to the program's original intent.

"We really understood and realized that this man really is about opportunity," Tejada said.

Allen earned the endorsement of the Latino Coalition, a nonpartisan advocacy group that has often backed GOP proposals and is headed by former Bush appointee Hector V. Barreto, who resigned as head of the Small Business Administration in April. Robert de Posada, the Latino Coalition's president, called Webb's affirmative action position "extremely insulting."

As Virginia governor, de Posada said, Allen "opened doors for Hispanics" by appointing several Latinos, including former Virginia Transportation secretary Robert E. Martinez. That prompted the coalition, which favors legalization for illegal immigrants, to overlook Allen's immigration views.

Staff writer Michael D. Shear contributed to this report.

Wilder Advises Webb To Make Stance Clear (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

RICHMOND -- Mayor L. Douglas Wilder, a former governor and one of the state's leading Democrats, has some advice for his party's U.S. Senate nominee James H. Webb Jr. -- let voters know what you stand for.

"The question is, what reasons will Jim Webb give people to vote for him," Mr. Wilder, 75, told The Washington Times. "There are so many people in the middle that want to have a reason to lean this way or that."

Mr. Wilder has yet to endorse anyone in Virginia's U.S. Senate contest.

He said that Mr. Webb still trails Republican Sen. George Allen, in part, because he has failed to articulate a message beyond opposing Mr. Allen and President Bush.

He also said it's "amazing" that so many voters he meets are undecided before the Nov. 7 election.

An endorsement from Mr. Wilder, who became the nation's first black governor in 1990, carries high value in any political contest in Virginia. But a Wilder blessing this year would be priceless for either Senate nominee.

Mr. Wilder said that he has spoken with both nominees -- and with Mr. Webb as recently as Thursday.

"I told him that I think a lot of people are looking to see which of the candidates has a concise clear message that distinguishes one from the other," he said. "It's not a matter of voting against somebody but reasons that people would want to vote for Jim Webb."

Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, a Democrat, knows the power of a Wilder blessing: He was endorsed by the mayor Nov. 2, less than a week before last year's election.

DOJ_NMG_0084319

"It helped a lot," Mr. Kaine told The Times. "At that point, we felt like we had momentum and it was a confirmation of momentum, which created more momentum."

Mr. Wilder, who was elected with 79 percent of the vote in Richmond in 2004, holds influence over many Virginians but has particular sway among black voters.

Twenty percent of the state's population is black, according to the 2004 census.

Mr. Allen captured 20 percent of the black vote in 1993 when he was elected to succeed Mr. Wilder as governor, and 17 percent when he unseated Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb in 2000.

The black vote has become increasingly important in the neck-and-neck contest between Mr. Allen and Mr. Webb.

Both men have been accused of making racist comments when they were young.

Mr. Allen was accused of using the "n-word" as a student at the University of Virginia, and he called an Indian-American Webb volunteer "macaca" at a campaign event this past summer. The term, which Mr. Allen said he made up, is considered a racial slur in some cultures.

Mr. Webb has faced criticism from blacks for saying that affirmative action is unfair to white men. However, he has since tempered his comments and recently received the endorsement of the state's Legislative Black Caucus.

Mr. Wilder, who dropped a bid for the U.S. Senate in 1994, is unpredictable. He has endorsed Republicans and Democrats, and has turned his back on candidates he previously had favored.

He joined Mr. Allen in March 2004, denouncing a state tax increase proposed by then-Gov. Mark Warner, a Democrat he had endorsed a few years earlier.

"Had I had any idea he would be embarking upon raising of taxes of Virginians past anything we had promised during that course, I would not have been there with him," Mr. Wilder said in 2004.

The increase ultimately passed, but left Mr. Wilder at odds with some of the state's most loyal Democrats.

Open Seats Lift Democratic Hopes In The House (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

GOLDEN, Colo., Oct. 19 — Ed Perlmutter, a former Democratic state senator, has had other opportunities to run for the House seat representing the district around Denver, but he waited until this year, when the Republican incumbent decided to run for governor rather than seek re-election.

“It is a clean slate,” Mr. Perlmutter said about the appeal of a race without an entrenched office-holder. “It gives people a real shot at seeing who the right guy is.”

In the age of gerrymander, the open seat — one where incumbents step aside because of age, ambition, scandal or other considerations — is a rare but sometimes golden opportunity for one party to wrest control from the other. This year, Democrats like Mr. Perlmutter are taking full advantage, giving their party a potentially vital edge in the battle for control of the House.

“I hate open seats,” Representative Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee, said in an interview last month as he discussed his party’s difficulties in defending its openings.

Deprived of the name recognition, fund-raising and other powers of incumbency — not least the ability to steer federal dollars into local projects — candidates trying to defend open seats for their parties can have a much harder time of it than do sitting members of Congress.

This year, there are 33 open House seats, including three that are vacant at the moment but had been held steadily by one party, and polls suggest that Democrats have a good chance to capture enough Republican-held districts to put them well on their way to tilting the balance of power in Washington.

Surveys show Mr. Perlmutter in command of his race against his Republican opponent, Rick O’Donnell, in the contest to succeed Representative Bob Beauprez, a Republican who is running for governor.

In races for 20 other Republican open seats, recent polls show the Democrat leading in at least 8, putting the party more than halfway to the 15 seats needed to capture the House. Just one of 12 Democratic open seats appears at risk, and even that is considered a long shot.

The state-of-play shows why leaders of both parties pleaded with incumbents who were contemplating leaving the House to stick around, begging them to pass up career changes, more time with the grandchildren or a run for the Senate.

Grabbing open seats has proven critical in past Congressional realignments. In the watershed election of 1994, House Republicans converted 22 Democratic open seats; in the Watergate election of 1974, House Democrats flipped 13 Republican seats. Now, for Democrats to seize the majority, the open seats will be crucial. “You have to win the open seats by a rather substantial proportion because, unless you have a nationalized race, the incumbents are going to win,” said John Samples, director of the Center for Representative Government at the Cato Institute.

DOJ_NMG_0084320

It is a testament to the partisan makeup of most Congressional districts that even with such a strong political tide running against the Republican majority, Democrats are still trying to assemble enough victories to gain control of the House.

But Colorado's Seventh, which ranges from industrial Commerce City through bedroom communities to the old Gold Rush town of Golden, is a textbook swing district drawn to foster competition. Mr. Perlmutter was considered a top prospect for the new seat in 2002, but said he decided not to run to tend to a young family and a law practice. In 2004, Mr. Beauprez was solidly ensconced, but when he started publicly pondering a run for governor in 2005, Mr. Perlmutter got serious about a race.

The benefits of incumbency can be both large and small — from visibility and the ability to help individual constituents to an aura of political invincibility that discourages challenges and keeps donations flowing.

Mr. Perlmutter, who represented part of the House district as a state legislator, still had to win a tough and expensive primary to get into the general election, though it ultimately helped raise his profile. Mr. O'Donnell, a lifelong resident of the district who lost a primary to Mr. Beauprez in 2002, escaped a primary this year. But he quickly discovered he had work to do to become known.

"Over the summer, I would knock on people's doors, and they would say, 'Who are you? What are you running for?' " Mr. O'Donnell said. "A couple hundred thousand dollars in TV ads takes care of that."

In their closely watched race, Mr. O'Donnell has sought to emphasize a hard line on immigration and raise the specter of Democratic tax increases while Mr. Perlmutter has pressed the need for change in Republican-controlled Washington and emphasized stem-cell research, an issue he has personalized, saying it represents the potential for treatment of his daughter's epilepsy.

If there were a year not to be an incumbent, Mr. O'Donnell argues, this is it with the Republicans he hopes to join in the House facing an electorate anxious about the war in Iraq, frustrated with the Congress and angry over constant scandal.

"This year, I am thrilled to be an open-seat candidate," Mr. O'Donnell said.

Yet Mr. Perlmutter and his Democratic allies have worked to tie Mr. O'Donnell to the Bush administration and an unpopular war. In doing so, they have saddled Mr. O'Donnell with the disadvantages of incumbency while he lacks the long-term relationship with district voters that might help a sitting lawmaker.

In a new advertisement broadcast this week by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee on behalf of Mr. Perlmutter, a beaming Mr. O'Donnell was shown leaving Air Force One with President Bush as the president arrived for a fund-raising visit this summer. "Another vote for George Bush's agenda," says the advertisement.

Mr. O'Donnell and his aides acknowledge that in the Denver area, where snow is already falling this year, it is tough sledding for Republicans. "I am under no illusions," he said. "It is going to be painstaking, vote by vote by vote."

Republicans hardly needed added trouble in a year when the party controlling the White House traditionally suffers. But their task was greatly complicated by the departure of three veteran lawmakers in safe seats who exited under ethical clouds and left their local ballots in shambles.

Tom DeLay, the former House majority leader under indictment in Texas, quit after winning his primary and state Republicans lost a legal fight to replace him on the ballot, forcing them to put their hopes in a difficult write-in campaign. The name of Mark Foley, who resigned over sexually explicit e-mail to former pages, will remain on the ballot in his Florida district, though votes cast for him will go to another candidate. Representative Bob Ney of Ohio, who recently pleaded guilty to corruption charges, dropped out of his race but left his replacement contending with the fallout from his bribery scandal. Democrats could conceivably win all three seats.

In Arizona, Representative Jim Kolbe, who is retiring, refused to endorse the conservative Republican who won the primary to replace him, putting Republican retention of that seat in jeopardy. In Colorado Springs, Republican divisions over the candidate to succeed Representative Joel Hefley, who is retiring, have national Democrats examining whether to make a serious run at that solidly Republican seat.

"In a year like this, the only Republican open seats that are certain to stay Republican are rock-solid, overwhelmingly Republican districts," said Stuart Rothenberg, a nonpartisan Congressional handicapper.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee just bought advertising time in the race for a Nevada open seat that was previously considered out of reach, and party strategists are looking into investing in others where Republicans are showing signs of weakness.

"We are trying to figure out the combination on the lock of the gerrymandered districts," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, campaign committee chairman.

Republicans are fighting back, spending on television advertisements for Mr. O'Donnell and others in open seat races. But they are also being forced to spend in places like Idaho, where they had expected to avoid a fight. Party officials predict that in the end, many of the seats will remain in Republican hands.

DOJ_NMG_0084321

In A G.O.P. Stronghold, 3 Districts In Indiana Are Now Battlegrounds (NYT)

By Joyce Purnick

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

MISHAWAKA, Ind. — Indiana, so heavily Republican that it has not voted for a Democratic presidential candidate since 1964, has become an unexpected battleground in this year's Congressional elections.

Three of the state's seven Republican members of Congress are locked in tough races, with the campaigns drawing big money and big names from both parties, including President Bush, Laura Bush, Barbara Bush, former President Bill Clinton and Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois.

What is happening here in the Crossroads of America?

Just standard election year politics, say Republicans, in a state with a history of close races and of electing some Democrats (two of its nine members of Congress are Democrats, as is one senator). It is more than that, say Democrats, portraying Indianans as unusually disaffected and predicting that their party will make significant gains.

Ed Feigenbaum, editor of The Indiana Legislative Insight, a nonpartisan newsletter, said the situation reflected the nation's souring mood.

"People are unhappy everywhere," Mr. Feigenbaum said. "And incumbents suffer when they think the country is heading in the wrong direction."

It is not that candidates in the three competitive districts differ substantially on issues that matter most to voters. But their styles are different, as is the political company they keep, as each often reminds voters.

Republicans warn that Democratic victories will mean liberal leadership in Congress, while Democrats say their opponents support failed policies. The overwhelmingly negative advertisements on both sides have focused on personalities, moral values, party allegiances and help for veterans.

Voters seem focused on larger matters. From the hills of New Albany near the Kentucky border to the gray streets of Mishawaka near the Michigan border, scores of voters in the three districts said in interviews that they were uneasy about Iraq, illegal immigration, the economy and the cost of health care.

Some said they feared that gasoline prices would rise again, while others complained about lobbyists. None cited the resignation of Representative Mark Foley over his e-mail exchanges with Congressional pages, though many Republicans were concerned that unhappiness about moral lapses in Washington might depress turnout among Christian conservatives.

Some spoke about local issues, but national matters, especially Iraq, prevailed.

"Iraq is seen as a failed Republican policy that isn't working and costing money," said Brian Vargus, a professor of political science at Indiana University in Indianapolis.

"That really resonates with Hoosiers," Mr. Vargus said. "They are very patriotic, feel that the American military is very efficient so someone is doing something wrong."

Second District

Representative Chris Chocola, a Republican, and the Democrat, Joe Donnelly, a lawyer and businessman, are in a race that was never supposed to be so close, though the district has elected Democrats in the past.

The economy and immigration loom as large as Iraq in this blue-collar district. Many auto-parts plants have closed or been cut back. Workers are nervous, and some say that Mr. Chocola does not understand their predicament because he is independently wealthy.

Plant workers blame Washington for higher gasoline prices, which hurt demand for automobiles; for spending money on Iraq that could be spent at home; and for failing, as they see it, to stop illegal immigrants from taking jobs in nonunion shops.

Mr. Chocola soundly defeated Mr. Donnelly in 2004, but polls now show Mr. Donnelly ahead. Mr. Donnelly appears to be benefiting from spending by independent groups and national Democrats. (Republicans recently stopped broadcasting advertising for Mr. Chocola, cautioning they have not given up on him but declining to say if the advertisements will resume.)

"Billions of dollars go to China, they're taking away our jobs, and they call it free trade," said Richard Rittenhouse Jr., leaning against a friend's pickup after their shift at the AM General Hummer H2 plant in Elkhart.

Illegal immigrants, whose numbers are relatively small in Indiana, but are concentrated in some areas, are "working hard and cheap" in nonunion plants Mr. Rittenhouse said, while union jobs are trimmed.

He and his friend, Steve Patton, said they were also frustrated by high property taxes, the leasing of a state toll road to a foreign entity and changes in the local daylight saving time.

Mr. Chocola said he was not worried.

"This district is always competitive," he said, after addressing students at Penn High School in Mishawaka. "Nothing unusual."

DOJ_NMG_0084322

Mr. Donnelly, who criticizes Mr. Chocola for supporting the president on Iraq and foreign trade, sounds equally confident.

"We're going to change the country," he said in a South Bend pub.

Eighth District

The "Bloody Eighth" as it is known because of its close elections. Representative John Hostettler, a six-term Republican, is invariably described an unorthodox public official who does as he likes, from voting against the Iraq war to taking a loaded gun into the Louisville airport two years ago. The congressman said he had forgotten that the gun was in his briefcase.

Political analysts say Mr. Hostettler has been more unorthodox than usual, campaigning and fund-raising less aggressively than might be expected, given his opposition — the telegenic sheriff of Vanderburgh County, Brad Ellsworth.

Mr. Hostettler, who insists he is campaigning hard, historically wins, usually by small margins, helped by a strong get-out-the-vote operation led by Christian conservatives.

But Democrats see Mr. Ellsworth as the strongest opponent Mr. Hostettler has faced, a conservative Democrat whose record can appeal to working-class voters.

The candidates in fact agree on most issues. Both oppose abortion rights and favor tough immigration laws. Their major difference is Mr. Hostettler's vote against raising the minimum wage and Mr. Ellsworth's support for it.

Nonetheless, Mr. Hostettler paints Mr. Ellsworth as "far to the left," and raises the specter of Representative Nancy Pelosi, the House minority leader from California, becoming speaker if Democrats win a majority.

That registers with some voters. "They are both good men, but the Democrats will put pressure on him to put Pelosi in, an extreme Democrat," Mike Rhoads, an insurance agent, after said services at Bethel Temple, a nondenominational Christian church in Evansville.

Mr. Hostettler's longevity in Washington registers with other voters, among them Betty Paddock, a retired dietitian who voted for Mr. Hostettler in 2004.

"He's been there a long time, time for a change," Ms. Paddock said at the West Side Nut Club Fall Festival in Evansville. Hr sister Jean Tabor, a cashier at a Target store, added, "Too many bad things are happening."

Ninth District

The race is a rubber match, an unusually personal fight between two candidates with distinctly different styles — Representative Mike Sodrel, a Republican who two years ago beat the same Democratic opponent, Baron Hill, a former two-term congressman.

Mr. Sodrel worked the crowd in shirt sleeves during the Harvest Homecoming Festival in New Albany, across the Ohio River from Louisville, Ky. The day before, Mr. Hill appeared in suit and tie, serious and unsmiling as he and Senator Evan Bayh, Democrat of Indiana, discussed domestic security in a town firehouse.

Mr. Sodrel, owner of a trucking company, accuses Mr. Hill of having "gone Washington." He says that Mr. Hill "doesn't share our values" and that Mr. Hill voted against protecting the flag from desecration and opposed a bill banning same-sex marriage.

Mr. Hill says that he honors the flag and opposes same-sex marriage but that the issues should be left for states. He accuses Mr. Sodrel of being too close to the oil industry, and calls on him to return campaign contributions from Speaker J. Dennis Hastert and other Republicans for what he calls a failure of leadership in the Foley case.

Both candidates strike voters as too negative and out of touch with what really concerns people, many football fans said at a recent Friday game at New Albany High School.

"Nobody wants to talk about anything I think is important, like getting out of this stupid war," said Edward Summers, a veteran of World War II.

Neal Lang, a fifth-grade teacher from nearby Floyds Nob, said he was worried that the country "seems angry and strongly divided."

Mr. Lang said he did not know who he would vote for, but predicted, "I think it will be close again."

Working Families Party's Aim: Putting Democrats In Congress (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

Even by the Lilliputian standards of minor political parties, the Working Families Party has typically played the part of feisty underdog. Only four states list the party on their ballots, and even in New York, where it is based and most active, Working Families usually draws far fewer voters than rivals like the Conservative Party or the Independence Party.

Nevertheless, leaders of the Working Families Party, hoping to play a small but crucial role in this fall's Congressional elections, have started an effort to swing unaffiliated voters to Democratic candidates in three tight Congressional races.

DOJ_NMG_0084323

The party is focusing on unaffiliated voters in New York's 24th and 29th Congressional Districts and Connecticut's 5th Congressional District, which all have a Democratic candidate cross-endorsed by the Working Families Party. Both New York and Connecticut allow "fusion" elections in which candidates may run on more than one party line.

In New York's 24th District, Michael A. Arcuri, a Democrat, is battling State Senator Raymond A. Meier, a Republican; and in Connecticut's 5th District, State Senator Christopher S. Murphy, a Democrat, is challenging Nancy L. Johnson, the Republican incumbent.

Working Families is financing direct mail, door-to-door canvassing and phone banks in those districts. In New York's 29th Congressional District, the party will begin a direct-mail effort on behalf of the Democratic candidate, Eric Massa, who is challenging Congressman John Randy Kuhl Jr., the incumbent Republican.

The tight focus on upstate, unaffiliated voters is something of a departure for the Working Families Party, which was founded by a coalition of labor unions and community organizations in 1998. Its supporters are most heavily concentrated in the New York City area, where the party has worked largely in support of liberal Democratic candidates. But party officials said that polling they conducted but did not release showed that a large number of independent voters in the three districts supported views traditionally associated with liberal Democrats, like being in favor of universal health care and in opposition to free trade.

According to the poll, the party said, many of those surveyed said they believed that both major parties were indifferent to such concerns, and that they might be open to voting for a Democratic candidate on a minor party line if the candidate had their values.

"People see our message about jobs and health care not as a left-wing message," said Dan Cantor, the party's executive director. "They put it dead center in focus groups. Trade deals, universal health care. These independent voters are like incipient progressives."

Mr. Cantor also cited past efforts by the party, like its work in 2002 on behalf of Representative Tim Bishop of Suffolk County, as evidence that the party may prove able to provide candidates with crucial voters in tight races. Mr. Bishop, who ran on the Democratic and Working Families lines, beat a Republican incumbent by about 2,500 votes; he earned 2,700 votes on the Working Families line. Of those 2,700, more than half came from people who also voted to re-elect Republican Gov. George E. Pataki.

"Having that extra line, giving independents a place to go, and having them work to get out the vote, all of that was very helpful to me," Mr. Bishop said in an interview.

The party will spend at least $400,000 — a third of it donated from New York's Democratic Congressional delegation — on the effort, a large amount for the party, though a relatively small expenditure given the millions of dollars being spent by the Democratic and Republican campaign committees and the candidates themselves.

But some political experts said that such a political bank shot — persuading unaffiliated voters to register a protest vote for a Democrat by voting for a minor party — could prove more or less unsolvable.

"To the extent that people know that the Working Families Party exists, those people don't view the Working Families Party as less liberal or left than the Democratic Party," said Norman Adler, a political consultant in New York who has advised Republican and Democratic candidates. "People who are liberal are already very comfortable voting for the Democrats.

"Talking to blanks is always useful, since they comprise the largest number of people who haven't made up their mind," he added, referring to people who do not select a party on their voter registration. "But to make the argument that they're the alternative to the Democratic Party for independent voters — I don't think that'll work."

The Political Season Has Gone Sordid (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

Republican congressional candidate Tan Nguyen was expendable (meaning he had no chance of beating Loretta Sanchez), so he was expended this week by the Orange County Republican leadership. A heroic decision, tempered only by the fact that as recently as 2004 Nguyen was running as a Democrat.

In other words, Nguyen wasn't exactly dyed-in-the-wool. Still, when it was learned that his office apparently sent out 14,000 copies of a letter to registered voters saying it was illegal for immigrants to vote, the party leadership quickly leaned on him to withdraw and said all the right things about veiled intimidation of Latinos who are duly registered.

It is truly a new day in Orange County, where a generation ago the previous Republican Party leadership would have tabbed Nguyen as an up-and-comer with a good head on his shoulders.

Nguyen, who clearly doesn't yet have the hang of this running-for-office thing, said he had nothing to do with the mailing and ascribed the blame to his office manager. He presumably was going to lay out his defense Friday afternoon at a news conference, but state agents put a crimp in those plans by raiding his Garden Grove office.

DOJ_NMG_0084324

You can't help but appreciate (in a twisted way) how this flare-up reflects on Orange County's changing demographics. That is, no longer is the attempted thwarting of the Latino vote limited to Anglo officeholders. Nguyen, according to his website, is a Vietnamese refugee who was 8 when his family fled the Communists and came to America.

And now, just 25 years later, he's got his name in the newspapers in connection with political dirty tricks.

A cynic would say he's assimilated well.

And speaking of assimilation and participating in the democracy …

Over in Anaheim, Bill Dalati is getting a dose of the American political system in his first run for office. The 41-year-old insurance agent has been called a potential "Manchurian candidate" by a former state Republican Party chairman who cites Dalati's political support of a controversial congresswoman from Georgia and his advocacy of the local Council on American-

Islamic Relations, considered an extremist group by some but which somehow manages to operate quite comfortably and openly under the noses of the entire local and federal law enforcement structure. I was once at a CAIR meeting where local public officials and law enforcement representatives praised it.

For you youngsters, a "Manchurian candidate" is taken from a 1962 movie and refers to someone who pretends to be one of us but is really an agent of the enemy. Dalati's birth name is Belal, and he was born in Syria, so you know who the critics think he's a secret agent of.

Call me irreverent, but I'd like to see what a Manchurian candidate from Syria could do to Anaheim. Sure, he says he's interested in housing and traffic, but the mind boggles at what someone with a secret agenda could do.

Hey, wait a second! Isn't Anaheim Mayor Curt Pringle a more likely Manchurian candidate? Nobody looks more benign than he does. And how do we know for sure his family drapery business wasn't fronting for something else?

Sorry, mayor. It's all in the spirit of a long political season.

I got hold of a subdued Dalati late Friday and asked him how he was enjoying his first run for office. He didn't sound overly amused. "I was trying to run a straightforward campaign," he said. "Unfortunately, they brought race and religion into it. Because of the Islamophobia out there, I think it's hurt me."

He said he was getting calls of support from "true Americans" but that other e-mails included threats. He's one of seven candidates for two council seats, and I asked if he regretted running. No, he said. "I know what I ran for. I wanted to serve … and give back to a community and country that has given so much to me."

In the present climate, you say something like that and your critics only chalk it up to more cunning.

There you have it. That's my report from today's Politics & Ethnicity front.

Kind of gives you a warm, fuzzy feeling about things, doesn't it?

Ehrlich, O'Malley Focus On Turnout As Election Nears (WP)

By Matthew Mosk And Robert Barnes

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

The hallways were decorated with the green and white of Martin O'Malley's campaign, but more important was what was happening inside the Prince George's County ballroom: thunderous applause from a thousand supporters, most of them African American women.

The Baltimore mayor converted the rostrum into a pulpit.

"Turn to your neighbor and say, 'There's a lot of power in this room,' " O'Malley preached.

" There's a lot of power in this room ," the women cried out.

Four years ago, Democrats headed into the final stretch of a heated governor's race without much of a message to get their supporters to the polls, and there was a pointed lack of enthusiasm from black voters, the party's most loyal supporters. The Democrats got clobbered.

"We didn't really do our job in '02, and we saw what happened," said Donna Edwards, a Democratic Party activist and former congressional candidate who attended the rally.

Democrats are determined to make this year different, said Edwards and others supporting O'Malley's bid to retake the governor's office from Republican Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. This time, both Ehrlich and O'Malley have elaborate plans, in the works for more than a year, to maximize turnout that are the centerpiece of a two-week sprint to Election Day.

For O'Malley, the focus is on what campaign manager Josh White calls "drop-off voters," those who turn out when presidential candidates are on the ballot but stay home in intervening years.

"We're, in a sense, trying to expand our base," White said. "These are people who need a push out the door. But once they get there, we know they'll be with us."

DOJ_NMG_0084325

For Republicans, the task is more complicated. Because Democrats hold a nearly 2 to 1 edge on voter rolls, Ehrlich can't afford to merely try to drive more people to the polls. He needs to motivate his supporters to show up Nov. 7 while doing nothing to energize those backing his opponent.

To accomplish this, his aides said they have been brewing their own turnout recipe -- one that depends on the science of "microtargeting" and on many of the same formulas that helped propel George W. Bush to victory in 2004. Information about every potential Ehrlich voter, down to the magazines they read and the church they attend, will drive the strategy for lighting a spark under them on Election Day.

"Every race is about turnout, but this one especially so for Ehrlich," said one of the governor's top aides, who discussed internal campaign strategy on the condition that he not be named. "Last time, we won partly because I think we had a superior air game -- television ads, radio ads, direct mail. This time, in my opinion, we win by having a better ground game."

While each campaign will spend the next two weeks working several fronts -- O'Malley will launch a bus tour; Ehrlich will begin a barrage of television ads -- the strategy that could ultimately decide the outcome of this year's hotly contested race is the one that succeeds at driving the right voters to the polls.

A crucial piece of the effort for Democrats will involve black voters, who traditionally have been the party's most loyal constituency but who stayed home in large numbers in 2002, when Kathleen Kennedy Townsend became the first Democratic gubernatorial candidate to lose in Maryland in 34 years.

Census records show that although 50.5 percent of registered black voters turned out to vote in 1998, that number dropped to 41.3 percent in 2002.

This year, many Democrats are still waiting for signs that black voters will take an interest in O'Malley, said former Maryland governor Parris N. Glendening (D).

"I think this is going to be the biggest single challenge, because the excitement and the enthusiasm is really not at the level that it needs to be to get a really good, strong turnout," Glendening said, adding that he believes interest will climb as the election approaches.

The Democrats have some obstacles within the black community. For one, Republicans fielded the state's first African American to be elected statewide, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele, and he is now on the ballot in the race for U.S. Senate.

And there is also unease about the complexion of the Democratic statewide ticket: All but one of the candidates is white. But that is a "longer-term problem," Edwards said. "I don't think that's going to be enough to keep people from voting."

Democratic Party officials have tried to address those issues by producing a series of door-hangers and brochures aimed specifically at black voters, including one that pictures an African American woman on the front and the words, "Why I am a Democrat . . ."

O'Malley recruited an African American running mate, Del. Anthony G. Brown (Prince George's), and has brought in well-known black figures to help, too. Basketball great-turned-movie theater mogul Earvin "Magic" Johnson is promoting the Baltimore mayor on the radio. Former president Bill Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama have joined him on the stump.

"Bill Clinton is like the Energizer bunny for Democrats, and especially the key groups we need to make sure come out, African American voters especially," Edwards said.

Today, Rep. Elijah E. Cummings (D-Md.) will kick off a two-week canvassing effort in black neighborhoods that will involve passing out 10,000 postcards reminding residents of their voting rights. O'Malley himself will be knocking on doors of targeted voters in Montgomery and Howard counties tomorrow.

The party has also recruited three to four times as many volunteers as they had four years ago to phone the drop-off voters, White said. It's a strategy that might have yielded little in years past but could prove vital in taking advantage of a national climate that appears to favor Democrats heavily.

That climate has forced Ehrlich's campaign to direct more attention to independents and his own base of support, the state's rural Republicans, to make sure they don't decide to stay home. Part of Ehrlich's success in 2002 stemmed from bringing out 191,000 more Republicans than voted in 1998 for Ellen R. Sauerbrey.

Ehrlich said he is not concerned by the national mood, noting that in two weeks, events in North Korea or elsewhere could shift attention away from the series of GOP scandals in Washington. And he believes the microtargeting effort will overcome any unease about voting.

"You saw in 2004 what it can do," he said, referring to Bush's successful turnout effort.

At the same time, he has been writing to supporters to persuade them to cast absentee ballots. The stated purpose has been to ensure a secure ballot in the face of possible problems with electronic voting. But because he'll know that those ballots have been cast and can scratch those voters off of contact lists, he can improve the efficiency of his turnout operation come Election Day, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0084326

When asked what effect surrogates such as Clinton will have on the outcome of the race, the governor laughed. Yes, the former president probably helps energize some Democrats, he said. "But he helps me with my base, too."

Anti-O'Malley Ad Shows Baltimore In A Grim Light (WP)

By Eric Rich

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Mayor Martin O'Malley may be the target but Baltimore also takes a beating in a television ad launched yesterday by the Republican Governors Association, a 30-second tableau of urban decay that declares Maryland's largest municipality "the most dangerous city in America."

The ad, the first the group has aired in the state, features footage of a cemetery and a crime scene. The camera bounces erratically as the images lose and regain focus. The schools are in shambles, a female voice says, and the homicide rate is six times higher than New York City's. "Baltimore," the voice says, "Martin O'Malley's legacy of mismanagement. And now he wants a promotion so he can do for the entire state of Maryland what he did for Baltimore."

The O'Malley campaign was quick to condemn the ad, which they said perpetuated stereotypes about a city they said Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) is "essentially disowning."

"It's essentially unheard of for a governor to allow an outside group to attack the biggest city in his state," said Hari Sevugan, an O'Malley spokesman.

A recent Ehrlich ad raised similar issues far more delicately: A Baltimore resident -- with a criminal record, it later emerged -- describes himself as a Democrat so concerned about crime and the city schools that he intends to vote for Ehrlich.

Ehrlich spokeswoman Shareese N. DeLeaver declined to comment on whether the campaign has misgivings about Baltimore being portrayed in such a light. The ad, she said, "isn't about Baltimore, it's about Martin O'Malley's failure of leadership of Baltimore."

The governors association is barred from coordinating its activities with the campaign.

"The intent of this advertisement is not to trash Baltimore," said Phil Musser, the association's executive director. "The intent is to point out what's clearly a lackluster record."

The Democratic Governors Association contributed $290,000 to the Maryland Fund, an independent group that has spent nearly $1 million on negative ads linking Ehrlich to the policies of President Bush.

Yesterday, Democrats pointed out that the Republican group received a $100,000 contribution Sept. 29 from a prominent Maryland developer and Ehrlich supporter, Kingdon Gould. Gould, developer of the Konterra project in Prince George's County, has contributed $50,000 to Ehrlich through various companies since 1999. He was traveling yesterday and did not respond to calls seeking comment.

Computer Voting Disks Likely Made For Testers (WP)

By Cameron W. Barr

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

A Maryland election official said yesterday that possibly stolen computer disks believed to be electronic voting software were "apparently produced" for use by a testing firm hired by the Maryland legislature in November 2003.

Ross Goldstein, deputy administrator of the Maryland State Board of Elections, said documents indicate that the disks were sent to Maryland so Raba Technologies Inc. could assess the security of the state's electronic voting system, which is provided by Diebold Election Systems. A receptionist at Raba, based in Columbia, declined to comment yesterday after consulting with her supervisor.

Labels on the disks indicate that they contain the versions of two Diebold programs that powered electronic voting machines in Maryland in 2004, Goldstein said Thursday. Diebold said one version of one program is still in use in some jurisdictions elsewhere in the United States.

Cheryl C. Kagan, a former Maryland delegate who has questioned the security of electronic voting systems, said the disks were delivered anonymously to her office in Olney on Tuesday.

State elections administrator Linda H. Lamone has asked the FBI to investigate the apparent theft and leaking of proprietary voting software.

Critics of electronic voting said the most recent incident in Maryland casts doubt on Lamone's claim that Maryland has the nation's most secure voting system. "There now may be numerous copies of the Diebold software floating around in unauthorized hands," said Linda Schade, co-founder of TrueVoteMD, which has pressed for a system that provides a verifiable paper record of each vote.

DOJ_NMG_0084327

Yesterday, Henry Fawell, a spokesman for Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R), said the suspected leak "raises yet another unanswered question about the Diebold technology on which our election system depends." Ehrlich initially supported the Diebold technology but in recent years has said Maryland should switch to a system that provides a paper trail.

Some computer scientists said the incident shows why the makers of voting systems should publicly disclose their software. "It's hard to keep a secret like this for a long time," said Edward Felten, a Princeton University computer scientist who demonstrated in September how Diebold's machines could easily be hacked. The company called Felten's work inaccurate and unrealistic.

The Washington Post, which obtained copies of the disks Wednesday to verify them, agreed yesterday to Diebold's request to return them.

Kagan said that she expects to meet with FBI agents next week and that she was prepared to grant the FBI's request to turn over the disks.

The disks bear logos from two other testing companies, Ciber Inc. and Wyle Laboratories, which Diebold hired to test its voting system. Maryland retained Raba in 2003 to conduct a security assessment after an academic study revealed vulnerabilities in Diebold's system, said Karl S. Aro, executive director of the Department of Legislative Services.

Aro said he believes that Diebold made its own arrangements to transmit the software to Raba. "To my knowledge, [Aro's staff] never touched those disks," Aro said.

Diebold spokesman Mark Radke said: "We contacted Ciber and Wyle and asked them to send the software directly to someone in Maryland." He said he could not confirm if the recipient was Raba or an intermediary.

Felten, the Princeton computer scientist, said public disclosure of the core instructions or "source code" that powers electronic voting machines would enhance security by allowing experts to find flaws that could then be corrected.

David Jefferson, a computer scientist at Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory who advises California's secretary of state on election matters, said the source code should be public precisely because it is part of voting systems. "Our democratic process has to be completely open, and we cannot conduct transparent elections on top of secret software," he said.

Michael I. Shamos, a computer scientist at Carnegie Mellon University, said the appearance of the disks in Kagan's office is "essentially meaningless." He said electronic voting source code should be disclosed because of the public's strong interest in the credibility of voting systems. "Since the disclosure of source code is a good thing," he asked, "why should we be complaining when some gets disclosed?"

"Anything that happens to convince the makers of voting software to drop the nonsensical claim of 'trade secrets' is a good thing," Shamos said.

Radke said the company was not averse to disclosing its code if the law were changed to require it. But he said disclosure would dampen innovation in the field.

Avi Rubin, a computer scientist at Johns Hopkins University who reviewed the software Wednesday at the request of The Post, said he was all but certain that the material on the disks was Diebold software.

Angelides Urges Gov. To Release Tapes (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

SACRAMENTO — In private conversations in the governor's office earlier this year, Arnold Schwarzenegger spoke with aides about the "failure of Mexican American immigrants to assimilate into American culture" and made "ad hominem remarks about a variety of legislators," Phil Angelides' gubernatorial campaign said Friday.

An attorney for Angelides sent a 10-page letter to Schwarzenegger aides urging them to release recordings of the governor's conversations before the Nov. 7 election.

In the letter, the Angelides campaign offered more detail about what Schwarzenegger said in unguarded moments in his office than has been made public to date.

Angelides aides know what the recordings contain because they downloaded them from the governor's website in late August. But the campaign has declined to release the tapes on its own, calling on Schwarzenegger to take that step.

"Instead of hiding behind his handlers, he should publicly release these records so that the people of the state of California can hear for themselves what the governor believes in candid moments away from the spotlight," Angelides campaign attorney Lance Olson wrote.

Schwarzenegger officials indicated that the governor would not release the recordings, saying they are not a matter of public record.

DOJ_NMG_0084328

Schwarzenegger campaign manager Steve Schmidt, in an interview, said of Angelides: "This is yet another act of political desperation by a failing candidate who, with every passing day, makes it clear he lacks the ethics, integrity and character to be governor of California."

At issue are four hours of recordings. They were made by the governor's speech writing team, whose members taped the governor's conversations to familiarize themselves with his cadence and speech patterns. Six minutes of recordings have been made public so far and are posted on The Times' website at latimes.com/news/local/politics/cal/la-govmeetingmp30954716.mp3file.

In that snippet, Schwarzenegger, talking casually with his inner circle of advisors, made comments about the temperament of Assemblywoman Bonnie Garcia (R-Cathedral City). Discussing her ethnicity, he said it didn't matter if she was Puerto Rican or Cuban.

"I mean, they are all very hot," he said. "They have the, you know, part of the black blood in them and part of the Latino blood in them that together makes it."

Fearing legal repercussions, Angelides campaign officials have been unwilling to release the rest of the recordings. But they've offered hints about what Schwarzenegger says in recent letters to the governor.

In the letter Friday, Olson rebuts Schwarzenegger's claim that the tapes are exempt from disclosure under a legal provision that protects the governor's internal "deliberations."

Olson writes that the recordings "do not relate to anything 'deliberative' at all and are clearly unrelated to speech writing but, rather, discuss Republican Party politics, derogatory remarks about Mexican Americans and observations about legislators and other public figures."

Were Schwarzenegger to demean Mexican Americans, it could produce a backlash.

The governor has been courting Latino voters in hopes of building on the 32% of the Latino vote he received in the 2003 recall election.

After The Times made public part of the recordings last month, the California Highway Patrol opened an investigation. The Schwarzenegger administration had notified the CHP, claiming the Angelides campaign had "penetrated" a secure, password-protected part of the governor's website.

Angelides campaign officials deny that's the case. They said staff members encountered no passwords or obstacles of any kind in downloading the recordings and they assert that others who have visited the governor's website have done much the same thing.

The CHP said it would produce at least a preliminary report quickly. But at this point, with 17 days left in the campaign, no report has emerged.

Schwarzenegger Story Gets Another Rewrite (LAT)

By Peter Nicholas

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

SACRAMENTO — Maybe the make-or-break moment of Arnold Schwarzenegger's governorship was the morning of Nov. 10, 2005, in his hotel suite across the street from the Capitol building.

He had just been walloped in the special election that he had thrust before voters, capping a year when he had fought to put in place a distinctly conservative agenda.

Prepping the Republican governor for a news conference, one of his aides urged a tough stance: Don't apologize, don't give ground.

Schwarzenegger did the opposite. He appeared before the cameras and conceded that he had screwed up and promised to start listening to the Democrat-dominated Legislature.

So began his political resurrection. From a nadir at which he was being compared with Jesse Ventura, the pro wrestler who flamed out as governor of Minnesota after one term, Schwarzenegger rose to be the front-runner in the Nov. 7 election.

His governorship has been a string of such moments: spontaneous decisions that have carried large consequences, for better and for worse. New to professional politics, he has been learning as he goes.

He has overreached; called officials "stooges" and worse; flip-flopped, wasted time and money. All in full view of California voters and in the face of enormous expectations that came with the historic 2003 recall election.

But over the last 11 months he has righted himself, relying on competitive instincts that told him if he was to survive he needed to drop the hubris and build a centrist government more in step with California voters.

It worked. His approval rating is up to 56%, according to the latest Los Angeles Times poll, a rise of nearly 20 percentage points in one year.

DOJ_NMG_0084329

Schwarzenegger came to the job convinced he could master it — much as he has everything else he's tried. But the job nearly mastered him. Three years after taking office, he is, in fundamental ways, still figuring out what a governor is supposed to do.

His advisors say they still worry when he speaks in public, wondering if he'll blurt out something that offends a constituency or torpedoes a policy position his administration spent months crafting. Others who have worked closely with him said they have no idea what to expect next if Schwarzenegger wins.

Will he be the combative partisan who, 168 times during 2005, railed about "special interests" corrupting Sacramento, according to transcripts of speeches and interviews?

Will he be the go-along moderate who has not once uttered that phrase in public this year? "Arnold 2.0" is how some aides now describe him.

Or is another reinvention in the works?

"I don't know where the governor is going to go next year," said Assemblyman Keith Richman, a moderate Republican from Northridge.

Few people reach high elective office with so little political experience. Schwarzenegger walked off the set of "Terminator 3" and into the recall election.

Campaign workers mined interviews he'd given as a champion bodybuilder and movie star, looking for the germ of a policy platform. He was tutored extensively in his Santa Monica office — sessions his staff labeled "Schwarzenegger University."

The cramming helped. Schwarzenegger retains information well and is adept at numbers, which he says he thinks about in his native German. When he grasps something, he utters a two-word acknowledgment: "Got it."

But after he took office, his busy schedule slowed the schooling. And the gaps in what he understood about California government became painfully evident.

Marybel Batjer, the governor's Cabinet secretary in his first year, said, "Yes, he needed more education, and if I could have done it better — and I don't know how we could squeeze more time out of him — I would have had policy briefing time on his schedule weekly."

First Lady Maria Shriver would, on occasion, call then-Chief of Staff Patricia Clarey. Her husband would come home at night with a stack of briefing papers, Shriver said, and realize in frustration that he was not getting everything he needed from the daytime briefings, according to one person familiar with the conversations.

There was an embarrassing moment in his first months in office when Schwarzenegger's inexperience showed.

He often boasted about his negotiating skills. After years of haggling with Hollywood bosses over movie contracts, he was confident he could outwit Sacramento interest groups. But it wasn't as easy as he supposed.

He sat down with officials from the California Teachers Assn., the powerful labor group, to discuss the complex spending formulas that drive the education budget. The governor hoped CTA would agree to concessions that might stave off deep budget cuts.

Schwarzenegger acknowledged to his staff at one point that he wasn't in command of the details. But he plowed ahead, ultimately striking a deal with the union: CTA would forgo $2 billion owed to schools, in return for the governor's promise to repay the money in coming years.

The agreement turned out to be politically costly. It was Schwarzenegger who had been outmaneuvered.

Facing a tight budget the next year, the governor broke the promise. He told the union that if he lived up to the bargain, it would mean drastic cuts elsewhere in government that he was unwilling to make. Union officials turned on him.

The governor hadn't realized the commitment he'd made, said Peter Siggins, then Schwarzenegger's legal counsel, who was taken aback by the agreement.

"I sat down with [another aide] and said, 'Did we really agree to this?' " said Siggins, now a state appeals court judge in San Francisco. "I was surprised. It … really boxed him in."

The teachers union, once a friend, was now a dogged and well-funded enemy.

For all the stagecraft Schwarzenegger employs to make sure he appears in a flattering light, he tends to wing it when he grabs the mike. He says what feels right at the moment. But the spontaneity can backfire, and has.

In April, the administration prepared for an environmental summit in San Francisco. In defiance of his big-business supporters, the governor was going to call for emissions caps meant to curb global warming.

The day came. Schwarzenegger led a discussion that included business leaders unhappy about the plan. An official of a cement trade group objected that mandatory caps would be a burden to business.

Schwarzenegger began to waffle. Maybe it would be better to start "without caps," he said. Aides cringed.

"It undercut the main message of the day," said one administration official, requesting anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

DOJ_NMG_0084330

Damage was done — and Schwarzenegger had to undo it. The next day, in an appearance in Davis, he said emissions caps were "a great idea."

In other ways, Schwarzenegger sounds like the most seasoned of politicians, saying one thing but doing another.

The day after winning the election in 2003, he said at a news conference that he would devote himself to the job full time: "There will be no time for movies or anything else."

A month later, he quietly signed an agreement to serve as a consultant to and editor of the tabloid and muscle-magazine publisher American Media Inc., which would pay him an estimated $8 million over five years. He severed the arrangement after it was made public last year.

Schwarzenegger once eloquently warned of the danger of "special interests" — moneyed groups whose fortunes depend on state action. They give millions to politicians and expect favors in return, the governor said.

But since entering the recall campaign, Schwarzenegger has accepted record sums of campaign cash — more than $114 million — from oil companies, insurers, developers and growers that rely on the governor to sign or veto key legislation.

Every year the California Chamber of Commerce, the state's leading business lobbying group, puts out a list of what it calls "job killer bills" — legislation it wants defeated.

Of 11 such bills that passed the Legislature and made it to the governor's desk this year, he vetoed nine, or 82%.

"He came in on a reform platform which essentially was to hose out the Augean Stables," said Martin Kaplan, associate dean of the USC Annenberg School for Communication, referring to the labors of Hercules. "And he ends up raising more money than Gray Davis, or anyone else, for that matter."

Schwarzenegger has said repeatedly that legislators were "spending addicts." But he has signed budgets that have raised state spending 27%, to $101.3 billion from $79.8 billion.

On a radio show, Schwarzenegger explained his ethics policy. Indian tribes that own casinos are "people that I would never take money from," he said. That would be a "conflict of interest," because a governor negotiates gambling compacts with tribes, he said.

Yet six tribes that own casinos have donated at least $800,000 altogether to the California Republican Party in the last two years. And the party has run television ads helpful to Schwarzenegger.

Schwarzenegger has a record of floating ideas and then dropping them. He vowed in 2004 to bust the Legislature down to part-time status. Never did it.

He told the Sacramento Press Club in January that he would set up a bipartisan commission to examine the state's costly pension system. Never happened.

Then there are moments when he seems to simply get carried away.

Frustrated that lawmakers wouldn't pass his budget, he appeared at a rally at a shopping mall in Ontario two years ago to ratchet up pressure. His staff had written a speech for him, but Schwarzenegger ad-libbed.

Before a crowd of more than 1,000 supporters, he called his legislative opponents "girlie men." The audience loved it, but Democratic lawmakers were furious. The tone had been set for the next year, which Schwarzenegger had optimistically dubbed "the year of reform."

Some of Schwarzenegger's top aides never wanted the special election. After a flurry of campaigns in 2003-04, they thought he needed a year to govern quietly and squirrel away some money for a reelection bid.

But Schwarzenegger worried that if he didn't go to the ballot with a dramatic proposal to shake things up, he might be facing years of paralysis in Sacramento, aides said. A big, bold step was needed, he believed.

Things came to a head at a meeting at a Sheraton hotel near the Capitol late in 2004. Schwarzenegger snapped at his staff that they had dithered, failing to prepare for the special election he envisioned.

One advisor recalls Schwarzenegger saying that without a special election, he "would be facing 18 months where nothing would get done." He wouldn't be talked out of it.

Schwarzenegger backed four measures that his allies placed on the November 2005 ballot: He wanted to curb state spending, revamp the way the state draws voting districts, make it tougher for teachers to get tenure and bar unions from making campaign contributions without permission from members.

The agenda wasn't even his own. It had been cobbled together by the Chamber of Commerce, anti-tax forces and conservative leaders on the fringes of the governor's political circle.

The program also was reminiscent of a Schwarzenegger mentor — former Republican Gov. Pete Wilson. In the 1990s, Wilson went to the ballot to expand the governor's budget-cutting powers and impose restrictions on union political activity. Voters said no.

The Republican operatives surrounding Schwarzenegger remembered those fights from the Wilson years. But maybe they'd have better luck with a former movie star as the salesman.

DOJ_NMG_0084331

Joel Fox was co-chairman of a campaign committee that became the prime fundraising vehicle for the Schwarzenegger-backed initiatives.

In Schwarzenegger, he saw a "Mr. Olympia who has the ability to lift the weight of the world — and we were going to jump on his back. That's the attitude we had," he said.

But "it didn't serve Arnold well," Fox said. "And I take part of the blame for this debacle."

Teachers, nurses and firefighters mobilized against the governor's agenda, picketing Schwarzenegger's fundraising events from Manhattan to Los Angeles. Schwarzenegger could not muster grass-roots support or raise enough money to combat the union attacks.

"We stumbled around," said Mike Murphy, the governor's chief political strategist at the time. "We tried to do three years of reform in about six months."

Battered by the unions' TV ads, Schwarzenegger saw his approval ratings plummet. When defeat came last November, he moved quickly to recapture voters' trust.

He had spent much of 2005 declaring he'd been sent to Sacramento to "fix a broken system." Now he understood that voters wanted him to work within that system, broken or not.

A shake-up followed.

Murphy left to focus more on Hollywood projects. Shriver, injecting herself in the personnel search, as she often does when her husband is in trouble, found a replacement in Steve Schmidt, a barrel-chested veteran of the Bush White House who runs a no-nonsense political operation.

Out went Clarey, once an aide to former Republican Gov. Pete Wilson. In came Susan Kennedy, once an aide to former Democratic Gov. Gray Davis.

"That was his apology," Kaplan said. "By hiring her, and taking pretty intense public criticism for it from his Republican base, he was saying: 'I really heard you. I got it.' "

Embracing the Democratic agenda, Schwarzenegger signed bills raising the minimum wage and providing prescription drug discounts. It was effective politics, executed on the cusp of a reelection campaign.

But it also showed some flexibility: Schwarzenegger had tried something. It didn't work. So he tried something else.

"He's been a very reliable partner in advancing a very strong Democratic agenda," said Fabian Nuñez, the Democratic speaker of the Assembly. "It's the ultimate irony."

When something works, Schwarzenegger stays with it, his friends say. Now that his political recovery has put a second term within his grasp, he's unlikely to risk another effort to shake Sacramento to its core.

"I've known him 27 years and I've never seen him happier than he is now," said Bonnie Reiss, a longtime friend and a senior aide.

Others sound a more wistful note. They hoped Schwarzenegger would prove a transformational figure.

Right after taking office, Schwarzenegger embarked on one of the most ambitious projects of his governorship. Acting on his vow to "blow up the boxes" of government, he appointed 275 state employees, aides and consultants to plan how to do it. The group came up with a far-reaching program to wipe out 100 state boards and commissions. But when interest groups complained, Schwarzenegger backed down. The panel's 2,500-page report, released more than two years ago, sits on bookshelves across the capital, ignored.

"I would like to have blown up a box or two," Fox said.

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Arnold Schwarzenegger

Party: Republican

Occupation: Governor of California

Age: 59; born in Thal, Austria.

Residence: Los Angeles (Brentwood)

Personal: Wife, Maria Shriver; four children.

Education: Bachelor's degree in business and international economics, University of Wisconsin-Superior, 1979

Career highlights: As a bodybuilder, won 13 championship titles; was the subject of "Pumping Iron," a 1977 documentary about bodybuilding, and went on to star in many films; in 1990, was named chairman of the President's Council on Physical Fitness and Sports under President George H. W. Bush; sponsored Proposition 49, a ballot measure approved in 2002 to increase funding for after-school programs.

Platform: Job creation through economic development and promotion of the California economy; no tax increases; curbs on greenhouse gases through regulation of business; $37 billion in bonds to rebuild state infrastructure.

Los Angeles Times

DOJ_NMG_0084332

Boo!? An Inevitable October Surprise (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

The October surprise: It's as much a seasonal sure thing in Washington as cherry blossoms and the National Christmas Tree.

When leaves fall and elections loom, the term gets tossed around more than a Manning family football. This October, too, is chockablock with shockers. Already "October surprise" has been applied to: several unflattering new books about the White House, an upwardly revised civilian casualty estimate from the Iraq war, the Mark Foley scandal . . . and October isn't over yet.

Originally the term meant some alakazam rabbit-from-a-hat trick that an incumbent party would unveil to keep its candidate in office. Over time the phrase has been bandied about and overused to the point that it now means any startling surprise from any direction that might somehow affect the outcome of an election.

October, says Michele Swers, a political scientist at Georgetown University, "is when the electorate begins to focus on the candidates and the issues, and voters begin to actually look at what you do and what you say."

A surprise works, she says, "if there's already a national mood building for a certain issue. The surprise can exacerbate the mood of the people. Anything that intensifies a national wave is helpful."

On his MSNBC show last week, former congressman Joe Scarborough pointed out three recent eye-openers, including "the latest October surprise from New York's publishing world." Excited, he cited "State of Denial" by Bob Woodward, which actually went on sale Sept. 30, and "Soldier: The Life of Colin Powell" by Karen DeYoung, published on Oct. 10. Both books, by Washington Post reporters, "provided a double-barrel blast at the White House," Scarborough said.

He continued, "But now another book drops within weeks of the midterm elections, claiming the Bush White House played Christians for fools and called them nuts and lunatics behind their backs."

He was talking about David Kuo's "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction." Published this week, the book questions the Bush administration's sincerity when it comes to support for faith-based initiatives and for the social issues important to evangelicals.

On CNBC, Jed Babbin, who was a defense undersecretary in the George H.W. Bush administration, referred to the Johns Hopkins University study of Iraqi civilian deaths -- published in the British medical journal the Lancet -- as "another October surprise. . . . It's not at all credible."

Babbin said the number of Iraqi dead has been used before as a pre-November jolt. "The last time they published this same report," he said of the Johns Hopkins survey, "the same group went out and did a similar analysis two years ago, and guess what? They put it out just before the 2004 election."

The longest-running eyebrow-raiser of this October -- the Mark Foley scandal -- got its start in the final days of September. Keith Olbermann, host of the MSNBC program "Countdown," referred to it as a pre-October surprise, but the story has drip-dripped through the month. "The Democrats prayed for an October surprise," wrote syndicated columnist Jonah Goldberg, "and like manna from heaven, a hypocritical, sexually disturbed Florida Republican dropped into their laps."

Some Republican strategists suggested that Democrats waited to make a big deal about Foley's instant messages to generate an autumnal bombshell.

The earliest mention of "October surprise" in a Nexis database search of American newspapers is in The Washington Post in late August 1980. William R. Van Cleve, co-director of candidate Ronald Reagan's panel of military policy advisers, said that the notion of the incumbent president, Jimmy Carter, pulling an "October surprise" somewhere in the world to influence the pending election "has been nagging at some of us for some period of time." The rumored surprise was an invasion of Iran, which was holding dozens of Americans captive.

In October 1992, the issue of Penthouse magazine with the Gennifer Flowers interview about her relationship with candidate Bill Clinton went on sale. In late September 1996, questions arose about campaign contributions from foreign sources to the reelection campaign of Clinton and Al Gore. On Nov. 2, 2000, just five days before the election, a Maine television station reported that candidate George W. Bush had been arrested in 1976 on a drunk-driving charge. "Call it the October surprise a few days late," a CBS reporter said at the time.

In some years the October surprise, like the Great Pumpkin or Godot, is much anticipated but never appears. But in recent years it's become so predictable, so commonplace, it should be called the October Same-Old Same-Old.

"Surprises, on schedule, are hardly surprises," Matt Drudge of the Drudge Report says in an interview. "The October surprise has become a tired ritual that needs reinvention."

DOJ_NMG_0084333

There are variations. And trying to guess the next iteration -- sex scandal, international policy shift, military assault -- makes for a popular bar game. But in this era of muck-slinging politics with candidates "going negative" and "digging up dirt," a true October surprise would be an October without one.

Obama's Project Runway (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

WASHINGTON

So the question before us is, should Barack Obama stop lounging around in fashion magazines and do some honest work, like running for president?

How will we ever persuade him to give up his modeling gigs in Men's Vogue, Marie Claire, Vanity Fair and Washington Life? How can we lure the lanky young senator from Illinois out of the glossy celebrity pages and back to gritty substance, away from Annie Leibovitz's camera and back to Abraham Lincoln's tradition? He may not want to come back, now that he has mastered that J.F.K. casual glamour pose in shirt sleeves and tie, suit jacket slung over his shoulder, elegant wife and pretty children accessorizing.

The Washington Post's fashion reporter, Robin Givhan, analyzed the Men's Vogue spread, with its "touch football" aura: "Obama is pictured in warm light or soft focus. He is pondering, nurturing, working. But never glad-handing, pontificating or fund-raising. The pictures celebrate the idea of Obama rather than the reality of politics."

Why should the 45-year-old senator tackle reality in a city that has forsworn it altogether? And why not join the catwalk of Democratic hotties? The Washington Post reported that the Democrats were "fielding an uncommonly high number of uncommonly good-looking candidates." Young and cute, as the party campaign honcho Rahm Emanuel wryly told me, could be a refreshing change from "Hastert, Rumsfeld and Cheney, who look like the retirees from 'Goodfellas.' "

Mr. Obama's main accomplishment so far is sending a chill through Hillary Clinton, the Democrats' dreaded eventuality. It must certainly be more fun cavorting on a cover with Eva Longoria than caucusing in the Capitol with Harry Reid. Working on legislation can be so tedious, compared with a 13-city book tour in which you are feted as the liberal hunk of the 21st century, generating buzz about your future instead of the country's.

Mr. Obama, who fears being seen as fluffy and who has been known to mock pretty boys in his party, never seems to take off his makeup these days, as he pads from one soft perch to the next, from Oprah to Meredith to Larry. The first black president of the Harvard Law Review is spending too much time in green rooms.

He also logs a lot of time at the gym. (You never know when Anna Wintour will call.) It is the only thing this intellectually nimble, preternaturally articulate smarty-pants has in common with W.

"Politics sometimes blends in with celebrity," he told Oprah this week. "And it gobbles you up because the tendency is for people to want to see you perform and say what they want to hear, as opposed to you trying to stay in touch with, you know, that deepest part of you, that kernel of truth inside." Doesn't he see that when you express this skepticism on Oprah it is not skepticism at all?

Haven't we seen this tease before? Before the 1996 campaign, Colin Powell scared the bejesus out of Hillary's husband by showing a fair amount of leg on his book tour. He sold 2.6 million books and was hugely popular, but caution crimped him. He never ran for president, and when he went to the State Department he never stood up to the forces of darkness.

Senator Obama's caution, too, may cause him to miss the moment. Like Alma Powell, Michelle Obama is afraid for her husband to run.

After 16 years of polarizing presidents driving them crazy, Americans will be yearning for someone as soothing as Obama. ("No one is exempt," he writes in one of many platitudes in his new book, "from the call to find common ground.") He is so hot now that tickets to his political events are being sought, at scalpers' prices, on Craig's List.

His appeal combines the political ability — alien to the Bush administration — to see something from your opponent's point of view with the cool detachment of a J.F.K. He's intriguingly imperfect: His ears stick out, he smokes, and he's written about wrestling with pot, booze and "maybe a little blow" as a young man.

He has been told by Democratic leaders to think about whether he really wants to be president, or whether he's just getting swept away by people who want him to do it. (That's a distinction that entitled and unqualified Republican WASPs like W. and Dan Quayle never bother to make, simply learning — or not learning — on the job.)

Does Barack Obama want to be a celebrity or a man of history — or is there no longer any difference?

The Decline Of Political Competition (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084334

IN AN ELECTION YEAR IN WHICH grumpy voters from coast to coast are gunning for the scalps of doddering Republicans, Rep. Gary Miller (R-Diamond Bar) would seem a vulnerable target. Named this summer by a nonprofit watchdog group as one of the "20 most corrupt members of Congress," Miller has earmarked road repairs near housing developments he co-owns, declined to pay taxes on three land sales and — in a congressional district one-quarter Latino — wrote legislation denying citizenship to the children of illegal immigrants.

But Democrats have a competitive disadvantage in unseating the four-term congressman: Miller is running for reelection unopposed.

This scene is playing out throughout Southern California and the rest of the state as competitive races and even challengers are becoming endangered species. Because of a cynical bipartisan agreement after the 2000 census, Democrats and Republicans represent frequently convoluted geographical footprints meticulously designed, it would seem, to ensure that no incumbent party will ever lose another election, no matter which way the political winds are blowing. In 2004, for example, not a single one of the 153 redrawn congressional, Assembly or state Senate seats changed political hands, and only three of the 53 House victors won with less than 60% of the vote.

Having carved out their spoils, Yalta-like, the two parties are loath to venture into each other's territories, even with polls showing that people want change. The cities of Diamond Bar, Chino and Rowland Heights all voted for Al Gore in 2000, and the Italy-shaped 42nd District that envelops them abuts the land-splotches of Democrats Linda T. Sanchez, Joe Baca and Grace F. Napolitano, yet no Democrat bothered to muster the 3,000 signatures necessary to take on Miller. One-candidate elections are supposed to be for fiefdoms like Myanmar, or the city of Vernon.

The unilateral disarmament is not limited to the party of Jimmy Carter. You could buy a car on Brand Boulevard in Glendale, drive southwest through Silver Lake and Hollywood as the street becomes Hyperion and then Fountain, take a left at Western and go all 30 miles to the Pacific Ocean, and only one of the five congressional districts you'd cross through would have a Republican on the ballot. (To add insult to neglect, the 35th's Maxine Waters is on that "20 most corrupt" list too.) That's 150,000 registered Republicans who the national party has left stranded in a sea of blue. Rarely have American Independents and Libertarians looked so inviting.

The solution to this unseemly state of affairs remains simple — put redistricting in the hands of retired judges, just like it was in the 1990s, and stop letting the major parties define the terms for their own cartel. Alas, voters turned down such a reform in last year's special election. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger is still committed to an overhaul of the redistricting process, and we wish him well. It'd be a shame to let California devolve into 53 one-party states.

U.S. And China Call For North Korea To Rejoin Talks (NYT)

By Thom Shanker And Joseph Kahn

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

BEIJING, Oct. 20 — The United States and China spoke in a unified voice on Friday to call for the resumption of six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear program, but they did not announce concrete steps to increase pressure on the North Korean government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said she had been told by the Chinese government that a special envoy sent by Beijing to North Korea had delivered "a strong message." And the Chinese foreign minister, standing beside Ms. Rice, pledged his nation's commitment to breaking the stalemate over the North's nuclear weapons program.

The meetings in Beijing took place after China's special envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, returned from Pyongyang, where he had met with Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader. Chinese officials described the meeting as "positive" and "greatly significant," but declined to provide details of what Mr. Kim had said.

Two South Korean news organizations quoted diplomatic sources as saying Mr. Kim had offered to resume nuclear talks under certain conditions, and said he gave assurances that he had no plans to conduct a second nuclear test, as many in the region had feared.

Those accounts were not confirmed by either Chinese or American officials, and North Korea held a huge political rally in downtown Pyongyang to "hail the success" of its nuclear test.

Li Zhaoxing, China's foreign minister, said, "We are ready to maintain and continue to strengthen our consultation and cooperation with all the other parties to strive to break the stalemate as soon as possible and reconvene the six-party talks."

Ms. Rice stressed that North Korea should return to those talks "without condition," and that the financial restrictions the United States has imposed to crack down on North Korean counterfeiting would not be lifted just to entice the North back to the negotiations.

In comments later Friday, Ms. Rice expressed confidence that China was committed to enforcing new United Nations military sanctions on North Korea, and that a number of economic and trade measures were under review.

DOJ_NMG_0084335

Asked specifically whether the Chinese were considering halting their oil supplies to North Korea, Ms. Rice said the Chinese government had told her it would "consider a whole host of measures."

Ms. Rice also said the Beijing leadership pledged to be "scrupulous" about ensuring that North Korea does not ship prohibited materials across its lengthy border with China.

As she neared the end of a fast-paced swing through Japan, South Korea and China, with a final stop in Moscow planned for the weekend, Ms. Rice said that halting North Korea's trade in nuclear bomb-making materials and missiles would take time; she emphasized that "this is an early trip."

The six-nation talks over North Korea's nuclear program stalled after multiple rounds in 2004 and 2005. Mr. Kim ignored Chinese pressure to return to the bargaining table before conducting a missile test in July and the nuclear test on Oct. 9.

Some Chinese experts say they hope Mr. Kim, emboldened by becoming the world's latest nuclear power, is eager to resume negotiations and see the price he can extract in exchange for slowing or scrapping his nuclear program.

But others here doubt he has any intention of rolling back the nuclear program, the realization of an enormously expensive effort begun by Mr. Kim's father, Kim Il-sung, after the Korean War.

There were mixed signs on Friday about the potential for resuming talks. Mr. Kim's meeting on Thursday with Mr. Tang was treated as a sign of progress here, if only because Mr. Kim appeared eager to repair relations with his leading benefactor.

A South Korean newspaper, Chosun Ilbo, citing diplomatic sources in China, said Mr. Kim had "expressed regret" for the nuclear test. Ms. Rice, however, said that her Chinese hosts had made no mention of any expression of regret by Mr. Kim. She said that there was nothing surprising in the Chinese summary of the visit by their envoy to North Korea.

Later in the day, though, the Yonhap News Agency of South Korea quoted diplomatic sources as saying that Mr. Kim had promised not to conduct another nuclear test, an event that China and the United States have said would quickly lead to a much harsher set of sanctions on his already isolated country.

That account also could not be confirmed.

It is unclear whether a new offer from North Korea to return to talks, provided certain conditions are met, will persuade China to reduce pressure on Pyongyang.

The risk for the United States is that China may soften its stance if it perceives that the Bush administration, rather than Mr. Kim, is throwing up obstacles to resuming talks.

Mr. Kim has pushed to hold one-on-one negotiations with the United States, but the Bush administration has refused to negotiate with North Korea outside the six-party talks. China has urged President Bush to authorize bilateral talks, but he has declined.

Even so, Chinese scholars who have held discussions with Chinese leaders say that North Korea's missile and nuclear tests, which were conducted despite stern warnings from China, had pushed Beijing toward a less accommodating approach toward its neighbor and onetime ally.

China twice backed United Nations sanctions against North Korea, and has since then indicated internally that it may be prepared to impose a range of bilateral sanctions if Mr. Kim continues to develop his nuclear program.

The Chinese leadership, the experts said, is prepared to reduce inexpensive oil supplies to North Korea if it conducts more nuclear tests or refuses to return to talks.

China has also imposed limited restrictions on banking transactions with North Korea, especially in the trading post of Dandong, on the Chinese side of the North Korean border, bankers there say.

Chinese analysts said they were not surprised that Mr. Kim would seek to blunt international solidarity against him. But they said they doubted he would be prepared to bargain in earnest about dismantling his nuclear program.

"I am pessimistic about the prospects for a diplomatic breakthrough," said Zhu Feng, a senior international affairs scholar and arms control expert at Beijing University. "The talks have to be given a chance, but I see no signs that Kim has undergone a sudden change of heart."

Mr. Zhu said he also doubted that China had much patience for inconclusive negotiations or North Korean "tricks" to buy time.

"I don't think our leaders are prepared to tolerate him much longer," Mr. Zhu said. "My feeling is that they are prepared to implement harsher penalties and will have to proceed with them before long."

China Gave 'Strong Message' To North Koreans, Rice Says (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

Beijing Is Called Ready to Apply U.N. Sanctions

DOJ_NMG_0084336

BEIJING, Oct. 20 -- China and the United States on Friday appeared to close ranks on North Korea, as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice emerged from a day-long series of meetings here to say that a high-level Chinese government delegation had given North Korea "a strong message" about its nuclear test. China urged North Korea, its longtime beneficiary, to return to six-nation negotiations and appeared ready to implement key measures of the U.N. Security Council resolution punishing the Pyongyang government, Rice said.

Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing and other Chinese officials did not provide details of the meeting on Thursday between a Chinese envoy and North Korean leader Kim Jong Il. But Li pointedly told reporters after meeting with Rice that China will "continue to implement our relevant international obligations and exert our due role in this process."

Rice, briefing reporters traveling with her, said China is considering a range of responses, but said she did not press the government to take any particular steps to force North Korea back to the bargaining table to discuss its nuclear program. "Let's just watch and see what China will do," Rice said, adding that "nobody wants to be on the wrong side of this resolution, in other words, something slipping through."

The U.N. resolution bars trade with North Korea in major weapons, materials that could be used in a nuclear program and luxury goods. China has an 880-mile land border with North Korea, and Rice said the border would be closely monitored.

China has been North Korea's largest trading partner, and has frequently criticized the Bush administration for its refusal to hold bilateral negotiations with North Korea. But officials here were shocked by Pyongyang's refusal to heed its warnings not to conduct a test.

Rice arrived in China after stops in Japan and South Korea to coordinate strategy on implementing the resolution and to reassure Asians that the United States does not want to escalate the conflict. Among the leaders she met with were Chinese President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao.

Rice said it was clear that early reports on U.S. intentions have "conjured up in people's minds the Cuban missile crisis," in which the United States imposed a quarantine on Cuba, and she wanted to allay those fears.

She also emphasized that she had not come to Asia "with my own list of what every country in the world should do." But she predicted that the sanctions may remain in place for some time. "I do believe that you're getting a firm response," she said. "If there isn't some movement, you may get a firmer response as time goes on, but I think this is going to evolve."

On Thursday, China announced that State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan had met with Kim in Pyongyang. When Rice and Tang posed for photographs before their meeting Friday, Tang was overheard telling Rice, "Fortunately, my visit this time has not been in vain." Reporters were then ushered from the room.

The Tang-Kim meeting spurred a rash of news reports in South Korea that Kim had expressed regret for the Oct. 9 test, that North Korea would return to the talks and even that North Korea had declared it would not conduct a second test. Like the Chinese officials, Rice did not disclose details of the meeting, except to say she did not get any indication that Kim expressed regret for testing the weapon.

"There wasn't anything particularly surprising" about Kim's message, Rice said, suggesting the reports that Kim promised a halt in testing were also inaccurate.

Rice aides declined to elaborate on her remarks. In Washington, White House spokesman Tony Snow said that "the North Koreans have not made proffers to return to the six-party talks" and instead said they would return only if the United States ended a crackdown on North Korean money-laundering operations.

The talks have been suspended for nearly a year. North Korea has blamed a U.S. Treasury Department action against a bank in Macau called Banco Delta Asia, which the department had identified as the main conduit for bringing North Korean-made counterfeit U.S. bills into the international system. The Treasury Department had determined that senior officials at the Macau bank accepted large deposits of cash and agreed to place the bogus money into circulation. The bank is also reputed to hold the private accounts of Kim and his family.

In September 2005, four days before North Korea reached an agreement with the United States, China, Russia, Japan and South Korea on a "statement of principles" to guide nuclear negotiations, the Treasury Department formally designated the bank as a "primary money-laundering concern." Banco Delta Asia quickly teetered on the edge of collapse, and banks around the world began to curtail their dealings with North Korea for fear of being similarly tainted. After the impact of the Treasury action became apparent, North Korea refused to return to the six-party talks.

Rice said a recent decision by at least four Chinese banks to stop dealing with North Korea was related to the investigation of Banco Delta Asia. "I will tell you that the reaction to Banco Delta Asia has been quite extraordinary, and it must mean that it's having an effect," she said.

In Washington, meanwhile, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and South Korean Defense Minister Yoon Kwang Ung met Friday and approved a joint communique emphasizing the "continuation of the extended deterrence offered by the U.S. nuclear umbrella" for South Korea. The 2005 communique had spoken only of "continued provision of a nuclear umbrella."

DOJ_NMG_0084337

South Korean officials had urged their U.S. counterparts to expand on the "nuclear umbrella" assurance, although the Pentagon resisted the change, U.S. defense officials said. "They wanted to define it further" said a Pentagon spokesman, Maj. David Smith, such as "if the North does this, we'll do that." But he said U.S. policy is not to provide such details, either publicly or privately.

At a Pentagon news conference, Rumsfeld repeatedly said that this year's joint communique would be virtually the same as last year's, until Yoon contradicted him. "I hope that when the joint statement comes out eventually, it'll have different language from years past," Yoon said.

Staff writer Ann Scott Tyson in Washington contributed to this report.

China Urges North Korea To Return To Negotiations (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

BEIJING - China sent "a strong message" to North Korea about its nuclear weapons test and urged Pyongyang to return to negotiations about its nuclear arsenal, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said after meetings here Friday.

Displaying unusual harmony with China on a key security issue, Rice praised Beijing's role in the crisis, and she, too, urged North Korea to return to the six-nation negotiations. She expressed pessimism that the isolated North Korean regime would take up the offer anytime soon, however.

Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing appealed for "cool-headedness" in dealing with North Korea's nuclear ambitions, reflecting Beijing's long-standing fears of instability on the Korean peninsula.

China has long propped up Kim's regime with oil supplies and other aid, but there are signs that Beijing is losing patience with North Korea and reassessing those ties. Some U.S. officials believe that the apparent shift may reflect the fact the China has become a major economic power that values stability more than revolutionary fervor or ideological solidarity with the erratic Communist regime in Pyongyang.

Senior Chinese leaders privately have expressed frustration with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il and questioned his judgment with unusual candor, and a senior Rice aide, speaking aboard her flight here from South Korea, said there's been a "sea change" in China's attitude toward North Korea. The aide requested anonymity to speak more frankly. China, which was deeply embarrassed and angered by North Korea's October 9 nuclear test, this week sent a senior envoy, Tang Jiaxuan, to Pyongyang to make its views clear. Tang, who returned to Beijing on Thursday, said that his mission produced results.

"Fortunately, my visit this time has not been in vain," he said as he met with Rice. He wasn't more specific. There was an unconfirmed report from South Korea's Yonhap news agency that North Korean leader Kim promised Tang that his country wouldn't conduct more nuclear tests.

U.S. officials said they couldn't confirm that report, and cast doubt on it.

A major part of Rice's mission here was to ensure that China, North Korea's only major ally, enforces strict U.N. sanctions on the country's imports and exports.

Foreign Minister Li said that China would enforce the U.N. sanctions.

"China will, as always, continue to implement our relevant international obligations and exert our due role in this process," Li said.

That message apparently was delivered to the North Koreans, as well.

Tang "went out of his way to tell the North that (the U.N. resolution imposing sanctions) was a resolution that everybody has to implement," Rice said in a session with reporters accompanying her to Asia.

The U.N. sanctions ban North Korea from importing or exporting materials for its nuclear weapons and ballistic missile programs; advanced weapons such as tanks and artillery; and luxury goods.

China will be critical in determining whether the sanctions have any effect on isolated North Korea's political calculus.

Rice said she didn't dictate to the Chinese how they should enforce them and noted that, since the U.N. resolution was passed with near-record swiftness, discussions are still under way about the details of inspecting North Korean cargoes.

She predicted that Beijing, which is concerned about a potential flood of refugees, would be "scrupulous" about patrolling its 880-mile border with impoverished North Korea.

The six-nation talks have been on ice for nearly a year, since North Korea boycotted them to protest a Bush administration financial crackdown that froze accounts linked to Kim's regime in a bank in China's territory of Macau.

China has been urging Washington to suspend the financial measures in order to restart the talks, which also include Japan, Russia and South Korea.

But Rice said the Chinese told her that the talks should begin without preconditions. "The Chinese are emphasizing the need for six-party talks to begin again," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0084338

Rice said that President Bush has made it clear that he won't reverse the financial measures, some of which were taken to protect the U.S. dollar against counterfeiting.

She was skeptical that North Korea would return to the negotiating table soon, and predicted that the sanctions against it could be in place for some time.

"I don't know how quickly they will make a strategic decision to denuclearize," she said. "I think we will be at this for a long time."

Rice also met with Chinese President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao. She flies to Moscow for meetings on Saturday.

China Takes Tough Stance On North Korea (AP-Y)

By Anne Gearan, Ap Diplomatic Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

An exasperated China took a newly tough approach to communist ally North Korea on Friday, siding with the United States in saying the North must back away from nuclear confrontation, and moving to cut Pyongyang's vital supply of hard currency.

Chinese banks have stopped financial transfers to North Korea under government orders, bank employees said Friday. And at an appearance with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, China's foreign minister nudged the North to resume negotiations over its nuclear program and assured Washington that China would carry out United Nations sanctions on Pyongyang.

"We hope all relevant parties will maintain coolheadedness, adopt a prudent and a responsible approach and adhere to peaceful dialogue," Li Zhaoxing said as Rice concluded crisis talks in Asia following the North's Oct. 9 nuclear test blast.

China, which is North Korea's longtime protector, has been reluctant in the past to use economic pressure for fear Kim Jung Il's government might collapse.

But Chinese leaders were stung when the North ignored their warnings not to test-fire missiles over the summer, and again when it defied Beijing by detonating the underground blast this month. China previously had reduced food aid to North Korea amid complaints that Pyongyang had ignored Chinese interests.

The move by China's banks could deal a significant blow to the already impoverished North. China is North Korea's top trading partner — accounting for more than half its total foreign trade of less than $4 billion last year — and is a key conduit for its hard currency.

China's actions are considered key to enforcing U.N. sanctions on the North over the test, and to coaxing the North to back away from the nuclear brink and rejoin talks.

Rice told reporters China has new resolve against the North that shows it has re-evaluated its relationship with Pyongyang. Last week's U.N. Security Council vote to impose sanctions on Pyongyang, which Beijing supported, proves the point, Rice said.

"In this entire 30-year history of the North Korean nuclear program, this is the first time that the international system has been able to actually impose a cost on North Korea for its nuclear behavior," Rice said. "It's able to impose that cost because China has been brought into the process in a way that China never was before."

The U.S.-backed sanctions were watered down partly at China's request, but China's vote in favor of punishment still represents a shift for Beijing.

All four major Chinese state-owned banks and British-owned HSBC Corp. have stopped financial transfers to the North, according to bank employees in Beijing and the northeastern Chinese city of Shenyang.

China has also been inspecting North Korean trucks at some points along the two nations' 880-mile border, and it dispatched a top envoy to Pyongyang this week to warn the North against a second nuclear test and try to bring it back to the arms talks.

Discussions over Pyongyang's nuclear program have been stalled for a year because of a boycott by the North over U.S. financial sanctions. The talks involve the United States, host China, the two Koreas, Japan and Russia.

Beijing was the final and most important stop on Rice's hastily arranged tour of Asian capitals. She continues to Moscow on Saturday for talks on the dual nuclear challenges posed by North Korea and Iran.

In Beijing, Rice appealed to North Korea to return without condition to stalled international talks over its nuclear program. She downplayed differences among the U.S., China and South Korea over the strength and tone of world response to Pyongyang.

The U.N. sanctions ban trade with the North in major weapons and materials that could be used by its ballistic missile and unconventional weapons programs, and in luxury goods enjoyed almost exclusively by elites around Kim.

The U.N. restrictions call for inspections of all cargo leaving and arriving in North Korea, but it is not clear how that will work in practice. Rice has stepped gingerly around that point this week, saying all nations are obligated to enforce the sanctions but leaving the details vague.

DOJ_NMG_0084339

Several Defense Department officials said Friday that the U.S. Navy is tracking a North Korean cargo ship that left port and was headed south from the Korean Peninsula. One of the officials, who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the information, said the U.S. does not know what the ship is carrying or its destination.

South Korean news reported Friday that Kim said Pyongyang doesn't plan to carry out any more nuclear tests and expressed regret about the country's first-ever atomic detonation last week. Kim told a visiting Chinese envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, that the North had "no plans for additional nuclear tests," Yonhap news agency reported, citing an unnamed diplomatic source in Beijing.

Rice met with Tang in Beijing on Friday and later told reporters that he had carried a "strong message to North Korea about the seriousness of what has happened."

Rice would not provide details of Kim's response, but White House press secretary Tony Snow told reporters in Washington that the North had not offered to return to six-nation arms talks stalled since late last year.

___

Associated Press writer Lolita C. Baldor contributed to this report from Washington.

U.S. Finds Allies Are Reluctant To Enforce North Korea Sanctions (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. In Beijing, Gordon Fairclough In Shanghai And Yuka Hayashi In Tokyo

The Wall Street Journal, October 21, 2006

As it leads the charge to punish North Korea for testing nuclear weapons, the U.S. is finding its allies are reluctant to enforce even the minimal sanctions imposed by the United Nations -- and that its own, tougher approach has serious gaps as well.

During her Asia trip this past week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the solution is to put more muscle into an effort launched by the U.S. three years ago to monitor and interdict suspected weapons shipments around the world. The Proliferation Security Initiative, or PSI, has had its successes. But North Korea's three key neighbors -- China, South Korea and Japan -- are all uncertain about how that crackdown might work, or even if they want to participate.

The logic behind PSI is simple: A loose coalition of countries share intelligence on suspected arms trafficking, and then swoop in on ships or planes suspected of carrying illicit cargo. U.S. officials say the program has resulted in a number of prominent catches around the world, including missiles and chemicals, mainly involving North Korean shipments.

Pyongyang has been accused for years of trafficking in everything from counterfeit currency to nuclear-weapons parts. The U.N. resolution, approved days after North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, calls for countries to prevent Pyongyang's trafficking in illicit materials. It left the details to be worked out later.

Ms. Rice's immediate challenge is to get real cooperation from North Korea's neighbors. Yet she appeared to make little progress on that front during her Asia trip, which ended Saturday.

South Korea remains reluctant to sign on, and members of Seoul's ruling liberal party argue that it shouldn't. Demonstrators outside the Foreign Ministry headquarters chanted slogans opposing PSI during Ms. Rice's visit. Chinese authorities, meanwhile, who are otherwise taking tough steps to crack down on North Korea, have said they may draw the line at interdicting shipments at sea.

Beijing and Seoul worry that any attempts to stop North Korean freighters could spark an armed skirmish. Japan, while more eager to crack down on Pyongyang, is severely limited by its pacifist constitution.

Even if the U.S. were to get full cooperation on PSI, participants would face challenges in tracking and interdicting banned shipments. Getting sound intelligence on shipments is tough, especially when it is easy to disguise a vessel's identification and registration.

Countries are also wrangling over the legal justification for interdicting shipments, especially in international waters. Neither PSI nor the U.N. sanctions gives countries clear legal leverage. Ms. Rice has argued that under the U.N. resolution, countries have a "mandatory obligation" to scrutinize shipments from North Korea under the authority of their domestic laws.

The legal hurdle is particularly high in Japan. To pave the way for its military participation, Tokyo may have to invoke for the first time a clause in a 1999 law that grants expanded responsibility to the country's self-defense forces.

As the North's top trade partner, China has a tall order, too, policing a long land border with its neighbor. In the past week, Beijing has stepped up inspections of trucks bound for North Korea at the main border crossing in Dandong.

Some U.S. officials, too, are wary of the consequences of stopping or seizing North Korean vessels or their cargoes at sea. One U.S. official said the military, currently fighting two wars, is short of the resources to effectively police shipping. "I don't think our military is anxious to dedicate significant resources to that sort of effort," the official said.

Write to Neil King Jr. at neil.king@wsj.com1, Gordon Fairclough at gordon.fairclough@wsj.com2 and Yuka Hayashi at yuka.hayashi@wsj.com3

DOJ_NMG_0084340

Asia Goal Proving Elusive For Rice (LAT)

By Mark Magnier

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

BEIJING — As U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice left China today for Russia, her goal of uniting Northeast Asia in a strong, unambiguous punitive stance against North Korea remained elusive.

China continued to balk at using its economic leverage too aggressively against its longtime ally, given the risk that a wave of refugees along their 880-mile shared border could destabilize its industrial northeast. China would be the linchpin of any effective sanctions since it supplies most of North Korea's fuel and much of its food.

South Korea has refused to shutter two major economic projects with the North that put millions of dollars in hard currency into the pockets of the isolated Stalinist regime.

Russia, the final stop on Rice's four-nation trip in the wake of North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, opposes tough economic sanctions or intrusive searches.

And Japan, closest to Washington in its thinking on the crisis, is roundly viewed in the region as the wrong player at the wrong time to make like neighborhood cop. The concern is that memories of Japan's wartime brutality on the Korean peninsula and throughout Asia would inflame tensions were it to inspect North Korean ships at sea or take other tough enforcement steps.

With no easy answers, a wily adversary in Pyongyang, the North's capital, and limited options, Rice sought Friday to lower expectations, even as she praised China's willingness to consider tougher measures in the interest of regional and global stability.

"This is an early trip. People are reviewing where they are," she told reporters in Beijing. "What do we know about securing the land border with North Korea? Not very much."

Amid South Korean and Japanese media reports that Pyongyang had no plan to test a second nuclear device, and that it was contrite about the test that rattled nerves around the world, the North remained publicly defiant.

"The nuclear test was an exercise of the independent and legitimate right of [North Korea] as a sovereign state," said Choe Thae Bok, a senior member of the North's Korean Workers' Party, according to the country's official news agency.

The record is not very good when it comes to nations getting the nuclear genie back into the bottle.

"No country has stopped nuclear tests after only carrying out one," Japanese Foreign Minister Taro Aso told reporters in Tokyo. "We have to think that [a second test] will be done."

Faced with few alternatives, North Korea's neighbors have put renewed faith in the heretofore unsuccessful six-nation talks as a way to contain the isolated, impoverished state. Negotiations stalled after Pyongyang walked out a year ago. In addition to China and the United States, the participants are the two Koreas, Japan and Russia.

As usual, a great deal comes down to mercurial North Korea's stance, behavior and negotiating tactics.

"I can't answer to whether they're serious about returning to six-party talks or not," Rice told reporters. "I don't think anybody believes that six or seven six-party talk sessions in which we again get into an argument about the sequencing of a light-water reactor is going to be very helpful to anyone."

China's desire to see the talks succeed — it had a crucial role in setting them up — and its role as mediator and host are additional reasons it is reluctant to push North Korea too hard on sanctions. Beijing believes that if it is identified too closely with a U.S. hard-line stance, it loses the opportunity to broker a solution in the future, with the international prestige that entails.

"Our purpose is to do some punitive things," said Shen Dingli, an international relations professor at Fudan University in Shanghai. "But the ultimate goal is to bring them back to the six-party talks and to abandon their nuclear weapons."

mark.magnier@latimes.com

Times staff writer Bruce Wallace in Tokyo and Yin Lijin in The Times' Beijing Bureau contributed to this report.

China Wrests N. Korean Pledge (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

BEIJING -- China reportedly won a pledge from North Korean leader Kim Jong-il not to conduct another nuclear test and at the same time blocked bank transfers to the isolated state.

"In this entire 30-year history of the North Korean nuclear program, this is the first time that the international system has been able to actually impose a cost on North Korea for its nuclear behavior," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

"It's able to impose that cost because China has been brought into the process in a way that China never was before," she said after meetings with President Hu Jintao and other senior leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0084341

Chinese State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan briefed Miss Rice on his meeting with Mr. Kim a day earlier in Pyongyang. As state councilor, Mr. Tang outranks China's foreign minister in the government hierarchy.

"Fortunately, my visit this time has not been in vain," Mr. Tang said.

Meanwhile, acting on government orders, four state-owned Chinese banks halted financial transfers to North Korea, bank employees told the Associated Press in Beijing and the northeastern city of Shenyang.

Miss Rice flew out of the Chinese capital today for Moscow, where she will hold further talks on implementing U.N. sanctions. Miss Rice is scheduled to discuss North Korea with Russian President Vladimir Putin and Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov.

The secretary of state has also visited Japan and South Korea on her tour of North Korea's neighbors.

"We have no plans for additional nuclear tests," South Korea's Yonhap news agency quoted Mr. Kim as telling the Chinese envoy. The newspaper cited an unidentified diplomatic source in Beijing.

South Korea's Chosun Ilbo daily reported that the North Korean leader also told the Chinese visitors "he is sorry about the nuclear test" already conducted. The newspaper cited a diplomatic source in China.

The Japanese news agency Kyodo quoted Foreign Minister Taro Aso as saying he had information, although not confirmed, that the North Korean leader had said he would not conduct another test.

U.S. and Chinese officials stopped short of confirming the reports, saying only that Mr. Kim pledged not to escalate the situation further.

Mr. Tang "went out of his way to emphasize that he told the North" that China "intends to implement" U.N. Security Council Resolution 1718, Miss Rice told reporters in a joint press conference with Chinese Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing.

The U.N. measure imposed sanctions on missile- and nuclear-related imports and exports and called for inspections of cargo heading in and out of North Korea.

"The Chinese made the point to us that they are scrupulous about [their] land border" with North Korea, Miss Rice said. "You will see cooperation on cargo, particularly if there is suspicious cargo."

China had said publicly that it would not participate in inspections called for in the U.N. resolution. Nevertheless, Chinese officials this week began inspecting North Korean trucks crossing the two nations' 880-mile border.

Miss Rice said that her visit to China, and earlier to Japan and South Korea, was intended to emphasize the importance of enforcing the resolution.

"Their implementation is going to differ according to their own authorities, with the specific problems they face," she said.

During his joint appearance with Miss Rice, Mr. Li, the Chinese foreign minister, urged North Korea to end its yearlong boycott of six-nation talks on North Korea's nuclear future.

"We hope all relevant parties will maintain coolheadedness, adopt a prudent and a responsible approach and adhere to peaceful dialogue," Mr. Li said.

As North Korea's longtime ally and protector, China had used its veto-wielding clout in the U.N. Security Council to soften the sanctions package.

The measure explicitly ruled out the threat of military force if North Korean defiance continued.

Nevertheless, China's vote for the final resolution and measures it has since implemented represented a major shift in its posture toward the North.

Russia, China, Japan, the two Koreas and the United States are parties in the six-nation talks that have been boycotted by North Korea since late last year.

N. Korea Threat Lies In Nuclear Sales (LAT)

By Greg Miller

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

U.S. intelligence officials and weapons experts say the possible export of atomic material and know-how is a greater concern than an attack.

WASHINGTON — U.S. intelligence officials and weapons proliferation experts say they are concerned that North Korea could add plutonium to the extensive inventory of arms components and technologies it already has sold to such nations as Syria, Pakistan and Libya.

Because of North Korea's track record as an eager exporter of weaponry, some experts are more worried about the government in Pyongyang spreading nuclear technology to other "rogue" nations than about the possibility of it launching a nuclear attack.

"Iran having nuclear weapons is a threat," said David Albright, a former weapons inspector and current president of the Institute for Science and International Security in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0084342

"It's hard to articulate that North Korea having nuclear weapons is a threat to anybody, except by selling it."

That concern prompted a warning from President Bush on Wednesday that Pyongyang would face a "grave consequence" if caught trying to sell plutonium or nuclear weapons to "rogue" nations or terrorist groups.

Albright and other experts, as well as American intelligence officials, said they had not seen evidence that North Korea was attempting to sell the nuclear technology it demonstrated in an underground explosion Oct. 9. Doing so, they said, would be an extreme and dangerous step even for one of the world's most defiant regimes.

But the combination of North Korea's newly demonstrated capability and its long history of selling arms has refocused international attention on the nuclear proliferation threat.

"I don't think you'll find guys saying they've got devices ready to sell off the shelf," said a U.S. intelligence official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the classified nature of the subject. "I think the concern would be about components and raw material."

Tracking North Korea's weapons programs and shipments has been a major priority for U.S. intelligence agencies.

Last year, American intelligence analysts concluded that samples of processed uranium surrendered by Libya probably had come from North Korea. Libya turned over the materials when it agreed in 2003 to abandon its illegal weapons programs.

Pyongyang has a more extensive and established record as an exporter of conventional missile components.

A study by the London-based International Institute for Strategic Studies says North Korea had sold "several hundred" mid-range ballistic missiles "as well as materials, equipment, components and production technology" to countries that include Egypt, Iran, Libya, Pakistan, Syria and Yemen. Most of the exported missiles have been variants of the Scud design the Soviets first sold to North Korea in the late 1960s, the study says.

Over a two-decade period, sales of missiles and components have brought in revenue of several hundred million dollars, "a significant portion of North Korea's hard currency earnings," the study says.

North Korea is an impoverished country that relies on China for much of its food, and it depends on the sale of weapons and contraband, allegedly including counterfeit U.S. currency, for much of its revenue.

North Korea is believed to have engaged in barter arrangements by which it has provided missiles to Iran in exchange for oil. Of greater concern has been an apparent deal with Pakistan begun in 1997 by which North Korea provided missile components and technology in return for expertise on developing a uranium enrichment program — a means of producing weapons-grade nuclear material that is more difficult to detect than the reprocessing of plutonium.

Numerous North Korean weapons shipments have been intercepted. In 1996, Swiss authorities stopped a consignment of Scud missile components headed to Egypt, prompting Cairo to promise to curtail its purchases from North Korea.

Given North Korea's record, its nuclear test has triggered fears that it may next seek to export such weapons technology as well.

As recently as several years ago, American intelligence agencies concluded that North Korea probably had enough plutonium for two or three bombs. But in December 2002, North Korea expelled international inspectors, soon thereafter withdrew from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty and subsequently declared that it was resuming the reprocessing of more than 8,000 spent fuel rods.

"They have certainly produced enough plutonium since that time to make a number of more weapons," said a U.S. defense official familiar with the intelligence on North Korea.

It is unclear whether Pyongyang plans further nuclear tests. American spy satellites and other surveillance have detected suspicious activity at other underground facilities, possibly indicating preparations for another test, U.S. intelligence officials said. However, South Korean and Japanese media reported Friday that North Korean leader Kim Jong Il had told a Chinese envoy that Pyongyang would not conduct another test.

Experts said that further tests would suggest that North Korea has an ample supply of plutonium, enough to make additional bombs and raise concerns about proliferation.

Recent sanctions imposed by the United Nations bar North Korea from spreading nuclear material or technology. And most experts said the country would probably refrain from doing so. "It's still a low-probability worry," said Michael Levi, a nuclear weapons expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, "but it's the high consequences that make people concerned."

greg.miller@latimes.com

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

A history of arms exports

Here are some of the transfers of weapons and related materials from North Korea to other countries:

Egypt

· Bought Scud-B missiles in 1980s

DOJ_NMG_0084343

· Bought Scud-C throughout 1990s
· Negotiated for Nodong missiles in 2000, but U.S. diplomatic intervention blocked transfer
Iran
· Had Scud-B missiles and mobile launchers shipped in 1987 for Iran-Iraq war
· Received Scud-C missiles in early 1990s
· Began to have Nodong missiles shipped in 1995
· May have received advanced Taepodong technology
Pakistan
· Reportedly agreed around 1997 to trade uranium enrichment technology for Nodong missiles and production technology
· Arranged for missile components and technicians to be transported by aircraft from North Korea in late 1997
· Tested version of Nodong in April 1998
Syria
· Reports of negotiations surfaced in 1989
· Received Scud-C missiles in 1990s
· Few reports of substantial sales since 1990s, perhaps because Syria and Iran developed missile cooperation
Libya
· Ship destined for Libya carrying Scud missile materials, components and blueprints intercepted June 1999 by Indian customs officials
· Unconfirmed reports of purchases of Nodong missiles or components since 2000
· U.S. intelligence analyzed Libyan-processed uranium after December 2003 and concluded it came from North Korea
United Arab Emirates, Yemen
· Minor purchases of Scud missiles during 1990s
· North Korean ship carrying 15 Scud missiles for Yemen temporarily detained in December 2002
Source: "North Korea's Weapons Programs — A Net Assessment," International Institute for Strategic Studies

Amid Nuclear Crisis, Sun May Be Setting On `sunshine Policy' (MCT)

By Tim Johnson
McClatchy Newspapers, October 21, 2006

SEOUL, South Korea - Many South Koreans shrug off North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear test, saying that while a nuclear-armed Pyongyang may menace the United States and Japan, it's unlikely to attack its prosperous southern neighbor.

Their attitudes changed markedly under the "sunshine policy" launched in 1998 by former President Kim Dae-jung, which fueled investment in impoverished North Korea and helped defuse the fear that the Korean Peninsula might be at war once again.

But North Korea's entry into the global nuclear club may be a coda for the sunshine policy. Some South Koreans say engagement has failed to encourage significant reform in North Korea. Others view it as appeasement, saying their nation has served as a virtual ATM for North Korea.

The sunshine policy, which also has put Seoul in conflict with Washington, clearly is nearing sunset.

"Public opinion is divided," said Choi Jang-jip, a Korea University political scientist. "After the nuclear test, questions have been raised about people's trust in the policy."

A prominent political scientist, Nam Sung-wook, said he expected the policy "to expire in the near future" because it had failed to halt North Korea's nuclear quest. "North Korea is a brand-new country since Oct. 9," he said.

The sunshine policy dramatically increased the exposure of South Koreans to North Korea, and many South Koreans came to believe that they were forestalling North Korea's economic collapse and setting the pace for eventual orderly reunification. Each month, tens of thousands of South Koreans cross the heavily fortified border to visit a mountain sanctuary resort in North Korea, getting a small taste of life on the other side.

Now, however, polls show that an increasing number of South Koreans think that Seoul should stand up more firmly to Pyongyang, even as their fear of North Korea has diminished.

"You need to use a stick as well as a carrot in conducting the engagement policy," said Kim Yong-won, a 25-year-old university student studying computer science.

The pillars of the policy are two massive cross-border investment projects, the Mount Kumgang resort - Diamond Mountain in English - and the Kaesong Industrial Zone.

DOJ_NMG_0084344

About 40,000 South Koreans go each month to the resort in the Kumgang Mountains, a site exalted in Korean literature as the embodiment of the peninsula's scenic beauty. Some 1.35 million South Koreans have traveled to the resort, crossing the once-feared Demilitarized Zone into North Korea.

The Kaesong Industrial Zone, an hour's bus ride from Seoul just north of the DMZ, employs 9,000 North Koreans now and is slated to grow rapidly in the next few years.

The Hyundai Group, which has financed the projects, has pumped in about $1.6 billion, helping to increase cross-border trade to more than $1 billion last year.

Newspapers fill with emotional stories of reunions among relatives who were separated after the 1950-1953 Korean War. Some 14,600 people have been reunited, and tens of thousands of South Koreans, mainly businessmen, have visited North Korea under the sunshine policy, mostly searching for opportunities.

"For 50 years, before Kim Dae-jung's sunshine policy, only 200 South Koreans had visited North Korea," said Jung Chung-rae, a legislator from South Korea's ruling Uri Party.

As a result of the increased exposure, Jung said, polls consistently show that fewer than 10 percent of South Koreans feel an immediate threat from North Korea.

The last major nuclear scare occurred in 1994, when Pyongyang threatened to turn Seoul into a "sea of fire." Panic ensured, with many South Koreans fleeing to markets in "ramen runs," believing that catastrophic war might erupt.

But a majority of South Koreans now think that North Korea is using its newfound nuclear capacity as a bargaining chip and would target other nations - probably Japan and the United States - only if pushed to the wall.

"I don't think Kim Jong Il will fire nuclear weapons toward South Korea because that would be killing his own brethren," said Oh Sang-tae, a 64-year-old deliveryman for an office-supply store in central Seoul.

Like many residents of Seoul, he said he wasn't sure where there might be a secure bomb shelter. The Donga-ilbo newspaper reported recently that the city of some 10 million people has nuclear shelters capable of holding only 1,500.

Conservatives, who've long decried the sunshine policy, said many South Koreans had grown foolishly inured to real threats of war.

"Maybe people are numb," said Cha Myung-jin, a legislator with South Korea's largest opposition force, the Grand National Party. "The threat has been going on for so long, people don't feel it."

Pyongyang is known to have 8,000 artillery pieces dug into mountains and aimed at Seoul, ready to lob conventional, chemical and biological shells.

From his perch at Seoul's South Gate Market, vendor Kim Myong-seon - who sells military surplus gear, including gas masks - said citizens weren't nervous as they once were.

"It was after Sept. 11 that people bought gas masks," he said. "People thought South Korea could be another target of al-Qaida because it is a U.S. ally."

Now sales are slow. No one is rushing out to stock up for conflict.

"Nobody is frightened," Kim said. "It's not like in the past."

Yet polls have found that South Koreans do worry about the role the Bush administration may play in a crisis, fearing that they might get dragged into a war and dreading anything like the war U.S. troops are waging in Iraq, where some 2,400 South Korean troops are posted.

"I am afraid of President Bush. It is possible he could start a war in Korea as he did in Iraq," said Cho Sung-moo, an electrical engineering student at Chonnam University in Seoul.

U.N. Reports On Genetic Concentration Camps (WT)

By Damien Mcelroy

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

North Korea operates a rigorous system of eugenics that locks up those deemed subnormal, ranging from the disabled to dwarfs, according to a U.N. report released yesterday.

A system of gulags is designed to ensure that those who do not conform to the state's designation of normal do not pass on their genes by having children.

"Those with disabilities are sent away from the capital city and particularly those with mental disability are detained in areas or camps known as 'Ward 49' with harsh and subhuman conditions," wrote Vitit Muntarbhorn, a Thai lawyer who is special rapporteur for human rights in North Korea.

Evidence was gathered from defectors to South Korea.

The report said dwarfs are not allowed to reproduce and they are rounded up and relocated. Marriages at the camps are permitted but having children is not.

DOJ_NMG_0084345

Shut away for life, the afflicted are subjected to harsh and subhuman conditions. Food is scarce and of poor quality and beatings are commonplace, according to the report.

There are extensive descriptions of other forms of torture, including chemical weapons tests and germ agent experiments. Those not used as laboratory guinea pigs are ordered to carry out back-breaking work.

North Korea is not the only totalitarian state to retain a fascination with the goal of breeding a better population by eliminating those with "weak" genes. But since the fall of the Soviet bloc, it apparently is one of the last states to implement the practice.

Pyongyang is also dedicated to the principle of racial purity. Women who have sexual relations with the small Chinese community in North Korea are often purged.

"If they carry a child of non-Korean ethnicity, they may be subjected to discrimination and/or violence, with a dire impact on the babies," the report stated.

The report was delivered to the U.N. General Assembly, which has been asked to censure the Stalinist dictatorship.

U.S.: China Must Address Trade Disputes (AP-Y)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, October 21, 2006

China has made progress in resolving long-standing trade disputes with the United States, but more needs to be done in a number of areas, the administration's top trade official for Asia said Friday.

Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Karan Bhatia said that when he holds talks next week with Chinese trade officials in Beijing, he would review a number of commitments China made last spring.

He said the government seemed to be fulfilling some pledges, such as an agreement to load legal software on all new computers sold in China. But in other areas, the Chinese have been less forthcoming, he said.

"We are looking, frankly, for speedy resolution in areas where they have made policy commitments," Bhatia said.

In addition to the commitment on computer software, other commitments made by the Chinese included ways it planned to crack down on the sale of illegal, pirated computer software and expanding the opportunity for U.S. and other foreign firms to compete for Chinese government contracts.

Bhatia's trip is just the latest by administration officials seeking to show progress in dealing with America's ballooning trade deficit with China, which hit a record $202 billion last year and is on track to exceed that amount this year.

In addition to discussions with government officials in Beijing, Bhatia was traveling to the Chinese cities of Dalian and Shenyang to meet with local government officials and business leaders during five days of talks that will begin next Tuesday.

Before arriving in China, Bhatia planned a stop Monday in Seoul, South Korea, for meetings with government officials, business groups and students to present U.S. administration views on the current free trade negotiations with South Korea.

Bhatia said the United States still has significant issues to resolve before it will be able to complete the free trade deal with South Korea or a separate free trade agreement being negotiated with Malaysia.

Both sets of talks face a deadline for completion at the beginning of next year for the deals to be submitted to Congress before President Bush loses his negotiating authority under the Trade Promotion Act, which is set to expire next July.

Bhatia said both South Korea and Malaysia stood to gain a great deal economically by concluding agreements. He said North Korea's recent testing of a nuclear device underscored the need for close ties between the U.S. and South Korea but did not have an impact on the "nuts and bolts" of the talks on removing trade barriers.

The fourth round of the U.S.-South Korea trade talks are scheduled to be held next week in Jeju, South Korea.

Those negotiations will be followed the next week in Kuala Lumpur with the third round of talks on a free trade agreement with Malaysia.

Bhatia said those talks had faced recent obstacles including debate inside the Malaysian government over negotiating positions in such areas as opening bidding on government contracts to U.S. companies.

But Bhatia said the administration still believed a deal could be done before Bush's negotiating authority expires.

"We are prepared to work as quickly as Malaysia wants to," he said.

China's Milestone, Our Millstone (NYT)

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

The Chinese sell a lot of merchandise in the United States and, in the process, accumulate a lot of dollars. They then loan many of those dollars back to the United States in exchange for all manner of American i.o.u.'s, including Treasury bonds, federal agency bonds, and private-sector debt.

DOJ_NMG_0084346

America's indebtedness to China, as a result, is staggeringly high, although the Bush administration — which needs foreign loans to help finance the budget deficit — seems unfazed. But there is reason for pause. The Wall Street Journal reported this week that China's holdings of foreign currency and securities would soon top $1 trillion, a fivefold increase since 2000. Roughly 70 percent of that is believed to be in dollars or dollar-based assets.

Of course, $1 trillion does not confer significantly more clout than, say, $990 billion. But the size and growth of China's holdings mean increasing vulnerability for the United States.

For several years, China's loans have helped to keep prices and interest rates low in the United States, and to finance big tax cuts. If the lending began to dry up — because Chinese officials decided to diversify into other currencies or to spend more at home — prices, interest rates and taxes in the United States would very likely rise. If the loans dried up quickly — a worst-case scenario — the result could be a sharp financial crisis. A gradual shift could mean a long downward trend in American living standards as a higher cost of living took its toll.

China might never pull back in a way that harmed the United States. But the fact that it could already makes the global financial system more volatile. Investors and traders are hypersensitive to any hint that Beijing may switch allocations.

The Journal also reported that administration officials are concerned that developing nations, unhappy with conditions on loans from the International Monetary Fund, may decide to borrow directly from China. That would give Beijing more influence over emerging markets and their governments.

To its credit, the Bush administration has repeatedly stressed that the rise of China is not to be feared or begrudged. But excessive borrowing during the Bush years has made the United States unnecessarily vulnerable.

Iran's Leader Warns West On Support For Israel (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

TEHRAN, Oct. 20 — President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran warned Europe on Friday that continued support for Israel could lead to an act of revenge by those in the Middle East angry about the Palestinians' plight.

He issued the warning at a critical time; the United Nations Security Council is expected to begin public deliberations next week on whether to impose sanctions on Iran for defying a United Nations demand to suspend uranium-enrichment activities by the end of August.

Mr. Ahmadinejad, addressing European countries, said, "People in the region blame you for any crime or invasion against any country and will take revenge on you."

"You should know that the rage of people is boiling and is like an ocean that is welling up," he said in his speech at a rally here. "Once its storm begins blowing, it will go beyond the borders of Lebanon and Palestine, and it will hurt European countries."

He did not describe what revenge could entail in his speech, which was also carried live on radio.

The rally was called for Jerusalem Day, held here every year on the last Friday of the fasting month of Ramadan in support of the Palestinian struggle against Israel. Mr. Ahmadinejad told tens of thousands of demonstrators that Israel could not last long after its battle this summer against Hezbollah militants in Lebanon. "Hezbollah shattered the myth that Israel is undefeatable," he said. "Now Israel has no reason to exist."

State-run television showed tens of thousands of demonstrators around the country who chanted "Death to America" and "Death to Israel." People carried pictures of Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the leader of Hezbollah in Lebanon, and burned American and Israeli flags.

Over the last year, Mr. Ahmadinejad has caused international outrage by questioning the Holocaust and saying, "Israel should be wiped off the map," a slogan used often by the father of the 1979 revolution, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini.

On Friday, Mr. Ahmadinejad talked again about the Holocaust, saying: "Even if we assume that six million Jews were killed in World War II, how come you don't have sympathy for the other 54 million who were killed, too? It is not even clear who counted those you have sympathy for." He said Israel has effectively held European countries hostage for what happened during World War II.

Television reports also showed demonstrators chanting in support of Iran's nuclear program.

Mr. Ahmadinejad repeated Friday that Iran would not give in to international demands to suspend its uranium-enrichment program and dismissed United Nations efforts to impose sanctions on Iran as illegitimate. "They want to use the Security Council as an instrument to put pressure on our people," he said. "But thank God they will never succeed."

Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, the former president, warned Western countries at the same rally that sanctions on Iran would have serious consequences for Europeans. "I advise them not to implement the harmful decision they have made over Iran's nuclear program," he said. Mr. Rafsanjani has backed Iran's nuclear program in public speeches but is believed to favor policies that would prevent confrontation between Iran and the West.

DOJ_NMG_0084347

Mr. Ahmadinejad said last week that Iran would welcome sanctions because local industries would have a chance to grow.

Britain, France, Germany and the United States have been working on a Security Council resolution on Iran that they hope to introduce early next week. It may include a ban on nuclear or missile cooperation with Iran. European Union foreign ministers, meeting Tuesday in Luxembourg, agreed to call for limited sanctions.

In its first official response to the threat of United Nations action, Iran's Foreign Ministry said in a statement that Iran would not "remain idle if sanctions are imposed."

"It is big miscalculation to think the policy of carrot and stick can be pursued at the same time," the statement said, according to ISNA, a government-affiliated news agency.

Israel Accuses Iran Of Blocking Release (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

Israel accused the Iranian government of paying $50 million to block a deal that would have freed an Israeli soldier captured by Hamas-linked militants who crossed from Gaza into Israel on June 25. Hamas and Iran dismissed the accusation as untrue.

Israel's U.N. Ambassador Dan Gillerman told the Security Council on Thursday that "we heard news" earlier in the day that Tehran bribed Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal "to sabotage the negotiations on the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit and prevent his release."

Gillerman later refused to divulge the basis of the allegation or provide details, saying only that "we have every reason to believe that the Iranian regime has bribed Khaled Mashaal."

Iranian diplomat Mansour Sadeghi told the council his government "categorically rejected" all allegations against his country made by Israel, dismissing Gillerman's allegations as "baseless and absurd."

He said Gillerman's allegations were an attempt to divert attention from Israel's "aggression, occupation and state terrorism," and its defiance of Security Council resolutions.

According to a report Thursday in the Israeli daily Yediot Ahronot, which cited anonymous sources from a Western country, the deal was foiled when an Iranian delegation met Mashaal in Damascus and offered him $50 million to block it.

Mashaal, who lives in exile in Damascus, accepted the money and ratcheted up his demands for Shalit's release, the report said, deadlocking the negotiations.

"If this is the way in which Iran threatens humanitarian situations," Gillerman said, "I shudder to think about the lengths to which Iran will go to undermine a diplomatic one, and achieve its dangerous regional aspirations and nightmarish and megalomaniacal dreams of nuclear capability."

Osama Hamdan, Hamas' representative in Lebanon, said in a telephone interview on Friday that the report "is an obvious Israeli lie."

"Everybody knows that the Israeli soldier was captured in order to exchange him with Palestinian prisoners, so, the issue has no relationship with money, or any other matter," Hamdan said. "The issue is related to the release of Palestinians captives."

Israel has long been targeting Mashaal. In 1997, Israel botched an assassination attempt in Jordan. Two Mossad agents injected Mashaal with poison, but were caught, and as Mashaal lay dying in a Jordanian hospital, King Hussein of Jordan forced Israel to provide the antidote in return for the release of the Mossad agents.

In June, then-Justice Minister Haim Ramon said Mashaal is a target for assassination for ordering Shalit's kidnapping.

Alvaro de Soto, the U.N.'s Mideast envoy, told the Security Council that Egyptian officials are leading diplomatic efforts to free Shalit "and report that a package is on the table designed to address both parties' concerns, but the captors say they seek additional guarantees."

The package reportedly involved a swap of hundreds of Palestinian prisoners jailed by Israel for Shalit.

Israeli War Plan Had No Exit Strategy (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

JERUSALEM -- Just two days after Israel launched a punishing counterattack against Hezbollah this summer, Israeli military and diplomatic officials were deeply split over war strategy.

On July 14, as Israeli aircraft prepared to bomb south Beirut, the research unit of Israel's military intelligence branch presented a report to senior Israeli officials that questioned the war plan's ability to achieve the government's goals.

DOJ_NMG_0084348

The analysis, according to senior Foreign Ministry officials who read it, concluded that the heavy bombing campaign and small ground offensive then underway would show "diminishing returns" within days. It stated that the plan would neither win the release of the two Israeli soldiers in Hezbollah's hands nor reduce the militia's rocket attacks on Israel to fewer than 100 a day.

Those initial conclusions held true when the war ended 31 days later.

"The question we want to know to this day was why the military chose an option that had no exit strategy," said a senior Foreign Ministry official who read the report. "They never had one, as far as we could tell."

An examination of the first days of the war shows that leaders of Israel's newly elected government launched a broad military campaign without a clear strategy for how it was to end. It also reveals that while Israeli military officials anticipated an entrenched guerrilla force, front-line officers were surprised by just how well prepared Hezbollah was.

This account was drawn from interviews with Israeli military commanders, senior political and diplomatic officials and soldiers, and a visit to the site where the war began. Several commissions are investigating how Israel's political and military leadership managed the war, and those conclusions could determine how long Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's government remains in office.

Maj. Gen. Ido Nehushtan, the military's chief of strategic planning, declined to comment directly on the research unit's assessment. But he acknowledged that "yes, you are right, that at one point we reached a point of diminishing returns."

"But you never know when that crack will come," he said.The Ambush

On July 12, two Israeli Humvees passed within yards of a Hezbollah ambush point. It was a hollow carved in the underbrush, just above the track used by Israeli military patrols. The hidden Hezbollah camp was stocked with food, water, radios, rifles, antitank missiles and diagrams detailing the insignia and size of Israeli military units. The Hezbollah fighters aimed and fired at the Israeli convoy just after 9 a.m. along a remote bend in the fence-lined road.

Lt. Col. Ishai Efroni, deputy commander of the Baram Brigade, had for months seen donkeys carrying sacks on the other side of the border, led by men who appeared to be Lebanese farmers. "We thought it was fertilizer," he said of the sacks. Later, he realized it was weapons and equipment. "This is what you learn in guerrilla school," he said of the Hezbollah fighters. "You take your time."

Efroni noticed that the Hezbollah gunmen had grown increasingly brazen walking the fence line in his sector along the northwestern border, and on May 28 the guerrillas fired a barrage of Katyusha rockets toward Israel's coastal towns. "I got the feeling something had changed," said Efroni, 41, who has spent most of his career in the northern border area.

On July 12, the dull thump of explosions reached Efroni's brigade headquarters as he reviewed morning intelligence reports. Six other army posts reported taking fire at the same time, coordinated attacks that knocked out surveillance cameras.

Contact with the patrol was lost after the Hezbollah team knocked out the trailing Humvee, killing the soldiers inside. But it took 20 minutes to confirm that Staff Sgts. Ehud Goldwasser, 31, and Eldad Regev, 26, were missing from the first vehicle, a delay that gave the gunmen a large lead as they fled through olive orchards to the Lebanese border village of Aita al-Shaab.

Efroni sent a Merkava tank, an armored personnel carrier and a helicopter in pursuit. But the most direct route into the village was a dirt track lined with explosives-filled trenches. Instead, Efroni ordered the tank through a rocky canyon from the east. Tracking its progress from the operations room, he watched with alarm as it unexpectedly veered onto the road near a known Hezbollah post.

The blast beneath the tank was enormous, killing the four soldiers inside instantly. The fight to retrieve the bodies lasted hours and killed the eighth Israeli soldier of the day.

"All they wanted was some part of their bodies," Efroni said, referring to the Hezbollah fighters. He recalled that Israel had released hundreds of Palestinian, Lebanese and other Arab prisoners in exchange for the remains of three soldiers taken in 2000 and a kidnapped civilian. "They know we go to great efforts to get our people back."An Evolving Response

At 9:45 on the morning of July 12, Olmert sat across from Noam and Aviva Shalit, an unassuming couple who had come to hear how Israel's leader intended to free their son, captured by radical Palestinians outside the Gaza Strip 2 1/2 weeks earlier.

There was a knock on Olmert's office door. His military aide entered with a note.

The slip contained news of the ambush. "Hannibal," the army code word for a captured soldier, had been passed up the chain of command.

"I think you should read this, too," Olmert said as he handed the note to Noam Shalit, according to his communications director, Asaf Shariv, who watched events unfold that morning.

The Hannibal code triggered instant aerial surveillance and airstrikes inside Lebanon to limit Hezbollah's ability to move the soldiers it had seized. "If we had found them, we would have hit them, even if it meant killing the soldiers," a senior Israeli official said.

Olmert ordered his government to assemble that evening for an emergency meeting at military headquarters in Tel Aviv.

DOJ_NMG_0084349

Just before 6 p.m., Olmert arrived at the compound of palms and grassy courtyards. For the next two hours, his generals and intelligence chiefs presented him with a plan to strike Lebanon's roads, bridges, international airport and other infrastructure, especially in the Shiite Muslim south that is Hezbollah's heartland. This was followed by a government meeting, which went on until midnight.

Several officials said there was little dissension among ministers over the scope of the response. Within hours it had become an air-and-sea blockade of Lebanon. But Olmert, who was elected in March having never held a security portfolio, expressed concern over what Hezbollah intended to do in response.

"He wanted to know what would happen in the north," a senior Israeli official who attended the meeting recounted. "On that day, though, everyone was in favor of war."

Scores of targets were hit in the first hours, including many of Hezbollah's longer-range rocket launchers in a single 34-minute period. But rockets launched by Hezbollah soon began falling across northern Israel.

The conventional Israeli military plan for an attack on southern Lebanon is called "Stones of Fire." The doctrine has been revised over the years, but it still relies on a ground invasion force of four army divisions.

Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, Israel's chief of staff, set that plan aside. Instead, Halutz, the first air force general to lead the military, emphasized air power. He hoped aerial assaults would encourage Lebanon's Sunni Muslim and Christian populations to turn against Hezbollah, a radical Shiite movement that has an armed wing and a vast social services network, and that operates as a state within a state.

"We couldn't fight Lebanon as a country," said Nehushtan, the military's head of strategic planning. "The only way to stop them was to make them take the blame for their attacks."

Given the expected rocket reprisals from Hezbollah, some Israeli officials believed a large ground war was inevitable and should begin sooner rather than later. But Nehushtan, then a brigadier general, said "Stones of Fire" had lost its relevance after Syria's military withdrew from Lebanon last year. He said Hezbollah's guerrilla tactics required a different approach.

According to Israeli intelligence estimates, Hezbollah had invested $1.5 billion over the past six years preparing for war, chiefly with material and logistical help from Syria and Iran, whose Shiite government uses the militia to project power in the Arab world. Weapons had been stockpiled in tunnels, bunkers and private homes, a nightmarish scenario for a conventional army in the age of cable news.

Israeli military officials had watched much of the preparation take place from ground posts and aerial surveillance, and even knew which houses were used for storing some of Hezbollah's rockets months before the war began. But senior Israeli officers said the extent of the tunnel networks, the size of the arsenal and some of the more sophisticated weapons in it were not anticipated.

The officers also said Israel's airstrikes on some bunker systems and built-in short-range rocket sites were less effective than planned. Also, the Lebanese did not turn against Hezbollah as the Israelis had hoped.

"This was not the beginning," Nehushtan said of Hezbollah's ambush. "This was the end of one process and the beginning of another."Support From Abroad

Israel's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, was one of those who initially supported the military assault on Hezbollah. She was influenced by events earlier in Gaza, when the soldier had been captured by radical Palestinians. Some of her senior advisers had been arguing that there were bigger issues involved -- that Israel should strike hard at Hamas, one of the groups involved in the soldier's capture, and attempt to focus international attention on its radical supporters in Syria and Iran. Livni had not fully agreed with them at the time. But when Hezbollah struck, she readily assented.

"I think July 12 was the day she accepted the thesis we submitted weeks before that we were being threatened by a radical axis," a senior Foreign Ministry official said. "This was another in-your-face event that if we allowed to go unpunished would lead to many more abductions."

Livni's chief concern was avoiding the international condemnation of a military strike that accompanied Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon. She reached out to the Bush administration, to European governments and to moderate Arab nations, whose Sunni leaders publicly criticized Hezbollah for the ambush and viewed Israel's response as an opportunity to rid the region of a menacing Iranian proxy.

The support she found, according to two senior officials, was surprising given the international criticism that accompanied past Israeli operations in Lebanon. Some within the ministry interpreted the support as encouragement to deepen the war.

"It took us more than a week to understand how the world had changed," the senior Foreign Ministry official said.Internal Dissent

The internal consensus, trumpeted in public by Israel's leaders, crumbled with the military intelligence assessment. A senior Foreign Ministry official said Livni was briefed on the report at 2 p.m. July 14 and immediately ordered her staff to begin devising a diplomatic exit strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0084350

Later that day in a meeting of the seven-member war cabinet, she voted against bombing Hezbollah's urban stronghold in south Beirut. She was concerned that the plan would only bring an escalation in Hezbollah rocket fire and not further the government's goals. Most of the cabinet voted to continue the bombing, according to Foreign Ministry officials, even though a number of cabinet members were expressing angry surprise over the size of Hezbollah's arsenal and tenacity on the ground.

In the days that followed, the cabinet, led by Olmert, continued voting to expand the war as proposed by Halutz and other proponents of the air campaign. While failing to deplete Hezbollah's rocket fire, the Israeli bombardment avoided heavy casualties for Israel, casualties that a major ground invasion would have brought.

Avi Dichter, Olmert's public security minister and a member of the war cabinet who also opposed the bombing of southern Beirut, said 10 days after the military intelligence report was filed that "if there are surprises, I think they are local surprises, not strategic ones."

"You can do this in a very short time," Dichter said. "But you are going to kill many more innocent civilians and cause many more casualties among the troops. We have no intention of doing either."

On Aug. 11, Israel finally went beyond the air campaign and pushed thousands of troops across the border as the debate over a U.N.-brokered cease-fire began. The goal of the troops was to destroy Hezbollah's short-range Katyusha rockets that the air force had been unable to knock out.

Just three days later, the troops froze after Olmert's cabinet accepted the cease-fire terms -- a period when 35 soldiers died, nearly a third of all Israeli troops killed in the war. "We realized we had to do this from the ground," Nehushtan said. "And it was left incomplete."

Muslims Flood Streets Of Jerusalem For Ramadan (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 20 — With Israel imposing tight restrictions on Palestinian movements, the holy month of Ramadan marks a rare occasion when large numbers of Palestinians from the West Bank can enter Jerusalem to worship at the Aksa Mosque compound, one of the most sacred sites in Islam.

On Friday, the last one before Ramadan ends, an estimated 180,000 Muslims from the West Bank and Israel filled the narrow stone streets of Jerusalem's Old City and prayed at the compound. But it was no consolation for the thousands of West Bank men who were turned back at the city's edge, some in scuffles with Israeli security forces.

Israel, citing security concerns, only permitted West Bank men over age 45 to enter Jerusalem and the mosque compound, while the Israeli security forces maintained a large presence at the crossing points along the nation's West Bank security barrier.

On Jerusalem's southern border with Bethlehem, Israeli security forces fired tear gas and lobbed stun grenades to drive back hundreds of Palestinian men who were not allowed to pass the security checkpoint through the 25-foot-high concrete wall dividing the cities.

"It's a terrible feeling," said Qassem al-Balboul, 42. He sought to pray in Jerusalem with his 8-year-old daughter, Sundus, who has been asking for years to visit Al Aksa Mosque. "We have no jobs and no money, and now we can't even pray at our greatest mosque."

The Palestinians in Bethlehem began gathering shortly after sunrise, hours before the main prayers at the Aksa compound a few miles away. As the crowd grew, with many clearly below the minimum age limit, the police ordered them to disperse.

"Please, please, move back; I don't want to use this," said an Israeli border policeman clutching a stun grenade. But as the crowd pressed forward, the policeman and his colleagues began tossing the stun grenades and firing tear gas.

It was the second consecutive Friday that the security forces had clashed with Palestinians seeking to enter Jerusalem, though no serious injuries were reported either time.

Arab citizens of Israel and those living in East Jerusalem do not face restrictions in visiting the mosque compound, the place where the Palestinian uprising began in 2000. But since then, Palestinians from the West Bank have had an increasingly difficult time entering Jerusalem. With occasional exceptions, Palestinians from the Gaza Strip cannot get permission to visit Jerusalem.

Israel says that the huge crowds show its commitment to the freedom of worship, but insists that the restrictions are necessary to guard against possible violence at the site.

The mosque compound was built about 1,300 years ago over the ruins of the biblical Jewish Temples. The holiest site for Jewish prayer is the Western Wall, which forms one side of the compound, known to Jews as the Temple Mount.

The four Fridays during Ramadan always draw large crowds, and this year the Muslim holy month overlapped with Jewish holidays that brought tens of thousands of Jewish worshipers to the Western Wall.

DOJ_NMG_0084351

"We have to make arrangements for huge numbers of people, and in our view, everything went according to plan," said Micky Rosenfeld, a police spokesman.

Palestinians took a different view.

Mufeed Dadoah, 39, has had a permit to work in Israel for the past 15 years, and enters Jerusalem daily for his job as a construction worker. But on Friday, he was prevented from entering in the morning because he was not 45.

"Today, Israel decides everything for us, but some day this will change," Mr. Dadoah said.

When Jordan controlled Jerusalem's Old City from 1948 to 1967, it did not permit Jews to enter and pray at the Western Wall.

Mr. Dadoah said he envisioned a day when Muslims would again rule the city and its religious shrines. He was asked if Jews would then be allowed to pray at their holy sites. "God willing, no," he said.

He then joined about 200 Palestinian men who prayed in the street, with Israel's separation barrier looming in the background.

In Jerusalem, worshipers emerged from the Aksa Mosque compound and clogged the streets lined with small shops. But this year, Palestinian economic conditions are worse than ever, and most said they lacked the money to buy the usual gifts for the Id al-Fitr holiday next week, at the end of Ramadan.

"How can we enjoy the holidays?" asked Safiyeh al-Awadeh, 42, from the West Bank town of Hebron. Normally, she comes to Jerusalem to pray and stock up on gifts for her nine children, as well as to prepare for a large family feast.

"Today, I can't afford anything," she said. "All I have is this," she added, opening a plastic bag with the prayer rug she had brought from home.

In the Gaza Strip on Friday, Palestinian gunmen fired on Palestinian security forces traveling with Prime Minister Ismail Haniya. One security force vehicle was set on fire, but no injuries were reported.

Residents Shut Out Of West Bank (LAT)

By Ken Ellingwood

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

Scores of Palestinians are separated from their families since Israel tightened reentry rules.

RAMALLAH, West Bank — Abdelhakeem Itayem, a Palestinian with American citizenship, was counting on a simple overnight stay when he traveled from the West Bank to Jordan on a business trip.

Six months later, he is still there, trapped in bureaucratic limbo.

Israeli officials, who control the border between Jordan and the West Bank, refused to let him return when he presented his U.S. passport at the crossing from Jordan.

"I came to Amman for one day. I had one suit and a change of clothes for one day. And now I can't go back," Itayem said by telephone from the Jordanian capital, where he has rented an apartment while awaiting an answer.

The long delay has kept him from his wife, Lisa, and their seven children, who remain in the family's home near Ramallah, said Itayem, 41. It also has cost him his job as a manager for a Palestinian distributor of foreign consumer goods.

"It's breaking my heart," he said.

His plight is not unique. Activists say scores of Palestinians who carry foreign passports, mostly American, have been denied entry this year since Israel moved to close a loophole that once allowed residents to enter repeatedly on renewable Israeli tourist visas.

The policy has created a quandary for the Palestinian Americans who remain: If they leave to get a new three-month stamp, they may not be allowed back. If they stay, their current Israeli visas will expire. Many say their previous applications for formal residency in the Palestinian territories were rejected by Israel or never acted upon.

"The Israelis are turning their back to any logic," said Adel Samara, whose wife, Enayeh, was refused entry in May after she crossed to Jordan to get her American passport stamped with a fresh Israeli tourist visa.

Samara, a Palestinian economist and writer, said Enayeh, 56, is staying with a sister in Chicago after living in the West Bank for 31 years on a succession of short-term Israeli visas. Making matters worse, he said, Israel won't let him leave because of his past involvement in nationalist Palestinian groups.

"I can't go outside, and she can't come inside," Samara, 62, said in Ramallah. "It is like a form of divorce."

Israeli officials say the tourist visas were not meant to serve as documents for Palestinian residency or work in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The new restrictions have created uncertainty and anger among Palestinian Americans, especially in the West Bank, where they number at least 30,000 and are leading players in business and academic life.

DOJ_NMG_0084352

A group of Palestinians with American citizenship has lobbied diplomats and launched a campaign to draw attention to the problem. Samara, who is also a U.S. citizen, is working with an Israeli advocacy group to challenge the legality of the new rules.

He and others charge that Israel imposed the tighter rules to punish Palestinians for electing the militant group Hamas in January's parliamentary elections, and to reduce the Palestinian population of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Israel rejects those claims.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice raised the visa issue in meetings with Israeli officials in Jerusalem this month. American diplomats say they have asked Israel to explain the policy.

Israel acknowledges that the rules, overseen by the Interior Ministry, have caused problems. Officials said the change was an attempt to curb misuse of tourist visas, which had become a favored means of entry for thousands of Palestinians with foreign citizenship.

"It was decided in the government, at a medium-level bureaucratic level, that this is wrong. How can you let people be here when they are obviously not tourists? It's an abuse of the tourist visa," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry.

The tightened policy, however, is having "unintended consequences" that officials are now trying to correct, Regev said.

Israel has said that Palestinians living in the West Bank should apply for residency, which is granted by the Jewish state, rather than continue seeking tourist visas.

But many Palestinians complain that they have been denied residency, or have met with inaction.

After the signing of the Oslo interim peace accords in the early 1990s, Israel agreed to allow 3,000 people to move into the West Bank and Gaza Strip each year, an annual quota later raised to 10,000 and then 20,000, said Shlomo Dror, a spokesman for the office that serves as liaison to the Palestinians.

But he said the Palestinian Authority, created in 1994, often failed to provide the names of those who were living in the Palestinian territories and in need of formal residency.

Israel has frozen applications aimed at unifying families since the outbreak of violence in 2000. And since Hamas won office in January, Israel — which considers the group as a terrorist organization — has refused to deal with the Palestinian Authority government.

Dror said the number of people without proper residency status had grown to 60,000, in part because of Israel's freeze on the family-reunification process. "We are trying to sort the problem out and find a different way," he said.

Itayem, who was born in the West Bank but moved to Chicago at 15, said he might relocate his wife and children to Amman during the winter break for schools. But doing so would leave no one to watch over his 75-year-old mother and 38-year-old sister, who is disabled, he said.

The episode has left Itayem angry and disoriented. He found work in Amman at a sister company of his former West Bank employer. But Itayem is staying in an unfurnished apartment and has no clear answers to why he cannot go back to the West Bank, his home for the last 12 years.

"What kind of a life?" he asked. "My wife is in one country, and I'm alone in another country."

ellingwood@latimes.com

U.S. Courts Hamas Rival (WT)

By Harry De Quetteville

The Washington Times, October 21, 2006

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip -- To his enemies, he is ruthless and corrupt.

But to his allies in the West, Mohammed Dahlan is a potential Palestinian savior to stand up to the radical Islamist group Hamas.

Secular and tough -- some say brutal -- Mr. Dahlan, a member of the rival Fatah party, is being courted by U.S. diplomats eager to counter Hamas' burgeoning influence in the occupied territories.

Last week, as the worst interfactional fighting in 10 years fueled fears of a Palestinian civil war, U.S. officials described him as a man who can "get things done" in a violent climate.

In less diplomatic terms, that means having the clout, if needed, to summon armed Palestinians into battle with Hamas, which Washington regards as a terrorist group.

"He can be viewed as a thug," said one official, "but he is one of the very few people who has authority and can impose some order on the ground who is not from Hamas."

U.S. officials are increasingly reluctant to apply that "can-do" description to Fatah's moderate leader, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, 71.

DOJ_NMG_0084353

While outwardly backing him, they privately condemn Mr. Abbas as hesitant and timid in taking on Hamas since the Islamic movement came to power in January's democratic elections.

Since then, living standards for most Palestinians, particularly in the coastal Gaza Strip, have plummeted as a result of Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel's right to exist or accept previous peace agreements with the Jewish state. In the face of such intransigence, international aid has been cut off.

Sitting in his plush and heavily guarded office in Gaza, Mr. Dahlan is openly contemptuous of Hamas' ideological rule.

"They thought that running a government was like running a charity," said Mr. Dahlan, who ran Palestinian security services in Gaza under Yasser Arafat until 2002. "But we need health care, education, roads, salaries. We don't need speeches and sermons at the mosque on Friday."

The main proposal to restart international funding, on which the crippled Palestinian economy depends, had been to form a national unity government. But talks between Fatah and Hamas now look irremediably deadlocked.

U.S. officials say they have few options to stop the carnage. They are covertly grooming a few potential successors to Mr. Abbas, including Mr. Dahlan.

As security chief, Mr. Dahlan arrested thousands of Hamas members. Some purportedly were tortured and others had their beards -- signs of their religious devotion -- forcibly shaved off.

"Dahlan is a gangster. He tortured us and abused us," said Islam Shahwan, a spokesman for Hamas' militia.

A Liberal Brother At Odds With The Muslim Brotherhood (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, October 21, 2006

CAIRO

GAMAL AL-BANNA is 85, and for much of his life he has been overshadowed by his famous brother, Sheik Hassan al-Banna, the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, the Islamist political party and antecedent of a host of militant Islamist organizations, from Al Qaeda to Hamas.

That seems to have suited him just fine, though. He liked to write, read and think. His sister left him a lot of money, and so for decades, that is exactly how he spent his days.

His bedroom is at one end of a dusty old apartment on a chaotic street in the center of the city. At the other end is his office, his desk piled high with papers. In between are books — some 30,000 of them — arranged neatly on floor-to-ceiling shelves. One section is devoted to the 100 or so books he has written and translated over the course of his lifetime.

But Mr. Banna is no longer living in his brother's shadow. And, like the organization his brother founded, the younger Mr. Banna is no friend of the establishment, but for quite a different reason. He is a liberal thinker, a man who would like to see Islamic values and practices interpreted in the context of modern times. Egypt's gatekeepers of religious values, the government-appointed and self-appointed arbiters of God's word, condemn, dismiss and dispute what he says. They have also banned at least one of his books.

"Gamal al-Banna has opinions that fall outside the scope of religion," said Sheik Omar el-Deeb, deputy in charge of Al Azhar, the centuries-old seat of Islamic learning in Cairo. "The people, of course, oppose anybody who talks about things that violate religion."

Mr. Banna likes to wear a blue collarless suit, buttoned to the very top. He prefers sandals to shoes, and wears his thin, wiry white hair swept back. He is often laughing, a kind of knowing chuckle that seems to say he knows better, by virtue of his age and experience.

He doesn't press his ideas, does not try to wage a contest with the institution of Al Azhar, but instead takes the long-term view, hoping to plant a few seeds that will, in time, take root and spread. He recognizes that, at the moment, the other side is winning the contest of ideas in Egypt, and the region.

"If religion was correctly understood, it would be a power of liberation," Mr. Banna said. "But it is misunderstood, and so it is driving us backward."

The views alleged to fall outside religion include those on women: They are not required to wear a veil, as most do in Egypt, Mr. Banna believes; they should not be forced to undergo genital cutting, as most do now in Egypt; and they should be allowed to lead men in prayer, which is forbidden in Egypt.

"My idea is that man is the aim of religion, and religion only a means," said Mr. Banna. "What is prevalent today is the opposite."

Egypt, often looked to as a center of moderate Islam, is, like the rest of the Arab world, becoming more conservative and less tolerant of opposing religious views, according to thinkers like Mr. Banna. Since August there have been at least three high-profile cases here where religious officials condemned, or sought to have criminally charged, people or publications promoting religious ideas they deemed offensive.

DOJ_NMG_0084354

"When the Muslims used to disagree, they had different schools of thought," said Sayed el-Qemni, another reform-minded writer who lives in a small city outside of Cairo. "No one would point to the other and say, 'This is not Islam.' But when one school of thought says, 'I am the correct school of thought and everyone else deserves death,' then you are starting a new religion."

Mr. Qemni has received death threats for some of his writings, and sleeps with two police officers guarding his house.

BY contrast, Mr. Banna exudes a sense of impunity. That, he says, is not a result of his name, though it is a powerful force in a society where family ties are deeply respected, but because "I am free."

He is free because he has been careful not to become involved in political movements — and because of his sister, Fawziyya, who left him the equivalent of about $100,000. That is a huge sum in Egypt, especially considering Mr. Banna has no family and lives and works in the same apartment at a nominal rent.

"I am a completely independent man," he said with a smile. "I am not an employee, I am not in any party, and I am not affiliated with anything — completely independent."

Mr. Banna was born Dec. 15, 1920, in Mahmudiya, a village in Egypt's northern Nile Delta, northwest of the capital. The youngest of five children, he moved with his family to Cairo at age 4. His oldest sibling, Hassan, went on to form the Muslim Brotherhood, which is the largest organized opposition group in Egypt, although banned.

Their father, Ahmad Banna, a self-taught prayer leader and religious teacher, supported the family by repairing watches (his small wooden worktable sits in the hall of Gamal's apartment). The elder Mr. Banna spent years of his life indexing the many thousands of sayings of the Prophet Muhammad, assembling them in a multivolume set that sits on his youngest son's shelves and inspires the son to this day.

As a young man, Mr. Banna was kicked out of high school after a dispute with an English teacher. He finished his studies at a technical school and did not pursue college, he said, because he knew he wanted to pursue writing. So he went out and began to write. In 1946, he published a book, "A New Democracy," which included a chapter titled "Toward a New Understanding of Islam."

MR. BANNA says one of the fundamental problems with religious leaders in Egypt is that they look to the interpretations of their ancestors and not to the Koran itself. To look directly at the book, and not at the words as interpreted by men living in a different time, would have a liberating effect, he says.

Many of his ideas challenge the core beliefs of the radical Muslims who have been driving the religious agenda in the region. Some Islamists say, for example, that elected governments are un-Islamic because people must follow God's law, or Shariah, and not that of a parliament.

But Mr. Banna says the radicals are guilty of pursuing the very logic they say is un-Islamic. They would impose what amounts to their interpretation of the Koran onto other Muslims. That, he says, is no different than relying on a parliament to pass laws, as both are a result of man's intervention, not divine revelation.

Islam, he says, needs to be seen in a modern context. "Because Islam is the last of religions, if it was rigid and closed, it could not stand the changes of the ages," he said.

Mr. Banna does not deliver his message as a lecture. He speaks casually, slipping between English and Arabic, smiling, waving his hands. He has his own name now, and a philosophy quite different from the Islamist organization his brother founded.

Unlike the Brotherhood, he has stayed far from politics, but that does not mean he is apolitical. On the contrary, Mr. Banna says he believes that the reason his ideas have not gained momentum is that political freedom in Egypt is stifled by the nation's rulers.

"They want only power," he said. "They don't want freedom of thought. Free thought, that will condemn them."

Scrambling To Save Trade Perks (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, October 21, 2006

BOGOTA, Colombia — The Bush administration has a prescription for fighting coca growing, sidelining Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and saving thousands of jobs in Latin America: extending free trade for Andean nations.

A senior Bush administration official said this week that the White House would push Congress to pass a bill continuing trade benefits for Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia under a little-known law. It wants the bill passed during the "lame-duck session" after the November elections and before the new Congress is sworn in in January — while free-trade-friendly Republicans are still in control.

The administration has acknowledged that an extension of trade preferences would improve frayed diplomatic relations in Latin America while countering Chavez's influence, analysts said. The White House has mounted an 11th-hour campaign to preserve the trade perks, which have generated thousands of jobs, given birth to entire export industries and provided alternatives to drug trafficking. The benefits are set to expire Dec. 31.

DOJ_NMG_0084355

The Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act was initiated in 1991 by then-President George H.W. Bush. U.S.-Colombia trade alone has tripled to $15 billion since 1990, thanks partly to the boom in the flower, apparel, liquor and fresh-produce industries.

Industries such as pouched tuna in Ecuador and asparagus in Peru have sprung up to take advantage of special rules that allow products to enter the U.S. market duty-free. Colombian flower exports have grown 10% annually since 2002 to $758 million in 2005. Flower-related jobs now total 190,000, according to the nation's largest flower growers association.

Expiration of the trade preferences could deliver a death blow to industries that overnight will lose exemptions on duties of 6% to 20%. That margin is crucial to flower growers here and in Ecuador, which face rising competition from countries including China.

This month, Miami-based Dole Fresh Flowers, a major exporter of roses and other flowers to the U.S., announced that it was cutting 3,500 jobs at greenhouses in Colombia and Ecuador, partly because of the uncertainty surrounding free trade.

The nations involved in the Andean Trade Promotion and Drug Eradication Act accepted that one-way trade preferences eventually would be replaced by bilateral free-trade agreements between the U.S. and each of the four countries. The deals, which would give U.S. companies access to Andean markets, would be sealed in international treaties.

"Preferences can be taken away, but a free-trade agreement is hard to change, so it's imperative that Colombia passes one," said Richard Francis, an analyst at Standard & Poor's in New York. "It would also make Colombia more attractive for foreign investors by giving them a longer-term horizon."

For a variety of reasons, none of the four countries will have individual free-trade agreements in place by year's end. Peru and Colombia are the furthest along, as both have completed free-trade negotiations with the U.S. By December, both will have signed formal agreements that could take months, perhaps a year, to take effect.

Negotiations on a free-trade agreement for Ecuador have stalled for political reasons, and a prospective effective date is even farther out. Bolivia is not ready for a formal free-trade agreement but wants an extension of the one-way preferences.

The White House recognizes that the "hole" between the expiration of the current trade preferences and the effective dates of the free-trade agreements could have dire economic consequences, according to a senior Bush administration official who spoke on condition that he not be identified.

"People have organized their commercial relations around the lack of tariffs," the official said. "We would prefer to see those relations continue without being disrupted by an on-again, off-again tariff situation."

Gary Hufbauer, an economist with the Washington-based Institute for International Economics, said the White House recognized that the loss of trade benefits would unduly punish Colombia and Peru, staunch U.S. allies in the drug war, and also "give the populists in Bolivia and in Ecuador more reason to push back against the United States."

Hufbauer was referring to Bolivian President Evo Morales, who, though not rejecting an eventual free-trade agreement, has used harsh anti-U.S. rhetoric.

In Ecuador, a presidential runoff election set for Nov. 26 will pit pro-free-trade candidate Alvaro Noboa against Chavez friend and free-trade opponent Rafael Correa.

The White House said it would push Congress for an extension of trade preferences for all four countries even though relations with Ecuador and Bolivia have been strained. In May, Ecuador's state oil company seized an oil field operated by Westwood-based Occidental Petroleum Corp. A month later, U.S. embassy officials there said chances of a new free-trade deal were slim in light of the seizure.

But this week, the senior administration official said the U.S. now believed it was best to "engage" both Ecuador and Bolivia with trade preferences.

"We would support an extension for all four countries for a year or two perhaps," he said.

For Ecuador, the extension might hinge on whether its president, whoever he is, agrees to abide by impending international arbitration of the oil field seizure, which could end in a judgment requiring Ecuador to reimburse Occidental hundreds of millions of dollars.

Bruce Bagley, a political science professor at the University of Miami, said the new U.S. posture was a clear effort to send a message to Ecuadorean voters to support candidate Noboa, because Correa has said during the campaign that he will not take part in the Occidental arbitration process.

"The U.S. government is showing political acumen for once in trying to tip the balance away from Correa, the pro- Chavez candidate, and toward Noboa, whom they see as an entrepreneur, free trader and capitalist," Bagley said.

Santiago Pardo, vice president of Andalex, Colombia's largest foreign trade business group, said the move to get the trade preferences extended might have come too late.

DOJ_NMG_0084356

"There is very little time, and the U.S. Congress will have lots of other things to do," Pardo said. "We are already losing investment because of the uncertainty."

Organization of American States Secretary General Jose Miguel Insulza and Inter-American Development Bank President Luis Alberto Moreno have joined in lobbying Congress for the extension.

"They're making a big push," Hufbauer said.

Peru has already signed a free-trade agreement with the U.S. that awaits approval by the legislatures of both countries. Colombia is expected to sign a free-trade deal in late November, but it will not take effect until next fall, assuming that the legislatures of both nations approve it, observers here say.

Failure of Congress to extend the trade preferences would result in significant losses of Colombian jobs and exports, said Mauricio Reina, an economist with Fedesarrollo, a think tank in Bogota. Four of every 5 Colombian export-oriented apparel firms, for example, rely on the trade preferences, as do 5 of every 6 firms that export liquor or tobacco. Those firms would find themselves in immediate financial difficulty, he said.

"It's hard to know what percentage would be left out of the U.S. market because it's impossible to know how many companies could absorb that extra tariff they would begin to pay," Reina said. "But it's safe to say that it would be a very important percentage."

*

EU Urges Putin To Honour Oil Contracts (FT)

By George Parker In Lahti

Financial Times, October 21, 2006

European leaders on Friday night pressed Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, to honour contracts with western oil companies, amid fears in the EU over Moscow's tightening grip on the energy sector.

In a strained summit dinner in the Finnish town of Lahti, EU leaders also chided Mr Putin on questions of human rights, press freedom and Moscow's tough treatment of the former Soviet republic of Georgia.

The meeting with Mr Putin served as a reminder to European leaders that their attempt to build a more equal energy partnership with Russia has so far yielded few positive results.

Instead of encouraging European investment in Russia, Moscow has questioned contracts signed in the 1990s by companies including Royal Dutch Shell and Total. This month it also shut foreign capital out of the development of the huge Shtokman gas field.

In spite of the differences among EU member states in their relations with Moscow, some leaders bit their tongues at last night's dinner. They jointly argued that Mr Putin should treat western companies fairly if he wants Russian companies to have greater access to European markets.

"We offer security in contracts and we expect the same from Russia, namely also legal security in contracts and access to the Russian market," Angela Merkel, German chancellor, said before the dinner.

Tony Blair, Britain's prime minister, called for a "two-way street" in investment, in spite of criticism that he has already signalled that Gazprom could be considered as a buyer for Centrica, the British gas company, without reciprocal market opening in Russia.

Mr Putin said that he had no intention of bowing to European demands that Russia should open Gazprom's pipelines to other companies, as required under the energy charter treaty, which Russia has signed but has not ratified.

He also defended Russia's decision to clamp down on "environmental breaches" by Royal Dutch Shell in the Sakhalin 2 field, and said he hoped foreign companies could be involved later in the Shtokman project.

Mr Putin also issued an uncompromising warning to Georgia to calm a dispute with Russian-backed breakaway regions in the former Soviet republic, claiming it could end in "disaster and bloodshed".

Faced with their implacable dinner guest, the EU's 25 heads of government had spent much of lunch discussing how to present a common line to the Russian president. Matti Vanhanen, Finland's president, said they succeeded: "We were very united," he said.

José Manuel Barroso, European Commission president, said Russia and the EU needed a partnership based on reciprocity, openness, transparency, non-discrimination and market prices.

"We cannot allow energy to divide Europe as communism once did," he said.

The timing of Mr Putin's appearance as the guest of honour at the EU summit was viewed as awkward by many European diplomats.

Russia's dealings with western oil companies, its tough treatment of Georgians living within Russian borders and the assassination of the journalist Anna Politkovskaya have all caused increasing concern in Europe.

DOJ_NMG_0084357

On Friday Mr Barroso was forced to justify why the EU was honouring a leader who was overheard on Thursday joking that he “envied” the Israeli president, who is facing rape allegations.

The Russian Kommersant daily newspaper quoted Mr Putin, a former KGB agent, as saying: “He turns out to be a really powerful guy! He raped 10 women!” The Kremlin said his attempt at humour had been lost in translation.

Putin Ducks EU Demands On Energy Charter (AP)

By Constant Brand, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 21, 2006

Russian President Vladimir Putin defended his government's tough stance on Georgia and dodged EU leaders' demands Friday that he commit to a legally binding energy charter that would guarantee better access to Russia's oil and gas fields.

The 25 EU leaders, meeting with Putin over dinner following a one-day summit on energy, also grilled Putin about the recent killing of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya — an apparent execution-style slaying that EU leaders raised as an example of slipping human rights in Russia.

Putin called her death "a brutal murder" and pledged to hunt down her killers, diplomats said.

But he sidestepped European appeals for moderation on Georgia, and said he was acting to prevent conflict between Georgia and its breakaway regions of Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which have close ties to Russia.

"To our great sorrow and concern, the situation is developing in the direction of possible bloodshed," Putin told reporters. He accused Georgia of trying to take back the two regions "by military means. This is what you and I should be afraid of ... bloodshed in that region."

Russia and Georgia have had a history of friction since they went their separate ways with the collapse of the Soviet Union 15 years ago.

The Kremlin has recently cracked down on Georgian migrants in Russia as retaliation for Georgia's arrest in late September of four Russian military officers on charges of espionage. Russia has deported hundreds of people and closed dozens of Georgian-run firms and restaurants.

Summit host Finnish Prime Minister Matti Vanhanen confronted Putin on human rights and democracy in Russia, as well as EU concerns about Moscow's military campaign in Chechnya, officials and diplomats said.

"It was a tough message," Lithuanian President Valdas Adamkus told The Associated Press. But Putin "was very forceful" in defending his country's policy on Chechnya.

EU leaders spent Friday in the lakeside town of Lahti, north of Helsinki, forging a united front on energy before meeting with Putin in the evening.

The leaders of the European Union — which already depends on Russia for a quarter of its energy — urged Putin to implement a legally binding energy charter that would ensure supplies of Russian oil and gas for Europe.

The EU is anxious to secure future supplies of oil and gas from Russia but concerned about Moscow's reliability as a source — at a time of questions about a backsliding on democracy in increasingly authoritarian Russia.

Last winter, a dispute with Ukraine led Moscow to temporarily turn off the taps, disrupting natural gas supplies for several EU nations.

"From the economic point of view, we demand that Russia is a stable and reliable supplier," said Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi.

The 25 EU leaders succeeded in devising a common stance on how to approach Russia on energy — but Putin disagreed with their views, Estonian Prime Minister Andrus Ansip told the AP.

"The European Union was speaking in one voice — one single voice — and of course, Russia wasn't speaking in the same voice," he said with a laugh.

Dutch Prime Minister Jan Peter Balkenende said Friday's talks with Putin were just the start of a wider discussion on EU's partnership with Moscow. The two sides meet again Nov. 24 for an EU-Russia summit.

Also at the summit, EU leaders called on the Sudanese government to accept a U.N. peacekeeping force in the western region of Darfur, where 200,000 people have died and more than 2.5 million displaced in three years of violence.

EU leaders also discussed illegal immigration, with Spanish Prime Minister Jose Luis Rodriguez Zapatero appealing for more boats, planes, patrols and money to help Italy, Malta, Greece and Spain tackle the growing problem of migrants from Africa landing on European shores.

___

Associated Press writers Maria Danilova, Paul Ames, Robert Wielaard and Matti Huuhtanen contributed to this report.

___

On the Net:

DOJ_NMG_0084358

http://www.eu2006.fi

Aftermath Of A Murder (WP)

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

IT HAS NOW been 14 days since Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya was murdered in Moscow. No one has been arrested for the crime, which is hardly surprising: None of the dozen other killings of journalists since Vladimir Putin became Russia's president has been solved. This one eliminated one of the fiercest and bravest critics of his government, a reporter who had tenaciously documented the depravity of Mr. Putin's war against Chechnya. We don't have any evidence implicating the Kremlin, but it's revealing to examine how Mr. Putin and his regime have behaved over the past few days.

The president's first reaction was a strange silence. While politicians, media outlets and statesmen in Russia and around the world condemned Ms. Politkovskaya's murder, no word came from Mr. Putin for three days. When finally compelled to speak, at a joint news conference in Germany with Chancellor Angela Merkel, Mr. Putin offered a rote condemnation of the attack. He then disparaged Ms. Politkovskaya, saying that "the level of her influence on political life in Russia was utterly insignificant." He made the ugly suggestion that foreign-based enemies of his government were somehow behind the killing -- a claim echoed in the state-controlled press. "We have information, and it is reliable, that many people hiding from Russian justice have long been nurturing the idea of sacrificing somebody in order to create a wave of anti-Russia feeling in the world," he said.

Really? If so, Mr. Putin's enemies also must have found a way to manipulate his own security forces. It was interior ministry operatives, after all, who violently broke up a peaceful vigil in Ms. Politkovskaya's memory in the Caucasian city of Nazran on Monday. Flowers and pictures of the slain journalist were ripped from the hands of the participants and stomped on. Ekaterina Sokiryanskaya, a well-known activist of the human rights group Memorial, was punched in the face and head; she suffered a broken nose and a concussion. Three days earlier, a court ordered the closure of the Russian-Chechen Friendship Society, one of the few nongovernmental organizations still attempting to document abuses in that devastated province. On Thursday the government suspended the operations of Amnesty International, Human Rights Watch and more than 90 other NGOs, saying they had not met the requirements of a controversial new registration law.

One other part of this story has played out with depressing predictability: the absence of any serious follow-up by Western leaders. At the same news conference at which Mr. Putin uttered his ugly insinuations, Ms. Merkel vowed that her government would press to complete a new partnership agreement between the European Union and Russia when Germany has the rotating E.U. presidency next year. Yesterday Mr. Putin was invited to dine with European leaders at a summit in Finland. If Ms. Politkovskaya's murder remains unsolved, will it be an obstacle to "partnership" between Russia and Europe? Sadly, Mr. Putin has been given no reason to think so.

'Enemy' Schoolchildren In Moscow (WP)

By Masha Lipman

The Washington Post, October 21, 2006

MOSCOW -- A Georgian migrant worker died at a Moscow airport this week while awaiting deportation. Tengiz Togonidze, 48, had asthma and was gasping for breath, but he was reportedly denied permission to get some fresh air either during the five days he was held in a detention center or afterward, during the trip to the airport, which took many hours. He was one of some 700 ethnic Georgians deported over the past three weeks as the government's anti-Georgia policies turned into a campaign of harassment of Georgians in Russia. The political conflict between Russia and Georgia has led to an ugly outburst of political xenophobia here.

In recent years intolerance and even violent ethnic and racial crime have become increasingly common in Russia. Just this summer, in a vicious attack on "non-locals," dark-skinned residents were driven out of the northwestern town of Kondopoga and some of their businesses set on fire or property smashed.

But this anti-Georgian campaign is different, in a scary way. Until now, if government authorities contributed to public xenophobia it was through inaction, incompetence or irresponsibility. Now ethnic hostility is being incited by government figures -- legislators and executive officials alike.

Three weeks ago, in a new round of the tit-for-tat fight between Moscow and Tbilisi that has been going on since Mikheil Saakashvili became Georgia's president, four Russian servicemen were arrested in Georgia on charges of espionage. Apparently caught off guard, the Kremlin responded with a barrage of threatening language. Though the immediate conflict was resolved after a few days through Western mediation, the anger and resentment over an obviously arrogant act by the Georgian government appeared to call for revenge.

DOJ_NMG_0084359

In the days that followed the arrests, Russian officials sought to outdo one another in anti-Georgian rhetoric. Georgians were declared the most criminal of all ethnic minorities in Russia. A broad range of officials and loyalists demanded that they be barred from entering Russia and that migrant workers be forbidden to send home remittances.

President Vladimir Putin remarked that "migration flows should be regulated so that . . . our citizens would not be disadvantaged in various sectors of the economy." The speaker of the lower house proclaimed that "indigenous residents should be assured of advantages in trading activity at marketplaces." At the same time, on Kremlin-controlled television, Georgians were vilified as fat cats running casinos and driving Mercedes-Benzes. Raids on casinos (with their owners' unmistakably Georgian-sounding last names repeatedly cited) were shown on national news programs. One of the federal channels showed a documentary about "guests" from the south -- all with Georgian last names -- coming to Russia to commit crimes.

Georgia has been virtually blockaded, with transport from and to Russia severed. Though the Russian government wouldn't admit that the blockade was political (it was described as a punitive measure for failure to observe various rules and regulations), the message was unambiguous: Georgia and Georgians were the enemies of Russia.

Ethnic Georgians all over Moscow have been harassed by the police, regardless of whether they were Georgian nationals or held Russian citizenship. Fearing raids and shakedowns, Georgian restaurants suspended operations. Georgians were denied Russian entry visas regardless of their status and occupation; those barred from entering Russia included a popular dance company. Meanwhile, the Russian youth chess team refused to take part in the world championship being held in the Georgian city of Batumi.

The campaign took an especially ugly turn when some Moscow schools were ordered to submit lists of children with Georgian last names to police to facilitate the search for their parents, whose Georgian origin now made them suspect.

Until recently, Georgians would have seemed an unlikely target for such hostility. Georgian culture, art and cuisine have long been inseparable from Russian/Soviet life. Georgian moviemakers directed some of the most popular Soviet movies, which are watched by millions of Russians as eagerly today as they were in the U.S.S.R. The Russian cultural elite is inconceivable without Georgian actors, singers and artists. Georgian food is found not only in Georgian restaurants, which are mercifully cheap by Moscow standards, but as part of family holiday meals throughout Russia. And Georgians share a common Orthodox Christian religion with Russians.

But the sad truth is that ethnic hostility can be readily embraced by the Russian people, and the ethnicity involved doesn't seem to matter much. As the TV news was filled with anti-Georgian themes, television monitoring services registered increased interest in news programming. In a national poll taken in mid-October, 38 percent of Russians said they would support the deportation of all Georgians from Russia, even those with Russian citizenship. A significant majority said they approve of deportations, transportation blockades, stepped-up inspections of Georgian businesses and other anti-Georgian measures taken by the government. And there has been little in the way of protest against the xenophobia: Russia's remaining liberal media outlets condemned what they referred to as "ethnic cleansing," and a couple of rallies opposing the anti-Georgia campaign were held.

After a while, however, the authorities seemed to realize that things had gone too far. They have begun to backpedal. The initiative to check schools for Georgian children was strongly condemned by a Moscow government official, who was joined by many others; high-ranking law enforcers even apologized for the action. Several officials came out with reassuring statements that the government is acting to restore order, not to harass individual Georgians.

The campaign may well turn out to be simply a resentful overreaction to Georgia's arrogance with regard to the alleged spying rather than a deliberate policy aimed at capitalizing on public xenophobia. But the government's desire to punish Georgia has broken the fragile taboo on ethnic hostility in official language. In the xenophobic atmosphere of today's Russia, this threatens to further encourage ethnic hatred and lead to more loss of life.

Masha Lipman, editor of the Carnegie Moscow Center's Pro et Contra journal, writes a monthly column for The Post.

DOJ_NMG_0084360

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, October 23, 2006 8:24 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Saturday, October 21, 2006
Attachments:	agnb061021.pdf; agnb061021.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

DOJ Says Courts Are No Longer Open To Detainees....4
Many Highly-Publicized Terror Arrests End In Minor Convictions....4
Juror Upset By Stewart's Sentence For Aiding Terrorists....4
Kurd Was Imprisoned By US And Taliban....4
Columnist Assails Hulon, FBI Over "Un-Intelligence."....5

Homeland Response:

DHS Aid Disbursement Formula Said To Favor Less Populous States....5
Man Arrested For Football Stadium Bomb Hoax....5
FBI Removes Dead Man From Terrorist List....5
9/11 Victims' Remains Found Near WTC Site....5
NYTimes Faults Coast Guard For Live-Fire Drills On Great Lakes....6
Louisiana Pays FEMA $319 Million, Sues Over $61 Million Bill....6

War News:

Administration Open To Changing Iraq Tactics, But Not Strategy....6
Militias Clash In Amarah....9
Many Iraqis Consider Militia Gunmen As Protectors....10
Iraqi Religious Leaders Issue Edicts Against Violence....10
UN Says 914,000 Have Fled Iraq....10
UN Complains Of Iraqi Sealing Of Civilian Death Toll Data....10
GOP Criticizes CNN For Airing "Sniper Tape."....10
Plea Is Reported In Iraq Murder Case....11
Colonel Takes Care Of 18,000 Troops' Families....11
Gunmen Murder 8 Afghan Laborers....11
Total Says Interrogated Executive Is Innocent In Oil For Food Probe....11
Columnist King Sees Violent New Iraq....11
Cynthia Tucker Says Bush "Exploited" Americans' Fears....12

DOJ:

DOJ Honors Five Maryland Prosecutors With Director's Awards....12

Corporate Scandals:

Ouster Of UnitedHealth CEO Could Make Other CEOs Vulnerable....12
Fifth Circuit Ruling Could Aid Skilling Effort To Have Convictions Thrown Out....12
Grasso Vows To Continue Fighting Over Paychecks....13

Criminal Law:

Ethics Panel May Release Interim Report On Foley Case Before Election....13
US Will Not Seek Fourth Trial Of Gotti....13
DOJ Examining Harman's Relationship With AIPAC....14
Abramoff To Serve Time In Cumberland, Maryland....14
Alaska Lawmaker's Relationship With Developer Is One Focus Of FBI Probe....14
FBI Investigating Former New Jersey Township Planning Board Member....14
FBI Subpoenas Records On Rhode Island Senate President's Land Deals....14
Informant Taped Friends, Associates, Girlfriend In Effort To Reduce His Sentence....15
Williams Settles Education Department Case....15
Man Wanted In Poland For 1998 Police Killing Arrested In US....15
YouTube Turned Over User Data To Media Lawyers In Response To Subpoena....15
Church Youth Pastor Indicted On Child Porn Charges....16
NYPD To Receive Grant To Buy Bulletproof Vests....16
Scios Under Investigation For "Off Label" Marketing Of Heart Drug....16

Civil Law:

Illinois Firm Settles Naval Shipyard Kickback Accusations....16

Government Reaches Settlement Over Jet Noise Claims 16
DOJ Cracking Down On Bankruptcy Fraud 16

Civil Rights:

California Congressional Candidate's Office Raided 17
Discrimination Claim Could Hurt Cracker Barrel's Ability To Draw Minority Customers 18
Court Strikes Down Las Vegas Ordinance Barring Street Solicitation 18
Alabama Reported Zero Hate Crimes In 2005 18
ACLU Asks Justice Department To Monitor Chesterfield County Voting 18
SCOTUS Overturns Injunction On Arizona Voter ID Law 19

Antitrust:

Consumer Groups Want More Concessions From AT&T For BellSouth Buyout 19
Judge Rules Petco Vote Can Proceed 19
Federal Reserve Approves Regions, AmSouth Merger 20
Ripplewood Mulling Bid For Delphi 20
Tops Exec Says There Was No Viable Offer To Buy Ohio Stores 20
High Court To Hear Weyerhaeuser Argument On Illegal Monopoly Ruling 20
Avaya Faces Federal Antitrust Suit 20
Technical Glitch Mars Meeting On Vista Operating System . 20

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Solar Services Companies Provide Cleaner Energy To Corporations 21
Study Warns Of Extreme Weather Caused By Global Warming 21
WSJ Dismisses Concerns Over Growing Population's Strain On Resources 21
Court Limits Feds' Authority At Indian Casinos 22

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Face Sentencing In January On Gun Trafficking Charges 22

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Back Aide Suspended Over Suspicion Of NIE Leak 22
Bush Urges Republicans To Tout Medicare Drug Benefit 22
Gerson Defends Bush's "Compassionate Conservatism." 23
Pelosi's Refusal To Negotiate With GOP Credited With Boosting Democrats 23
Congress Urged To Overhaul Medical Records System 23
White House Aides Among Members Of Prominent Young Republican Group 24
Paulson Sells Manhattan Condo For Almost $8 Million 24
NYT Criticizes Administration's Space Policy 24
WPost Decries Wasteful Federal Farm Subsidies 24

Other News:

Stocks Down Slightly After Record-Setting Week 24
OPEC Seeks To Cut Supply As Oil Prices Continue To Fall . 25
Texas Judge Avoids Reprimand For Support Of Miers 25
Bush Makes Surprise Appearance At Italian-American Event 25
RNC Ad References LBJ's "Daisy Ad." 25
GOP Airs Ads Claiming Democrats Endanger Children In Response To Foley Scandal 26
Democrats' Religious Outreach More Focused Than In Years Past 26
Polls Said To Indicate Candidates Can Gain Votes By Moving To The Center 26
McCain Aiding GOP Candidates While Laying Groundwork For 2008 26
Clinton Faces Questions Concerning Her Presidential Ambitions During Debate 27
Lieberman Has 17 Point Lead In New Poll 27
Ford Disrupts Corker News Conference 27
Allen And Webb Seen As Avoiding Immigration Debate 28
Talent Handicapped By National GOP's Difficulties 28
Democrats' Find Success Targeting Open Seats 28
Tight House Races In Indiana Feature Vulnerable GOP Incumbents 28
Working Families Party Campaigns For Three Democratic House Candidates 29
GOP House Candidate Investigated Over Immigrant Threats 29
Ehrlich And O'Malley Concentrate On GOTV Efforts 29
Angelides Urges Schwarzenegger To Release Controversial Recordings 30
History Of "October Surprise" Described 30
Columnist Dowd Questions Obama's Desire For Presidency 30
LATimes Notes California Democrats Disadvantaged By Redistricting 30
Chinese Leaders Assure Rice They Will Enforce North Korea Sanctions 31
US Trade Rep To Discuss Trade Disputes With China 32
Iran Dismisses UN Sanctions Possibility, Warns Europe Against Support For Israel 33
Israel Said To Have Begun Hezbollah Conflict Without Strategy For Ending It 33
US Said To Be Turning From Abbas To Rival Fatah Leader 34

DOJ_NMG_0084363

Brother Of Muslim Brotherhood Founder Advocates Liberal Islam 34
Administration Launches Effort To Extend Latin American Trade Deals 34
EU Leaders Confront Putin On Oil Contracts 34
Kremlin Defends Putin's Remarks About Katsav Scandal 35

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 35

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 36

DOJ_NMG_0084364

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Says Courts Are No Longer Open To Detainees. The AP (10/21, Apuzzo) reports, "Hundreds of detainees received notice from the Justice Department this week that because of a new law signed by President Bush, the U.S. court system is no longer open to them. Now it will be up to a federal appeals court, and ultimately the Supreme Court, to decide the fate of prisoners who have spent years arguing the government is illegally holding them at overseas military bases." The "habeas corpus exemption has drawn criticism from lawyers, civil rights groups and even members of Bush's own party, such as Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee."

Opinions Vary On Legality Of Military Tribunals. McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Rosen) reports, "The administration gave more ground on how the military commissions will work and how the trials will run, while the three senators yielded more on the controversial interrogation techniques, said John Radsan, who served as the CIA's assistant general counsel from 2002 to 2004 and now runs the National Security Forum at the William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul, Minn." Several scholars' varying opinions on whether the Supreme Court will uphold the law are noted. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-SC) predicts a 7-2 vote upholding it.

Many Highly-Publicized Terror Arrests End In Minor Convictions. In a story taking an overall negative tone toward the FBI, CNN's Paula Zahn Now (10/20) reported, "Since 9/11, hundreds of terror suspects have been arrested in the U.S., and just about every time you see the Justice Department and the FBI make an announcement with a lot of fanfare in front of a lot of TV cameras, but so many times we never hear about those the suspects again." CNN (Griffin) added, "In the FBI's war on terror, this man came close to being another Justice Department statistic." Detroit gas station attendant Abdul Berro is "about to be sentenced for credit card and bank fraud," but not "for terrorism, even though the FBI spent months and hundreds of thousands of dollars investigating him and others for plotting against America. The FBI had an informant who said there was more going on with Berro than just credit card fraud. … According to documents, the bureau paid that informant more than $200,000," but he "turned out to be a liar, a con man, now serving a 10-year sentence for his expensive misinformation." Griffin noted that "an independent research group at Syracuse University says half the sentences for these terrorism-related cases are for 28 days or less in prison. … The FBI's John Miller insists that even these lesser convictions are vital in the war on terror." Miller: "The idea is to neutralize these groups either before they are able to transmit money to a terrorist organization overseas, before they are able to put together an attack plan here." Griffin: Judge Richard Posner "says the U.S. needs a new domestic agency, one less concerned with making quick arrests and more willing to take the risk of sitting on a case to see if it leads to a bigger terror threat. The FBI's Miller disagrees." Miller: "This is not a game of chicken we're playing, where we can see whether we get within hours of them striking to get just that much more proof."

Juror Upset By Stewart's Sentence For Aiding Terrorists. The New York Times (10/21, Preston, 1.21M) reports, "He was known as Juror 8, for the jury box chair where he listened silently for more than six months as the convoluted evidence unfolded in the trial of Lynne F. Stewart, the radical defense lawyer accused of aiding Islamic terrorism. The jurors argued behind closed doors in Federal District Court in Manhattan for another month before they finally agreed to convict Ms. Stewart on all five charges she faced for smuggling messages out of prison from her terrorist client, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman. … So on Monday, 20 months after the verdict, Juror 8 kept his eye on the television, waiting for news of her sentence. When he heard that Judge John G. Koeltl had reduced the 30 years sought by the government to 28 months in prison, Juror 8 said he was first disbelieving, then 'vastly disappointed.'"

Kurd Was Imprisoned By US And Taliban. The AP (10/21, Sniffen) reported that Abdul Rahim was arrested "by the Taliban in Afghanistan in January 2000, Rahim says al-Qaeda leaders burned him with cigarettes, smashed his right hand, deprived him of sleep, nearly drowned him and hanged him from the ceiling until he 'confessed' to spying for the United States. US forces took the young Kurd from Syria into custody in January 2002 after the Taliban fled his prison. Accusing him of being an al-Qaeda terrorist, US interrogators deprived him of sleep, threatened him with police dogs and kept him in stress positions for hours, he says. He's been held ever since as an enemy combatant." His story "is one of several emerging from" Gitmo "as defense lawyers make bids to free their clients while the Bush administration tries to use a new law to lock them out of federal courts."

DOJ_NMG_0084365

Columnist Assails Hulon, FBI Over "Un-Intelligence." In a Toledo Blade (10/21) column titled "The FBI's Un-Intelligence," the Blade's Jack Kelly wrote, "A Few weeks ago, Jeff Stein, national security editor for Congressional Quarterly magazine, interviewed Willie Hulon, who recently was named chief of the FBI's national security branch." When "Mr. Stein asked Mr. Hulon to explain the difference" between Sunnis and Shiites, "He couldn't." Kelly added, "Mr. Hulon is continuing a long tradition of abysmal and inexcusable ignorance in high places at FBI," and Kelly goes on to discuss intelligence shortcomings on North Korea, Iraq and the 1993 WTC attack. "As far as we know, no one in the FBI or the CIA has been held accountable for intelligence failures. And when no one is held accountable, you get people like Mr. Hulon in jobs they obviously are unqualified to do. This is President Bush's greatest failure."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Aid Disbursement Formula Said To Favor Less Populous States. The CBS Evening News (10/20, story 5, 3:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "This year, the Federal government gave the states nearly $2 billion in homeland security money, but you might be surprised how it got divvyed up. For instance, North Dakota -- hardly considered a major terror target -- got nearly $17 per resident. But New York, which has been attacked twice, got only about $9.50 per person. Montana received nearly as much money per resident as New York did." CBS continued, "Tom Kean, Chairman of the 9/11 Commission, says Congress should refigure the formula that now gives some homeland security dollars to every state." Kean: "An area that has the greatest threat is the first priority, and the money. And so on down the list." According to CBS, "Since 9/11, Montana has received about $70 million in Federal homeland security dollars, raising questions as to how wisely that money is being spent. State officials point to the need to protect projects like this hydroelectric dam and dozens of other potential targets for terrorism. Like power grids, missile sites, and 545 miles of largely unprotected border with Canada."

Man Arrested For Football Stadium Bomb Hoax. NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 5, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight there is an arrest in connection with what turned out to be a phony threat on the internet to attack seven NFL stadiums this weekend with radioactive so-called dirty bombs. A 20-year-old Wisconsin grocery store clerk is accused of orchestrating this hoax. He told prosecutors he had posted the same phony threat 40 different times on various websites."

The New York Times (10/21, Smothers, 1.21M) reports, "Federal officials labeled the threat a hoax on Thursday, but at a news conference on Friday to announce the arrest, the United States attorney in Newark, Christopher J. Christie, called it the 'Internet version of yelling 'Fire!' in a crowded theater in this post-9/11 era.' Law enforcement officials said that the message posted by the man, Jake J. Brahm…explained that the timing of the threatened explosions coincided with the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan and that Al Qaeda would take credit for what members would call 'America's Hiroshima.'" The Washington Times (10/21, Seper, 88K) also reports on this story.

FBI Removes Dead Man From Terrorist List. The AP (10/21) reports, "The FBI removed an al-Qaida explosives expert linked to the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Africa from the most wanted terrorists list Friday after learning he was killed six months ago. Muhsin Musa Matwali Atwah was killed in an April 12 gunfight with Pakistani authorities ... Twenty-six suspected terrorists remain on the FBI's list, including al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden."

9/11 Victims' Remains Found Near WTC Site. NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 4, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This week here in New York, over five years now since 9/11, more human remains were found dating back to that attack." The New York Times (10/21, Dunlap, 1.21M) reports, "New York City's chief medical examiner will station a team at ground zero to look for human remains from 9/11, the Bloomberg administration said yesterday, after dozens of bones were found Thursday by workers excavating two manholes that had been covered since 2002."

DOJ_NMG_0084366

NYTimes Faults Coast Guard For Live-Fire Drills On Great Lakes. The New York Times (10/21, 1.21M) editorializes, "When the Coast Guard decided it wanted to practice firing its new machine guns on the Great Lakes, it posted an item in the Federal Register -- not exactly household reading. Now that the public has caught up, there is an uproar all around the lakes ... Few are disputing that the United States needs to do more to protect its borders against terrorists. But we face far more plausible threats than terrorists cutting across Lake Michigan in small boats. ... Turning the Great Lakes -- even on occasion -- into a live-fire zone is the kind of decision that says little to terrorists but speaks volumes to the rest of us."

Louisiana Pays FEMA $319 Million, Sues Over $61 Million Bill. The New York Times/AP (10/21) reports the state of Louisiana "wired $319 million to the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Friday, a large part of what the agency billed the state for hurricane recovery for Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, and filed a lawsuit in federal court disputing the remaining $61 million bill. The state's actions were based on the advice of the legislative auditor. The commissioner of administration, Jerry Luke LeBlanc, who is the governor's top financial adviser, said that the state attorney general's office filed the lawsuit Friday afternoon and that the disputed dollars would be deposited into a registry of the court until the case was resolved.

Activists Encourage Lawmakers To Visit The Gulf Coast. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Simmons, 918K) reports, "The Women of the Storm, as this ad hoc group calls itself, were about to land in Washington and embark on a one-day mission in the nation's halls of power. The goal: to persuade members of Congress to help save the state's fast-disappearing coastline. The powerful folks in Washington ignore this eclectic group at their peril. The Women are quickly becoming a recognized power among the activist groups that have sprouted from the rubble of Katrina, many fueled by frustration with the slow pace of government assistance. Their first objective has been to bring Washington to New Orleans. The group's premise is simple: When lawmakers see how devastated the Gulf Coast looks, they will be roused to help. So far, the group has helped convince 55 of the nation's 100 senators and at least 106 of its 435 representatives to visit Louisiana."

WAR NEWS:

Administration Open To Changing Iraq Tactics, But Not Strategy. The possibility of the president changing his approach the war in Iraq received heavy coverage, leading the three network newscasts and appearing on the front-page of major newspapers. ABC World News (10/20, lead story, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush has gathered his top Iraq advisers for discussions on strategy." Bush "met today with the top commander for the Middle East, to talk about a possible change in tactics." President Bush: "My message to them is, 'whatever you need, we'll give you. And whatever tactics you think work on the ground, you put in place.'" Raddatz added, "A senior military official tells ABC News that for now, the changes will be only minor adjustments in how the battle is fought. There are no large scale changes in the plan." In the face of calls to adjust its policies, one "senior official said that the pressure will continue on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki to crack down on the militias." One "senior official said today Maliki will be given until the end of the year and then commanders and Administration officials, Charlie, will reassess the situation to see if it's working."

The CBS Evening News (10/20, lead story, 3:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Pressure is building on President Bush to find a way out of Iraq where the US death toll is now approaching 2,800." CBS (Axelrod): "In a not-so-subtle dig at 'cut-and-run,' his former number two at the State Department Richard Armitage now says the US should 'notify and walk.' Notify Iraqis we're going to be drawing down our troops over a reasonable interval of months. 'We can't win this militarily.'" CBS states that the President "is now in a delicate dance, showing resolve on the campaign trail but hinting at flexibility when he describe what is he tells his generals." Bush: "Whatever you need, we'll give you and whatever you tactics you think work on the ground, you put in place." CBS correspondent David Axelrod described Bush as "showing no flexibility on a phased withdrawal. It's called a non-starter, the idea of dividing Iraq into three separate regions, that's being ruled out, too."

NBC Nightly News (10/20, lead story, 3:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It has been a week of setbacks in Iraq and there have been some rare admissions from the Bush administration regarding U.S. policy there. Tonight there is further evidence that some sort of review of the Iraq war is underway." NBC (Gregory) added, "There's also a greater sense of urgency within the White House about the war. A flurry of meetings today focused on two key questions. 'What should the U.S. do next in Iraq?' And 'what realistically can it do?' With just weeks to go before Iraq's political impact is felt at the polls, the President today conceded setbacks."

DOJ_NMG_0084367

The Washington Post (10/21, A1, Tyson, Fletcher, 748K) reports that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Bush "said military commanders are constantly adjusting their tactics to meet enemy challenges." However, the Post emphasizes that Bush and Rumsfeld also "defended the U.S. strategy in Iraq, saying the ultimate goals remain unchanged despite escalating violence and increasingly somber assessments from military leaders on the ground."

The New York Times (10/21, A1, Semple, 1.21M) in an article focused mainly on militia violence in Iraq notes, "Reviews of the American strategy in Iraq took on more urgency on Friday."

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Richter, McManus, 918K) in an article titled "Bush Open To Shift In Iraq War 'Tactics'" says Bush's remarks Friday "appeared to signal that he was open to at least a limited change in his approach, and that he was not wedded to a 'stay-the-course' doctrine, as critics say. At the same time, Bush pledged to secure victory and said he would not change his administration's strategy or overall goals, even if it shifted tactics." With continuing violence in Iraq and "an increasing number of Republicans" questioning "the wisdom of Bush's policies" some "administration officials said Friday that in the face of Iraq's deepening troubles, they were weighing major changes in direction and expected a new course -- though not a withdrawal -- to be announced within months."

Under the headline "Pressure Builds For Policy Shift, But Bush Shows No Signs Of Budging," McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Hutcheson, Youssef) report, "American officials are grasping for new ways to keep the conflict from spinning out of control." Yet, "Bush has given no indication that he's ready to make dramatic changes in his Iraq policy" and his "public comments and those of his senior aides suggest that he's more determined than ever to stay the course." White House spokesman Tony Snow Friday "said that Bush is open to changes in tactics that could help achieve his goals, but won't consider any deviation from his core strategy." McClatchy notes, "That leaves senior American officials and commanders in Iraq in a tough place. They've acknowledged that the current approach isn't working, and that they're looking for an alternative."

The AP (10/20, Riechmann, Freking) portrays Bush as adamant in his resolve regarding Iraq, reporting that he "conceded Friday that 'right now it's tough' for American forces in Iraq, but the White House said he would not change U.S. strategy in the face of pre-election polls." The AP notes "fresh signs of Republican doubts," including the statement of Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison. Secretary Rumsfeld "said the Iraqi government must become less reliant on the United States to handle security. He also said U.S. officials are working with the Iraqis to develop projections on when that might happen."

The Financial Times (10/21, Luce, Sevastopulo) agrees that "Bush conceded yesterday that he was increasingly flexible about America's military strategy" and "has abandoned talk of achieving 'victory.'" On the issue of dividing Iraq along ethnic lines, Bloomberg (10/21, Mathewson, Williams) quotes White House spokesman Tony Snow saying, "You don't want to create the Balkans." Bloomberg adds, "The U.S. will continue urging Iraqis to identify themselves as one people, recalling how 12 million citizens turned out a year ago for the first democratic election in decades, Snow said."

Speculation Abounds Concerning Iraq Study Group's Recommendations. The New York Times (10/21, Weisman, 1.21M) reports, "Bush has opened himself to the new ideas when the war is presenting some of the problems the elder Mr. Bush and his aides, in their own memoirs, have said they worried about in 1991." James A. Baker III, co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, says "Bush has an unwarranted reputation for not listening to dissenting views," adding, "this project demonstrates one heck of a lot of flexibility." The group "has set off fevered talk in Washington, ranging from the political to the psychological, especially now that Mr. Baker has declared that neither Mr. Bush's 'stay the course' message nor what the White House calls the 'cut and run' approach of critics offers a way out," and "Speculation has centered on the possibility of a phased military withdrawal from Iraq; a possible separation of Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish areas; some kind of international protectorate to secure Baghdad; and greater involvement in Iraq and the region by Iran and other neighbors." While the group may not recommend personnel changes, "many doubt that those associated with the current approach could carry out a new one," and "it is well known that Mr. Baker is not a great fan of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld."

DOJ_NMG_0084368

Bush Links Democrats' Position On Iraq To Stance During Cold War. In contrast to other newspapers which focus on speculation about a shift in Administration Iraq policy, the Washington Times (10/21, A1, Dinan, 88K) in a front page story leads with Bush's campaign message reporting, "President Bush yesterday said Democrats became the party of 'doubt and defeat' during the fight against communism in the Cold War, and said it shows today in their calls for withdrawal from Iraq." Bush "said that shift began in 1972, with the nomination of George McGovern to run for president, continued into President Jimmy Carter's administration and characterized Democrats during Republican President Ronald Reagan's administration."

Administration Seen As Under "Pressure" To Shift Strategy. Continuing a theme found in many news reports ABC World News (10/20, story 3, 2:00, Gibson, 8.78M) focused on the Iraq War's impact on the congressional elections, reporting, "Karl Rove, the top White House political adviser, earlier on, was saying the Republican candidates ought to embrace the war and accuse Democrats of wanting to cut and run." ABC chief Washington correspondent, George Stephanopoulos: "And those words, cut and run, were the magic words for Republicans all year long. Even when the Iraq headlines were bad, if they could accuse Democrats of cutting and running, they felt they were in good shape. That slogan is losing its potency right now. And there's some evidence the Democratic charge of staying the course is gaining power. If you look at the tight Senate races, Democrats are on the offense, advertising on Iraq in seven of the tight Senate races. We see Republicans starting to break ranks."

GOP Candidates Begin To Waver On War. The AP (10/20, Gamboa) reports, "Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, one of President Bush's most ardent loyalists on the war in Iraq, voiced her strongest criticism yet of the administration's reasons for going to war. In a debate with her challenger in the Nov. 7 election, Hutchison, R-Texas, said she would not have voted for war had she known there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. But she also made it clear she does not support troop withdrawal." Her words "come as a small but growing number of Republicans are suggesting a change in the Iraq strategy may be necessary."

The AP (10/20, Lewis) reports, "Republican Sen. George Allen…called for 'changes in tactics' in how the U.S. is fighting the Iraq war on Friday as he continued to face questions about his morphing position on the war." Allen "has yet to reject or criticize the hard line on Iraq that he had touted for months and that President Bush repeated Thursday at an Allen fundraiser," but he "began shifting his public position on the unpopular war two weeks ago after fellow Virginia Sen. John Warner" said Iraq was "drifting sideways."

Rumsfeld Says Iraq Must Take Over Security. The AP (10/20, Burns) says that Rumsfeld argued that "the biggest mistake would be to not continue turning regions of the country over to the Iraqis, even if that means the U.S. has to go back and retake control because the Iraqis are overwhelmed." While he has made such remarks before about handing over responsibility, these comments "came less than three weeks before elections in which Democrats are threatening to recapture control of Congress."

UPI (10/20) also reports his declaration, saying that Rumsfeld "is scheduled to confer Saturday with President George W. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Gen. John Abizaid, head of Central Command. Gen. George Casey, the head of U.S. forces in Iraq, is to join the discussion from Baghdad by video."

Soldiers Feel Frustration In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (10/20, story 2, 3:40, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "Some senior American commanders in Baghdad now describe their mission here as treading water, trying to buy time for an Iraqi government and political system that so far is failing. Also failing is the US mission to reduce bloodshed in the Iraqi capital, something military commanders finally admitted as the death toll for American troops surged with over 70 dead already this month. While leaders in Washington work on a new strategy, American soldiers are forced to keep on with the operation in Baghdad."

Clarence Page Sees Bush Preparing To "Declare Victory And Go Home." In the Washington Times (10/21, 88K), syndicated columnist Clarence Page predicts, "Iraq has sunk deeper into what looks like a civil war and the Bush administration has sunk deeper into denial. But recent events indicate that, despite Mr. Bush's mantra about 'staying the course' in Iraq, he's looking for an exit strategy." Bush's consultation of the Baker-led Iraq Study Group "could offer cover for the younger Mr. Bush to do something he is loath to do in public: change his mind. ... In fact, Iraq's best direction may come through a partitioning of the country between its dominant Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish factions. ... But, whether in war or in peace, Iraq's future ultimately must be decided by Iraqis."

DOJ_NMG_0084369

Militias Clash In Amarah. ABC World News (10/20, story 2, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There may be a desire to crack down on the militias. But it wouldn't seem to be work working from what happened today. One of the things the US fears most in Iraq is militias seizing power at will, and dimming hopes for unification in the future. It happened today in Amarah, a city in the south. Population 750,000. The Mehdi army led by a cleric in Baghdad took over the city." ABC (McCarthy): "By nightfall, mediators sent by prime minister Maliki had arranged an uneasy truce in the city. But the damage had already been done to the government's authority." University of Michigan professor Juan Cole: "The guerillas typically have better firepower than the Iraqi military and the security forces. I am not sure anyone can do what Maliki has been called upon to do." McCarthy: "Iraq is increasingly becoming a battlefield for private armies, outside any central control. If that isn't stopped, many are afraid the country is truly heading into darkness."

NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 2, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) called the violence in Amarah "the latest example of this unraveling security situation on the ground." NBC (Engel): "This is an example of an exit strategy gone wrong. The Mahdi army invaded the city of Amarah and briefly seized control. This is the second city here this week where Iraqi security forces have been unable to stand up to militias. It was Shi'ites killing Shi'ites. " The attack on Amarah is Sadr's "boldest challenge yet to the central government." The Brookings Institution's Michael O'Hanlon: "Sadr may be getting ready for war and he may be getting ready to try to control as much of Baghdad and surrounding areas as possible in the belief that ultimately who rules Iraq will be settled on the battlefield, not at the ballot box." Loren Thompson, Lexington Institute military analyst: "If U.S. troops can't count on the Iraqi security forces to maintain control then we basically got two choices. Stick around or accept defeat." Engel: "Tonight after negotiations with Sadr's forces, the Iraqi army did regain control of Amarah, but Sadr's brazen takeover put both the Iraqi government and the U.S. military on notice of what could be an emerging pattern."

The New York Times (10/21, A1, Semple, 1.21M) reports, "Hundreds of militiamen linked to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr battled local police and members of a rival Shiite militia in the southeastern city of Amara," but "after a day of negotiations involving representatives of the warring militias, and delegates from the Baghdad offices of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, Mahdi Army gunmen withdrew from their positions, and by nightfall the city was under the control of an Iraqi Army battalion that had been dispatched from Basra." The fighting "exposed the deep fissures in the country's Shiite leadership and cast doubt on the ability of the ruling Shiite coalition to hold itself together. It also underscored the weaknesses of the Iraqi security forces and the potency of the Mahdi Army," and "raised fresh questions, too, about the ability of the Iraqi government and security forces to maintain order once allied troops are withdrawn."

The Washington Post (10/21, A13, Anderson, 748K) adds, "Each side blamed the other in a cycle of retaliatory clashes with tribal overtones," and "a spokesman for the Interior Ministry, Brig. Abdul Karim Khalaf Kinany, said the clashes were not driven by intra-Shiite conflict, but by tribal differences." However, the "bloody feud…illustrated deepening rifts within Iraq's largest sect and the growing turmoil in the south," proving "a stark illustration of the deepening tension among Shiite leaders."

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Roug, 918K) reports that Secretary Rumsfeld "said in Washington that he believed Iraqi security forces had regained control of the area. But the two-day offensive by the Al Mahdi army highlighted how difficult it has become for the central government and its security forces to rein in Shiite Muslim militias, both in the capital and in the south. ... Handing over control to the Iraqi army and police is key to the strategy of U.S.-led military forces, but the Iraqis often have proved inadequate, especially when facing Shiite militias."

McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Obeid, Youssef) calls the fighting "another sign that Iraqi government forces are unable or unwilling to subdue rogue elements." McClatchy speculates, "It's unclear how much control Sadr has over some members of his militia, which has expanded and splintered since he founded it in 2003. During Friday's fighting, some militiamen appeared to defy the firebrand cleric's orders for calm."

The Financial Times (10/21, Negus) headlines its coverage, "Amara Unrest Strains Plans For Unified Iraq" and reports from the British point of view, "The fighting threatens to disrupt British plans to complete the handover of the four Shia-majority provinces in their area of responsibility to local authorities. British and other coalition forces had already pulled out of two of the four provinces in their zone in June and September and withdrew from Amara in August."

DOJ_NMG_0084370

The AP (10/20, Hurst) reports, "The Amarah showdown between the two virtual private armies highlighted the potential for an all-out conflict between them and their political sponsors, both with large blocs in parliament and important to the survival of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's shaky 4-month-old government." Secretary Rumsfeld is quoted as saying that it "was not a strategic error for the British to turn over control of the city to the Iraqis in August."

Many Iraqis Consider Militia Gunmen As Protectors. The New York Times (10/21, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports that "the Mahdi Army, and a growing criminal breakaway element, have grown into one of the government's biggest problems and are a major obstacle to the success of the American enterprise here. Despite its new rogue fringe, Iraqi Shiites see the Mahdi militia as their most effective protector against the hostile Sunni groups that have slaughtered Shiites and driven them from their homes. Shiites say that as long as the government cannot keep them safe, they cannot support the disarming of militias. ... It is a broadly held view among Shiites that the American military has unfairly focused on Shiite militias and has largely forgotten the Sunni militias that they say launched the sectarian war." The Times asks rhetorically, "How is it possible to control a militia when trust among Iraqis has vanished and the government is incapable of containing the spiraling violence?"

Iraqi Religious Leaders Issue Edicts Against Violence. The AP (10/20) reports, "In a bid to stop sectarian bloodshed, Shiite and Sunni religious figures met in Mecca, Islam's holiest city, and issued a series of edicts Friday forbidding violence between Iraq's two Muslim sects. It is uncertain, however, whether the edicts, or fatwas, will find resonance among the country's Sunni and Shiite militants whose tit-for-tat attacks have created a deadly cycle of violence that gains momentum and brutality daily." The ongoing violence "is largely perpetuated by militants who abide only by the strict interpretations of the Quran, Islam's holy book, and Hadith, sayings of Islam's prophet Muhammad, that are offered by radical clerics outside Islam's mainstream."

The Washington Times (10/21, 88K) in a front page article reports on this meeting and its edict as well, stating, "It was not clear what impact the document signed by the dozens of clerics would have on militias that appear to be outside the control of both Shi'ite and Sunni religious authorities, and others that are affiliated with al Qaeda. Nevertheless, it marked an unprecedented effort by Iraqi religious leaders -- who gathered in the Saudi Arabian city where Islam was born -- to speak out against the bloodshed that has increased daily throughout the holy month of Ramadan."

UN Says 914,000 Have Fled Iraq. The AP (10/20, Jordans) reports, "At least 914,000 Iraqis have fled their homes since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, more than a third since an increase in sectarian bloodshed at the start of this year, the U.N. refugee agency said Friday. ... The agency has concluded that 754,000 displaced Iraqis remain in the country." The Los Angeles Times (10/21, 918K) carries an abbreviated version of this article.

UN Complains Of Iraqi Sealing Of Civilian Death Toll Data. The New York Times (10/21, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "The United Nations office in Baghdad says that Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, has ordered the country's medical authorities to stop providing the organization with monthly figures on the number of civilians killed and wounded in the conflict there, according to a confidential cable. ... Ashraf Qazi, the United Nations envoy to Iraq, says the prohibition may hinder the ability of his office to give accurate accounts in its bimonthly human rights reports on the levels of violence and the effect on Iraqi society."

GOP Criticizes CNN For Airing "Sniper Tape." The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Perry, 918K) reports, "CNN cable news has become 'the publicist for an enemy propaganda film' by broadcasting a tape showing an insurgent sniper apparently killing an American soldier" according to House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter. Hunter "called for the Pentagon to oust immediately any CNN reporter embedded with U.S. troops in Iraq." Reps. Brian Bilbray and Darrell Issa joined Hunter in "sending a letter to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld." The Pentagon, though, "had no official reaction to the CNN video. Though embedded reporters are made to sign pledges not to show the faces of dead Americans until their families are notified, nothing prohibits the use of pictures where identities are not discernible."

DOJ_NMG_0084371

Plea Is Reported In Iraq Murder Case. The AP (10/20, Watkins) reports, "A Camp Pendleton Marine will plead guilty next week for his role in the killing of an Iraqi civilian last April, his attorney said Friday. Pfc. John J. Jodka, 20, of Encinitas, would be the first Marine to plead guilty in the case, in which six other Marines and one Navy corpsman were also charged with murder." His attorney "said Jodka would testify at his court-martial and that sentencing was not expected until Nov. 15."

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Perry, 918K) reports that Jodka "was the youngest and lowest-ranking" of the Marine defendants and that he "was moved from the brig at Camp Pendleton to the Miramar Marine Corps Air Station brig two weeks ago to separate him from other defendants."

Officer Awaits Ruling In Abu Ghraib Case. The AP (10/20, Dishneau) reports, "An Army colonel began deliberating Friday whether to recommend a court-martial for an officer accused of abusing Abu Ghraib prisoners by ignoring their mistreatment and then lying to investigators about it. A decision is expected by early November on whether Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, an Army reservist from Fredericksburg, Va., will stand trial for any of the 12 charges against him." He "is the highest-ranking U.S. soldier, and the first officer, charged with crimes stemming from the physical abuse and sexual humiliation of Abu Ghraib detainees."

Colonel Takes Care Of 18,000 Troops' Families. ABC World News (10/20, story 10, 3:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Finally from us, our 'person of the week' we are awed, time and again, by the bravery and sacrifice exhibited on the battlefields of Iraq. And humbled when we hear of the sacrifices that families at home also make. Tonight, the man who takes care of the families when their loved ones are in the thick of war." Col. Larry Phelps: "I think the perception is, when a unit deploys, it sweeps the building out, locks the door and walks away. But with a division the size of this one, we have over 18,000 soldiers. And every one of those soldiers has a family. And every one of those families has to be taken care of in the absence of the soldier." Gibson: "Colonel Larry Phelps is the commander of the Army's 1st Cavalry Rear Detachment. The 1st Cav is presently deploying 18,000 soldiers to Iraq. And in simple terms, Colonel Phelps is in charge of taking care of the 18,000 families left behind. Taking care of one family is hard enough for most of us. Think about 18,000."

Gunmen Murder 8 Afghan Laborers. The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/21) reports, "Gunmen ambushed a carload of Afghan laborers heading home from a remote U.S. military base in eastern Afghanistan and executed eight of them ... The killings occurred as a statement purportedly issued by fugitive Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar called for stepped-up attacks on Afghan and foreign troops." The victims "worked for the U.S. military in the mountainous Korangal area of Kunar province."

Total Says Interrogated Executive Is Innocent In Oil For Food Probe. The New York Times (10/21, Kanter, 1.21M) reports, "The French oil company Total rallied on Friday to the defense of its second in command and designated chief executive, Christophe de Margerie, after he was taken into custody and questioned about possible illegal payments for Iraqi oil. Mr. de Margerie, 55, and a former Total executive, Bernard de Combret, 63, were released on bail on Thursday after being held for 48 hours." A spokeswoman said, "The judge has to prove that he is or is not guilty, and we think he's not guilty."

The Financial Times (10/21, Arnold) reports, "The surprise move cast a shadow over plans for Mr Margerie to replace Thierry Desmarest as chief executive when the latter steps up to non-executive chairman after the group's annual results in February. ... The charges add to growing discomfort in Paris political and business circles about the damage being done to France's prestige by the inquiry. ... Politicians and executives in countries from Germany to India have been snared by the scandal. But France's strong ties to Saddam Hussein's regime seemed to mean it was more involved than most."

Columnist King Sees Violent New Iraq. In his Washington Post (10/21, 748K) column, Colbert King writes, "Some of us can't forget the prewar talk about weapons of mass destruction and Saddam Hussein's partnership with al-Qaeda, and how wrong the foreign policy elite were about that. Then there was the rosy post-Hussein world portrayed by the Bush administration, in which Iraqis, liberated from the grip of fear and imbued with a deep and abiding respect for human rights and freedom, would be busy building a better future for themselves. ... There is a new Iraq emerging before our eyes. It is an Iraq that torments Christians, that indulges in unrelenting sectarian bloodbaths, that cheers for Hezbollah, that is no more a friend to Israel than is Iran, all despite the lies sold to the White House and Pentagon by self-serving, power-hungry Iraqi expatriates."

DOJ_NMG_0084372

Cynthia Tucker Says Bush "Exploited" Americans' Fears. In a column scheduled to appear Sunday in the Atlanta Journal Constitution (10/22), Cynthia Tucker writes, "Bush had a major advantage in persuading Americans to support his Iraqi misadventure: Voters wanted to believe that ousting Saddam would take care of terrorists. ... But 3 1/2 years after the invasion, with bloodshed escalating, the spell has worn off…we are less secure than we were five years ago. Terrorists are using our invasion of Iraq as a recruiting tool. While Saddam had no weapons of mass destruction, North Korea apparently now has nukes. Iran is on its way to nuclear capabilities. And we have few soldiers left to handle a conflict anywhere else." She also charges that Secretary Rumsfeld "was eager to attack Iraq because it presented better targets for our advanced weaponry than primitive Afghanistan, according to several White House insider accounts."

DOJ:

DOJ Honors Five Maryland Prosecutors With Director's Awards. The Baltimore Sun (10/21) reported, "The US Justice Department honored five federal prosecutors in Maryland yesterday with 2006 Director's Awards from the department's executive office for United States attorneys. Roann Nichols was recognized for her work in negotiating the civil settlement of fraud charges against Serono Laboratories Inc. in connection with illegal schemes to promote, market and sell its AIDS drug, Serostim. A. David Copperthite and Charles J. Peters, who serve in the U.S. attorney's narcotics and organized crime section, were recognized for their work on the prosecution of Baltimore police detectives William King and Antonio Murray. Stuart A. Berman and Barbara S. Skalla received Director's Awards for their work on the prosecution of international drug dealers from Pakistan, a trial handled in the U.S. District Court in Greenbelt."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ouster Of UnitedHealth CEO Could Make Other CEOs Vulnerable. The AP (10/21) reported, "Chief executives caught in the stock-options scandal may find it harder to keep their jobs now that a CEO as mighty as UnitedHealth's William McGuire has fallen. The scandal rattling corporate America has claimed more than three dozen executives and board directors at 19 public companies so far. McGuire, whose retirement was announced Sunday, is arguably the most prominent. … The fall of a big domino like McGuire - the man who engineered UnitedHealth's rise from a regional health insurer into the nation's second-largest - can spark the descent of others like him." The AP adds, "A sort of guillotine for corporate executives has been set out in the public square. With more than 100 companies under options investigations by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, many likely are eager to show their cooperation with the authorities and willingness to take remedial action - like firing executives believed to be implicated or responsible and possibly recouping some of their options money."

Fifth Circuit Ruling Could Aid Skilling Effort To Have Convictions Thrown Out. Bloomberg (10/21) reported, "A federal appeals court has refused to consider reinstating the convictions of four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage in 1999 to help Enron appear to have met earnings targets. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit denied a government request for a hearing before all its 15 judges, the online court docket said yesterday. … The decision may help Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey K. Skilling, in his bid to have his guilty verdicts thrown out. Mr. Skilling, 52, had cited the ruling in asking the judge in his case to cancel his fraud convictions. His sentencing begins Monday."

The New York Post (10/21, Tharp) reported that Skilling "faces 20 years behind bars at his sentencing Monday - while his lawyers face an unpaid legal tab of $30 million." Skilling is "already nearly broke, say his lawyers. But prosecutors say he's got many millions left from his ill-gotten gains, and must fork over $182.9 million in penalties and restitution to his victims."

Feinstein Urges DOJ To Appeal Ruling On Lay Convictions. The Fresno Bee (10/21) reports, "Sen. Dianne Feinstein is urging the Justice Department to appeal a ruling this week vacating the fraud and conspiracy conviction of Enron founder Kenneth Lay." In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Feinstein criticized "the decision to erase the conviction. U.S. District Judge Sim Lake in Houston made the ruling because Lay died before getting to pursue appeals. 'I urge the Justice Department to seek an appeal of Judge Lakes' decision, so that the government can fight to preserve Enron victims' hard-fought right to obtain restitution,' Feinstein wrote."

DOJ_NMG_0084373

The Houston Chronicle (10/21, Ivanovich) reports, "Feinstein argued the 5th Circuit's ruling went beyond a doctrine in common law that does away with punishments after a defendant's death. 'The Supreme Court has never held that it also must wipe out a victim's right to compensatory relief such as restitution,' Feinstein wrote."

Grasso Vows To Continue Fighting Over Paychecks. The Wall Street Journal (10/21, B1, Lucchetti, Davies) reported, "The fight over one of Wall Street's biggest paychecks -- the $187.5 million compensation package amassed by former New York Stock Exchange chief Dick Grasso -- is headed for yet another round of nasty court battles. A judge's decision on Thursday that Mr. Grasso needs to give back as much as $100 million significantly changes the landscape of the battle, handing Mr. Grasso's enemies a key victory. Mr. Grasso vowed to keep pressing his case. 'I believe it was right when I started, and nothing has changed my mind,' Mr. Grasso said Friday in an interview."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ethics Panel May Release Interim Report On Foley Case Before Election. The Washington Post (10/21, A8, Eilperin, 748K) reports, "Despite an uncharacteristic spurt of activity, the House ethics committee is unlikely to complete its investigation of the Mark Foley page scandal before the election, but it may issue an interim report on Foley's activities and how the GOP leadership responded to warnings." In addition to key members of House Speaker Dennis Hastert's staff they may depose Hastert as well. Rep. Howard Berman and the panel's chairman, Rep. Doc Hastings "have managed to resuscitate the panel to some extent in recent months, doling out private advice to lawmakers behind closed doors and taking on the politically sensitive task of probing whether Hastert and his deputies failed to act quickly enough to stop Foley."

Priest Suspended After Abuse Of Foley Revealed. The CBS Evening News (10/20, story 4, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M) profiles Father Anthony Mercieca, "the priest at the center of the Mark Foley scandal. Today we got our first look at him and the church is now taking action." The New York Times (10/21, Goodnough, 1.21M) reports, "The Archdiocese of Miami on Friday barred the Rev. Anthony Mercieca from functioning as a priest anywhere in the world after confirming that he was the clergyman who Mark Foley said molested him in the 1960's."

The New York Times (10/21, Fisher, 1.21M) adds, "The sketchiest of portraits emerged from neighbors and church officials: Father Mercieca retired here a few years ago, having spent his career mostly in Brazil and the United States, and has not been officially active here as a priest. But he said Mass at 9 every morning for several dozen worshipers at the main church here."

US Will Not Seek Fourth Trial Of Gotti. The New York Times (10/21, Feuer) reported, "John A. Gotti, who three times in just over a year has escaped conviction on federal racketeering charges, will finally be able to pursue what he claims he has long desired: an ordinary life. After three trials in Manhattan, each ending in a hung jury, federal prosecutors have announced that they will not seek a fourth trial on those charges for Mr. Gotti, a decision federal officials had indicated was likely. It enshrines him as a defendant even trickier to convict than his father." The Times noted, "This decision does not preclude the F.B.I. or other authorities from developing new evidence for a different case some day." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/21, McShane) called it "one huge victory for second-generation mobster" Gotti. "But more legal problems could lie ahead: Radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa promised a civil suit against Mr. Gotti over his near-fatal June 1992 kidnapping allegedly ordered by the mob scion."

The New York Daily News (10/21, Marzulli) reported, "Though Gotti insists he left the Mafia behind in 1999, one law enforcement source said it's 'pretty impossible' to believe he's going to move away and go straight. 'He sitting on a ton of money which is all ill-gotten gains,' the source said. 'He knows one life and it's called organized crime. Plus he has to look over his shoulder with the Gambino family because he really upset a lot of people.' But mob expert Jerry Capeci said he doesn't think anyone is gunning for Gotti for speaking to prosecutors." Capeci noted, "He never hurt anyone, never became a cooperating witness." Newsday (10/21, DeStefano) added that US Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement Friday that US District Judge Shira Scheindlin "signed papers that ended the prosecution of Gotti. 'It was just wise to stop,' said one federal law enforcement official who asked not to be named." The New York Post (10/21, Cornell) reported on the decision, under the headline "Giddy Gotti Jr. Defeats The Feds." The Staten Island Advance (10/21, Harrell) and Bloomberg (10/21, Glovin, Hurtado) also reported the story.

DOJ_NMG_0084374

DOJ Examining Harman's Relationship With AIPAC. Time (10/22, Burger) reported on its web site, "Did a Democratic member of Congress improperly enlist the support of a major pro-Israel lobbying group to try to win a top committee assignment? That's the question at the heart of an ongoing investigation by the FBI and Justice Department prosecutors, who are examining whether Rep. Jane Harman of California and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) may have violated the law in a scheme to get Harman reappointed as the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee, according to knowledgeable sources in and out of the US government." A spokesman for AIPAC "denied any wrongdoing by the group and stressed that it is not taking sides in regards to the committee assignment. Spokespersons for Justice and the FBI declined to comment."

The Washington Times (10/21) reported, "Time Magazine reports she may have received a boost from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee when Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi wanted to remove her from the committee. Harman left a voice mail for the magazine calling any suggestions of improper conduct 'irresponsible, laughable and scurrilous.' She has retained Ted Olson, the lawyer who formerly served as President George W. Bush's solicitor general. Olson told Time Harman did not know of any investigation but decided to retain him after news reports of a probe."

Abramoff To Serve Time In Cumberland, Maryland. NBC News (10/21, Seidman) reported, "Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff will report Nov. 15 to a federal prison in Cumberland, Md., to serve a 70-month sentence for fraud and conspiracy charges in connection with the purchase of Florida-based SunCruz Casinos. U.S. District Judge Paul Huck granted a request by prosecutors and Abramoff's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, that Abramoff serve his time at the Cumberland facility because it is within driving distance of Washington. They said in a court filing that Abramoff was cooperating in the Justice Department's Washington influence peddling investigation and would continue to assist prosecutors while in prison."

Alaska Lawmaker's Relationship With Developer Is One Focus Of FBI Probe. The Anchorage Daily News (10/21, Demer) reported, "Last year, state Rep. Vic Kohring sat down with the mayor of the Fairbanks North Star Borough, Jim Whitaker, to talk about changing a state law to increase a tax break for an Anchorage-based developer." Kohring "was on the payroll of the developer, Marc Marlow, for whom he had been working since November 2004. To Whitaker, himself a former legislator, Kohring was acting like a lobbyist, not a lawmaker." The Daily News added, "Kohring has worked on a half-dozen projects for Marlow," and "now their relationship is coming under new scrutiny as part of an FBI investigation into legislators, influence peddling and the oil field service and construction company Veco Corp. Kohring is one of six Alaska legislators whose offices were searched by the FBI," and "agents took a folder of information on Marlow along with other items, according to a copy of the receipt for property provided by Kohring's attorney."

FBI Investigating Former New Jersey Township Planning Board Member. The Asbury Park Press (10/21, Brown) reported from Tinton Falls, N.J., "The FBI served a subpoena at borough hall late Friday afternoon requesting all records relating to a former Planning Board member's activities while a borough official, a source said. The source…said the FBI is investigating the activities of Paul J. Abrams and his relationship with the developer of the proposed Heather Glen development, intended for the Tinton Avenue site of the former Communications-Electronic Command building." The Press noted, "News of the subpoena apparently had not reached Abrams on Friday. 'I have no idea what you're talking about,' he said."

FBI Subpoenas Records On Rhode Island Senate President's Land Deals. WJAR-TV Providence (10/20) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast Friday, "NBC 10 has learned that the FBI has subpoenaed records from the West Warwick Town Hall and confirmed that the records taken involve land deals that Senate President Joseph Montalbano conducted for the town. … The state Ethics Commission is still looking into a complaint accusing Montalbano of failing to disclose legal work he did for West Warwick before a vote on a constitutional amendment that would allow a casino to be built in the town. The complaint, filed by Operation Clean Government…accused Montalbano of failing to disclose more than $86,000 that his law firm received for work done for West Warwick town authorities." The Pawtucket Times (10/21, Scudder) noted, "The FBI would not confirm or deny if or what documents were subpoenaed from the town. 'We can only speak to what is public record. I have nothing in my records that indicates any activity that is of public record,' said FBI spokesperson Gail Marcinkevich. Television news reports, however, said that Bauer confirmed it was the FBI that subpoenaed records from town hall."

DOJ_NMG_0084375

Informant Taped Friends, Associates, Girlfriend In Effort To Reduce His Sentence. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (10/21, A1, Richardson) reported, "To secure a lighter sentence, Garland Hardeman taped friends, associates and a lover Surviving a .22 caliber shot to the head. … Mr. Hardeman, a Los Angeles cop-turned-lobbyist, was 'working off a beef,' as prosecutors say -- hoping to reduce his own jail time by acting as a government witness. Earlier, he had been busted for attempted bribery in a Los Angeles garbage-hauling scandal. He continued to work as a lobbyist, using the job as cover to trick friends and business associates into admitting their part in one of the most widespread cases of public malfeasance in the U.S., spanning nine cities and five states." Hardeman "wore a wire to record 17 people, many of whom were subsequently convicted. That included his girlfriend. He testified in four grand juries and three trials and accounted for a 'substantial' part of the evidence used in 'the most pervasive corruption case this district has ever seen,' says Tom McConville, a federal prosecutor in the Central District of California. Many of the cases involved paying bribes and kickbacks in return for municipal contracts."

Williams Settles Education Department Case. The AP (10/21) reported, "Columnist Armstrong Williams has reached a settlement with prosecutors regarding payments he received by the Education Department to promote President Bush's agenda. Under the settlement, Williams admits no wrongdoing but will have to pay $34,000. The deal was reached last week by Williams, the Education Department and its subcontractor, Ketchum Communications." The settlement "brings to a close a yearlong investigation into the case after reports emerged that the Education Department contracted with several radio, television and print commentators to promote the No Child Left Behind Act." The AP adds, "In the settlement, the Justice Department examined whether Williams actually performed the work that was promised in his $240,000 contract signed in late 2003 and cited in his monthly reports to the Education Department. Ultimately, prosecutors determined he was overpaid $34,000."

Man Wanted In Poland For 1998 Police Killing Arrested In US. The Chicago Tribune (10/21, Coen, Bush, Zajac, Wischnowsky) reported that Edward Mazur, a Glenview businessman who is wanted in Poland for soliciting the murder of a former national police chief, ""was taken into custody Friday morning at his home, an arrest billed as a breakthrough in a case of enormous significance in that country." Mazur "appeared in federal court in Chicago on Friday afternoon, and was ordered held pending an identification and extradition hearing Wednesday. The arrest came on the heels of a high-level meeting in Washington this month between Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales and Polish Justice Minister Zbigniew Ziobro."

The AP (10/21, Robinson) reports that US Magistrate Judge Arlander Keys "warned the defendant that if he proved to be the Edward Mazur named in an arrest warrant issued by a court in Warsaw, 'the officials from Poland will come to Chicago and take you in custody to Poland.'"

YouTube Turned Over User Data To Media Lawyers In Response To Subpoena. Market Watch (10/21, Charny) reported, "YouTube's actions in response to a subpoena it received in May show that it has been keeping tabs on users who post copyrighted material to its site -- and in one case shared the name of a user with lawyers from a Hollywood film studio. On May 24, lawyers for Viacom Inc.'s Paramount Pictures convinced a federal judge in San Francisco to issue a subpoena requiring YouTube to turn over details about a user who uploaded dialog from the movie studio's 'Twin Towers,' according to a copy of the document. YouTube promptly handed over the data to Paramount, which on June 16 sued the creator of the 12-minute clip, New York City-based filmmaker Chris Moukarbel, for copyright infringement, in federal court in Washington."

DOJ_NMG_0084376

Church Youth Pastor Indicted On Child Porn Charges. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (10/21, Villarreal) reported, "A former youth leader at Grace Baptist Church in St. Charles was indicted Thursday on federal child pornography charges. According to the indictment, Michael Gulley…had seven files of child pornography on his computer. Terri Dougherty, assistant to U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway, said the files were sent from Gulley's work computer to his home computer. Capt. Gerry Pollard, spokesman for the St. Charles Police Department, said the investigation began in November 2005. 'A person involved with the church became alarmed at what was going on,' he said." Gulley "was indicted on one felony count of possession of child pornography. If he is convicted, he could face a maximum of 10 years in prison, fines up to $250,000 and supervised release for life."

NYPD To Receive Grant To Buy Bulletproof Vests. The Staten Island Advance (NY) (10/21, Hart) reported, "The NYPD is finally on course to receive a federal grant of more than $538,000 to purchase about 1,000 bulletproof vests, under a funding stream approved yesterday by the Department of Justice. The money comes from the Justice Department's Bulletproof Vest Partnership Grant Program, funded at $30 million in the Fiscal Year 2006 Science, State, Justice, and Commerce Appropriations bill."

Scios Under Investigation For "Off Label" Marketing Of Heart Drug. The San Jose Mercury News (10/21, Johnson) reports, "The heart-failure drug Natrecor seemed sure to become a blockbuster after Scios of Fremont put it on the market in 2001. Besides its use in hospitalized patients, many clinics began giving it to walk-in patients in weekly sessions dubbed 'tuneups.' … There was only one problem: Some medical experts contend Natrecor was never approved for such tuneups. Some also say it may not be as safe as initially thought. Scios says studies show the drug is safe. And it has launched a campaign to clarify to doctors that the drug is not recommended for repeated use in patients in a clinic setting. Nevertheless, the drug's sales have sagged and the company is under investigation by the US attorney in San Francisco for allegedly engaging in 'off-label' marketing, promoting drugs for uses not approved by the government."

CIVIL LAW:

Illinois Firm Settles Naval Shipyard Kickback Accusations. The Newport News (VA) Daily Press (10/21) reports, "An Illinois transportation firm has agreed to pay $4.2 million to settle US Justice Department accusations that it deliberately overcharged Norfolk Naval Shipyard for delivering cargo. The original whistle-blower -- who runs a competing freight forwarding firm in Newport News -- is sharing the winnings." AIT Worldwide Logistics of Itasca, Ill., "had been accused of scheming with its agent in Hampton Roads and a transportation officer at Norfolk Naval Shipyard to bilk the government in exchange for giving kickbacks to the transportation officer. Paul Watkins runs the Oyster Point division of Target Logistic Services, a Baltimore-based company that competes with AIT for freight forwarding contracts. He was the original whistle-blower, gathering evidence of the scheme three years ago and reporting it to the Naval Criminal Investigative Service. Under the terms of the federal whistle-blower act, Watkins and his lawyer will split 18 percent of the amount of the Justice Department winnings."

Government Reaches Settlement Over Jet Noise Claims. The Navy Times (10/21, McMichael) reports, "The US government has reached a tentative settlement with more than 3,000 southern Virginia homeowners over their claims that excessive Navy jet noise reduced the value of their properties beginning in 1999, according to a court order filed Tuesday. The published order cancels the trial that was scheduled to start Thursday in Chesapeake, Va., under the auspices of the US Court of Federal Claims. Judge Victor J. Wolski also halted all proceedings in all the matters and ordered that the parties file a joint status report on the settlement process within 90 days. Settlement details or proposals for same have not been released. Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson cautioned that 'nothing has been finalized.'"

DOJ Cracking Down On Bankruptcy Fraud. The Salt Lake Tribune (10/21, Oberbeck) reports that the Justice Department is cracking down on bankruptcy fraud. According to the Tribune, prosecutors "have filed criminal charges against 78 people in 36 judicial districts nationwide. Three of them were in Utah. … Among those charged as a result of the nationwide sweep were nine attorneys, two bankruptcy petition preparers and a former law enforcement officer. The Justice Department estimates fraud is involved in approximately 10 percent of all bankruptcy petitions. Collectively, the charges alleged defendants concealed more than $3 million in assets, used false Social Security numbers and identities, submitted fraudulent documents and fraudulently received government loans and benefits, the Justice Department said. In many states such bankruptcy fraud prosecutions are rare, but that's not the case in Utah.

DOJ_NMG_0084377

The Federal Times (10/21, Curl) reports, "Agencies are improving the way they disseminate information to the public thanks to a presidential directive that requires them to review and revamp how they respond to Freedom of Information Act requests. The executive order 'has had an immediate and widespread positive effect on the operations of the federal agencies that administer the FOIA,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wrote in a report issued Oct. 16. However, he noted that a large backlog at many agencies 'still remains an area of concern.'" The Presidential order, issued in December 2005, "requires agencies to name chief FOIA officers at the assistant secretary level and create improvement plans to streamline the processing of requests. The order also directs agencies to establish one or more service centers and designate one or more public liaisons to this effort. Gonzales said agencies, in their FOIA improvement plans, have embraced a number of critical elements — expanded use of technology, active disclosure of information, improved customer service and backlog reduction."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

California Congressional Candidate's Office Raided. The AP (10/21, Prengaman) reports that the home of California congressional candidate Tan Nguyen was raided by 10 uniformed California Department of Justice police officers Friday. Agents "spent two hours sifting through cabinets, boxes and computers" and "left carrying several boxes and plastic bags of evidence." Nguyen has acknowledged his campaign sent a letter, "which wrongly said immigrants could be jailed if they voted. He blamed an unidentified staffer whom he said he has fired. Nguyen has resisted calls from leaders in his own party to quit the race, saying he did not approve the letter and did not know about it."

The Orange County (CA) Register (10/21, Santana) reports, "Agents also searched Nguyen's Santa Ana home and a campaign worker's Anaheim home."

The McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Santana) reports, "Despite burgeoning state and federal probes into the flier, Nguyen's attorney said Nguyen has no plans to withdraw as the Republican nominee for the 47th Congressional District race against incumbent Democrat Loretta Sanchez. Dave Wiechert, an attorney representing Nguyen, said that 'Mr. Nguyen has indicated that he did not authorize or approve the mailing' yet declined to discuss specifics because of the ongoing investigation. Wiechert added that misinformation was fueling what he called 'a political firestorm.'"

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Delson, Goffard, Tran) reported, "Even as he prepared to step before the cameras Friday in an effort to mend his tattered candidacy for Congress, the worst week of Tan Nguyen's political life got bleaker still, as state agents raided his Garden Grove campaign headquarters and Santa Ana home, hauling off computers and bags of evidence." Nguyen "maintains that he neither wrote nor authorized the instantly infamous letter, claiming it was the work of a campaign manager he refused to name. According to the head of the Orange County Republican Party, however, the mailing house that sent the letter said Nguyen had a direct hand in it." Nguyen lawyer David Wiechert "said agents from the state attorney general's office had questioned Nguyen for two hours Thursday and that he was cooperating fully with their investigation." The New York Times (10/21, Chang, 1.21M) also briefly reported on the search of Nguyen's home and office.

Local Television. Many California television networks reported that federal authorities raided the campaign office and home of Republican congressional candidate Tan Nguyen in an effort to find evidence regarding who sent a letter threatening illegal immigrants with arrest if they vote. Some examples: KNSD-TV San Diego, (10/20, 6:14 p.m.) broadcasted, "Authorities came looking for answers and for evidence. Investigators with the state Department of Justice spent nearly two hours inside the campaign office of Tan Nguyen. Authorities searched through files, computers and documents. They would not say what they found."

KPSP-TV Palm Springs, (10/20, 5:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "State authorities are searching the campaign office of Orange County Republican congressional candidate Tan Nguyen. … Tonight about ten uniformed agents from the state Department of Justice arrived at the campaign office today with a search warrant."

KSBY-TV Santa Barbara, (10/20, 6:15 p.m.) broadcasted, "State agents search the campaign office of a Republican congressional candidate whose campaign mailed thousands of intimidating letters to Hispanic immigrant voters. Half-dozen agents could be seen opening cabinets and scouring desks in the storefront campaign office of Tan Nguyen."

DOJ_NMG_0084378

KFMB-TV San Diego, (10/20, 11:07 p.m.) broadcasted, "Department of Justice agents also searched Tan Nguyen's home. The republican maintains he's innocent, saying he fired the staffer responsible for the controversial letter."

KPSP-TV Palm Springs, (10/21, 11:30 p.m.) broadcasted, "Schwarzenegger said if candidate Tan Nguyen knew about the letter, he should resign. 'I think those kind of tactics are illegal, this is hate crime, and I think that anyone that knew, and if he knew, has to resign immediately. I think there should be no tolerance for this kind of behavior, and I think that it is good that attorney general Bill Lockyer is investigating the whole thing."

Discrimination Claim Could Hurt Cracker Barrel's Ability To Draw Minority Customers. The State (SC) (10/21, Duplessis) reported, "Experts say Cracker Barrel gained one more business risk when the mother of comedian Chris Rock accused Cracker Barrel of racial discrimination for her treatment at a restaurant Tuesday. … The real risk is that it will set back the company's ability to lure one of the most lucrative sources of increasing its business: drawing more minority customers." Lawsuits "led Cracker Barrel to reach a consent decree in 2004. The Justice Department cited widespread discrimination within the chain. In some restaurants, black diners routinely were given tables apart from whites, were seated after white customers who arrived later and were given inferior service. The decree led Cracker Barrel to establish a discrimination policy."

Court Strikes Down Las Vegas Ordinance Barring Street Solicitation. The New York Times (10/21, Marshall) reported, "A federal appeals court in San Francisco struck down a Las Vegas ordinance barring solicitation on city streets, calling it unconstitutional. The decision, by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, stems from a 1997 case brought by the American Civil Liberties Union and several religious and political groups challenging Las Vegas ordinances that barred certain groups from distributing leaflets or using vendor tables along a five-block pedestrian promenade. The court also ruled that the city violated the ACLU's constitutional right to free speech when it forbid it to set up a vendor table."

Alabama Reported Zero Hate Crimes In 2005. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (10/21, Daker) reported, "No hate crimes were recorded in Alabama in 2005, according to statistics released this week by the FBI, but law enforcement agencies representing about 10 percent of the state's population were the only ones providing information for the survey. Alabama and Mississippi were the only states in the nation that reported zero hate crimes, according to the FBI. Hawaii did not participate in the study, which included 49 states and the District of Columbia." The FBI "reported that nationally more than 7,000 criminal incidents recorded in 2005 occurred as a result of bias toward a particular race, religion, sexual orientation, ethnicity/national origin, or physical or mental disability. In 2005, California reported the most hate crimes, recording 1,379. New Jersey reported the second most with 738, according to the FBI."

ACLU Asks Justice Department To Monitor Chesterfield County Voting. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (10/21, Whitley) reported, "The American Civil Liberties Union of Virginia asked the U.S. Justice Department yesterday to send election observers to Chesterfield County on Election Day. The ACLU claims the county's actions could discourage minority voters. Kent Willis, director of the ACLU, cited four incidents over the past two years, including a new allegation that the registrar, Lawrence C. Haake III, refused to issue an absentee ballot to a registered voter because the prospective voter would not give his Social Security number. Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the department has received the letter from Willis. It does not disclose which localities it will monitor until 24 hours before an election, she said."

The AP (10/21) reported, "Willis cited several actions since 2004: --In October 2004, the county's general registrar, Lawrence Haake III, announced plans for security reasons to place armed guards at every polling precinct, a tactic Willis said was used in the past to intimidate black voters. --In November 2004, ACLU officials received complaints that county poll workers were restricting voters lacking identification. Willis said Virginia law allows voters to cast ballots without identification, provided they sign an affirmation of identity. --Requiring absentee voters to provide Social Security numbers. The State Board of Elections has said registrars can ask for Social Security numbers, but they cannot deny a ballot. --Refusing to count provisional ballots of voters who registered through the state Department of Motor Vehicles prior to registration deadlines, but whose applications had not been forwarded to the registrar."

DOJ_NMG_0084379

SCOTUS Overturns Injunction On Arizona Voter ID Law. The Washington Post (10/21, A3, Lane, 748K) reports the Supreme Court "ruled yesterday that Arizona may enforce a new state law requiring voters to show a photo identification card at the polls on Election Day this year, despite a pending lawsuit by opponents who say the measure will disenfranchise the poor, minorities and the elderly. In its unanimous five-page ruling, the court did not decide whether the Arizona law was constitutional. Rather, it overturned a federal appeals court in San Francisco that would have blocked enforcement of the law until the opponents' suit could be decided." The law "requires voters not only to present proof of citizenship when they register but also to present a photo ID when they go to the polls. Those without a photo ID may cast a provisional ballot, but their votes do not count unless they can produce a valid identification card within five days."

The New York Times (10/21, Greenhouse, 1.21M) reports, "In an unsigned opinion, the court granted Arizona's request to overturn an injunction issued this month by a two-judge federal appeals panel. The judges, A. Wallace Tashima and William A. Fletcher of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, had acted at the request of a group of Arizona Indian tribes, the League of Women Voters and other groups who have joined to challenge the constitutionality of the rules." The AP (10/21, Sherman) reports, "Courts in Georgia and Missouri have blocked similar laws. Justice John Paul Stevens, in a brief concurring opinion, said the high court's action makes it more likely that the constitutional issues 'will be resolved correctly on the basis of historical facts rather than speculation.'"

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Savage, 918K) reports, "Friday's order is likely to be seen as a benefit for Republican candidates and a setback for Democrats. In recent years, Republicans in Congress and in many state capitals have pressed for voter-identification requirements at the ballot box. They say these rules are needed to combat fraudulent voting."

ANTITRUST:

Consumer Groups Want More Concessions From AT&T For BellSouth Buyout. The AP (10/21, Dunbar) reported, "Consumer groups say concessions offered by AT&T Inc. as it seeks government approval of its buyout of BellSouth Corp. fall far short of what's needed for the deal to be in the public interest. The Justice Department has signed off on the deal, but the Federal Communications Commission has not voted on it. AT&T contends it has offered a full range of accommodations, including $10-a-month Internet access, free modems, promises to temporarily freeze prices for competitors that use the company's networks and even a program to return to the United States some jobs that were shipped overseas." The AP Adds, "Opponents of the deal, whose views often closely track those of the commission's two Democrats who managed to delay a planned FCC vote, would like to see AT&T beef up its offer in three main areas: Stronger assurances by the company that it will not discriminate against certain kinds of Internet traffic, a concept known as 'network neutrality.' Offer 'naked DSL,' or stand-alone digital subscriber line service, that is priced competitively. Lower prices for 'special access' customers -- service offered to capacity-hungry customers, such as large businesses and Internet service providers, that guarantee a dedicated high-capacity link to distribute voice and data."

Bloomberg (10/21) reported, "AT&T Inc. will fight calls by opponents of its $81 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. to divest airwaves intended for wireless high-speed Internet service, a company lobbyist said. AT&T, the biggest U.S. telephone company, plans to use the airwaves for emerging 'WiMax' broadband services, Senior Vice President Robert Quinn said Friday. 'Mobility is a feature that people are going to want to have,' Quinn said. 'We have every incentive in the world to utilize that spectrum.'"

Judge Rules Petco Vote Can Proceed. The San Diego Union-Tribune (10/21, Green) reported, "A judge declined yesterday to block a Monday meeting at which Petco shareholders will vote on the proposed sale of the company to two private investment firms. Attorneys representing dissident shareholders had wanted a temporary injunction halting the meeting so that shareholders could, among other remedies, be provided with additional information on how the company's board chose Leonard

DOJ_NMG_0084380

Green & Partners and Texas Pacific's $1.8 billion bid over a higher offer from PetSmart. In turning down the injunction request, San Diego Superior Court Judge John S. Meyer said there was not enough time 'to add some discrete information to the proxy' with Monday's meeting looming. He added that he was not sure whether an injunction was appropriate. He voiced concern during the hearing about possible damage to Petco's stock price if there should be a delay in the vote."

Federal Reserve Approves Regions, AmSouth Merger. The Huntsville Times (AL) (10/21, Smith) reports, "Regions Financial Corp. and AmSouth Bancorp. said late Friday that the Federal Reserve Board has approved their planned merger. The announcement came one day after AmSouth said it had reached an agreement with federal regulators to sell 52 branches in Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee. That agreement resolved antitrust concerns raised by the Department of Justice after the two Birmingham-based banks said last spring they planned to merge. … The combined bank will keep the Regions name."

Ripplewood Mulling Bid For Delphi. The Wall Street Journal (10/21, A3, Dugan) reported, "Ripplewood Holdings LLC, a large New York-based buyout firm, is preparing a likely bid for Delphi Corp., the auto-parts giant that filed for bankruptcy protection last year, according to people familiar with the matter. Ripplewood has examined the possibility of taking over the entire auto-parts maker, but a bid for just part of Delphi also is possible, these people said." The Journal adds, "A bid for all of Delphi likely would far surpass $10 billion, people involved in the discussions said. Delphi's enterprise value -- the value of all its stocks and bonds combined -- is estimated to total between $13 billion and $14 billion when it emerges from bankruptcy protection, according to stakeholders and officials who have been negotiating a restructuring for several months."

Tops Exec Says There Was No Viable Offer To Buy Ohio Stores. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (10/21, Cho) reported, "Tops Markets LLC insists there was never a financially viable offer to buy all 46 of its grocery stores in Northeast Ohio. John Barrett, a senior vice president for Tops Markets in Williamsville, N.Y., said if Tops had received what it considered a legitimate proposal to keep all its stores open and hire all 4,000-plus employees, it would have taken it." Barrett's remarks "came at a meeting Friday with U.S. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, who is raising antitrust questions about Tops' decision to sell 18 of the stores to its principal competitor, Giant Eagle Inc."

High Court To Hear Weyerhaeuser Argument On Illegal Monopoly Ruling. The Oregonian (10/21, Rivera) reported, "The US Supreme Court will hear arguments next month about a ruling that Oregon and seven other states say is critical in stopping big companies from getting away with illegal monopolies in forest products, agriculture and high-tech goods. Attorneys general from Oregon, California, Arizona, Iowa, Louisiana, Montana, West Virginia and Wisconsin recently submitted a court brief that comes down against an argument by Weyerhaeuser Co., the timber giant. The case led to a $79 million judgment against Weyerhaeuser, prompting settlements and judgments totaling about another $50 million. The states did not explicitly support a 2003 Portland federal jury verdict that found Weyerhaeuser had created an illegal monopoly in the market for alder sawlogs. But they wrote stridently against a tough new legal standard for antitrust plaintiffs that Weyerhaeuser is seeking. Rejection of Weyerhaeuser's argument and adoption of a more lenient one, the states wrote, could bar a single firm from dominating government timber auctions, protect small businesses and ensure competition for government contracts."

Avaya Faces Federal Antitrust Suit. The AP (10/21, Johnson) reported, "Business communications systems provider Avaya is accused in a federal antitrust lawsuit of illegally blocking competitors from providing maintenance and repairs to telephone equipment and software sold by Avaya. Continuant of Fife, Wash., which operates a telephone system maintenance business throughout North America, said Wednesday that it countersued Bernards-based Avaya after the AT&T spinoff sued Continuant this summer. The two parties are scheduled to appear in federal court in Trenton, where the two lawsuits were filed, for a hearing Nov. 14."

Technical Glitch Mars Meeting On Vista Operating System. The IDG News Service (10/21, McMillan) reported, "Security vendors looking to gain insight into Microsoft's plans for opening up the Vista operating system kernel were frustrated Thursday morning when a technical glitch kept many from joining the first online discussion of this issue. … Microsoft set up the meeting to talk about how it plans to give security vendors access to

DOJ_NMG_0084381

Vista's kernel on 64-bit systems. This has been a contentious issue, as Microsoft had initially planned to lock software vendors such as Symantec and McAfee out of the kernel, claiming that this would make Vista more secure. The security vendors said this would harm their products, and Microsoft finally capitulated, after first being warned by European Union regulators. Microsoft rescheduled its Thursday morning Web conference after it realized it had sent out a bad LiveMeeting link to participants, but in the end some security vendors were shut out of the meeting."

Vista Fight Pits Microsoft Against Vendors. The AP (10/21, Robertson) reports that the fight over Microsoft's Vista operating system pits the company "against an unlikely adversary: the security software vendors who are some of its most intimate partners in protecting its notoriously vulnerable systems from attacks. As Vista's planned release nears, the company is facing a backlash from such vendors as Symantec Corp. and McAfee Inc., which argue that even the concessions Microsoft recently made to appease European antitrust regulators won't do enough to help them best protect their customers."

Gartner Analyst Says Antitrust Changes To Vista Will Take Years To Complete. CNET News (10/21, Evers) reported, "Antitrust related changes to security in Windows Vista 64-bit will take years to complete and will cause compatibility trouble in the interim," according to Gartner analyst Neil MacDonald. CNET added, "Users of security technologies such as host intrusion-prevention systems, or HIPS, should postpone buying 64-bit versions of Vista, Gartner analyst Neil MacDonald wrote in a research note published on Wednesday. MacDonald also noted that many integrated security products today include HIPS functionality."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Solar Services Companies Provide Cleaner Energy To Corporations. The New York Times (10/21, Deutsch, 1.21M) reports that one solution "a small but growing number of other companies and municipalities" have adopted to avoid high investment costs in solar power is to get "solar energy from systems installed by others. Even though the installations are right on their own roofs, they buy the electricity much as they would from a utility's grid. And because the companies that paid for the systems will get a steady income, they can provide power from the sun at competitive electricity rates." One example is a G.M.'s parts warehouse in Cucamonga, Calif., which "has been host to a photovoltaic array with the ability to generate as much as 1.5 million kilowatt hours of electricity a year." The Times notes, "A solar developer called Developing Energy Efficient Roof Systems…bought the equipment with money it raised from private financiers. Deers and its investors own the cells; G.M. signed a long-term contract to purchase the solar-generated electricity from them, at a discount to the prevailing rate for electricity in the region."

Homeowner Touts Benefits Of Personal Solar-Hydrogen Energy System. ABC World News (10/20, story 9, 2:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "While the ups and downs of energy prices make a big difference to millions of families, what if you didn't care because your energy bills were zero? Today, one man in New Jersey, unhooked from the power grid forever." ABC describes how Mike Strizki has installed a "homemade, pollution-free power plant. And it will run his home using only sunlight and water." Strizki also has a fuel cell car, "also powered with homemade hydrogen. As a working prototype, the system was not cheap. $150,000 paid for with a utility grant. But Mike is quick to point out that early computers were also big and expensive."

Study Warns Of Extreme Weather Caused By Global Warming. The Washington Post/AP (10/21, A2, Borenstein) reports, "The world -- especially the Western United States, the Mediterranean region and Brazil -- is likely to suffer more extended droughts, heavy rainfalls and longer heat waves over the next century because of global warming, a new study" of nine computer models by the National Center for Atmospheric Research forecasts. Yet, "the prediction of a future of nasty extreme weather also includes fewer freezes and a longer growing season."

WSJ Dismisses Concerns Over Growing Population's Strain On Resources. The Wall Street Journal (10/21, A8, 2.03M) editorializes, "At bottom, the debate over population revolves around a single question: Are human beings a burden, or a resource?" The world has escaped pessimistic prognostications because of "prosperity" as "economic growth has easily outstripped population growth, giving the U.S., and much of the rest of the world, both more people and more prosperity, something presumed to be impossible by the Malthusians. Meanwhile, the slowdown in population growth brings a whole new set of challenges. To meet them, America and the world will need more minds generating new ideas. Four hundred million, here we come."

DOJ_NMG_0084382

Court Limits Feds' Authority At Indian Casinos. The AP (10/21, Werner) reports, "The federal government can't make rules for the ways Las Vegas-style games are played at Indian casinos, an appeals court ruled Friday in a blow to efforts to regulate the booming, $22 billion tribal gambling industry. The decision by a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit arises from a dispute in Arizona between the Colorado River Indian Tribes and the National Indian Gaming Commission, the federal agency that oversees Indian casinos. The commission tried in 2001 to audit the tribe's casino in Parker, Ariz., to ensure compliance with recently enacted federal standards for how games like blackjack and slot machines are run. The tribe objected, contending the commission was overstepping its authority under the National Indian Gaming Regulatory Act. A federal district court sided with the tribe, and the appeals court agreed in an 11-page ruling. While federal law gives the gaming commission some authority over games like lotto and bingo on Indian land, the big moneymakers like blackjack and slots…are outside the commission's jurisdiction, said the ruling written by Judge A. Raymond Randolph."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Face Sentencing In January On Gun Trafficking Charges. The Knoxville News Sentinel (TN) (10/21, Satterfield) reported that George Manus and Timothy Cobb pleaded guilty in US District Court to gun trafficking charges and face sentencing in January. The Sentinel reported, "In paperwork prepared as part of their pleas, Assistant U.S. Attorney Tracee Plowell described a profitable gun peddling business where the only thing that mattered was cash. … Manus and Cobb were nabbed as part of a US Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives probe. It isn't the first time the ATF has gone after flea market gun dealers. The agency headed a roundup of more than a dozen unlicensed dealers in 2002."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Back Aide Suspended Over Suspicion Of NIE Leak. The New York Times (10/21, Shane, 1.21M) reports, "The senior Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee yesterday sharply protested the chairman's decision to suspend a Democratic staff member's access to classified information in a leak inquiry. The congresswoman, Jane Harman of California, called the action a groundless act of political retaliation." She "said [Chairman Peter] Hoekstra had admitted to her that his action against [Larry] Hanauer was payback for her release on Tuesday of a report on actions by former Representative Randy Cunningham while he was on the Intelligence Committee."

The Washington Post (10/21, A4, Pincus, 748K) reports that Hoekstra's act, "which has drawn sharp criticism from Democratic panel members, was described by legislators of both parties as another example of the increased partisan infighting that has damaged the workings of the intelligence panel during this election year." Attorney Jonathan Turley represents Hanauer and "said there was 'not a single scintilla of evidence suggesting that Mr. Hanauer had any role in the leaking of the NIE.'"

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Miller, 918K) reports that the dispute "reflects a major deterioration in relations on a committee that traditionally has sought to avoid partisan clashes. One congressional official said the committee was in 'meltdown.'" Hoekstra "was angered earlier this week when Harman publicly released an unclassified summary of an internal committee investigation into abuses by former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham." The Washington Times/AP (10/21) reports that Hoekstra "said the step was the least aggressive he could take while the committee investigates."

Bush Urges Republicans To Tout Medicare Drug Benefit. The AP (10/21, Freking) reports President Bush "said Friday that Republicans are missing an opportunity if they're not talking up the Medicare drug benefit while campaigning this election season. 'I think this is a fantastic program, but more importantly, so do the seniors,' he said in an interview with The Associated Press. The drug program was rife with problems at the outset, but reports indicate that in recent months it has been operating smoothly.

DOJ_NMG_0084383

The administration estimates that the average elderly or disabled person will save about $1,100 annually on medicine. Polls indicate that most participants are satisfied. 'My own view is our candidates and the people who voted for this ought to be out there traveling to senior centers all over their districts and their state saying, "Look what we did,"' Bush said."

Gerson Defends Bush's "Compassionate Conservatism." The Wall Street Journal's Naomi Schaefer Riley (10/21, A8) writes, "two questions have frothed up within the recesses of the GOP… : Has compassionate conservatism worked? And should Republicans try it again? … Perhaps the best person to sort out this business is" President Bush's former speechwriter Michael Gerson. Gerson "is plotting a book about the future of conservatism. He has been giving a lot of thought to its history. Known around the White House as 'Mr. Compassionate Conservatism,' Mr. Gerson tells me: 'I think it's a political truth that one reason we won the 2000 election was that Republicans finally had a message on education and welfare. In 2008, they will have to have something other than a simplistic antigovernment message.'" Gerson "asserts that the president has been nothing if not honest about where he comes down in that argument. 'It should not have surprised anyone that President Bush was going to sign on to the Medicare prescription-drug benefit because he campaigned on it in 1999. And it should not have surprised anyone that he was going to define a federal role in education to raise standards because it was one of his main promises as a candidate."

Pelosi's Refusal To Negotiate With GOP Credited With Boosting Democrats. Three prominent US newspapers publish reports on the possibility that House Minority Leader could become Speaker. The Washington Post (10/21, A1, Romano, 748K), in a front-page article titled, "The Woman Who Would Be Speaker," reports, "On election night 2004, Nancy Pelosi faced a painful reality: Her party was again a big loser. … Pundits were suggesting Pelosi should accept her fate as the leader of a permanent House minority." But Pelosi "had a different idea. Instead, she reached out to advertising executives, Internet moguls and language specialists to ask how Democrats could rise from the ashes and challenge President Bush and the Republicans. The advice that came back was unabashed: 'You must take him down' and then hammer away at the differences between the two parties, Pelosi recalled. Today the Democrats appear capable of taking back leadership of the House…for reasons largely beyond Pelosi's control. … Nevertheless, if the Democrats win, experts say, much credit is due this 66-year-old woman, whose notable fundraising abilities (she raised $50 million this election cycle) and scorched-earth strategy of refusing to negotiate with the GOP have put her on track to become the first woman to be speaker of the House."

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Fiore, 918K) reports Democrats "need to gain 15 seats to take control, and Pelosi falls asleep at night crunching the numbers. It is her single burning obsession to lead her party to victory, and she devotes nearly every waking minute to it, coaching candidates, raising money and calculating in which districts to spend it. In three years as minority leader she has raised record amounts of cash and preached party unity that has helped bring 201 unruly Democrats to the brink of power."

Blue Dogs Claim They Will Exert Moderating Influence Over Democratic Majority. The Washington Post (10/21, A6, Weisman, 748K) reports, "If Democrats win control in November…Pelosi has decided to award committee chairmanships based almost entirely on seniority, ensuring that the House would feature far more minority faces, and some liberal firebrands, in key posts. But, mindful of the growing power of an expanding band of Democratic moderates and conservatives," Pelosi "has assured conservative Democrats that she would personally temper the legislative impulses of her most liberal chairmen while keeping close tabs on the investigations that could dominate the final two years of the Bush presidency." Rep. Dennis Cardoza, Blue Dog coalition co-chairman, "promised that the group would be 'a moderating influence on any excesses that might be brought forth by other wings of the party.'" The Post goes on to report, "The intelligence committee remains the biggest problem. The senior Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), wants the chairmanship and has the strong backing of the Blue Dogs. But personal friction between Harman and Pelosi virtually ensures that Harman will not remain on the committee, according to lawmakers and aides close to Pelosi."

Congress Urged To Overhaul Medical Records System. ABC World News (10/20, story 7, 2:20,Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Today, ABC is wrapping up a week of reports exploring ways to improve health care in America. How to make it better, more affordable, more available. Our medical editor, Dr. Timothy Johnson, has been a guiding force behind this series. … Is there one thing that we could do right now that would improve care and bring down costs?" Dr. Timothy Johnson: "Absolutely. That would be introducing an electronic, computerized record-keeping system to replace the sloppy, wasteful paperwork system we have right now. Not only could that lower cost. But it would more importantly improve quality. The best systems in this country already do it. The government has to take the lead on this. They have the clout. They could pass legislation. It's bipartisan. Leaders in both parties say they want to do it. They need to stop talking and do it."

DOJ_NMG_0084384

White House Aides Among Members Of Prominent Young Republican Group. The New York Times (10/21, Schaefer, 1.21M) describes how the "Swine on the Vine, of the Capital Club, a Washington group of 100 politically connected young men," use parties to release stress from working in the Capitol. The Times notes, "Among the club members and their guests, most in their 20's and 30's, were White House staff members. … Barbara and Jenna Bush have been known to show up at some of the parties." They "in some cases are wired right into the brain trust at the White House: the Republican lobbying firm DCI Group, which has strong ties to the Republican Party chairman Ken Mehlman and the White House senior adviser Karl Rove, has sponsored its parties. But club members insist their gatherings are not about networking or advancing anyone's career or political agenda." Among other former notable members is "Billy Bush, President Bush's cousin and a host of 'Access Hollywood.'"

Paulson Sells Manhattan Condo For Almost $8 Million. Bloomberg (10/21, Crenson) reports, "U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson…sold his 50th floor condominium near Manhattan's Lincoln Center for almost $8 million, according to public records." Bloomberg adds, "The median price for four-bedroom Manhattan apartments like Paulson's was just under $7 million in the third quarter, according to Miller Samuel Inc., the borough's largest appraiser."

NYT Criticizes Administration's Space Policy. The New York Times (10/21, 1.21M) editorializes, "The Bush administration has adopted a jingoistic and downright belligerent tone toward space operations. In a new 'national space policy' posted without fanfare on an obscure government Web site, and in recent speeches, it has signaled its determination to be pre-eminent in space…while opposing any treaties that might curtail any American action there." It "is being portrayed as a modest extension of the Clinton administration's space policy issued a decade ago." Yet "the more aggressive tone of the Bush policy may undercut international cooperation on civilian space projects -- a goal to which the new policy subscribes -- or set off an eventual arms race in space." And it "reflects the worst tendencies of the Bush administration -- a unilateral drive for supremacy and a rejection of treaties."

WPost Decries Wasteful Federal Farm Subsidies. The Washington Post (10/21, A18, 748K), in an editorial, states that a Post investigation of farm subsidies reveals "billions of federal dollars" are "wasted in unfair and uncompetitive handouts, many of which go to farmers working land that would be left fallow in a freer market." In response, "North Dakota farmer Terry Aronson unpretentiously defended the system to Post reporters. 'Taxpayers are funding something good, the rural life.' Yet most Americans -- removed from 'the rural life' in urban and suburban communities -- pay not only the opportunity cost of funneling money to farmers but also the incalculable costs of failed trade talks, which hurt the American consumer. America has a sentimental attachment to its farmlands. But preserving the rural life of a few, unproductive farmers is not worth the price it pays to do it."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Down Slightly After Record-Setting Week. The Washington Post/AP (10/21, D1, Paradis) reports, "Wall Street ended a record-setting week narrowly mixed Friday, with the Dow Jones industrial average falling to close at slightly more than 12,000 after a lackluster profit report and forecast from Caterpillar Inc. prompted many investors to retreat." Ryan Beck & Co. chief investment officer Joe Battipaglia "contends that while earnings reports have been sound over all companies are coming in with more guarded forecasts. He also is concerned that falling oil prices could indicate the economy is slowing too quickly."

DOJ_NMG_0084385

The Wall Street Journal (10/21, B1, Hudson, 2.03M) says, "After 10 upward moves in the last 14 trading sessions, some market watchers think the Dow industrials are poised to take a breather, at least for the short term." The Journal notes, "The stock market is 'still nervous and jittery and will likely be so for the next week or so, until we're done with earnings season,' said Brian Reynolds, chief market strategist for M.S. Howells, a Scottsdale, Ariz., brokerage firm. 'Eventually we'll work through that and start moving up again.'"

Bloomberg (10/21, Baker) reports, "U.S. stocks preserved their fourth straight weekly gain as earnings at Google Inc. and 3M Co. beat analysts' estimates and oil dropped below $57 a barrel, lifting companies that depend on consumer spending." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "slid 9.36, or 0.1 percent, to 12,002.37" and the S&P 500 Index "rose 1.64, or 0.1 percent, to 1368.60. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 1.36, or 0.1 percent, to 2342.30." Bloomberg adds, "For the week, the S&P 500 increased 0.2 percent, while the Dow average gained 0.4 percent and the Nasdaq fell 0.6 percent."

OPEC Seeks To Cut Supply As Oil Prices Continue To Fall. ABC World News (10/20, story 8, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "As oil prices keep falling, OPEC, today, vowed to cut supply. But prices just fell some more. At an emergency meeting, OPEC announced plans to cut production by 1.2 million barrels a day, about 4%. But with traders skeptical that OPEC members will actually stick to the deal, oil closed down almost $2 a barrel to under $57."

Bloomberg (10/21, Shenk) reports, "OPEC's cutback was larger than the reduction that ministers had been talking about for the past two weeks and was endorsed by OPEC's biggest producer, Saudi Arabia, which will trim output by 380,000 barrels a day." Energy Security Analysis Inc. analyst Rick Mueller said, "A cut of 1 million barrels was factored in so it looks like they decided to cut more to get the market's attention. … I doubt there will be a dramatic up-tick in prices because inventories are so high and uncertainty about what the members will actually cut."

The Washington Post (10/21, D1, Mufson, 748K) says, "If yesterday was a test of the power of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, the cartel flunked." The Post notes, "Oil traders and analysts said they remained unconvinced that OPEC members would have enough discipline to trim production by more than half the amount announced. And it remained unclear whether that smaller amount would be enough to stabilize prices as OPEC hopes." Meanwhile, decreasing oil prices "continued to provide a boost to the U.S. economy, especially for companies sensitive to fuel prices."

Texas Judge Avoids Reprimand For Support Of Miers. The New York Times (10/21, Blumenthal, 1.21M) reports Texas Supreme Court judge Nathan. Hecht, "who championed a longtime friend and fellow Republican, Harriet E. Miers, for the United States Supreme Court last year was cleared Friday of charges that his efforts had violated state rules of judicial ethics." He "had received a public admonition, the mildest form of sanction, from the State Commission on Judicial Conduct. It said he had discredited the judiciary by giving about 120 interviews that amounted to an endorsement of another candidate and a lending of judicial prestige to a private interest." Yet "three appellate justices appointed as a Special Court of Review to hear Justice Hecht's appeal overturned the reprimand, which had carried no civil or criminal penalty." The AP (10/21, Brown) reports similar details.

Bush Makes Surprise Appearance At Italian-American Event. The AP (10/21, Riechmann) reports President Bush "made a surprise appearance Friday night at a National Italian American Foundation dinner show featuring Frankie Valli and the Four Seasons." Bush "recognized famous faces in the audience, including Justices Samuel Alito Jr. and Antonin Scalia," but "then his remarks turned serious. Bush recognized one prominent Italian American, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who was missing from the annual gathering that attracted more than 1,000 people to a Washington hotel." Bush said, "We're in a titanic struggle between extremists and radicals who cannot stand the way of life of America. … They don't like the thought that people from different backgrounds are able to live under a nation and work together and achieve greatness. They can't stand the thought of free societies flourishing in their midst."

RNC Ad References LBJ's "Daisy Ad." NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 7, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Republican National Committee is out with a new campaign ad and when some political veterans first saw it, it reminded them of something. The ad, which shows a series of images and threats from al Qaeda contains the following wording on the screen. At the end of the ad, 'these are the stakes.' Well, when some politicos laid eyes on the ad it reminded them of something from a few decades ago. That there, the voice of President Lyndon Johnson, and the famous 'daisy ad' designed to scare people away from Goldwater in 1964. … The R.N.C. has only purchased about $20,000 in airtime. They're hoping for news media exposure to provide free airtime."

DOJ_NMG_0084386

GOP Airs Ads Claiming Democrats Endanger Children In Response To Foley Scandal. The AP (10/21, Kuhnhenn) reports "in this political ad, the message is in the faceless voices of cheerful children engaged in mayhem. 'Hit the hooker with the tire iron!' 'Steal the old lady's car.' 'Shoot her first!' The ad accuses a Democratic candidate of voting against banning the sale of violent and sexually explicit video games to children. Another ad, in Connecticut, says a Democrat voted to permit convicted sex offenders in public housing. Yet another, in Arizona, linked a candidate's work as a lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union to the ACLU's defense of a pedophile's group. In the fallout from former Rep. Mark Foley's electronic sex scandal, Republicans are turning the tables on Democrats, airing ads and leveling public accusations claiming their opponents have failed to protect children against sexual imagery, sexual violence or sexual predators." The AP adds, "The ad featuring children playing a violent video game is aimed at Rep. Baron Hill, a Democrat and former House member who is trying to recapture his seat from Republican Rep. Mike Sodrel. It cites Hill's vote in 1999 against an amendment to a juvenile crime bill that would have prohibited the sale of violent and sexually explicit movies and video games to teenagers."

Democrats' Religious Outreach More Focused Than In Years Past. The Washington Post (10/21, B9, Burke, 748K) reports on a meeting of the House Democrats' Faith Working Group. According to the Post, "As Democrats seek to reframe America's debate over moral values and close their 'God gap' with religious communities, conversations such as these are blowing like a mighty wind through party circles. Gone are the days when 'faith outreach' meant visiting African-American churches two weeks before an election, party leaders say. Instead, Democrats are seeking -- and getting -- regular meetings with megachurch pastors T.D. Jakes, Joel Osteen and Rick Warren. Rather than cede red states to Republicans, the party is buying airtime on Christian radio stations, with the message that Democrats are indeed a party with deep moral convictions."

Polls Said To Indicate Candidates Can Gain Votes By Moving To The Center. The Wall Street Journal's John Harwood (10/21, A2) writes, "Prevailing political wisdom holds that the only things that matter are each party's 'base' -- that there is no center anymore, and no more swing voters worth chasing. But look at what has happened among independent voters in the latest Wall Street Journal/NBC Poll1, taken this past week: Support for Republicans has collapsed. Just 24% of them say they want President Bush's party to control Congress after Election Day. Independents disapprove of Mr. Bush's job performance by 2 to 1. That's a big change from 2004, when Mr. Bush and John Kerry split the votes of independents." This year "Just 5% of Republicans want Democrats to take over Capitol Hill. Just 2% of Democrats want Republicans to win." Harwood notes that Sen. Conrad Burns will try to close Jon Tester's lead "by accusing his opponent of favoring tax increases. He won't rail against 'earmarks' the way some Republicans are doing to court their disaffected right wing. In a classic appeal toward centrists, Sen. Burns will invoke his clout as an appropriations subcommittee chairman."

McCain Aiding GOP Candidates While Laying Groundwork For 2008. The Wall Street Journal (10/21, A4, Hitt, Conkey, 2.03M) reports Sen. John McCain "has capitalized in an aggressive and systematic way by using the 2006 fight for control of Congress to lay the groundwork for a probable run for the presidency in 2008. Mr. McCain is crisscrossing the country on behalf of beleaguered Republicans, tapping his position as one of his party's most popular figures at a time when the image of President Bush and other administration officials is slumping. The senator has steered $1.2 million of campaign funds so far to Republican candidates and political committees. He is enlisting influential grass-roots supporters in Iowa and New Hampshire, pivotal early battlegrounds in the presidential-nomination fight. And he is firing up the party's conservative foot soldiers, picking a fight with New York Sen. Hillary Clinton…over whether her husband's administration took adequate steps to contain North Korea's nuclear ambitions." McCain "has plans to campaign almost daily through Nov. 7. … Embattled Republican candidates campaigning with Mr.

DOJ_NMG_0084387

McCain…are benefiting from his carefully cultivated image as an iconoclast who nonetheless remains loyal to the party."

Clinton Faces Questions Concerning Her Presidential Ambitions During Debate. The New York Times (10/21, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports, "Facing a barrage of questions about her national ambitions during the first Senate debate on Friday night, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton firmly maintained that she was focused on her work in Congress and had made no decisions about running for president. But her Republican opponent [John Spencer] seized on her aspirations at every opening, accusing her of already abdicating her responsibilities to New York." The AP (10/20, Humbert) reports Clinton "acknowledged that she has thought about running for the presidency in 2008, but said she is committed to running for Senate re-election. 'As you might guess, I've been asked that a few times before,' she said of her possible White House aspirations. 'I am focused on this election. I am focused on my work in the Senate. Obviously, people are talking about whether I will or should be running for president, and I'm flattered by that.'" The New York Times (10/21, Pérez-peña, 1.21M) reports, "on the question hanging over the race, and the first to arise in the debate — will Mrs. Clinton, a Democrat, run for president in 2008? — there is no provable answer, though it would be hard to find a politically minded American without an opinion."

Edwards' Wife Apologizes To Clinton. The AP (10/21, Elliott) reports Elizabeth Edwards, wife of former Senator John Edwards, "apologized to Sen. Hillary Clinton after saying her choices in life have made her happier than the senator, a Clinton aide said Friday. Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Elizabeth Edwards called the New York Democrat on Friday night. … 'Elizabeth Edwards called her and apologized,' Wolfson said. 'They had a good conversation.' Wolfson said the two spoke only for a couple of minutes. 'The senator thanked her for the call and wished her well on her book tour,' Wolfson said. The apology followed remarks by Elizabeth Edwards on Thursday at a luncheon sponsored by Ladies' Home Journal. 'She and I are from the same generation,' she said of the senator and former first lady. 'We both went to law school and married other lawyers, but after that we made other choices. I think my choices have made me happier. I think I'm more joyful than she is.'"

Lieberman Has 17 Point Lead In New Poll. The New York Times (10/21, Medina, 1.21M) reports Sen. Joseph Lieberman "won the backing of a top Republican in the Senate on Friday as Howard Dean traveled here to rally Democrats behind Ned Lamont's effort to unseat Mr. Lieberman." Lieberman "appeared at the New London City Pier with Senator Susan M. Collins, a Republican from Maine, to highlight the need for port security — and to campaign together." Dean "appeared at a sports bar in the state capital to rally support for Mr. Lamont and other Democratic candidates, including John DeStefano, the mayor of New Haven, who is running for governor, and Christopher S. Murphy, who is trying to unseat Congresswoman Nancy L. Johnson, a Republican." The Times notes yesterday's "release of a Quinnipiac University poll that showed Mr. Lamont trailing Mr. Lieberman by 17 percentage points, widening a 10-point lead he held in a Quinnipiac poll last month. The poll showed a 52 to 35 lead among likely voters and was conducted from Tuesday through Thursday. It had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points. The Republican candidate for the Senate, Alan Schlesinger, trailed with 6 percent of the vote. Another 7 percent said they were undecided."

Ford Disrupts Corker News Conference. The AP (10/21, Rucker) reports Rep. Harold Ford Jr. "turned up at a news conference Friday in Memphis called by his opponent, Republican Bob Corker, leading to a confrontation about Ford's large, politically active family." Corker "has questioned the work of Ford's father, former U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Sr., as a lobbyist for Fannie Mae while Ford Jr. sat on the House committee overseeing the mortgage giant's activities. Ford Jr. said that no one in his family has ever lobbied him on congressional issues and that he would refuse them if they did. Corker had scheduled the Friday morning news conference at a Memphis airport to discuss a proposal to prohibit relatives of senators and representatives from lobbying their family members." Ford "told Corker that he wanted to debate him on the Iraq war, then mentioned Ford's plan to partition Iraq into three regions. But then Corker stopped him and said he had come to talk about ethics. Corker called Ford's visit to the news conference 'a true sign of desperation.'"

NRSC's Ad Tying Ford To Playboy Party Described. The Financial Times (10/21, Daniel) reports, "The Republican attack advertisement starts with a clip from the rival candidate's campaign. It shows Harold Ford, sitting in church, saying he will not be painted as someone he is not. 'Fair enough,' intones the announcer. 'So what kind of man parties with Playboy playmates in lingerie, then films political ads from a church pew?' Cue: images of Mr Ford, the Democrat candidate for a Tennessee Senate seat, with James Bond-style silhouettes of Playboy bunnies, to highlight his hypocrisy. … The national Republican senatorial committee paid for the Ford ad. When Bob Corker, the candidate, was asked, he demurred: 'I haven't seen the ad.'"

DOJ_NMG_0084388

Allen And Webb Seen As Avoiding Immigration Debate. The Washington Post (10/21, B5, Brulliard, 748K) reports Allen and James Webb "have stark differences on" immigration. Allen "brooks no sympathy for illegal immigrants and favors guest-worker plans." Webb "supports legalization for some immigrants and opposes broad programs for temporary foreign labor. Analysts say the relative absence of immigration in the race reflects the increasingly tricky proposition of campaigning on polarizing topics, especially in a traditionally conservative state with a changing political landscape. In recent elections, Northern Virginia voters' allegiance has shifted toward Democrats. Studies show that Virginia's illegal immigrant population has swelled in recent years and that growth has been densest in Northern Virginia. Herndon voters this spring ousted Town Council members who backed a hiring site for immigrant day laborers, but Republican Jerry W. Kilgore lost the Northern Virginia suburbs -- and the governor's race -- after a campaign in which he vowed, among other things, to crack down on illegal immigrants."

Wilder Offer Webb Advice. The Washington Times (10/21, A1, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Richmond Mayor Douglas Wilder, "a former governor and one of the state's leading Democrats, has some advice for" Webb – "let voters know what you stand for. 'The question is, what reasons will Jim Webb give people to vote for him,' Mr. Wilder, 75, told The Washington Times. 'There are so many people in the middle that want to have a reason to lean this way or that.' Mr. Wilder has yet to endorse anyone in Virginia's U.S. Senate contest."

Talent Handicapped By National GOP's Difficulties. NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 6, 3:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Missouri -- always a political bellwether state and the Senate race there is no exception. … Unhappiness with the war in Iraq and Washington in general making things difficult for the Republican incumbent" Sen. Jim Talent, who is "in the political fight of his life. … His challenger, Democrat Claire McCaskill, now making serious headway by highlighting talent support for president Bush and the war in Iraq." Talent "doesn't dispute that the souring mood toward republicans nationally may hurt. … But his opponent McCaskill is also benefiting from a local initiative on the ballot to allow stem cell research. Polls show most in Missouri support it. So does McCaskill, but Talent is opposed."

Democrats' Find Success Targeting Open Seats. The New York Times (10/21, Hulse, 1.21M) reports, "Ed Perlmutter, a former Democratic state senator, has had other opportunities to run for the House seat representing the district around Denver, but he waited until this year, when the Republican incumbent decided to run for governor rather than seek re-election. … In the age of gerrymander, the open seat — one where incumbents step aside because of age, ambition, scandal or other considerations — is a rare but sometimes golden opportunity for one party to wrest control from the other. This year, Democrats like Mr. Perlmutter are taking full advantage, giving their party a potentially vital edge in the battle for control of the House." The Times continues, "This year, there are 33 open House seats, including three that are vacant at the moment but had been held steadily by one party, and polls suggest that Democrats have a good chance to capture enough Republican-held districts to put them well on their way to tilting the balance of power in Washington. Surveys show Mr. Perlmutter in command of his race against his Republican opponent, Rick O'Donnell, in the contest to succeed Representative Bob Beauprez, a Republican who is running for governor. In races for 20 other Republican open seats, recent polls show the Democrat leading in at least 8, putting the party more than halfway to the 15 seats needed to capture the House. Just one of 12 Democratic open seats appears at risk, and even that is considered a long shot."

Tight House Races In Indiana Feature Vulnerable GOP Incumbents. The New York Times (10/21, Purnick, 1.21M) reports Indiana "has become an unexpected battleground in this year's Congressional elections. Three of the state's seven Republican members of Congress are locked in tough races, with the campaigns drawing big money and big names from both parties." Rep.

DOJ_NMG_0084389

Chris Chocola "and the Democrat, Joe Donnelly, a lawyer and businessman, are in a race that was never supposed to be so close, though the district has elected Democrats in the past. The economy and immigration loom as large as Iraq in this blue-collar district. Many auto-parts plants have closed or been cut back. Workers are nervous, and some say that Mr. Chocola does not understand their predicament because he is independently wealthy." Rep. John Hostettler "is invariably described an unorthodox public official who does as he likes, from voting against the Iraq war to taking a loaded gun into the Louisville airport two years ago. … Political analysts say Mr. Hostettler has been more unorthodox than usual, campaigning and fund-raising less aggressively than might be expected, given his opposition — the telegenic sheriff of Vanderburgh County, Brad Ellsworth." In IN9 "the race is a rubber match, an unusually personal fight between two candidates with distinctly different styles — Representative Mike Sodrel, a Republican who two years ago beat the same Democratic opponent, Baron Hill, a former two-term congressman."

Working Families Party Campaigns For Three Democratic House Candidates. The New York Times (10/21, Confessore, 1.21M) reports, "Even by the Lilliputian standards of minor political parties, the Working Families Party has typically played the part of feisty underdog. Only four states list the party on their ballots, and even in New York, where it is based and most active, Working Families usually draws far fewer voters than rivals like the Conservative Party or the Independence Party. … The party is focusing on unaffiliated voters in New York's 24th and 29th Congressional Districts and Connecticut's 5th Congressional District, which all have a Democratic candidate cross-endorsed by the Working Families Party."

GOP House Candidate Investigated Over Immigrant Threats. The New York Times (10/21, Chang, 1.21M) reports California state investigators "searched the offices of a Republican Congressional candidate, a day after he acknowledged that a campaign worker was responsible for a letter sent to as many as 14,000 Latino residents in an effort to keep them from the polls. The candidate, Tan Nguyen, left, will stay in the race against the incumbent, Loretta Sanchez, even though the Republican Party has urged him to withdraw, said his lawyer, David Wiechert. Mr. Nguyen has denied having any knowledge of the letter, which stated that immigrants could be jailed if they voted." The Los Angeles Times' Dana Parsons (10/21) writes, "It is truly a new day in Orange County, where a generation ago the previous Republican Party leadership would have tabbed Nguyen as an up-and-comer with a good head on his shoulders."

Ehrlich And O'Malley Concentrate On GOTV Efforts. The Washington Post (10/21, A1, Mosk, Barnes, 748K) reports that in 2002 Maryland Democrats "headed into the final stretch of a heated governor's race without much of a message to get their supporters to the polls, and there was a pointed lack of enthusiasm from black voters, the party's most loyal supporters. The Democrats got clobbered. … Democrats are determined to make this year different, said" top Democrats supporting Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley's "bid to retake the governor's office from Republican Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. This time, both Ehrlich and O'Malley have elaborate plans, in the works for more than a year, to maximize turnout that are the centerpiece of a two-week sprint to Election Day." The Post notes, "For Republicans, the task is more complicated. Because Democrats hold a nearly 2 to 1 edge on voter rolls, Ehrlich can't afford to merely try to drive more people to the polls. He needs to motivate his supporters to show up Nov. 7 while doing nothing to energize those backing his opponent."

Republican Governors Association Targets O'Malley's Record In Baltimore. The Washington Post (10/21, B4, Rich, 748K) reports O'Malley "may be the target but Baltimore also takes a beating in a television ad launched yesterday by the Republican Governors Association, a 30-second tableau of urban decay that declares Maryland's largest municipality 'the most dangerous city in America.' The ad, the first the group has aired in the state, features footage of a cemetery and a crime scene. The camera bounces erratically as the images lose and regain focus. The schools are in shambles, a female voice says, and the homicide rate is six times higher than New York City's. 'Baltimore,' the voice says, 'Martin O'Malley's legacy of mismanagement. And now he wants a promotion so he can do for the entire state of Maryland what he did for Baltimore.'"

Maryland Legislator Receives Stolen Voting Machine Software. The Washington Post (10/21, B1, Barr, 748K) reports, "A Maryland election official said yesterday that possibly stolen computer disks believed to be electronic voting software were 'apparently produced' for use by a testing firm hired by the Maryland legislature in November 2003. … Documents indicate that the disks were sent to Maryland so Raba Technologies Inc. could assess the security of the state's electronic voting system, which is provided by Diebold Election Systems. … Labels on the disks indicate that they contain the versions of two Diebold programs that powered electronic voting machines in Maryland in 2004, Goldstein said Thursday. Diebold said one version of one program is still in use in some jurisdictions elsewhere in the United States. Cheryl C. Kagan, a former Maryland delegate who has questioned the security of electronic voting systems, said the disks were delivered anonymously to her office in Olney on Tuesday."

DOJ_NMG_0084390

Angelides Urges Schwarzenegger To Release Controversial Recordings. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Nicholas, 918K) reports, "In private conversations in the governor's office earlier this year, Arnold Schwarzenegger spoke with aides about the 'failure of Mexican American immigrants to assimilate into American culture' and made 'ad hominem remarks about a variety of legislators,' Phil Angelides' gubernatorial campaign said Friday. An attorney for Angelides sent a 10-page letter to Schwarzenegger aides urging them to release recordings of the governor's conversations before the Nov. 7 election. … Angelides aides know what the recordings contain because they downloaded them from the governor's website in late August. But the campaign has declined to release the tapes on its own, calling on Schwarzenegger to take that step." Schwarzenegger aides "indicated that the governor would not release the recordings, saying they are not a matter of public record."

Schwarzenegger's Reaction To Special Election Defeats Spurred His Comeback. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Nicholas, 918K) reports, "Maybe the make-or-break moment of Arnold Schwarzenegger's governorship was the morning of Nov. 10, 2005, in his hotel suite across the street from the Capitol building. He had just been walloped in the special election that he had thrust before voters, capping a year when he had fought to put in place a distinctly conservative agenda. Prepping the Republican governor for a news conference, one of his aides urged a tough stance: Don't apologize, don't give ground. Schwarzenegger did the opposite. He appeared before the cameras and conceded that he had screwed up and promised to start listening to the Democrat-dominated Legislature. So began his political resurrection. From a nadir at which he was being compared with Jesse Ventura, the pro wrestler who flamed out as governor of Minnesota after one term, Schwarzenegger rose to be the front-runner in the Nov. 7 election."

History Of "October Surprise" Described. The Washington Post (10/21, C1, Weeks, 748K) reports on the history of the "October surprise." According to the Post, two developments that have been described as this year's "surprise" are a spate of books critical of President Bush and the Johns Hopkins study released last week that purported to find that as many as 600,000 Iraqis have been killed since the beginning of the war in 2003.

Columnist Dowd Questions Obama's Desire For Presidency. Maureen Dowd in her column in the New York Times (10/21, 1.21M) writes, "So the question before us is, should Barack Obama stop lounging around in fashion magazines and do some honest work, like running for president?" Obama's "appeal combines the political ability — alien to the Bush administration — to see something from your opponent's point of view with the cool detachment of a J.F.K." Obama's "been told by Democratic leaders to think about whether he really wants to be president, or whether he's just getting swept away by people who want him to do it." Dowd ponders whether Obama wants "to be a celebrity or a man of history — or is there no longer any difference?"

LATimes Notes California Democrats Disadvantaged By Redistricting. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, 918K), in an editorial, writes, "In an election year in which grumpy voters from coast to coast are gunning for the scalps of doddering Republicans, Rep. Gary Miller (R-Diamond Bar) would seem a vulnerable target." He "has earmarked road repairs near housing developments he co-owns, declined to pay taxes on three land sales and -- in a congressional district one-quarter Latino -- wrote legislation denying citizenship to the children of illegal immigrants. But Democrats have a competitive disadvantage in unseating the four-term congressman: Miller is running for reelection unopposed. This scene is playing out throughout Southern California and the rest of the state as competitive races and even challengers are becoming endangered species. Because of a cynical bipartisan agreement after the 2000 census, Democrats and Republicans represent frequently convoluted geographical footprints meticulously designed, it would seem, to ensure that no incumbent party will ever lose another election, no matter which way the political winds are blowing."

DOJ_NMG_0084391

Chinese Leaders Assure Rice They Will Enforce North Korea Sanctions. ABC World News (10/20, story 4, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice has wrapped up her Asian tour to rally support for United Nations sanctions. Today, she was in Beijing meeting China's leaders. We reported yesterday a Chinese delegation was in North Korea. And it appears the Chinese say they will enforce the sanctions against North Korea." ABC correspondent Karl added that "there were signs today that the effort to isolate North Korea is gaining momentum. Chinese leaders assured Secretary of State Rice, they'll help enforce sanctions. And China's four biggest banks said they would suspend transfers to North Korea. A move that potentially goes further than U.N. sanctions."

In a brief story The CBS Evening News (10/20, story 3, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) noted, "Kim Jong Il reportedly told Chinese envoys that he is sorry for conducting a nuclear test nearly two weeks ago and promised he won't do it again. Just the same, he held a huge rally today to celebrate that test. While that was happening, Secretary of State Rice was in Beijing hoping to persuade the Chinese to vigorously enforce U.N. sanctions against North Korea."

NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 3, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made the most important stop on her Asia trip today to press for tougher action against North Korea for conducting a nuclear test." NBC (Mitchell) added, "She was in China and met with China's president but also with a top Chinese envoy who had just returned from North Korea where he personally delivered a tough message to Kim Jong-Il. Rice says that the Chinese official told Kim he needs to return to regional talks and should not even think about exploding a second nuclear test. Rice says that China agreed to inspect North Korean cargo but that she won few hard commitments from them and contrary to earlier reports out of South Korea, Kim did not tell the Chinese he is ready to return to talks or end the nuclear showdown."

The New York Times (10/21, Shanker, Kahn, 1.21M) reports, "The United States and China spoke in a unified voice on Friday to call for the resumption of six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear program, but they did not announce concrete steps to increase pressure on the North Korean government." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "expressed confidence that China was committed to enforcing new United Nations military sanctions on North Korea, and that a number of economic and trade measures were under review." She "also said the Beijing leadership pledged to be 'scrupulous' about ensuring that North Korea does not ship prohibited materials across its lengthy border with China." Rice added "she had been told by the Chinese government that a special envoy sent by Beijing to North Korea had delivered 'a strong message.'" He "returned from Pyongyang, where he had met with Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader. Chinese officials described the meeting as 'positive' and 'greatly significant,' but declined to provide details of what Mr. Kim had said. Accounts that "Kim had offered to resume nuclear talks under certain conditions, and said he gave assurances that he had no plans to conduct a second nuclear test," weren't "confirmed by either Chinese or American officials." Rice did stress "that North Korea should return to those talks 'without condition,' and that the financial restrictions the United States has imposed to crack down on North Korean counterfeiting would not be lifted just to entice the North back to the negotiations." Still, she added "that halting North Korea's trade in nuclear bomb-making materials and missiles would take time."

The Washington Post (10/21, A11, Kessler, 748K) adds, "China and the United States on Friday appeared to close ranks on North Korea." Rice also said, "Let's just watch and see what China will do." McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Strobel) reports that rice showed "unusual harmony with China on a key security issue." However, "senior Chinese leaders privately have expressed frustration with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il and questioned his judgment with unusual candor" and according to senior Rice aide "there's been a 'sea change' in China's attitude toward North Korea." The AP (10/21, Gearan) adds, "An exasperated China took a newly tough approach to communist ally North Korea on Friday, siding with the United States."

In contrast to the articles affirming China's cooperation with the US, the Wall Street Journal (10/21, A4, King, Fairclough, Hayashi, 2.03M) reports that "the U.S. is finding its allies are reluctant to enforce even the minimal sanctions imposed by the United Nations -- and that its own, tougher approach has serious gaps as well." The "immediate challenge" for Rice is getting "real cooperation from North Korea's neighbors. Yet she appeared to make little progress on that front during her Asia trip." South Korea is "reluctant to sign on, and members of Seoul's ruling liberal party argue that it shouldn't." The Chinese, "who are otherwise taking tough steps to crack down on North Korea, have said they may draw the line at interdicting shipments at sea," and "Japan, while more eager to crack down on Pyongyang, is severely limited by its pacifist constitution." Additionally, "getting sound intelligence on shipments is tough, especially when it is easy to disguise a vessel's identification and registration," and some U.S. officials "are wary of the consequences of stopping or seizing North Korean vessels or their cargoes at sea. One U.S. official said the military, currently fighting two wars, is short of the resources to effectively police shipping."

DOJ_NMG_0084392

In the same vein, the Los Angeles Times (10/21, Magnier, 918K) adds that as "Rice left China today for Russia, her goal of uniting Northeast Asia in a strong, unambiguous punitive stance against North Korea remained elusive." So, "with no easy answers, a wily adversary in Pyongyang, the North's capital, and limited options, Rice sought Friday to lower expectations, even as she praised China's willingness to consider tougher measures."

The Washington Times (10/21, A1, Kralev, 88K) reports that Rice said "China has been brought into the process in a way that China never was before." The paper takes a different tone from the New York Times on the claims that China "won a pledge from North Korean leader Kim Jong-il not to conduct another nuclear test and at the same time blocked bank transfers to the isolated state," reporting that "U.S. and Chinese officials stopped short of confirming the reports, saying only that Mr. Kim pledged not to escalate the situation further."

Experts Said To Worry About North Korean Nuclear Sales. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Miller, 918K) reports, "U.S. intelligence officials and weapons proliferation experts say they are concerned that North Korea could add plutonium to the extensive inventory of arms components and technologies it already has sold to such nations as Syria, Pakistan and Libya," and "some experts are more worried about the government in Pyongyang spreading nuclear technology to other 'rogue' nations than about the possibility of it launching a nuclear attack." However, they agree that such a sale "would be an extreme and dangerous step even for one of the world's most defiant regimes."

South Korea's Sunshine Policy Said To Be Ending. McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Johnson) reports, "North Korea's entry into the global nuclear club may be a coda for the sunshine policy. Some South Koreans say engagement has failed to encourage significant reform in North Korea. Others view it as appeasement, saying their nation has served as a virtual ATM for North Korea." Recent "polls show that an increasing number of South Koreans think that Seoul should stand up more firmly to Pyongyang, even as their fear of North Korea has diminished."

ABC Profiles North Korean Culture. ABC World News (10/20, story 5, 1:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "North Korea, of course, is the most-isolated nation in the world. The hermit kingdom it's called. It's nearly impossible for reporters to get inside. But this week, ABC's Diane Sawyer has been the only Western journalist there. So we asked her tonight, to share some of her impressions with us." Sawyer, added that there are signs of a nation with no money. Dark halls. Few lightbulbs. Rundown buildings. But inside, people proud of their three rooms, carpeted and pictures of Kim il-Sung and Kim Jong-il. We notice that traveling through the streets, we never once saw an obese person. We never once saw a dog or cat, either, for that matter. We are looking at two worlds, very different views and few bridges between."

UN Report Says North Korea Imprisons "Those Deemed Subnormal." The Washington Times (10/21, Mcelroy, 88K) reports that a U.N. report released yesterday says "North Korea operates a rigorous system of eugenics that locks up those deemed subnormal, ranging from the disabled to dwarfs," and are "designed to ensure that those who do not conform to the state's designation of normal do not pass on their genes by having children." Base on evidence gathered from defectors to South Korea, the report says "the afflicted are subjected to harsh and subhuman conditions. Food is scarce and of poor quality and beatings are commonplace."

US Trade Rep To Discuss Trade Disputes With China. The AP (10/21, Crutsinger) reports that Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Karan Bhatia said "China has made progress in resolving long-standing trade disputes with the United States," such as an agreement to load legal software on all new computers sold in China, "but more needs to be done in a number of areas." He added that "when he holds talks next week with Chinese trade officials in Beijing, he would review a number of commitments China made last spring," including "ways it planned to crack down on the sale of illegal, pirated computer software and expanding the opportunity for U.S. and other foreign firms to compete for Chinese government contracts."

DOJ_NMG_0084393

NYTimes Argues Bush's Excessive Borrowing Creates Vulnerabilities To China. The New York Times (10/21, 1.21M) editorializes, "America's indebtedness to China…is staggeringly high." While the Administration "seems unfazed," China's holdings' "size and growth…mean increasing vulnerability for the United States." If their lending "dried up quickly…the result could be a sharp financial crisis," but even a gradual change "could mean a long downward trend in American living standards as a higher cost of living took its toll." Also, "administration officials are concerned that developing nations, unhappy with conditions on loans from the International Monetary Fund, may decide to borrow directly from China. That would give Beijing more influence over emerging markets and their governments. To its credit, the Bush administration has repeatedly stressed that the rise of China is not to be feared or begrudged. But excessive borrowing during the Bush years has made the United States unnecessarily vulnerable."

Iran Dismisses UN Sanctions Possibility, Warns Europe Against Support For Israel. The New York Times (10/21, Fathi, 1.21M) reports that as "the United Nations Security Council is expected to begin public deliberations next week on whether to impose sanctions on Iran for defying a United Nations demand to suspend uranium-enrichment activities by the end of August," Iran's Foreign Ministry, with "its first official response to the threat of United Nations action…said in a statement that Iran would not 'remain idle if sanctions are imposed.'" At the same time, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "warned Europe…that continued support for Israel could lead to an act of revenge by those in the Middle East angry about the Palestinians' plight," although "He did not describe what revenge could entail in his speech." He also "repeated…that Iran would not give in to international demands to suspend its uranium-enrichment program and dismissed United Nations efforts to impose sanctions on Iran as illegitimate."

Israel Says Iran Bribed Hamas To Block Soldier's Release. The AP (10/21, Lederer) reports, "Israel's U.N. Ambassador Dan Gillerman told the Security Council on Thursday that 'we heard news' earlier in the day that Tehran bribed Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal 'to sabotage the negotiations on the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit and prevent his release.'" Shalit is the Israeli soldier captured by Hamas-linked militants on June 25. "Gillerman later refused to divulge the basis of the allegation or provide details." Ianian diplomat Mansour Sadeghi responded that "his government 'categorically rejected' all allegations against his country made by Israel, dismissing Gillerman's allegations as 'baseless and absurd,'" and Osama Hamdan, Hamas' representative in Lebanon, called the report 'an obvious Israeli lie.'"

Israel Said To Have Begun Hezbollah Conflict Without Strategy For Ending It. The Washington Post (10/21, A1, Wilson, 748K) reports, "An examination of the first days of the war" between Israel and Hezbollah "shows that leaders of Israel's newly elected government launched a broad military campaign without a clear strategy for how it was to end. It also reveals that while Israeli military officials anticipated an entrenched guerrilla force, front-line officers were surprised by just how well prepared Hezbollah was." Senior Israeli officers admitted "the extent of the tunnel networks, the size of the arsenal and some of the more sophisticated weapons in it were not anticipated." Two days after the counterattack began, "Israeli military and diplomatic officials were deeply split over war strategy." Their "internal consensus, trumpeted in public by Israel's leaders, crumbled" after "the research unit of Israel's military intelligence branch presented a report to senior Israeli officials that questioned the war plan's ability to achieve the government's goals."

Citing Security Concerns, Israel Restricts Muslims Entering Jerusalem To Pray At Holy Site. The New York Times (10/21, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "With Israel imposing tight restrictions on Palestinian movements, the holy month of Ramadan marks a rare occasion when large numbers of Palestinians from the West Bank can enter Jerusalem to worship at the Aksa Mosque compound, one of the most sacred sites in Islam." Although an estimated 180,000 Muslims prayed at the compound, "thousands of West Bank men who were turned back at the city's edge, some in scuffles with Israeli security forces," as "Israel, citing security concerns, only permitted West Bank men over age 45 to enter Jerusalem and the mosque compound." It "says that the huge crowds show its commitment to the freedom of worship, but insists that the restrictions are necessary to guard against possible violence at the site."

Israel's Revised Visa Policy Prevents Palestinian-Americans From Returning To West Bank. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Ellingwood, 918K) reports, "Activists say scores of Palestinians who carry foreign passports, mostly American, have been denied entry this year since Israel moved to close a loophole that once allowed residents to enter repeatedly on renewable Israeli tourist visas," and this "has created a quandary for the Palestinian Americans who remain: If they leave to get a new three-month stamp, they may not be allowed back. If they stay, their current Israeli visas will expire." U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had "raised the visa issue in meetings with Israeli officials in Jerusalem this month," and "American diplomats say they have asked Israel to explain the policy." Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, "said the change was an attempt to curb misuse of tourist visas," which "were not meant to serve as documents for Palestinian residency or work in the West Bank and Gaza Strip." However, he admits that the changed policy "is having 'unintended consequences' that officials are now trying to correct."

DOJ_NMG_0084394

US Said To Be Turning From Abbas To Rival Fatah Leader. The Washington Times (10/21, De Quetteville, 88K) reports, "Secular and tough -- some say brutal" - Mohammed Dahlan, "a member of the rival Fatah party, is being courted by U.S. diplomats eager to counter Hamas' burgeoning influence in the occupied territories." U.S. officials describe him "as a man who can 'get things done' in a violent climate. In less diplomatic terms, that means having the clout, if needed, to summon armed Palestinians into battle with Hamas." An official admits, "He can be viewed as a thug…but he is one of the very few people who has authority and can impose some order on the ground who is not from Hamas." While US officials are "outwardly backing" Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, "they privately condemn Mr. Abbas as hesitant and timid in taking on Hamas."

Brother Of Muslim Brotherhood Founder Advocates Liberal Islam. The New York Times (10/21, Slackman, 1.21M) reports that Gamal al-Banna, the brother of Sheik Hassan al-Banna, the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, "is no friend of the establishment," because he "is a liberal thinker, a man who would like to see Islamic values and practices interpreted in the context of modern times." He advocates women's rights, for example. He remains free because "he has been careful not to become involved in political movements," and his sister left him enough to live well on. He feels "Egypt, often looked to as a center of moderate Islam, is, like the rest of the Arab world, becoming more conservative and less tolerant of opposing religious views."

Administration Launches Effort To Extend Latin American Trade Deals. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Kraul, 918K) reports, "The Bush administration has a prescription for fighting coca growing, sidelining Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and saving thousands of jobs in Latin America: extending free trade for Andean nations." One "senior Bush administration official said this week that the White House would push Congress to pass a bill continuing trade benefits for Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia under a little-known law. It wants the bill passed during the 'lame-duck session' after the November elections and before the new Congress is sworn in in January -- while free-trade-friendly Republicans are still in control." So it "has mounted an 11th-hour campaign to preserve the trade perks, which have generated thousands of jobs, given birth to entire export industries and provided alternatives to drug trafficking."

EU Leaders Confront Putin On Oil Contracts. The Financial Times (10/21, Parker) reports, "European leaders on Friday night pressed Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, to honour contracts with western oil companies." At the "strained summit dinner," the "EU leaders also chided Mr Putin on questions of human rights, press freedom and Moscow's tough treatment of the former Soviet republic of Georgia." However, it only served as a reminder that "their attempt to build a more equal energy partnership with Russia has so far yielded few positive results." Putin was "implacable," and responded "that he had no intention of bowing to European demands that Russia should open Gazprom's pipelines to other companies, as required under the energy charter treaty, which Russia has signed but has not ratified." He "also issued an uncompromising warning to Georgia."

The AP (10/21, Brand) agrees that Putin "sidestepped European appeals for moderation on Georgia" and for energy security. Estonian Prime Minister Andrus Ansip said, "The European Union was speaking in one voice — one single voice — and of course, Russia wasn't speaking in the same voice."

WPost Criticize Putin, Western Leaders On Handling Of Russian Journalist's Murder. The

DOJ_NMG_0084395

Washington Post (10/21, A18, 748K) editorializes that "it's revealing to examine how Mr. Putin and his regime have behaved" in response to the murder of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya. "The president's first reaction was a strange silence." Then, when "compelled to speak…Putin offered a rote condemnation of the attack. He then disparaged Ms. Politkovskaya" and "made the ugly suggestion that foreign-based enemies of his government were somehow behind the killing." If true, "Putin's enemies also must have found a way to manipulate his own security forces," as "interior ministry operatives…who violently broke up a peaceful vigil in Ms. Politkovskaya's memory." The "other part of this story has played out with depressing predictability: the absence of any serious follow-up by Western leaders. … Sadly, Mr. Putin has been given no reason to think" that should Ms. Politkovskaya's murder remain unsolved, it will "be an obstacle to 'partnership' between Russia and Europe."

Journalist Says Russian Treatment Of Georgia Encourages Future Ethnic Hatread, Loss Of Life. Masha Lipman, editor of the Carnegie Moscow Center's Pro et Contra journal and a columnist for The Post, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (10/21, A19, 748K), "In recent years intolerance and even violent ethnic and racial crime have become increasingly common in Russia." Recently "the political conflict between Russia and Georgia has led to an ugly outburst of political xenophobia" which "s different, in a scary way. Until now, if government authorities contributed to public xenophobia it was through inaction, incompetence or irresponsibility. Now ethnic hostility is being incited by government figures -- legislators and executive officials alike" and "the message was unambiguous: Georgia and Georgians were the enemies of Russia." While "the authorities seemed to realize that things had gone too far" and "have begun to backpedal," Russia's "desire to punish Georgia has broken the fragile taboo on ethnic hostility in official language. In the xenophobic atmosphere of today's Russia, this threatens to further encourage ethnic hatred and lead to more loss of life."

Kremlin Defends Putin's Remarks About Katsav Scandal. ABC World News (10/20, story 6, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Kremlin is defending Vladimir Putin after the Russian President joked about rape and assault allegations against the Israeli President, Moshe Katsav. Meeting the Israeli prime minister, he said say hello to your President. He didn't look like a guy who would handle ten women. A Russian newspaper is conveying a more graphic version, quoting Putin saying of Katsa, 'we all envy him.' As many as ten women have complained about Katsav. The Kremlin says the meaning of Putin's remarks were lost in translation."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Schwarzenegger Story Gets Another Rewrite."
"Words They've Lived By."
"Driver Guilty of Felony in Markey Crash."
"A Champion of Black History."
"Madam Speaker? Pelosi Likes the Sound."
"Bush Open to Shift in Iraq War 'Tactics'."

New York Times:

"Militias Battle for Iraqi City as Shiite Rivalry Escalates."
"As Trust Vanishes, Many Iraqis Look to Gunmen as Protection."
"Open Seats Lift Democratic Hopes in the House."
"Anger Festering in French Areas Scarred in Riots."
"Entrees Break the $40 Barrier, and, Sorry, the Sides Cost Extra."
"Doctors Rethink Widespread Use of Heart Stents."

Washington Post:

"Bush, Rumsfeld Defend Strategy."
"The Woman Who Would Be Speaker."
"Israeli War Plan Had No Exit Strategy."
"Veil Debate in Britain is Also Divisive for Muslims."
Ehrlich O'Malley Focus on Turnout As Election Nears."
"Used Cellphones Hold Trove of Secrets That Can Be Hard to Erase."

Washington Times:

"China Wrest N. Korean Pledge."
"World Series Lifts Detroit's Morale."
"Bush Pins Label of "Defeat" Party on Democrats."
"Screen Horror Gives Guys, Girls Roles."
"Wilder Advises Webb to Make Stance Clear."
"Doing Deals on the Green."

Detroit Free Press:

"Bachynski wails over guilty verdict."
"It's time to get your Halloween costume."

DOJ_NMG_0084396

"Detroiters look for equality."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:

"One Crash Every 2.8 Minutes."
"'I said 1, 2, 3, 4, Mommy, wake up!'"
"Shiites Seize a City in Iraq."
"Karr's Arrival in Sandy Springs Met with Unease."

Dallas Morning News:

"TXU Identified as Target of State's Energy Inquiry."
"U.S. Struggling to Curb Clout of Iraqi Militias."
"DA Scoffs at Test."
"Panel Clears Justice on Ethics Charges."

Houston Chronicle:

"Homicide Rate on Track to be Worst in a Decade."
"Rival Shiite Factions Battle for Iraqi City."
Clinic is World's 1st to Target a Rare Killer."
"The Force of Humanity"
"Elders Greet Festival of Lights, Wishing Hindus a Happy Diwali."
"Drug Plan May Fill Some Gaps."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:

ABC: Administration Iraq Strategy; Iraqi Militia Threat; GOP Pressure On Administration; US-China North Korea Sanctions; North Korean Culture; Putin Israeli Remarks; Universal Health Care Reform; OPEC, Oil Prices Down; Solar Power Alternative; Caring For US Troops' Families.

CBS: Administration Iraq Pressure; US Soldiers Frustrated; US-China North Korea Sanctions; Church Response To Foley Abuser; DHS Fund Distribution Questions; Campaign Ad Preview; Elderly Driving Dangers; Cassini Saturn Pictures; Sad Message In Bottle.

NBC: Bush Iraq Policy; Maghdi Siege Of Amarrah; Rice And North Korea; Ground Zero Remains Found; Football Stadium Hoax; Missouri Senate Race; RNC Terrorism Ad; Detroit Tigers; Ballet Charity.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Unavailable.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY -- Unavailable.

US Senate: No scheduled events.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other: Oct. 14 - 23. PSYCHIATRIC SERVICES _ The Americam Psychiatric Association hosts its 2006 Institute on Psychiatric Services. Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

Oct. 16 - 21. SAFE KIDS _ Safe Kids Worldwide holds its 18th annual Leadership Conference. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW. Contacts: n/a, 202-662-0600

Oct. 19 - 21. AEROSPACE EDUCATION _ The Civil Air Patrol hosts a national aerospace education conference. Highlights:
8:15 a.m. Astronaut Robert ``Hoot'' Gibson. 8:45 a.m. President Ken Hyde Wright Flight Experience. 4:30 p.m. Asatronaut Buzz Aldrin. Location: Marriott-Crystal Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Hwy., Arlington, Va. Contacts: Jim Tynan, 334-398-3312

Oct. 19 - 21. NAVAL ORDER _ The Naval Order of the United States holds its 2006 Annual Congress Program, ``Honoring Our Navy at Normandy.'' Highlights: 12 p.m. Coast Guard Commandant Adm. Thad Allen. 7:30 p.m. Retired Navy CNO Adm. Vernon Clark receives the Distinguished Sea Service Award and makes remarks. Location: Holiday Inn Rosslyn, 1900 N. Fort Myer Dr., Arlington. Contacts: Eric Berryman, 757-270-7487

Oct. 19 - 22. EDUCATION-DRUG ABUSE _ The 20th Annual National Meeting on Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse and Violence Prevention in Higher Education will be held. Location: Hyatt Crystal City , 2799 Jefferson Davis Highway. Contacts: Jo Ann Webb, 202-401-1576.

Oct. 20 - 21. ITALIAN AMERICANS _ The National Italian American Foundation holds its 2006 Convention and 31st Anniversary Gala. showcase Italian products and services. On Saturday evening, actor Alan Alda, baseball greats Yogi Berra and Tommy Lasorda, director Mel Brooks, Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia, Chicago mayor Richard M. Daley, and singers Neil Sedaka and Jerry Vale will join more than 3,000 people from across the U.S. and Italy at the Foundations 31st Anniversary Awards Gala. Academy Award-winning actress Anne Bancroft will be posthumously inducted into the NIAF Italian American Hall of Fame. Her husband, Mel Brooks, will represent Bancroft. Gala honorees are Samuel Alito Jr., Supreme Court justice; Raffaello Follieri, chairman and CEO of Follieri Yucaipa Investments; Tom W. LaSorda, CEO and president of the Chrysler Group; Catherine B. Reynolds, chairman of the Catherine B. Reynolds Foundation, and singer Frankie Valli. Highlights: 9 a.m. - 11 a.m. NIAF Council 2000/Youth Networking Continental Breakfast, featuring keynote speaker Tom Lasorda. 2:30 p.m. - 4:30 p.m. ``Judicial Independence, a panel discussion with Supreme Court Justices Samuel Alito Jr. and Antonin Scalia; Lynn Battaglia, judge, Court of Appeals of Maryland; William S. Sessions, partner, Holland & Knight. Note: Open to print media only. former FBI director and honorary co-chairman, ABA Commission on the 21st Century Judiciary. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW. Contacts: Elisa Ruffino, 202-939-3106.

DOJ_NMG_0084397

Oct. 21 - 23. SWEDISH EMBASSY _ Cremonies marking the opening of the House of Sweden, the new Swedish Embassy.
Location: 2900 K St. NW. Contacts: Andres Ericson, 202-467-2655. Notes: All events RSVP. Press tent at 901 30th St. NW.

8:50 a.m. CHRISTIANS-ISRAEL _ The Holy Land Christian Ecumenical Foundation hyolds a panel discussion on the theology and practical implications of Christian Zionism during its 8th International Conference, with Rev. Gary Burge of Wheaton College and JoAnn Magnuson of Interfaith Relations for Bridges for Peace. Location: Stone Hall National Presbyteriaqn Church, 4101 Nebraska Ave. NW. Contacts: Jessica Rodgers, 301-951-9400 ext 219. 9 a.m.

WALK AGAINST AUTISM _ Cure Autism Now holds second annual WALK NOW, family-friendly 5K walk and community resource fair. Location: National Mall. Contacts: Cure Autism Now, 8888AUTISM

9:30 a.m. LEGAL ETHICS _ Georgetown University Law Center holds a symp 1/8osium on legal ethics over the past 20 years, with Judge George Miller of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims, others. Location: Hart Auditorium, McDonough Hall, 600 New Jersey Ave. NW. Contacts: Kara Tershel, 202-662-9500.

12 p.m. NIGHT COMMUTERS _ Rally and march in support with child ``night commuters" in northern Uganda and efforts to end the 20 year way in Uganda. Location: Rally and walk start at John Marshall Park, Pennsylvania Ave. and 4th St. NW. Contacts: Michael Poffenberger, 574-229-1301.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0084398

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
DOJ Says Courts Are No Longer Open To Detainees 3
Many Highly-Publicized Terror Arrests End In Minor Convictions . 3
Juror Upset By Stewart's Sentence For Aiding Terrorists 3
Kurd Was Imprisoned By US And Taliban 3
Columnist Assails Hulon, FBI Over "Un-Intelligence." 3

Homeland Response:
DHS Aid Disbursement Formula Said To Favor Less Populous States 4
Man Arrested For Football Stadium Bomb Hoax 4
FBI Removes Dead Man From Terrorist List 4
9/11 Victims' Remains Found Near WTC Site 4
NYTimes Faults Coast Guard For Live-Fire Drills On Great Lakes 4
Louisiana Pays FEMA $319 Million, Sues Over $61 Million Bill 4

War News:
Administration Open To Changing Iraq Tactics, But Not Strategy 5
Militias Clash In Amarah 7
Many Iraqis Consider Militia Gunmen As Protectors 8
Iraqi Religious Leaders Issue Edicts Against Violence 8
UN Says 914,000 Have Fled Iraq 8
UN Complains Of Iraqi Sealing Of Civilian Death Toll Data 8
GOP Criticizes CNN For Airing "Sniper Tape." 8
Plea Is Reported In Iraq Murder Case 9
Colonel Takes Care Of 18,000 Troops' Families 9
Gunmen Murder 8 Afghan Laborers 9
Total Says Interrogated Executive Is Innocent In Oil For Food Probe 9
Columnist King Sees Violent New Iraq 9
Cynthia Tucker Says Bush "Exploited" Americans' Fears 10

DOJ:
DOJ Honors Five Maryland Prosecutors With Director's Awards 10

Corporate Scandals:
Ouster Of UnitedHealth CEO Could Make Other CEOs Vulnerable 10
Fifth Circuit Ruling Could Aid Skilling Effort To Have Convictions Thrown Out 10
Grasso Vows To Continue Fighting Over Paychecks 10

Criminal Law:
Ethics Panel May Release Interim Report On Foley Case Before Election 11
US Will Not Seek Fourth Trial Of Gotti 11
DOJ Examining Harman's Relationship With AIPAC 11
Abramoff To Serve Time In Cumberland, Maryland 12
Alaska Lawmaker's Relationship With Developer Is One Focus Of FBI Probe 12
FBI Investigating Former New Jersey Township Planning Board Member 12
FBI Subpoenas Records On Rhode Island Senate President's Land Deals 12
Informant Taped Friends, Associates, Girlfriend In Effort To Reduce His Sentence 12
Williams Settles Education Department Case 13
Man Wanted In Poland For 1998 Police Killing Arrested In US... 13
YouTube Turned Over User Data To Media Lawyers In Response To Subpoena 13
Church Youth Pastor Indicted On Child Porn Charges 13
NYPD To Receive Grant To Buy Bulletproof Vests 13
Scios Under Investigation For "Off Label" Marketing Of Heart Drug 13

Civil Law:
Illinois Firm Settles Naval Shipyard Kickback Accusations 14
Government Reaches Settlement Over Jet Noise Claims 14
DOJ Cracking Down On Bankruptcy Fraud 14

Civil Rights:
California Congressional Candidate's Office Raided 14
Discrimination Claim Could Hurt Cracker Barrel's Ability To Draw Minority Customers 15
Court Strikes Down Las Vegas Ordinance Barring Street Solicitation 15
Alabama Reported Zero Hate Crimes In 2005 15
ACLU Asks Justice Department To Monitor Chesterfield County Voting 15
SCOTUS Overturns Injunction On Arizona Voter ID Law 16

Antitrust:
Consumer Groups Want More Concessions From AT&T For BellSouth Buyout 16
Judge Rules Petco Vote Can Proceed 17

Federal Reserve Approves Regions, AmSouth Merger 17
Ripplewood Mulling Bid For Delphi 17
Tops Exec Says There Was No Viable Offer To Buy Ohio Stores17
High Court To Hear Weyerhaeuser Argument On Illegal Monopoly Ruling 17
Avaya Faces Federal Antitrust Suit..... 17
Technical Glitch Mars Meeting On Vista Operating System 17

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Solar Services Companies Provide Cleaner Energy To Corporations 18
Study Warns Of Extreme Weather Caused By Global Warming 18
WSJ Dismisses Concerns Over Growing Population's Strain On Resources..... 18
Court Limits Feds' Authority At Indian Casinos 18

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Face Sentencing In January On Gun Trafficking Charges.. 19

Congress-Administration:

Democrats Back Aide Suspended Over Suspicion Of NIE Leak 19
Bush Urges Republicans To Tout Medicare Drug Benefit..... 19
Gerson Defends Bush's "Compassionate Conservatism." 19
Pelosi's Refusal To Negotiate With GOP Credited With Boosting Democrats..... 20
Congress Urged To Overhaul Medical Records System..... 20
White House Aides Among Members Of Prominent Young Republican Group 20
Paulson Sells Manhattan Condo For Almost $8 Million..... 20
NYT Criticizes Administration's Space Policy..... 21
WPost Decries Wasteful Federal Farm Subsidies..... 21

Other News:

Stocks Down Slightly After Record-Setting Week 21
OPEC Seeks To Cut Supply As Oil Prices Continue To Fall 21
Texas Judge Avoids Reprimand For Support Of Miers..... 21
Bush Makes Surprise Appearance At Italian-American Event 22
RNC Ad References LBJ's "Daisy Ad."..... 22
GOP Airs Ads Claiming Democrats Endanger Children In Response To Foley Scandal 22
Democrats' Religious Outreach More Focused Than In Years Past..... 22
Polls Said To Indicate Candidates Can Gain Votes By Moving To The Center..... 22
McCain Aiding GOP Candidates While Laying Groundwork For 2008 23
Clinton Faces Questions Concerning Her Presidential Ambitions During Debate..... 23
Lieberman Has 17 Point Lead In New Poll..... 23
Ford Disrupts Corker News Conference..... 23
Allen And Webb Seen As Avoiding Immigration Debate..... 24
Talent Handicapped By National GOP's Difficulties 24
Democrats' Find Success Targeting Open Seats..... 24
Tight House Races In Indiana Feature Vulnerable GOP Incumbents 24
Working Families Party Campaigns For Three Democratic House Candidates 25
GOP House Candidate Investigated Over Immigrant Threats 25
Ehrlich And O'Malley Concentrate On GOTV Efforts 25
Angelides Urges Schwarzenegger To Release Controversial Recordings..... 26
History Of "October Surprise" Described 26
Columnist Dowd Questions Obama's Desire For Presidency 26
LATimes Notes California Democrats Disadvantaged By Redistricting 26
Chinese Leaders Assure Rice They Will Enforce North Korea Sanctions 26
US Trade Rep To Discuss Trade Disputes With China..... 28
Iran Dismisses UN Sanctions Possibility, Warns Europe Against Support For Israel 28
Israel Said To Have Begun Hezbollah Conflict Without Strategy For Ending It 29
US Said To Be Turning From Abbas To Rival Fatah Leader 29
Brother Of Muslim Brotherhood Founder Advocates Liberal Islam..... 29
Administration Launches Effort To Extend Latin American Trade Deals..... 29
EU Leaders Confront Putin On Oil Contracts 30
Kremlin Defends Putin's Remarks About Katsav Scandal 30

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages 30

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 31

DOJ_NMG_0084400

TERRORISM NEWS:

DOJ Says Courts Are No Longer Open To Detainees. The AP (10/21, Apuzzo) reports, "Hundreds of detainees received notice from the Justice Department this week that because of a new law signed by President Bush, the U.S. court system is no longer open to them. Now it will be up to a federal appeals court, and ultimately the Supreme Court, to decide the fate of prisoners who have spent years arguing the government is illegally holding them at overseas military bases." The "habeas corpus exemption has drawn criticism from lawyers, civil rights groups and even members of Bush's own party, such as Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee."

Opinions Vary On Legality Of Military Tribunals. McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Rosen) reports, "The administration gave more ground on how the military commissions will work and how the trials will run, while the three senators yielded more on the controversial interrogation techniques, said John Radsan, who served as the CIA's assistant general counsel from 2002 to 2004 and now runs the National Security Forum at the William Mitchell College of Law in St. Paul, Minn." Several scholars' varying opinions on whether the Supreme Court will uphold the law are noted. Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-SC) predicts a 7-2 vote upholding it.

Many Highly-Publicized Terror Arrests End In Minor Convictions. In a story taking an overall negative tone toward the FBI, CNN's Paula Zahn Now (10/20) reported, "Since 9/11, hundreds of terror suspects have been arrested in the U.S., and just about every time you see the Justice Department and the FBI make an announcement with a lot of fanfare in front of a lot of TV cameras, but so many times we never hear about those the suspects again." CNN (Griffin) added, "In the FBI's war on terror, this man came close to being another Justice Department statistic." Detroit gas station attendant Abdul Berro is "about to be sentenced for credit card and bank fraud," but not "for terrorism, even though the FBI spent months and hundreds of thousands of dollars investigating him and others for plotting against America. The FBI had an informant who said there was more going on with Berro than just credit card fraud. … According to documents, the bureau paid that informant more than $200,000," but he "turned out to be a liar, a con man, now serving a 10-year sentence for his expensive misinformation." Griffin noted that "an independent research group at Syracuse University says half the sentences for these terrorism-related cases are for 28 days or less in prison. … The FBI's John Miller insists that even these lesser convictions are vital in the war on terror." Miller: "The idea is to neutralize these groups either before they are able to transmit money to a terrorist organization overseas, before they are able to put together an attack plan here." Griffin: Judge Richard Posner "says the U.S. needs a new domestic agency, one less concerned with making quick arrests and more willing to take the risk of sitting on a case to see if it leads to a bigger terror threat. The FBI's Miller disagrees." Miller: "This is not a game of chicken we're playing, where we can see whether we get within hours of them striking to get just that much more proof."

Juror Upset By Stewart's Sentence For Aiding Terrorists. The New York Times (10/21, Preston, 1.21M) reports, "He was known as Juror 8, for the jury box chair where he listened silently for more than six months as the convoluted evidence unfolded in the trial of Lynne F. Stewart, the radical defense lawyer accused of aiding Islamic terrorism. The jurors argued behind closed doors in Federal District Court in Manhattan for another month before they finally agreed to convict Ms. Stewart on all five charges she faced for smuggling messages out of prison from her terrorist client, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman. … So on Monday, 20 months after the verdict, Juror 8 kept his eye on the television, waiting for news of her sentence. When he heard that Judge John G. Koeltl had reduced the 30 years sought by the government to 28 months in prison, Juror 8 said he was first disbelieving, then 'vastly disappointed.'"

Kurd Was Imprisoned By US And Taliban. The AP (10/21, Sniffen) reported that Abdul Rahim was arrested "by the Taliban in Afghanistan in January 2000, Rahim says al-Qaeda leaders burned him with cigarettes, smashed his right hand, deprived him of sleep, nearly drowned him and hanged him from the ceiling until he 'confessed' to spying for the United States. US forces took the young Kurd from Syria into custody in January 2002 after the Taliban fled his prison. Accusing him of being an al-Qaeda terrorist, US interrogators deprived him of sleep, threatened him with police dogs and kept him in stress positions for hours, he says. He's been held ever since as an enemy combatant." His story "is one of several emerging from" Gitmo "as defense lawyers make bids to free their clients while the Bush administration tries to use a new law to lock them out of federal courts."

Columnist Assails Hulon, FBI Over "Un-Intelligence." In a Toledo Blade (10/21) column titled "The FBI's Un-Intelligence," the Blade's Jack Kelly wrote, "A Few weeks ago, Jeff Stein, national security editor for Congressional Quarterly magazine, interviewed Willie Hulon, who recently was named chief of the FBI's national security branch." When "Mr. Stein asked Mr. Hulon to explain the difference" between Sunnis and Shiites, "He couldn't." Kelly added, "Mr. Hulon is continuing a long tradition of abysmal and inexcusable ignorance in high places at FBI," and Kelly goes on to discuss intelligence shortcomings on North Korea, Iraq and the 1993 WTC attack. "As far as we know, no one in the FBI or the CIA has been held accountable for intelligence failures. And when no one is held accountable, you get people like Mr. Hulon in jobs they obviously are unqualified to do. This is President Bush's greatest failure."

DOJ_NMG_0084401

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DHS Aid Disbursement Formula Said To Favor Less Populous States. The CBS Evening News (10/20, story 5, 3:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "This year, the Federal government gave the states nearly $2 billion in homeland security money, but you might be surprised how it got divvyed up. For instance, North Dakota -- hardly considered a major terror target -- got nearly $17 per resident. But New York, which has been attacked twice, got only about $9.50 per person. Montana received nearly as much money per resident as New York did." CBS continued, "Tom Kean, Chairman of the 9/11 Commission, says Congress should refigure the formula that now gives some homeland security dollars to every state." Kean: "An area that has the greatest threat is the first priority, and the money. And so on down the list." According to CBS, "Since 9/11, Montana has received about $70 million in Federal homeland security dollars, raising questions as to how wisely that money is being spent. State officials point to the need to protect projects like this hydroelectric dam and dozens of other potential targets for terrorism. Like power grids, missile sites, and 545 miles of largely unprotected border with Canada."

Man Arrested For Football Stadium Bomb Hoax. NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 5, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Tonight there is an arrest in connection with what turned out to be a phony threat on the internet to attack seven NFL stadiums this weekend with radioactive so-called dirty bombs. A 20-year-old Wisconsin grocery store clerk is accused of orchestrating this hoax. He told prosecutors he had posted the same phony threat 40 different times on various websites."

The New York Times (10/21, Smothers, 1.21M) reports, "Federal officials labeled the threat a hoax on Thursday, but at a news conference on Friday to announce the arrest, the United States attorney in Newark, Christopher J. Christie, called it the 'Internet version of yelling 'Fire!' in a crowded theater in this post-9/11 era.' Law enforcement officials said that the message posted by the man, Jake J. Brahm…explained that the timing of the threatened explosions coincided with the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan and that Al Qaeda would take credit for what members would call 'America's Hiroshima.'" The Washington Times (10/21, Seper, 88K) also reports on this story.

FBI Removes Dead Man From Terrorist List. The AP (10/21) reports, "The FBI removed an al-Qaida explosives expert linked to the 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Africa from the most wanted terrorists list Friday after learning he was killed six months ago. Muhsin Musa Matwali Atwah was killed in an April 12 gunfight with Pakistani authorities ... Twenty-six suspected terrorists remain on the FBI's list, including al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden."

9/11 Victims' Remains Found Near WTC Site. NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 4, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "This week here in New York, over five years now since 9/11, more human remains were found dating back to that attack." The New York Times (10/21, Dunlap, 1.21M) reports, "New York City's chief medical examiner will station a team at ground zero to look for human remains from 9/11, the Bloomberg administration said yesterday, after dozens of bones were found Thursday by workers excavating two manholes that had been covered since 2002."

NYTimes Faults Coast Guard For Live-Fire Drills On Great Lakes. The New York Times (10/21, 1.21M) editorializes, "When the Coast Guard decided it wanted to practice firing its new machine guns on the Great Lakes, it posted an item in the Federal Register -- not exactly household reading. Now that the public has caught up, there is an uproar all around the lakes ... Few are disputing that the United States needs to do more to protect its borders against terrorists. But we face far more plausible threats than terrorists cutting across Lake Michigan in small boats. ... Turning the Great Lakes -- even on occasion -- into a live-fire zone is the kind of decision that says little to terrorists but speaks volumes to the rest of us."

Louisiana Pays FEMA $319 Million, Sues Over $61 Million Bill. The New York Times/AP (10/21) reports the state of Louisiana "wired $319 million to the Federal Emergency Management Agency on Friday, a large part of what the agency billed the state for hurricane recovery for Hurricanes Katrina and Rita, and filed a lawsuit in federal court disputing the remaining $61 million bill. The state's actions were based on the advice of the legislative auditor. The commissioner of administration, Jerry Luke LeBlanc, who is the governor's top financial adviser, said that the state attorney general's office filed the lawsuit Friday afternoon and that the disputed dollars would be deposited into a registry of the court until the case was resolved.

DOJ_NMG_0084402

Activists Encourage Lawmakers To Visit The Gulf Coast. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Simmons, 918K) reports, "The Women of the Storm, as this ad hoc group calls itself, were about to land in Washington and embark on a one-day mission in the nation's halls of power. The goal: to persuade members of Congress to help save the state's fast-disappearing coastline. The powerful folks in Washington ignore this eclectic group at their peril. The Women are quickly becoming a recognized power among the activist groups that have sprouted from the rubble of Katrina, many fueled by frustration with the slow pace of government assistance. Their first objective has been to bring Washington to New Orleans. The group's premise is simple: When lawmakers see how devastated the Gulf Coast looks, they will be roused to help. So far, the group has helped convince 55 of the nation's 100 senators and at least 106 of its 435 representatives to visit Louisiana."

WAR NEWS:

Administration Open To Changing Iraq Tactics, But Not Strategy. The possibility of the president changing his approach the war in Iraq received heavy coverage, leading the three network newscasts and appearing on the front-page of major newspapers. ABC World News (10/20, lead story, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "President Bush has gathered his top Iraq advisers for discussions on strategy." Bush "met today with the top commander for the Middle East, to talk about a possible change in tactics." President Bush: "My message to them is, 'whatever you need, we'll give you. And whatever tactics you think work on the ground, you put in place.'" Raddatz added, "A senior military official tells ABC News that for now, the changes will be only minor adjustments in how the battle is fought. There are no large scale changes in the plan." In the face of calls to adjust its policies, one "senior official said that the pressure will continue on Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki to crack down on the militias." One "senior official said today Maliki will be given until the end of the year and then commanders and Administration officials, Charlie, will reassess the situation to see if it's working."

The CBS Evening News (10/20, lead story, 3:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Pressure is building on President Bush to find a way out of Iraq where the US death toll is now approaching 2,800." CBS (Axelrod): "In a not-so-subtle dig at 'cut-and-run,' his former number two at the State Department Richard Armitage now says the US should 'notify and walk.' Notify Iraqis we're going to be drawing down our troops over a reasonable interval of months. 'We can't win this militarily.'" CBS states that the President "is now in a delicate dance, showing resolve on the campaign trail but hinting at flexibility when he describe what is he tells his generals." Bush: "Whatever you need, we'll give you and whatever you tactics you think work on the ground, you put in place." CBS correspondent David Axelrod described Bush as "showing no flexibility on a phased withdrawal. It's called a non-starter, the idea of dividing Iraq into three separate regions, that's being ruled out, too."

NBC Nightly News (10/20, lead story, 3:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "It has been a week of setbacks in Iraq and there have been some rare admissions from the Bush administration regarding U.S. policy there. Tonight there is further evidence that some sort of review of the Iraq war is underway." NBC (Gregory) added, "There's also a greater sense of urgency within the White House about the war. A flurry of meetings today focused on two key questions. 'What should the U.S. do next in Iraq?' And 'what realistically can it do?' With just weeks to go before Iraq's political impact is felt at the polls, the President today conceded setbacks."

The Washington Post (10/21, A1, Tyson, Fletcher, 748K) reports that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Bush "said military commanders are constantly adjusting their tactics to meet enemy challenges." However, the Post emphasizes that Bush and Rumsfeld also "defended the U.S. strategy in Iraq, saying the ultimate goals remain unchanged despite escalating violence and increasingly somber assessments from military leaders on the ground."

The New York Times (10/21, A1, Semple, 1.21M) in an article focused mainly on militia violence in Iraq notes, "Reviews of the American strategy in Iraq took on more urgency on Friday."

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Richter, McManus, 918K) in an article titled "Bush Open To Shift In Iraq War 'Tactics'" says Bush's remarks Friday "appeared to signal that he was open to at least a limited change in his approach, and that he was not wedded to a 'stay-the-course' doctrine, as critics say. At the same time, Bush pledged to secure victory and said he would not change his administration's strategy or overall goals, even if it shifted tactics." With continuing violence in Iraq and "an increasing number of Republicans" questioning "the wisdom of Bush's policies" some "administration officials said Friday that in the face of Iraq's deepening troubles, they were weighing major changes in direction and expected a new course -- though not a withdrawal -- to be announced within months."

Under the headline "Pressure Builds For Policy Shift, But Bush Shows No Signs Of Budging," McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Hutcheson, Youssef) report, "American officials are grasping for new ways to keep the conflict from spinning out of control." Yet, "Bush has given no indication that he's ready to make dramatic changes in his Iraq policy" and his "public comments and those of his senior aides suggest that he's more determined than ever to stay the course." White House spokesman Tony Snow Friday "said that Bush is open to changes in tactics that could help achieve his goals, but won't consider any deviation from his core strategy." McClatchy notes, "That leaves senior American officials and commanders in Iraq in a tough place. They've acknowledged that the current approach isn't working, and that they're looking for an alternative."

DOJ_NMG_0084403

The AP (10/20, Riechmann, Freking) portrays Bush as adamant in his resolve regarding Iraq, reporting that he "conceded Friday that 'right now it's tough' for American forces in Iraq, but the White House said he would not change U.S. strategy in the face of pre-election polls." The AP notes "fresh signs of Republican doubts," including the statement of Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison. Secretary Rumsfeld "said the Iraqi government must become less reliant on the United States to handle security. He also said U.S. officials are working with the Iraqis to develop projections on when that might happen."

The Financial Times (10/21, Luce, Sevastopulo) agrees that "Bush conceded yesterday that he was increasingly flexible about America's military strategy" and "has abandoned talk of achieving 'victory.'" On the issue of dividing Iraq along ethnic lines, Bloomberg (10/21, Mathewson, Williams) quotes White House spokesman Tony Snow saying, "You don't want to create the Balkans." Bloomberg adds, "The U.S. will continue urging Iraqis to identify themselves as one people, recalling how 12 million citizens turned out a year ago for the first democratic election in decades, Snow said."

Speculation Abounds Concerning Iraq Study Group's Recommendations. The New York Times (10/21, Weisman, 1.21M) reports, "Bush has opened himself to the new ideas when the war is presenting some of the problems the elder Mr. Bush and his aides, in their own memoirs, have said they worried about in 1991." James A. Baker III, co-chairman of the Iraq Study Group, says "Bush has an unwarranted reputation for not listening to dissenting views," adding, "this project demonstrates one heck of a lot of flexibility." The group "has set off fevered talk in Washington, ranging from the political to the psychological, especially now that Mr. Baker has declared that neither Mr. Bush's 'stay the course' message nor what the White House calls the 'cut and run' approach of critics offers a way out," and "Speculation has centered on the possibility of a phased military withdrawal from Iraq; a possible separation of Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish areas; some kind of international protectorate to secure Baghdad; and greater involvement in Iraq and the region by Iran and other neighbors." While the group may not recommend personnel changes, "many doubt that those associated with the current approach could carry out a new one," and "it is well known that Mr. Baker is not a great fan of Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld."

Bush Links Democrats' Position On Iraq To Stance During Cold War. In contrast to other newspapers which focus on speculation about a shift in Administration Iraq policy, the Washington Times (10/21, A1, Dinan, 88K) in a front page story leads with Bush's campaign message reporting, "President Bush yesterday said Democrats became the party of 'doubt and defeat' during the fight against communism in the Cold War, and said it shows today in their calls for withdrawal from Iraq." Bush "said that shift began in 1972, with the nomination of George McGovern to run for president, continued into President Jimmy Carter's administration and characterized Democrats during Republican President Ronald Reagan's administration."

Administration Seen As Under "Pressure" To Shift Strategy. Continuing a theme found in many news reports ABC World News (10/20, story 3, 2:00, Gibson, 8.78M) focused on the Iraq War's impact on the congressional elections, reporting, "Karl Rove, the top White House political adviser, earlier on, was saying the Republican candidates ought to embrace the war and accuse Democrats of wanting to cut and run." ABC chief Washington correspondent, George Stephanopoulos: "And those words, cut and run, were the magic words for Republicans all year long. Even when the Iraq headlines were bad, if they could accuse Democrats of cutting and running, they felt they were in good shape. That slogan is losing its potency right now. And there's some evidence the Democratic charge of staying the course is gaining power. If you look at the tight Senate races, Democrats are on the offense, advertising on Iraq in seven of the tight Senate races. We see Republicans starting to break ranks."

GOP Candidates Begin To Waver On War. The AP (10/20, Gamboa) reports, "Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, one of President Bush's most ardent loyalists on the war in Iraq, voiced her strongest criticism yet of the administration's reasons for going to war. In a debate with her challenger in the Nov. 7 election, Hutchison, R-Texas, said she would not have voted for war had she known there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. But she also made it clear she does not support troop withdrawal." Her words "come as a small but growing number of Republicans are suggesting a change in the Iraq strategy may be necessary."

The AP (10/20, Lewis) reports, "Republican Sen. George Allen…called for 'changes in tactics' in how the U.S. is fighting the Iraq war on Friday as he continued to face questions about his morphing position on the war." Allen "has yet to reject or criticize the hard line on Iraq that he had touted for months and that President Bush repeated Thursday at an Allen fundraiser," but he "began shifting his public position on the unpopular war two weeks ago after fellow Virginia Sen. John Warner" said Iraq was "drifting sideways."

Rumsfeld Says Iraq Must Take Over Security. The AP (10/20, Burns) says that Rumsfeld argued that "the biggest mistake would be to not continue turning regions of the country over to the Iraqis, even if that means the U.S. has to go back and retake control because the Iraqis are overwhelmed." While he has made such remarks before about handing over responsibility, these comments "came less than three weeks before elections in which Democrats are threatening to recapture control of Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0084404

UPI (10/20) also reports his declaration, saying that Rumsfeld "is scheduled to confer Saturday with President George W. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Gen. John Abizaid, head of Central Command. Gen. George Casey, the head of U.S. forces in Iraq, is to join the discussion from Baghdad by video."

Soldiers Feel Frustration In Iraq. The CBS Evening News (10/20, story 2, 3:40, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "Some senior American commanders in Baghdad now describe their mission here as treading water, trying to buy time for an Iraqi government and political system that so far is failing. Also failing is the US mission to reduce bloodshed in the Iraqi capital, something military commanders finally admitted as the death toll for American troops surged with over 70 dead already this month. While leaders in Washington work on a new strategy, American soldiers are forced to keep on with the operation in Baghdad."

Clarence Page Sees Bush Preparing To "Declare Victory And Go Home." In the Washington Times (10/21, 88K), syndicated columnist Clarence Page predicts, "Iraq has sunk deeper into what looks like a civil war and the Bush administration has sunk deeper into denial. But recent events indicate that, despite Mr. Bush's mantra about 'staying the course' in Iraq, he's looking for an exit strategy." Bush's consultation of the Baker-led Iraq Study Group "could offer cover for the younger Mr. Bush to do something he is loath to do in public: change his mind. ... In fact, Iraq's best direction may come through a partitioning of the country between its dominant Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish factions. ... But, whether in war or in peace, Iraq's future ultimately must be decided by Iraqis."

Militias Clash In Amarah. ABC World News (10/20, story 2, 1:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "There may be a desire to crack down on the militias. But it wouldn't seem to be work working from what happened today. One of the things the US fears most in Iraq is militias seizing power at will, and dimming hopes for unification in the future. It happened today in Amarah, a city in the south. Population 750,000. The Mehdi army led by a cleric in Baghdad took over the city." ABC (McCarthy): "By nightfall, mediators sent by prime minister Maliki had arranged an uneasy truce in the city. But the damage had already been done to the government's authority." University of Michigan professor Juan Cole: "The guerillas typically have better firepower than the Iraqi military and the security forces. I am not sure anyone can do what Maliki has been called upon to do." McCarthy: "Iraq is increasingly becoming a battlefield for private armies, outside any central control. If that isn't stopped, many are afraid the country is truly heading into darkness."

NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 2, 2:30, Williams, 9.87M) called the violence in Amarah "the latest example of this unraveling security situation on the ground." NBC (Engel): "This is an example of an exit strategy gone wrong. The Mahdi army invaded the city of Amarah and briefly seized control. This is the second city here this week where Iraqi security forces have been unable to stand up to militias. It was Shi'ites killing Shi'ites. " The attack on Amarah is Sadr's "boldest challenge yet to the central government." The Brookings Institution's Michael O'Hanlon: "Sadr may be getting ready for war and he may be getting ready to try to control as much of Baghdad and surrounding areas as possible in the belief that ultimately who rules Iraq will be settled on the battlefield, not at the ballot box." Loren Thompson, Lexington Institute military analyst: "If U.S. troops can't count on the Iraqi security forces to maintain control then we basically got two choices. Stick around or accept defeat." Engel: "Tonight after negotiations with Sadr's forces, the Iraqi army did regain control of Amarah, but Sadr's brazen takeover put both the Iraqi government and the U.S. military on notice of what could be an emerging pattern."

The New York Times (10/21, A1, Semple, 1.21M) reports, "Hundreds of militiamen linked to the Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr battled local police and members of a rival Shiite militia in the southeastern city of Amara," but "after a day of negotiations involving representatives of the warring militias, and delegates from the Baghdad offices of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, Mahdi Army gunmen withdrew from their positions, and by nightfall the city was under the control of an Iraqi Army battalion that had been dispatched from Basra." The fighting "exposed the deep fissures in the country's Shiite leadership and cast doubt on the ability of the ruling Shiite coalition to hold itself together. It also underscored the weaknesses of the Iraqi security forces and the potency of the Mahdi Army," and "raised fresh questions, too, about the ability of the Iraqi government and security forces to maintain order once allied troops are withdrawn."

The Washington Post (10/21, A13, Anderson, 748K) adds, "Each side blamed the other in a cycle of retaliatory clashes with tribal overtones," and "a spokesman for the Interior Ministry, Brig. Abdul Karim Khalaf Kinany, said the clashes were not driven by intra-Shiite conflict, but by tribal differences." However, the "bloody feud…illustrated deepening rifts within Iraq's largest sect and the growing turmoil in the south," proving "a stark illustration of the deepening tension among Shiite leaders."

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Roug, 918K) reports that Secretary Rumsfeld "said in Washington that he believed Iraqi security forces had regained control of the area. But the two-day offensive by the Al Mahdi army highlighted how difficult it has become for the central government and its security forces to rein in Shiite Muslim militias, both in the capital and in the south. ... Handing over control to the Iraqi army and police is key to the strategy of U.S.-led military forces, but the Iraqis often have proved inadequate, especially when facing Shiite militias."

DOJ_NMG_0084405

McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Obeid, Youssef) calls the fighting "another sign that Iraqi government forces are unable or unwilling to subdue rogue elements." McClatchy speculates, "It's unclear how much control Sadr has over some members of his militia, which has expanded and splintered since he founded it in 2003. During Friday's fighting, some militiamen appeared to defy the firebrand cleric's orders for calm."

The Financial Times (10/21, Negus) headlines its coverage, "Amara Unrest Strains Plans For Unified Iraq" and reports from the British point of view, "The fighting threatens to disrupt British plans to complete the handover of the four Shia-majority provinces in their area of responsibility to local authorities. British and other coalition forces had already pulled out of two of the four provinces in their zone in June and September and withdrew from Amara in August."

The AP (10/20, Hurst) reports, "The Amarah showdown between the two virtual private armies highlighted the potential for an all-out conflict between them and their political sponsors, both with large blocs in parliament and important to the survival of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's shaky 4-month-old government." Secretary Rumsfeld is quoted as saying that it "was not a strategic error for the British to turn over control of the city to the Iraqis in August."

Many Iraqis Consider Militia Gunmen As Protectors. The New York Times (10/21, Tavernise, 1.21M) reports that "the Mahdi Army, and a growing criminal breakaway element, have grown into one of the government's biggest problems and are a major obstacle to the success of the American enterprise here. Despite its new rogue fringe, Iraqi Shiites see the Mahdi militia as their most effective protector against the hostile Sunni groups that have slaughtered Shiites and driven them from their homes. Shiites say that as long as the government cannot keep them safe, they cannot support the disarming of militias. ... It is a broadly held view among Shiites that the American military has unfairly focused on Shiite militias and has largely forgotten the Sunni militias that they say launched the sectarian war." The Times asks rhetorically, "How is it possible to control a militia when trust among Iraqis has vanished and the government is incapable of containing the spiraling violence?"

Iraqi Religious Leaders Issue Edicts Against Violence. The AP (10/20) reports, "In a bid to stop sectarian bloodshed, Shiite and Sunni religious figures met in Mecca, Islam's holiest city, and issued a series of edicts Friday forbidding violence between Iraq's two Muslim sects. It is uncertain, however, whether the edicts, or fatwas, will find resonance among the country's Sunni and Shiite militants whose tit-for-tat attacks have created a deadly cycle of violence that gains momentum and brutality daily." The ongoing violence "is largely perpetuated by militants who abide only by the strict interpretations of the Quran, Islam's holy book, and Hadith, sayings of Islam's prophet Muhammad, that are offered by radical clerics outside Islam's mainstream."

The Washington Times (10/21, 88K) in a front page article reports on this meeting and its edict as well, stating, "It was not clear what impact the document signed by the dozens of clerics would have on militias that appear to be outside the control of both Shi'ite and Sunni religious authorities, and others that are affiliated with al Qaeda. Nevertheless, it marked an unprecedented effort by Iraqi religious leaders -- who gathered in the Saudi Arabian city where Islam was born -- to speak out against the bloodshed that has increased daily throughout the holy month of Ramadan."

UN Says 914,000 Have Fled Iraq. The AP (10/20, Jordans) reports, "At least 914,000 Iraqis have fled their homes since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, more than a third since an increase in sectarian bloodshed at the start of this year, the U.N. refugee agency said Friday. ... The agency has concluded that 754,000 displaced Iraqis remain in the country." The Los Angeles Times (10/21, 918K) carries an abbreviated version of this article.

UN Complains Of Iraqi Sealing Of Civilian Death Toll Data. The New York Times (10/21, Hoge, 1.21M) reports, "The United Nations office in Baghdad says that Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, has ordered the country's medical authorities to stop providing the organization with monthly figures on the number of civilians killed and wounded in the conflict there, according to a confidential cable. ... Ashraf Qazi, the United Nations envoy to Iraq, says the prohibition may hinder the ability of his office to give accurate accounts in its bimonthly human rights reports on the levels of violence and the effect on Iraqi society."

GOP Criticizes CNN For Airing "Sniper Tape." The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Perry, 918K) reports, "CNN cable news has become 'the publicist for an enemy propaganda film' by broadcasting a tape showing an insurgent sniper apparently killing an American soldier" according to House Armed Services Committee Chairman Duncan Hunter. Hunter "called for the Pentagon to oust immediately any CNN reporter embedded with U.S. troops in Iraq." Reps. Brian Bilbray and Darrell Issa joined Hunter in "sending a letter to Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld." The Pentagon, though, "had no official reaction to the CNN video. Though embedded reporters are made to sign pledges not to show the faces of dead Americans until their families are notified, nothing prohibits the use of pictures where identities are not discernible."

DOJ_NMG_0084406

Plea Is Reported In Iraq Murder Case. The AP (10/20, Watkins) reports, "A Camp Pendleton Marine will plead guilty next week for his role in the killing of an Iraqi civilian last April, his attorney said Friday. Pfc. John J. Jodka, 20, of Encinitas, would be the first Marine to plead guilty in the case, in which six other Marines and one Navy corpsman were also charged with murder." His attorney "said Jodka would testify at his court-martial and that sentencing was not expected until Nov. 15."

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Perry, 918K) reports that Jodka "was the youngest and lowest-ranking" of the Marine defendants and that he "was moved from the brig at Camp Pendleton to the Miramar Marine Corps Air Station brig two weeks ago to separate him from other defendants."

Officer Awaits Ruling In Abu Ghraib Case. The AP (10/20, Dishneau) reports, "An Army colonel began deliberating Friday whether to recommend a court-martial for an officer accused of abusing Abu Ghraib prisoners by ignoring their mistreatment and then lying to investigators about it. A decision is expected by early November on whether Lt. Col. Steven L. Jordan, an Army reservist from Fredericksburg, Va., will stand trial for any of the 12 charges against him." He "is the highest-ranking U.S. soldier, and the first officer, charged with crimes stemming from the physical abuse and sexual humiliation of Abu Ghraib detainees."

Colonel Takes Care Of 18,000 Troops' Families. ABC World News (10/20, story 10, 3:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Finally from us, our 'person of the week' we are awed, time and again, by the bravery and sacrifice exhibited on the battlefields of Iraq. And humbled when we hear of the sacrifices that families at home also make. Tonight, the man who takes care of the families when their loved ones are in the thick of war." Col. Larry Phelps: "I think the perception is, when a unit deploys, it sweeps the building out, locks the door and walks away. But with a division the size of this one, we have over 18,000 soldiers. And every one of those soldiers has a family. And every one of those families has to be taken care of in the absence of the soldier." Gibson: "Colonel Larry Phelps is the commander of the Army's 1st Cavalry Rear Detachment. The 1st Cav is presently deploying 18,000 soldiers to Iraq. And in simple terms, Colonel Phelps is in charge of taking care of the 18,000 families left behind. Taking care of one family is hard enough for most of us. Think about 18,000."

Gunmen Murder 8 Afghan Laborers. The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/21) reports, "Gunmen ambushed a carload of Afghan laborers heading home from a remote U.S. military base in eastern Afghanistan and executed eight of them ... The killings occurred as a statement purportedly issued by fugitive Taliban leader Mullah Mohammed Omar called for stepped-up attacks on Afghan and foreign troops." The victims "worked for the U.S. military in the mountainous Korangal area of Kunar province."

Total Says Interrogated Executive Is Innocent In Oil For Food Probe. The New York Times (10/21, Kanter, 1.21M) reports, "The French oil company Total rallied on Friday to the defense of its second in command and designated chief executive, Christophe de Margerie, after he was taken into custody and questioned about possible illegal payments for Iraqi oil. Mr. de Margerie, 55, and a former Total executive, Bernard de Combret, 63, were released on bail on Thursday after being held for 48 hours." A spokeswoman said, "The judge has to prove that he is or is not guilty, and we think he's not guilty."

The Financial Times (10/21, Arnold) reports, "The surprise move cast a shadow over plans for Mr Margerie to replace Thierry Desmarest as chief executive when the latter steps up to non-executive chairman after the group's annual results in February. ... The charges add to growing discomfort in Paris political and business circles about the damage being done to France's prestige by the inquiry. ... Politicians and executives in countries from Germany to India have been snared by the scandal. But France's strong ties to Saddam Hussein's regime seemed to mean it was more involved than most."

Columnist King Sees Violent New Iraq. In his Washington Post (10/21, 748K) column, Colbert King writes, "Some of us can't forget the prewar talk about weapons of mass destruction and Saddam Hussein's partnership with al-Qaeda, and how wrong the foreign policy elite were about that. Then there was the rosy post-Hussein world portrayed by the Bush administration, in which Iraqis, liberated from the grip of fear and imbued with a deep and abiding respect for human rights and freedom, would be busy building a better future for themselves. ... There is a new Iraq emerging before our eyes. It is an Iraq that torments Christians, that indulges in unrelenting sectarian bloodbaths, that cheers for Hezbollah, that is no more a friend to Israel than is Iran, all despite the lies sold to the White House and Pentagon by self-serving, power-hungry Iraqi expatriates."

DOJ_NMG_0084407

Cynthia Tucker Says Bush "Exploited" Americans' Fears. In a column scheduled to appear Sunday in the Atlanta Journal Constitution (10/22), Cynthia Tucker writes, "Bush had a major advantage in persuading Americans to support his Iraqi misadventure: Voters wanted to believe that ousting Saddam would take care of terrorists. ... But 3 1/2 years after the invasion, with bloodshed escalating, the spell has worn off…we are less secure than we were five years ago. Terrorists are using our invasion of Iraq as a recruiting tool. While Saddam had no weapons of mass destruction, North Korea apparently now has nukes. Iran is on its way to nuclear capabilities. And we have few soldiers left to handle a conflict anywhere else." She also charges that Secretary Rumsfeld "was eager to attack Iraq because it presented better targets for our advanced weaponry than primitive Afghanistan, according to several White House insider accounts."

DOJ:

DOJ Honors Five Maryland Prosecutors With Director's Awards. The Baltimore Sun (10/21) reported, "The US Justice Department honored five federal prosecutors in Maryland yesterday with 2006 Director's Awards from the department's executive office for United States attorneys. Roann Nichols was recognized for her work in negotiating the civil settlement of fraud charges against Serono Laboratories Inc. in connection with illegal schemes to promote, market and sell its AIDS drug, Serostim. A. David Copperthite and Charles J. Peters, who serve in the U.S. attorney's narcotics and organized crime section, were recognized for their work on the prosecution of Baltimore police detectives William King and Antonio Murray. Stuart A. Berman and Barbara S. Skalla received Director's Awards for their work on the prosecution of international drug dealers from Pakistan, a trial handled in the U.S. District Court in Greenbelt."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Ouster Of UnitedHealth CEO Could Make Other CEOs Vulnerable. The AP (10/21) reported, "Chief executives caught in the stock-options scandal may find it harder to keep their jobs now that a CEO as mighty as UnitedHealth's William McGuire has fallen. The scandal rattling corporate America has claimed more than three dozen executives and board directors at 19 public companies so far. McGuire, whose retirement was announced Sunday, is arguably the most prominent. … The fall of a big domino like McGuire - the man who engineered UnitedHealth's rise from a regional health insurer into the nation's second-largest - can spark the descent of others like him." The AP adds, "A sort of guillotine for corporate executives has been set out in the public square. With more than 100 companies under options investigations by the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission, many likely are eager to show their cooperation with the authorities and willingness to take remedial action - like firing executives believed to be implicated or responsible and possibly recouping some of their options money."

Fifth Circuit Ruling Could Aid Skilling Effort To Have Convictions Thrown Out. Bloomberg (10/21) reported, "A federal appeals court has refused to consider reinstating the convictions of four former Merrill Lynch executives found guilty of helping engineer Enron's sale of mobile power plants to the brokerage in 1999 to help Enron appear to have met earnings targets. The United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit denied a government request for a hearing before all its 15 judges, the online court docket said yesterday. … The decision may help Enron's former chief executive, Jeffrey K. Skilling, in his bid to have his guilty verdicts thrown out. Mr. Skilling, 52, had cited the ruling in asking the judge in his case to cancel his fraud convictions. His sentencing begins Monday."

The New York Post (10/21, Tharp) reported that Skilling "faces 20 years behind bars at his sentencing Monday - while his lawyers face an unpaid legal tab of $30 million." Skilling is "already nearly broke, say his lawyers. But prosecutors say he's got many millions left from his ill-gotten gains, and must fork over $182.9 million in penalties and restitution to his victims."

Feinstein Urges DOJ To Appeal Ruling On Lay Convictions. The Fresno Bee (10/21) reports, "Sen. Dianne Feinstein is urging the Justice Department to appeal a ruling this week vacating the fraud and conspiracy conviction of Enron founder Kenneth Lay." In a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Feinstein criticized "the decision to erase the conviction. U.S. District Judge Sim Lake in Houston made the ruling because Lay died before getting to pursue appeals. 'I urge the Justice Department to seek an appeal of Judge Lakes' decision, so that the government can fight to preserve Enron victims' hard-fought right to obtain restitution,' Feinstein wrote."

The Houston Chronicle (10/21, Ivanovich) reports, "Feinstein argued the 5th Circuit's ruling went beyond a doctrine in common law that does away with punishments after a defendant's death. 'The Supreme Court has never held that it also must wipe out a victim's right to compensatory relief such as restitution,' Feinstein wrote."

Grasso Vows To Continue Fighting Over Paychecks. The Wall Street Journal (10/21, B1, Lucchetti, Davies) reported, "The fight over one of Wall Street's biggest paychecks -- the $187.5 million compensation package amassed by former New York Stock Exchange chief Dick Grasso -- is headed for yet another round of nasty court battles. A judge's decision on Thursday that Mr. Grasso needs to give back as much as $100 million significantly changes the landscape of the battle, handing Mr. Grasso's enemies a key victory. Mr. Grasso vowed to keep pressing his case. 'I believe it was right when I started, and nothing has changed my mind,' Mr. Grasso said Friday in an interview."

DOJ_NMG_0084408

CRIMINAL LAW:

Ethics Panel May Release Interim Report On Foley Case Before Election. The Washington Post (10/21, A8, Eilperin, 748K) reports, "Despite an uncharacteristic spurt of activity, the House ethics committee is unlikely to complete its investigation of the Mark Foley page scandal before the election, but it may issue an interim report on Foley's activities and how the GOP leadership responded to warnings." In addition to key members of House Speaker Dennis Hastert's staff they may depose Hastert as well. Rep. Howard Berman and the panel's chairman, Rep. Doc Hastings "have managed to resuscitate the panel to some extent in recent months, doling out private advice to lawmakers behind closed doors and taking on the politically sensitive task of probing whether Hastert and his deputies failed to act quickly enough to stop Foley."

Priest Suspended After Abuse Of Foley Revealed. The CBS Evening News (10/20, story 4, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M) profiles Father Anthony Mercieca, "the priest at the center of the Mark Foley scandal. Today we got our first look at him and the church is now taking action." The New York Times (10/21, Goodnough, 1.21M) reports, "The Archdiocese of Miami on Friday barred the Rev. Anthony Mercieca from functioning as a priest anywhere in the world after confirming that he was the clergyman who Mark Foley said molested him in the 1960's."

The New York Times (10/21, Fisher, 1.21M) adds, "The sketchiest of portraits emerged from neighbors and church officials: Father Mercieca retired here a few years ago, having spent his career mostly in Brazil and the United States, and has not been officially active here as a priest. But he said Mass at 9 every morning for several dozen worshipers at the main church here."

US Will Not Seek Fourth Trial Of Gotti. The New York Times (10/21, Feuer) reported, "John A. Gotti, who three times in just over a year has escaped conviction on federal racketeering charges, will finally be able to pursue what he claims he has long desired: an ordinary life. After three trials in Manhattan, each ending in a hung jury, federal prosecutors have announced that they will not seek a fourth trial on those charges for Mr. Gotti, a decision federal officials had indicated was likely. It enshrines him as a defendant even trickier to convict than his father." The Times noted, "This decision does not preclude the F.B.I. or other authorities from developing new evidence for a different case some day." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/21, McShane) called it "one huge victory for second-generation mobster" Gotti. "But more legal problems could lie ahead: Radio talk show host Curtis Sliwa promised a civil suit against Mr. Gotti over his near-fatal June 1992 kidnapping allegedly ordered by the mob scion."

The New York Daily News (10/21, Marzulli) reported, "Though Gotti insists he left the Mafia behind in 1999, one law enforcement source said it's 'pretty impossible' to believe he's going to move away and go straight. 'He sitting on a ton of money which is all ill-gotten gains,' the source said. 'He knows one life and it's called organized crime. Plus he has to look over his shoulder with the Gambino family because he really upset a lot of people.' But mob expert Jerry Capeci said he doesn't think anyone is gunning for Gotti for speaking to prosecutors." Capeci noted, "He never hurt anyone, never became a cooperating witness." Newsday (10/21, DeStefano) added that US Attorney Michael Garcia said in a statement Friday that US District Judge Shira Scheindlin "signed papers that ended the prosecution of Gotti. 'It was just wise to stop,' said one federal law enforcement official who asked not to be named." The New York Post (10/21, Cornell) reported on the decision, under the headline "Giddy Gotti Jr. Defeats The Feds." The Staten Island Advance (10/21, Harrell) and Bloomberg (10/21, Glovin, Hurtado) also reported the story.

DOJ Examining Harman's Relationship With AIPAC. Time (10/22, Burger) reported on its web site, "Did a Democratic member of Congress improperly enlist the support of a major pro-Israel lobbying group to try to win a top committee assignment? That's the question at the heart of an ongoing investigation by the FBI and Justice Department prosecutors, who are examining whether Rep. Jane Harman of California and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) may have violated the law in a scheme to get Harman reappointed as the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee, according to knowledgeable sources in and out of the US government." A spokesman for AIPAC "denied any wrongdoing by the group and stressed that it is not taking sides in regards to the committee assignment. Spokespersons for Justice and the FBI declined to comment."

The Washington Times (10/21) reported, "Time Magazine reports she may have received a boost from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee when Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi wanted to remove her from the committee. Harman left a voice mail for the magazine calling any suggestions of improper conduct 'irresponsible, laughable and scurrilous.' She has retained Ted Olson, the lawyer who formerly served as President George W. Bush's solicitor general. Olson told Time Harman did not know of any investigation but decided to retain him after news reports of a probe."

DOJ_NMG_0084409

Abramoff To Serve Time In Cumberland, Maryland. NBC News (10/21, Seidman) reported, "Disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff will report Nov. 15 to a federal prison in Cumberland, Md., to serve a 70-month sentence for fraud and conspiracy charges in connection with the purchase of Florida-based SunCruz Casinos. U.S. District Judge Paul Huck granted a request by prosecutors and Abramoff's lawyer, Abbe Lowell, that Abramoff serve his time at the Cumberland facility because it is within driving distance of Washington. They said in a court filing that Abramoff was cooperating in the Justice Department's Washington influence peddling investigation and would continue to assist prosecutors while in prison."

Alaska Lawmaker's Relationship With Developer Is One Focus Of FBI Probe. The Anchorage Daily News (10/21, Demer) reported, "Last year, state Rep. Vic Kohring sat down with the mayor of the Fairbanks North Star Borough, Jim Whitaker, to talk about changing a state law to increase a tax break for an Anchorage-based developer." Kohring "was on the payroll of the developer, Marc Marlow, for whom he had been working since November 2004. To Whitaker, himself a former legislator, Kohring was acting like a lobbyist, not a lawmaker." The Daily News added, "Kohring has worked on a half-dozen projects for Marlow," and "now their relationship is coming under new scrutiny as part of an FBI investigation into legislators, influence peddling and the oil field service and construction company Veco Corp. Kohring is one of six Alaska legislators whose offices were searched by the FBI," and "agents took a folder of information on Marlow along with other items, according to a copy of the receipt for property provided by Kohring's attorney."

FBI Investigating Former New Jersey Township Planning Board Member. The Asbury Park Press (10/21, Brown) reported from Tinton Falls, N.J., "The FBI served a subpoena at borough hall late Friday afternoon requesting all records relating to a former Planning Board member's activities while a borough official, a source said. The source…said the FBI is investigating the activities of Paul J. Abrams and his relationship with the developer of the proposed Heather Glen development, intended for the Tinton Avenue site of the former Communications-Electronic Command building." The Press noted, "News of the subpoena apparently had not reached Abrams on Friday. 'I have no idea what you're talking about,' he said."

FBI Subpoenas Records On Rhode Island Senate President's Land Deals. WJAR-TV Providence (10/20) reported on its Web site from a story broadcast Friday, "NBC 10 has learned that the FBI has subpoenaed records from the West Warwick Town Hall and confirmed that the records taken involve land deals that Senate President Joseph Montalbano conducted for the town. … The state Ethics Commission is still looking into a complaint accusing Montalbano of failing to disclose legal work he did for West Warwick before a vote on a constitutional amendment that would allow a casino to be built in the town. The complaint, filed by Operation Clean Government…accused Montalbano of failing to disclose more than $86,000 that his law firm received for work done for West Warwick town authorities." The Pawtucket Times (10/21, Scudder) noted, "The FBI would not confirm or deny if or what documents were subpoenaed from the town. 'We can only speak to what is public record. I have nothing in my records that indicates any activity that is of public record,' said FBI spokesperson Gail Marcinkevich. Television news reports, however, said that Bauer confirmed it was the FBI that subpoenaed records from town hall."

Informant Taped Friends, Associates, Girlfriend In Effort To Reduce His Sentence. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (10/21, A1, Richardson) reported, "To secure a lighter sentence, Garland Hardeman taped friends, associates and a lover Surviving a .22 caliber shot to the head. … Mr. Hardeman, a Los Angeles cop-turned-lobbyist, was 'working off a beef,' as prosecutors say -- hoping to reduce his own jail time by acting as a government witness. Earlier, he had been busted for attempted bribery in a Los Angeles garbage-hauling scandal. He continued to work as a lobbyist, using the job as cover to trick friends and business associates into admitting their part in one of the most widespread cases of public malfeasance in the U.S., spanning nine cities and five states." Hardeman "wore a wire to record 17 people, many of whom were subsequently convicted. That included his girlfriend. He testified in four grand juries and three trials and accounted for a 'substantial' part of the evidence used in 'the most pervasive corruption case this district has ever seen,' says Tom McConville, a federal prosecutor in the Central District of California. Many of the cases involved paying bribes and kickbacks in return for municipal contracts."

DOJ_NMG_0084410

Williams Settles Education Department Case. The AP (10/21) reported, "Columnist Armstrong Williams has reached a settlement with prosecutors regarding payments he received by the Education Department to promote President Bush's agenda. Under the settlement, Williams admits no wrongdoing but will have to pay $34,000. The deal was reached last week by Williams, the Education Department and its subcontractor, Ketchum Communications." The settlement "brings to a close a yearlong investigation into the case after reports emerged that the Education Department contracted with several radio, television and print commentators to promote the No Child Left Behind Act." The AP adds, "In the settlement, the Justice Department examined whether Williams actually performed the work that was promised in his $240,000 contract signed in late 2003 and cited in his monthly reports to the Education Department. Ultimately, prosecutors determined he was overpaid $34,000."

Man Wanted In Poland For 1998 Police Killing Arrested In US. The Chicago Tribune (10/21, Coen, Bush, Zajac, Wischnowsky) reported that Edward Mazur, a Glenview businessman who is wanted in Poland for soliciting the murder of a former national police chief, ""was taken into custody Friday morning at his home, an arrest billed as a breakthrough in a case of enormous significance in that country." Mazur "appeared in federal court in Chicago on Friday afternoon, and was ordered held pending an identification and extradition hearing Wednesday. The arrest came on the heels of a high-level meeting in Washington this month between Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales and Polish Justice Minister Zbigniew Ziobro."

The AP (10/21, Robinson) reports that US Magistrate Judge Arlander Keys "warned the defendant that if he proved to be the Edward Mazur named in an arrest warrant issued by a court in Warsaw, 'the officials from Poland will come to Chicago and take you in custody to Poland.'"

YouTube Turned Over User Data To Media Lawyers In Response To Subpoena. Market Watch (10/21, Charny) reported, "YouTube's actions in response to a subpoena it received in May show that it has been keeping tabs on users who post copyrighted material to its site -- and in one case shared the name of a user with lawyers from a Hollywood film studio. On May 24, lawyers for Viacom Inc.'s Paramount Pictures convinced a federal judge in San Francisco to issue a subpoena requiring YouTube to turn over details about a user who uploaded dialog from the movie studio's 'Twin Towers,' according to a copy of the document. YouTube promptly handed over the data to Paramount, which on June 16 sued the creator of the 12-minute clip, New York City-based filmmaker Chris Moukarbel, for copyright infringement, in federal court in Washington."

Church Youth Pastor Indicted On Child Porn Charges. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (10/21, Villarreal) reported, "A former youth leader at Grace Baptist Church in St. Charles was indicted Thursday on federal child pornography charges. According to the indictment, Michael Gulley…had seven files of child pornography on his computer. Terri Dougherty, assistant to U.S. Attorney Catherine Hanaway, said the files were sent from Gulley's work computer to his home computer. Capt. Gerry Pollard, spokesman for the St. Charles Police Department, said the investigation began in November 2005. 'A person involved with the church became alarmed at what was going on,' he said." Gulley "was indicted on one felony count of possession of child pornography. If he is convicted, he could face a maximum of 10 years in prison, fines up to $250,000 and supervised release for life."

NYPD To Receive Grant To Buy Bulletproof Vests. The Staten Island Advance (NY) (10/21, Hart) reported, "The NYPD is finally on course to receive a federal grant of more than $538,000 to purchase about 1,000 bulletproof vests, under a funding stream approved yesterday by the Department of Justice. The money comes from the Justice Department's Bulletproof Vest Partnership Grant Program, funded at $30 million in the Fiscal Year 2006 Science, State, Justice, and Commerce Appropriations bill."

Scios Under Investigation For "Off Label" Marketing Of Heart Drug. The San Jose Mercury News (10/21, Johnson) reports, "The heart-failure drug Natrecor seemed sure to become a blockbuster after Scios of Fremont put it on the market in 2001. Besides its use in hospitalized patients, many clinics began giving it to walk-in patients in weekly sessions dubbed 'tuneups.' … There was only one problem: Some medical experts contend Natrecor was never approved for such tuneups. Some also say it may not be as safe as initially thought. Scios says studies show the drug is safe. And it has launched a campaign to clarify to doctors that the drug is not recommended for repeated use in patients in a clinic setting. Nevertheless, the drug's sales have sagged and the company is under investigation by the US attorney in San Francisco for allegedly engaging in 'off-label' marketing, promoting drugs for uses not approved by the government."

DOJ_NMG_0084411

CIVIL LAW:

Illinois Firm Settles Naval Shipyard Kickback Accusations. The Newport News (VA) Daily Press (10/21) reports, "An Illinois transportation firm has agreed to pay $4.2 million to settle US Justice Department accusations that it deliberately overcharged Norfolk Naval Shipyard for delivering cargo. The original whistle-blower -- who runs a competing freight forwarding firm in Newport News -- is sharing the winnings." AIT Worldwide Logistics of Itasca, Ill., "had been accused of scheming with its agent in Hampton Roads and a transportation officer at Norfolk Naval Shipyard to bilk the government in exchange for giving kickbacks to the transportation officer. Paul Watkins runs the Oyster Point division of Target Logistic Services, a Baltimore-based company that competes with AIT for freight forwarding contracts. He was the original whistle-blower, gathering evidence of the scheme three years ago and reporting it to the Naval Criminal Investigative Service. Under the terms of the federal whistle-blower act, Watkins and his lawyer will split 18 percent of the amount of the Justice Department winnings."

Government Reaches Settlement Over Jet Noise Claims. The Navy Times (10/21, McMichael) reports, "The US government has reached a tentative settlement with more than 3,000 southern Virginia homeowners over their claims that excessive Navy jet noise reduced the value of their properties beginning in 1999, according to a court order filed Tuesday. The published order cancels the trial that was scheduled to start Thursday in Chesapeake, Va., under the auspices of the US Court of Federal Claims. Judge Victor J. Wolski also halted all proceedings in all the matters and ordered that the parties file a joint status report on the settlement process within 90 days. Settlement details or proposals for same have not been released. Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson cautioned that 'nothing has been finalized.'"

DOJ Cracking Down On Bankruptcy Fraud. The Salt Lake Tribune (10/21, Oberbeck) reports that the Justice Department is cracking down on bankruptcy fraud. According to the Tribune, prosecutors "have filed criminal charges against 78 people in 36 judicial districts nationwide. Three of them were in Utah. … Among those charged as a result of the nationwide sweep were nine attorneys, two bankruptcy petition preparers and a former law enforcement officer. The Justice Department estimates fraud is involved in approximately 10 percent of all bankruptcy petitions. Collectively, the charges alleged defendants concealed more than $3 million in assets, used false Social Security numbers and identities, submitted fraudulent documents and fraudulently received government loans and benefits, the Justice Department said. In many states such bankruptcy fraud prosecutions are rare, but that's not the case in Utah.

The Federal Times (10/21, Curl) reports, "Agencies are improving the way they disseminate information to the public thanks to a presidential directive that requires them to review and revamp how they respond to Freedom of Information Act requests. The executive order 'has had an immediate and widespread positive effect on the operations of the federal agencies that administer the FOIA,' Attorney General Alberto Gonzales wrote in a report issued Oct. 16. However, he noted that a large backlog at many agencies 'still remains an area of concern.'" The Presidential order, issued in December 2005, "requires agencies to name chief FOIA officers at the assistant secretary level and create improvement plans to streamline the processing of requests. The order also directs agencies to establish one or more service centers and designate one or more public liaisons to this effort. Gonzales said agencies, in their FOIA improvement plans, have embraced a number of critical elements — expanded use of technology, active disclosure of information, improved customer service and backlog reduction."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

California Congressional Candidate's Office Raided. The AP (10/21, Prengaman) reports that the home of California congressional candidate Tan Nguyen was raided by 10 uniformed California Department of Justice police officers Friday. Agents "spent two hours sifting through cabinets, boxes and computers" and "left carrying several boxes and plastic bags of evidence." Nguyen has acknowledged his campaign sent a letter, "which wrongly said immigrants could be jailed if they voted. He blamed an unidentified staffer whom he said he has fired. Nguyen has resisted calls from leaders in his own party to quit the race, saying he did not approve the letter and did not know about it."

The Orange County (CA) Register (10/21, Santana) reports, "Agents also searched Nguyen's Santa Ana home and a campaign worker's Anaheim home."

The McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Santana) reports, "Despite burgeoning state and federal probes into the flier, Nguyen's attorney said Nguyen has no plans to withdraw as the Republican nominee for the 47th Congressional District race against incumbent Democrat Loretta Sanchez. Dave Wiechert, an attorney representing Nguyen, said that 'Mr. Nguyen has indicated that he did not authorize or approve the mailing' yet declined to discuss specifics because of the ongoing investigation. Wiechert added that misinformation was fueling what he called 'a political firestorm.'"

DOJ_NMG_0084412

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Delson, Goffard, Tran) reported, "Even as he prepared to step before the cameras Friday in an effort to mend his tattered candidacy for Congress, the worst week of Tan Nguyen's political life got bleaker still, as state agents raided his Garden Grove campaign headquarters and Santa Ana home, hauling off computers and bags of evidence." Nguyen "maintains that he neither wrote nor authorized the instantly infamous letter, claiming it was the work of a campaign manager he refused to name. According to the head of the Orange County Republican Party, however, the mailing house that sent the letter said Nguyen had a direct hand in it." Nguyen lawyer David Wiechert "said agents from the state attorney general's office had questioned Nguyen for two hours Thursday and that he was cooperating fully with their investigation." The New York Times (10/21, Chang, 1.21M) also briefly reported on the search of Nguyen's home and office.

Local Television. Many California television networks reported that federal authorities raided the campaign office and home of Republican congressional candidate Tan Nguyen in an effort to find evidence regarding who sent a letter threatening illegal immigrants with arrest if they vote. Some examples: KNSD-TV San Diego, (10/20, 6:14 p.m.) broadcasted, "Authorities came looking for answers and for evidence. Investigators with the state Department of Justice spent nearly two hours inside the campaign office of Tan Nguyen. Authorities searched through files, computers and documents. They would not say what they found."

KPSP-TV Palm Springs, (10/20, 5:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "State authorities are searching the campaign office of Orange County Republican congressional candidate Tan Nguyen. … Tonight about ten uniformed agents from the state Department of Justice arrived at the campaign office today with a search warrant."

KSBY-TV Santa Barbara, (10/20, 6:15 p.m.) broadcasted, "State agents search the campaign office of a Republican congressional candidate whose campaign mailed thousands of intimidating letters to Hispanic immigrant voters. Half-dozen agents could be seen opening cabinets and scouring desks in the storefront campaign office of Tan Nguyen."

KFMB-TV San Diego, (10/20, 11:07 p.m.) broadcasted, "Department of Justice agents also searched Tan Nguyen's home. The republican maintains he's innocent, saying he fired the staffer responsible for the controversial letter."

KPSP-TV Palm Springs, (10/21, 11:30 p.m.) broadcasted, "Schwarzenegger said if candidate Tan Nguyen knew about the letter, he should resign. 'I think those kind of tactics are illegal, this is hate crime, and I think that anyone that knew, and if he knew, has to resign immediately. I think there should be no tolerance for this kind of behavior, and I think that it is good that attorney general Bill Lockyer is investigating the whole thing."

Discrimination Claim Could Hurt Cracker Barrel's Ability To Draw Minority Customers. The State (SC) (10/21, Duplessis) reported, "Experts say Cracker Barrel gained one more business risk when the mother of comedian Chris Rock accused Cracker Barrel of racial discrimination for her treatment at a restaurant Tuesday. … The real risk is that it will set back the company's ability to lure one of the most lucrative sources of increasing its business: drawing more minority customers." Lawsuits "led Cracker Barrel to reach a consent decree in 2004. The Justice Department cited widespread discrimination within the chain. In some restaurants, black diners routinely were given tables apart from whites, were seated after white customers who arrived later and were given inferior service. The decree led Cracker Barrel to establish a discrimination policy."

Court Strikes Down Las Vegas Ordinance Barring Street Solicitation. The New York Times (10/21, Marshall) reported, "A federal appeals court in San Francisco struck down a Las Vegas ordinance barring solicitation on city streets, calling it unconstitutional. The decision, by the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, stems from a 1997 case brought by the American Civil Liberties Union and several religious and political groups challenging Las Vegas ordinances that barred certain groups from distributing leaflets or using vendor tables along a five-block pedestrian promenade. The court also ruled that the city violated the ACLU's constitutional right to free speech when it forbid it to set up a vendor table."

Alabama Reported Zero Hate Crimes In 2005. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (10/21, Daker) reported, "No hate crimes were recorded in Alabama in 2005, according to statistics released this week by the FBI, but law enforcement agencies representing about 10 percent of the state's population were the only ones providing information for the survey. Alabama and Mississippi were the only states in the nation that reported zero hate crimes, according to the FBI. Hawaii did not participate in the study, which included 49 states and the District of Columbia." The FBI "reported that nationally more than 7,000 criminal incidents recorded in 2005 occurred as a result of bias toward a particular race, religion, sexual orientation, ethnicity/national origin, or physical or mental disability. In 2005, California reported the most hate crimes, recording 1,379. New Jersey reported the second most with 738, according to the FBI."

ACLU Asks Justice Department To Monitor Chesterfield County Voting. The Richmond Times-

DOJ_NMG_0084413

Dispatch (10/21, Whitley) reported, "The American Civil Liberties Union of Virginia asked the U.S. Justice Department yesterday to send election observers to Chesterfield County on Election Day. The ACLU claims the county's actions could discourage minority voters. Kent Willis, director of the ACLU, cited four incidents over the past two years, including a new allegation that the registrar, Lawrence C. Haake III, refused to issue an absentee ballot to a registered voter because the prospective voter would not give his Social Security number. Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the department has received the letter from Willis. It does not disclose which localities it will monitor until 24 hours before an election, she said."

The AP (10/21) reported, "Willis cited several actions since 2004: --In October 2004, the county's general registrar, Lawrence Haake III, announced plans for security reasons to place armed guards at every polling precinct, a tactic Willis said was used in the past to intimidate black voters. --In November 2004, ACLU officials received complaints that county poll workers were restricting voters lacking identification. Willis said Virginia law allows voters to cast ballots without identification, provided they sign an affirmation of identity. --Requiring absentee voters to provide Social Security numbers. The State Board of Elections has said registrars can ask for Social Security numbers, but they cannot deny a ballot. --Refusing to count provisional ballots of voters who registered through the state Department of Motor Vehicles prior to registration deadlines, but whose applications had not been forwarded to the registrar."

SCOTUS Overturns Injunction On Arizona Voter ID Law. The Washington Post (10/21, A3, Lane, 748K) reports the Supreme Court "ruled yesterday that Arizona may enforce a new state law requiring voters to show a photo identification card at the polls on Election Day this year, despite a pending lawsuit by opponents who say the measure will disenfranchise the poor, minorities and the elderly. In its unanimous five-page ruling, the court did not decide whether the Arizona law was constitutional. Rather, it overturned a federal appeals court in San Francisco that would have blocked enforcement of the law until the opponents' suit could be decided." The law "requires voters not only to present proof of citizenship when they register but also to present a photo ID when they go to the polls. Those without a photo ID may cast a provisional ballot, but their votes do not count unless they can produce a valid identification card within five days."

The New York Times (10/21, Greenhouse, 1.21M) reports, "In an unsigned opinion, the court granted Arizona's request to overturn an injunction issued this month by a two-judge federal appeals panel. The judges, A. Wallace Tashima and William A. Fletcher of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, had acted at the request of a group of Arizona Indian tribes, the League of Women Voters and other groups who have joined to challenge the constitutionality of the rules." The AP (10/21, Sherman) reports, "Courts in Georgia and Missouri have blocked similar laws. Justice John Paul Stevens, in a brief concurring opinion, said the high court's action makes it more likely that the constitutional issues 'will be resolved correctly on the basis of historical facts rather than speculation.'"

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Savage, 918K) reports, "Friday's order is likely to be seen as a benefit for Republican candidates and a setback for Democrats. In recent years, Republicans in Congress and in many state capitals have pressed for voter-identification requirements at the ballot box. They say these rules are needed to combat fraudulent voting."

ANTITRUST:

Consumer Groups Want More Concessions From AT&T For BellSouth Buyout. The AP (10/21, Dunbar) reported, "Consumer groups say concessions offered by AT&T Inc. as it seeks government approval of its buyout of BellSouth Corp. fall far short of what's needed for the deal to be in the public interest. The Justice Department has signed off on the deal, but the Federal Communications Commission has not voted on it. AT&T contends it has offered a full range of accommodations, including $10-a-month Internet access, free modems, promises to temporarily freeze prices for competitors that use the company's networks and even a program to return to the United States some jobs that were shipped overseas." The AP Adds, "Opponents of the deal, whose views often closely track those of the commission's two Democrats who managed to delay a planned FCC vote, would like to see AT&T beef up its offer in three main areas: Stronger assurances by the company that it will not discriminate against certain kinds of Internet traffic, a concept known as 'network neutrality.' Offer 'naked DSL,' or stand-alone digital subscriber line service, that is priced competitively. Lower prices for 'special access' customers -- service offered to capacity-hungry customers, such as large businesses and Internet service providers, that guarantee a dedicated high-capacity link to distribute voice and data."

Bloomberg (10/21) reported, "AT&T Inc. will fight calls by opponents of its $81 billion purchase of BellSouth Corp. to divest airwaves intended for wireless high-speed Internet service, a company lobbyist said. AT&T, the biggest U.S. telephone company, plans to use the airwaves for emerging 'WiMax' broadband services, Senior Vice President Robert Quinn said Friday. 'Mobility is a feature that people are going to want to have,' Quinn said. 'We have every incentive in the world to utilize that spectrum.'"

DOJ_NMG_0084414

Judge Rules Petco Vote Can Proceed. The San Diego Union-Tribune (10/21, Green) reported, "A judge declined yesterday to block a Monday meeting at which Petco shareholders will vote on the proposed sale of the company to two private investment firms. Attorneys representing dissident shareholders had wanted a temporary injunction halting the meeting so that shareholders could, among other remedies, be provided with additional information on how the company's board chose Leonard Green & Partners and Texas Pacific's $1.8 billion bid over a higher offer from PetSmart. In turning down the injunction request, San Diego Superior Court Judge John S. Meyer said there was not enough time 'to add some discrete information to the proxy' with Monday's meeting looming. He added that he was not sure whether an injunction was appropriate. He voiced concern during the hearing about possible damage to Petco's stock price if there should be a delay in the vote."

Federal Reserve Approves Regions, AmSouth Merger. The Huntsville Times (AL) (10/21, Smith) reports, "Regions Financial Corp. and AmSouth Bancorp. said late Friday that the Federal Reserve Board has approved their planned merger. The announcement came one day after AmSouth said it had reached an agreement with federal regulators to sell 52 branches in Alabama, Mississippi and Tennessee. That agreement resolved antitrust concerns raised by the Department of Justice after the two Birmingham-based banks said last spring they planned to merge. … The combined bank will keep the Regions name."

Ripplewood Mulling Bid For Delphi. The Wall Street Journal (10/21, A3, Dugan) reported, "Ripplewood Holdings LLC, a large New York-based buyout firm, is preparing a likely bid for Delphi Corp., the auto-parts giant that filed for bankruptcy protection last year, according to people familiar with the matter. Ripplewood has examined the possibility of taking over the entire auto-parts maker, but a bid for just part of Delphi also is possible, these people said." The Journal adds, "A bid for all of Delphi likely would far surpass $10 billion, people involved in the discussions said. Delphi's enterprise value -- the value of all its stocks and bonds combined -- is estimated to total between $13 billion and $14 billion when it emerges from bankruptcy protection, according to stakeholders and officials who have been negotiating a restructuring for several months."

Tops Exec Says There Was No Viable Offer To Buy Ohio Stores. The Cleveland Plain Dealer (10/21, Cho) reported, "Tops Markets LLC insists there was never a financially viable offer to buy all 46 of its grocery stores in Northeast Ohio. John Barrett, a senior vice president for Tops Markets in Williamsville, N.Y., said if Tops had received what it considered a legitimate proposal to keep all its stores open and hire all 4,000-plus employees, it would have taken it." Barrett's remarks "came at a meeting Friday with U.S. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, who is raising antitrust questions about Tops' decision to sell 18 of the stores to its principal competitor, Giant Eagle Inc."

High Court To Hear Weyerhaeuser Argument On Illegal Monopoly Ruling. The Oregonian (10/21, Rivera) reported, "The US Supreme Court will hear arguments next month about a ruling that Oregon and seven other states say is critical in stopping big companies from getting away with illegal monopolies in forest products, agriculture and high-tech goods. Attorneys general from Oregon, California, Arizona, Iowa, Louisiana, Montana, West Virginia and Wisconsin recently submitted a court brief that comes down against an argument by Weyerhaeuser Co., the timber giant. The case led to a $79 million judgment against Weyerhaeuser, prompting settlements and judgments totaling about another $50 million. The states did not explicitly support a 2003 Portland federal jury verdict that found Weyerhaeuser had created an illegal monopoly in the market for alder sawlogs. But they wrote stridently against a tough new legal standard for antitrust plaintiffs that Weyerhaeuser is seeking. Rejection of Weyerhaeuser's argument and adoption of a more lenient one, the states wrote, could bar a single firm from dominating government timber auctions, protect small businesses and ensure competition for government contracts."

Avaya Faces Federal Antitrust Suit. The AP (10/21, Johnson) reported, "Business communications systems provider Avaya is accused in a federal antitrust lawsuit of illegally blocking competitors from providing maintenance and repairs to telephone equipment and software sold by Avaya. Continuant of Fife, Wash., which operates a telephone system maintenance business throughout North America, said Wednesday that it countersued Bernards-based Avaya after the AT&T spinoff sued Continuant this summer. The two parties are scheduled to appear in federal court in Trenton, where the two lawsuits were filed, for a hearing Nov. 14."

Technical Glitch Mars Meeting On Vista Operating System. The IDG News Service (10/21, McMillan) reported, "Security vendors looking to gain insight into Microsoft's plans for opening up the Vista operating system kernel were frustrated Thursday morning when a technical glitch kept many from joining the first online discussion of this issue. … Microsoft set up the meeting to talk about how it plans to give security vendors access to

DOJ_NMG_0084415

Vista's kernel on 64-bit systems. This has been a contentious issue, as Microsoft had initially planned to lock software vendors such as Symantec and McAfee out of the kernel, claiming that this would make Vista more secure. The security vendors said this would harm their products, and Microsoft finally capitulated, after first being warned by European Union regulators. Microsoft rescheduled its Thursday morning Web conference after it realized it had sent out a bad LiveMeeting link to participants, but in the end some security vendors were shut out of the meeting."

Vista Fight Pits Microsoft Against Vendors. The AP (10/21, Robertson) reports that the fight over Microsoft's Vista operating system pits the company "against an unlikely adversary: the security software vendors who are some of its most intimate partners in protecting its notoriously vulnerable systems from attacks. As Vista's planned release nears, the company is facing a backlash from such vendors as Symantec Corp. and McAfee Inc., which argue that even the concessions Microsoft recently made to appease European antitrust regulators won't do enough to help them best protect their customers."

Gartner Analyst Says Antitrust Changes To Vista Will Take Years To Complete. CNET News (10/21, Evers) reported, "Antitrust related changes to security in Windows Vista 64-bit will take years to complete and will cause compatibility trouble in the interim," according to Gartner analyst Neil MacDonald. CNET added, "Users of security technologies such as host intrusion-prevention systems, or HIPS, should postpone buying 64-bit versions of Vista, Gartner analyst Neil MacDonald wrote in a research note published on Wednesday. MacDonald also noted that many integrated security products today include HIPS functionality."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Solar Services Companies Provide Cleaner Energy To Corporations. The New York Times (10/21, Deutsch, 1.21M) reports that one solution "a small but growing number of other companies and municipalities" have adopted to avoid high investment costs in solar power is to get "solar energy from systems installed by others. Even though the installations are right on their own roofs, they buy the electricity much as they would from a utility's grid. And because the companies that paid for the systems will get a steady income, they can provide power from the sun at competitive electricity rates." One example is a G.M.'s parts warehouse in Cucamonga, Calif., which "has been host to a photovoltaic array with the ability to generate as much as 1.5 million kilowatt hours of electricity a year." The Times notes, "A solar developer called Developing Energy Efficient Roof Systems…bought the equipment with money it raised from private financiers. Deers and its investors own the cells; G.M. signed a long-term contract to purchase the solar-generated electricity from them, at a discount to the prevailing rate for electricity in the region."

Homeowner Touts Benefits Of Personal Solar-Hydrogen Energy System. ABC World News (10/20, story 9, 2:00, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "While the ups and downs of energy prices make a big difference to millions of families, what if you didn't care because your energy bills were zero? Today, one man in New Jersey, unhooked from the power grid forever." ABC describes how Mike Strizki has installed a "homemade, pollution-free power plant. And it will run his home using only sunlight and water." Strizki also has a fuel cell car, "also powered with homemade hydrogen. As a working prototype, the system was not cheap. $150,000 paid for with a utility grant. But Mike is quick to point out that early computers were also big and expensive."

Study Warns Of Extreme Weather Caused By Global Warming. The Washington Post/AP (10/21, A2, Borenstein) reports, "The world -- especially the Western United States, the Mediterranean region and Brazil -- is likely to suffer more extended droughts, heavy rainfalls and longer heat waves over the next century because of global warming, a new study" of nine computer models by the National Center for Atmospheric Research forecasts. Yet, "the prediction of a future of nasty extreme weather also includes fewer freezes and a longer growing season."

WSJ Dismisses Concerns Over Growing Population's Strain On Resources. The Wall Street Journal (10/21, A8, 2.03M) editorializes, "At bottom, the debate over population revolves around a single question: Are human beings a burden, or a resource?" The world has escaped pessimistic prognostications because of "prosperity" as "economic growth has easily outstripped population growth, giving the U.S., and much of the rest of the world, both more people and more prosperity, something presumed to be impossible by the Malthusians. Meanwhile, the slowdown in population growth brings a whole new set of challenges. To meet them, America and the world will need more minds generating new ideas. Four hundred million, here we come."

Court Limits Feds' Authority At Indian Casinos. The AP (10/21, Werner) reports, "The federal government can't make rules for the ways Las Vegas-style games are played at Indian casinos, an appeals court ruled Friday in a blow to efforts to regulate the booming, $22 billion tribal gambling industry. The decision by a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit arises from a dispute in Arizona between the Colorado River Indian Tribes and the National Indian Gaming Commission, the federal agency that oversees Indian casinos. The commission tried in 2001 to audit the tribe's casino in Parker, Ariz., to ensure compliance with recently enacted federal standards for how games like blackjack and slot machines are run. The tribe objected, contending the commission was overstepping its authority under the National Indian Gaming Regulatory Act. A federal district court sided with the tribe, and the appeals court agreed in an 11-page ruling. While federal law gives the gaming commission some authority over games like lotto and bingo on Indian land, the big moneymakers like blackjack and slots…are outside the commission's jurisdiction, said the ruling written by Judge A. Raymond Randolph."

DOJ_NMG_0084416

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Two Face Sentencing In January On Gun Trafficking Charges. The Knoxville News Sentinel (TN) (10/21, Satterfield) reported that George Manus and Timothy Cobb pleaded guilty in US District Court to gun trafficking charges and face sentencing in January. The Sentinel reported, "In paperwork prepared as part of their pleas, Assistant U.S. Attorney Tracee Plowell described a profitable gun peddling business where the only thing that mattered was cash. … Manus and Cobb were nabbed as part of a US Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives probe. It isn't the first time the ATF has gone after flea market gun dealers. The agency headed a roundup of more than a dozen unlicensed dealers in 2002."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Back Aide Suspended Over Suspicion Of NIE Leak. The New York Times (10/21, Shane, 1.21M) reports, "The senior Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee yesterday sharply protested the chairman's decision to suspend a Democratic staff member's access to classified information in a leak inquiry. The congresswoman, Jane Harman of California, called the action a groundless act of political retaliation." She "said [Chairman Peter] Hoekstra had admitted to her that his action against [Larry] Hanauer was payback for her release on Tuesday of a report on actions by former Representative Randy Cunningham while he was on the Intelligence Committee."

The Washington Post (10/21, A4, Pincus, 748K) reports that Hoekstra's act, "which has drawn sharp criticism from Democratic panel members, was described by legislators of both parties as another example of the increased partisan infighting that has damaged the workings of the intelligence panel during this election year." Attorney Jonathan Turley represents Hanauer and "said there was 'not a single scintilla of evidence suggesting that Mr. Hanauer had any role in the leaking of the NIE.'"

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Miller, 918K) reports that the dispute "reflects a major deterioration in relations on a committee that traditionally has sought to avoid partisan clashes. One congressional official said the committee was in 'meltdown.'" Hoekstra "was angered earlier this week when Harman publicly released an unclassified summary of an internal committee investigation into abuses by former Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham." The Washington Times/AP (10/21) reports that Hoekstra "said the step was the least aggressive he could take while the committee investigates."

Bush Urges Republicans To Tout Medicare Drug Benefit. The AP (10/21, Freking) reports President Bush "said Friday that Republicans are missing an opportunity if they're not talking up the Medicare drug benefit while campaigning this election season. 'I think this is a fantastic program, but more importantly, so do the seniors,' he said in an interview with The Associated Press. The drug program was rife with problems at the outset, but reports indicate that in recent months it has been operating smoothly. The administration estimates that the average elderly or disabled person will save about $1,100 annually on medicine. Polls indicate that most participants are satisfied. 'My own view is our candidates and the people who voted for this ought to be out there traveling to senior centers all over their districts and their state saying, "Look what we did,"' Bush said."

Gerson Defends Bush's "Compassionate Conservatism." The Wall Street Journal's Naomi Schaefer Riley (10/21, A8) writes, "two questions have frothed up within the recesses of the GOP… : Has compassionate conservatism worked? And should Republicans try it again? … Perhaps the best person to sort out this business is" President Bush's former speechwriter Michael Gerson. Gerson "is plotting a book about the future of conservatism. He has been giving a lot of thought to its history. Known around the White House as 'Mr. Compassionate Conservatism,' Mr. Gerson tells me: 'I think it's a political truth that one reason we won the 2000 election was that Republicans finally had a message on education and welfare. In 2008, they will have to have something other than a simplistic antigovernment message.'" Gerson "asserts that the president has been nothing if not honest about where he comes down in that argument. 'It should not have surprised anyone that President Bush was going to sign on to the Medicare prescription-drug benefit because he campaigned on it in 1999. And it should not have surprised anyone that he was going to define a federal role in education to raise standards because it was one of his main promises as a candidate."

DOJ_NMG_0084417

Pelosi's Refusal To Negotiate With GOP Credited With Boosting Democrats. Three prominent US newspapers publish reports on the possibility that House Minority Leader could become Speaker. The Washington Post (10/21, A1, Romano, 748K), in a front-page article titled, "The Woman Who Would Be Speaker," reports, "On election night 2004, Nancy Pelosi faced a painful reality: Her party was again a big loser. … Pundits were suggesting Pelosi should accept her fate as the leader of a permanent House minority." But Pelosi "had a different idea. Instead, she reached out to advertising executives, Internet moguls and language specialists to ask how Democrats could rise from the ashes and challenge President Bush and the Republicans. The advice that came back was unabashed: 'You must take him down' and then hammer away at the differences between the two parties, Pelosi recalled. Today the Democrats appear capable of taking back leadership of the House…for reasons largely beyond Pelosi's control. … Nevertheless, if the Democrats win, experts say, much credit is due this 66-year-old woman, whose notable fundraising abilities (she raised $50 million this election cycle) and scorched-earth strategy of refusing to negotiate with the GOP have put her on track to become the first woman to be speaker of the House."

The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Fiore, 918K) reports Democrats "need to gain 15 seats to take control, and Pelosi falls asleep at night crunching the numbers. It is her single burning obsession to lead her party to victory, and she devotes nearly every waking minute to it, coaching candidates, raising money and calculating in which districts to spend it. In three years as minority leader she has raised record amounts of cash and preached party unity that has helped bring 201 unruly Democrats to the brink of power."

Blue Dogs Claim They Will Exert Moderating Influence Over Democratic Majority. The Washington Post (10/21, A6, Weisman, 748K) reports, "If Democrats win control in November…Pelosi has decided to award committee chairmanships based almost entirely on seniority, ensuring that the House would feature far more minority faces, and some liberal firebrands, in key posts. But, mindful of the growing power of an expanding band of Democratic moderates and conservatives," Pelosi "has assured conservative Democrats that she would personally temper the legislative impulses of her most liberal chairmen while keeping close tabs on the investigations that could dominate the final two years of the Bush presidency." Rep. Dennis Cardoza, Blue Dog coalition co-chairman, "promised that the group would be 'a moderating influence on any excesses that might be brought forth by other wings of the party.'" The Post goes on to report, "The intelligence committee remains the biggest problem. The senior Democrat, Rep. Jane Harman (Calif.), wants the chairmanship and has the strong backing of the Blue Dogs. But personal friction between Harman and Pelosi virtually ensures that Harman will not remain on the committee, according to lawmakers and aides close to Pelosi."

Congress Urged To Overhaul Medical Records System. ABC World News (10/20, story 7, 2:20,Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Today, ABC is wrapping up a week of reports exploring ways to improve health care in America. How to make it better, more affordable, more available. Our medical editor, Dr. Timothy Johnson, has been a guiding force behind this series. … Is there one thing that we could do right now that would improve care and bring down costs?" Dr. Timothy Johnson: "Absolutely. That would be introducing an electronic, computerized record-keeping system to replace the sloppy, wasteful paperwork system we have right now. Not only could that lower cost. But it would more importantly improve quality. The best systems in this country already do it. The government has to take the lead on this. They have the clout. They could pass legislation. It's bipartisan. Leaders in both parties say they want to do it. They need to stop talking and do it."

White House Aides Among Members Of Prominent Young Republican Group. The New York Times (10/21, Schaefer, 1.21M) describes how the "Swine on the Vine, of the Capital Club, a Washington group of 100 politically connected young men," use parties to release stress from working in the Capitol. The Times notes, "Among the club members and their guests, most in their 20's and 30's, were White House staff members. … Barbara and Jenna Bush have been known to show up at some of the parties." They "in some cases are wired right into the brain trust at the White House: the Republican lobbying firm DCI Group, which has strong ties to the Republican Party chairman Ken Mehlman and the White House senior adviser Karl Rove, has sponsored its parties. But club members insist their gatherings are not about networking or advancing anyone's career or political agenda." Among other former notable members is "Billy Bush, President Bush's cousin and a host of 'Access Hollywood.'"

Paulson Sells Manhattan Condo For Almost $8 Million. Bloomberg (10/21, Crenson) reports, "U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson…sold his 50th floor condominium near Manhattan's Lincoln Center for almost $8 million, according to public records." Bloomberg adds, "The median price for four-bedroom Manhattan apartments like Paulson's was just under $7 million in the third quarter, according to Miller Samuel Inc., the borough's largest appraiser."

DOJ_NMG_0084418

NYT Criticizes Administration's Space Policy. The New York Times (10/21, 1.21M) editorializes, "The Bush administration has adopted a jingoistic and downright belligerent tone toward space operations. In a new 'national space policy' posted without fanfare on an obscure government Web site, and in recent speeches, it has signaled its determination to be pre-eminent in space…while opposing any treaties that might curtail any American action there." It "is being portrayed as a modest extension of the Clinton administration's space policy issued a decade ago." Yet "the more aggressive tone of the Bush policy may undercut international cooperation on civilian space projects -- a goal to which the new policy subscribes -- or set off an eventual arms race in space." And it "reflects the worst tendencies of the Bush administration -- a unilateral drive for supremacy and a rejection of treaties."

WPost Decries Wasteful Federal Farm Subsidies. The Washington Post (10/21, A18, 748K), in an editorial, states that a Post investigation of farm subsidies reveals "billions of federal dollars" are "wasted in unfair and uncompetitive handouts, many of which go to farmers working land that would be left fallow in a freer market." In response, "North Dakota farmer Terry Aronson unpretentiously defended the system to Post reporters. 'Taxpayers are funding something good, the rural life.' Yet most Americans -- removed from 'the rural life' in urban and suburban communities -- pay not only the opportunity cost of funneling money to farmers but also the incalculable costs of failed trade talks, which hurt the American consumer. America has a sentimental attachment to its farmlands. But preserving the rural life of a few, unproductive farmers is not worth the price it pays to do it."

OTHER NEWS:

Stocks Down Slightly After Record-Setting Week. The Washington Post/AP (10/21, D1, Paradis) reports, "Wall Street ended a record-setting week narrowly mixed Friday, with the Dow Jones industrial average falling to close at slightly more than 12,000 after a lackluster profit report and forecast from Caterpillar Inc. prompted many investors to retreat." Ryan Beck & Co. chief investment officer Joe Battipaglia "contends that while earnings reports have been sound over all companies are coming in with more guarded forecasts. He also is concerned that falling oil prices could indicate the economy is slowing too quickly."

The Wall Street Journal (10/21, B1, Hudson, 2.03M) says, "After 10 upward moves in the last 14 trading sessions, some market watchers think the Dow industrials are poised to take a breather, at least for the short term." The Journal notes, "The stock market is 'still nervous and jittery and will likely be so for the next week or so, until we're done with earnings season,' said Brian Reynolds, chief market strategist for M.S. Howells, a Scottsdale, Ariz., brokerage firm. 'Eventually we'll work through that and start moving up again.'"

Bloomberg (10/21, Baker) reports, "U.S. stocks preserved their fourth straight weekly gain as earnings at Google Inc. and 3M Co. beat analysts' estimates and oil dropped below $57 a barrel, lifting companies that depend on consumer spending." The Dow Jones Industrial Average "slid 9.36, or 0.1 percent, to 12,002.37" and the S&P 500 Index "rose 1.64, or 0.1 percent, to 1368.60. The Nasdaq Composite Index gained 1.36, or 0.1 percent, to 2342.30." Bloomberg adds, "For the week, the S&P 500 increased 0.2 percent, while the Dow average gained 0.4 percent and the Nasdaq fell 0.6 percent."

OPEC Seeks To Cut Supply As Oil Prices Continue To Fall. ABC World News (10/20, story 8, 0:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "As oil prices keep falling, OPEC, today, vowed to cut supply. But prices just fell some more. At an emergency meeting, OPEC announced plans to cut production by 1.2 million barrels a day, about 4%. But with traders skeptical that OPEC members will actually stick to the deal, oil closed down almost $2 a barrel to under $57."

Bloomberg (10/21, Shenk) reports, "OPEC's cutback was larger than the reduction that ministers had been talking about for the past two weeks and was endorsed by OPEC's biggest producer, Saudi Arabia, which will trim output by 380,000 barrels a day." Energy Security Analysis Inc. analyst Rick Mueller said, "A cut of 1 million barrels was factored in so it looks like they decided to cut more to get the market's attention. … I doubt there will be a dramatic up-tick in prices because inventories are so high and uncertainty about what the members will actually cut."

The Washington Post (10/21, D1, Mufson, 748K) says, "If yesterday was a test of the power of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, the cartel flunked." The Post notes, "Oil traders and analysts said they remained unconvinced that OPEC members would have enough discipline to trim production by more than half the amount announced. And it remained unclear whether that smaller amount would be enough to stabilize prices as OPEC hopes." Meanwhile, decreasing oil prices "continued to provide a boost to the U.S. economy, especially for companies sensitive to fuel prices."

Texas Judge Avoids Reprimand For Support Of Miers. The New York Times (10/21, Blumenthal, 1.21M)

DOJ_NMG_0084419

reports Texas Supreme Court judge Nathan. Hecht, "who championed a longtime friend and fellow Republican, Harriet E. Miers, for the United States Supreme Court last year was cleared Friday of charges that his efforts had violated state rules of judicial ethics." He "had received a public admonition, the mildest form of sanction, from the State Commission on Judicial Conduct. It said he had discredited the judiciary by giving about 120 interviews that amounted to an endorsement of another candidate and a lending of judicial prestige to a private interest." Yet "three appellate justices appointed as a Special Court of Review to hear Justice Hecht's appeal overturned the reprimand, which had carried no civil or criminal penalty." The AP (10/21, Brown) reports similar details.

Bush Makes Surprise Appearance At Italian-American Event. The AP (10/21, Riechmann) reports President Bush "made a surprise appearance Friday night at a National Italian American Foundation dinner show featuring Frankie Valli and the Four Seasons." Bush "recognized famous faces in the audience, including Justices Samuel Alito Jr. and Antonin Scalia," but "then his remarks turned serious. Bush recognized one prominent Italian American, Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who was missing from the annual gathering that attracted more than 1,000 people to a Washington hotel." Bush said, "We're in a titanic struggle between extremists and radicals who cannot stand the way of life of America. … They don't like the thought that people from different backgrounds are able to live under a nation and work together and achieve greatness. They can't stand the thought of free societies flourishing in their midst."

RNC Ad References LBJ's "Daisy Ad." NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 7, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "The Republican National Committee is out with a new campaign ad and when some political veterans first saw it, it reminded them of something. The ad, which shows a series of images and threats from al Qaeda contains the following wording on the screen. At the end of the ad, 'these are the stakes.' Well, when some politicos laid eyes on the ad it reminded them of something from a few decades ago. That there, the voice of President Lyndon Johnson, and the famous 'daisy ad' designed to scare people away from Goldwater in 1964. … The R.N.C. has only purchased about $20,000 in airtime. They're hoping for news media exposure to provide free airtime."

GOP Airs Ads Claiming Democrats Endanger Children In Response To Foley Scandal. The AP (10/21, Kuhnhenn) reports "in this political ad, the message is in the faceless voices of cheerful children engaged in mayhem. 'Hit the hooker with the tire iron!' 'Steal the old lady's car.' 'Shoot her first!' The ad accuses a Democratic candidate of voting against banning the sale of violent and sexually explicit video games to children. Another ad, in Connecticut, says a Democrat voted to permit convicted sex offenders in public housing. Yet another, in Arizona, linked a candidate's work as a lawyer for the American Civil Liberties Union to the ACLU's defense of a pedophile's group. In the fallout from former Rep. Mark Foley's electronic sex scandal, Republicans are turning the tables on Democrats, airing ads and leveling public accusations claiming their opponents have failed to protect children against sexual imagery, sexual violence or sexual predators." The AP adds, "The ad featuring children playing a violent video game is aimed at Rep. Baron Hill, a Democrat and former House member who is trying to recapture his seat from Republican Rep. Mike Sodrel. It cites Hill's vote in 1999 against an amendment to a juvenile crime bill that would have prohibited the sale of violent and sexually explicit movies and video games to teenagers."

Democrats' Religious Outreach More Focused Than In Years Past. The Washington Post (10/21, B9, Burke, 748K) reports on a meeting of the House Democrats' Faith Working Group. According to the Post, "As Democrats seek to reframe America's debate over moral values and close their 'God gap' with religious communities, conversations such as these are blowing like a mighty wind through party circles. Gone are the days when 'faith outreach' meant visiting African-American churches two weeks before an election, party leaders say. Instead, Democrats are seeking -- and getting -- regular meetings with megachurch pastors T.D. Jakes, Joel Osteen and Rick Warren. Rather than cede red states to Republicans, the party is buying airtime on Christian radio stations, with the message that Democrats are indeed a party with deep moral convictions."

Polls Said To Indicate Candidates Can Gain Votes By Moving To The Center. The Wall Street Journal's John Harwood (10/21, A2) writes, "Prevailing political wisdom holds that the only things that matter are each party's 'base' -- that there is no center anymore, and no more swing voters worth chasing. But look at what has happened among independent voters in the latest Wall Street Journal/NBC Poll1, taken this past week: Support for Republicans has collapsed. Just 24% of them say they want President Bush's party to control Congress after Election Day. Independents disapprove of Mr. Bush's job performance by 2 to 1. That's a big change from 2004, when Mr. Bush and John Kerry split the votes of independents." This year "Just 5% of Republicans want Democrats to take over Capitol Hill. Just 2% of Democrats want Republicans to win." Harwood notes that Sen. Conrad Burns will try to close Jon Tester's lead "by accusing his opponent of favoring tax increases. He won't rail against 'earmarks' the way some Republicans are doing to court their disaffected right wing. In a classic appeal toward centrists, Sen. Burns will invoke his clout as an appropriations subcommittee chairman."

DOJ_NMG_0084420

McCain Aiding GOP Candidates While Laying Groundwork For 2008. The Wall Street Journal (10/21, A4, Hitt, Conkey, 2.03M) reports Sen. John McCain "has capitalized in an aggressive and systematic way by using the 2006 fight for control of Congress to lay the groundwork for a probable run for the presidency in 2008. Mr. McCain is crisscrossing the country on behalf of beleaguered Republicans, tapping his position as one of his party's most popular figures at a time when the image of President Bush and other administration officials is slumping. The senator has steered $1.2 million of campaign funds so far to Republican candidates and political committees. He is enlisting influential grass-roots supporters in Iowa and New Hampshire, pivotal early battlegrounds in the presidential-nomination fight. And he is firing up the party's conservative foot soldiers, picking a fight with New York Sen. Hillary Clinton…over whether her husband's administration took adequate steps to contain North Korea's nuclear ambitions." McCain "has plans to campaign almost daily through Nov. 7. … Embattled Republican candidates campaigning with Mr. McCain…are benefiting from his carefully cultivated image as an iconoclast who nonetheless remains loyal to the party."

Clinton Faces Questions Concerning Her Presidential Ambitions During Debate. The New York Times (10/21, Kornblut, 1.21M) reports, "Facing a barrage of questions about her national ambitions during the first Senate debate on Friday night, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton firmly maintained that she was focused on her work in Congress and had made no decisions about running for president. But her Republican opponent [John Spencer] seized on her aspirations at every opening, accusing her of already abdicating her responsibilities to New York." The AP (10/20, Humbert) reports Clinton "acknowledged that she has thought about running for the presidency in 2008, but said she is committed to running for Senate re-election. 'As you might guess, I've been asked that a few times before,' she said of her possible White House aspirations. 'I am focused on this election. I am focused on my work in the Senate. Obviously, people are talking about whether I will or should be running for president, and I'm flattered by that.'" The New York Times (10/21, Pérez-peña, 1.21M) reports, "on the question hanging over the race, and the first to arise in the debate — will Mrs. Clinton, a Democrat, run for president in 2008? — there is no provable answer, though it would be hard to find a politically minded American without an opinion."

Edwards' Wife Apologizes To Clinton. The AP (10/21, Elliott) reports Elizabeth Edwards, wife of former Senator John Edwards, "apologized to Sen. Hillary Clinton after saying her choices in life have made her happier than the senator, a Clinton aide said Friday. Clinton adviser Howard Wolfson said Elizabeth Edwards called the New York Democrat on Friday night. … 'Elizabeth Edwards called her and apologized,' Wolfson said. 'They had a good conversation.' Wolfson said the two spoke only for a couple of minutes. 'The senator thanked her for the call and wished her well on her book tour,' Wolfson said. The apology followed remarks by Elizabeth Edwards on Thursday at a luncheon sponsored by Ladies' Home Journal. 'She and I are from the same generation,' she said of the senator and former first lady. 'We both went to law school and married other lawyers, but after that we made other choices. I think my choices have made me happier. I think I'm more joyful than she is.'"

Lieberman Has 17 Point Lead In New Poll. The New York Times (10/21, Medina, 1.21M) reports Sen. Joseph Lieberman "won the backing of a top Republican in the Senate on Friday as Howard Dean traveled here to rally Democrats behind Ned Lamont's effort to unseat Mr. Lieberman." Lieberman "appeared at the New London City Pier with Senator Susan M. Collins, a Republican from Maine, to highlight the need for port security — and to campaign together." Dean "appeared at a sports bar in the state capital to rally support for Mr. Lamont and other Democratic candidates, including John DeStefano, the mayor of New Haven, who is running for governor, and Christopher S. Murphy, who is trying to unseat Congresswoman Nancy L. Johnson, a Republican." The Times notes yesterday's "release of a Quinnipiac University poll that showed Mr. Lamont trailing Mr. Lieberman by 17 percentage points, widening a 10-point lead he held in a Quinnipiac poll last month. The poll showed a 52 to 35 lead among likely voters and was conducted from Tuesday through Thursday. It had a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points. The Republican candidate for the Senate, Alan Schlesinger, trailed with 6 percent of the vote. Another 7 percent said they were undecided."

Ford Disrupts Corker News Conference. The AP (10/21, Rucker) reports Rep. Harold Ford Jr. "turned up at a news conference Friday in Memphis called by his opponent, Republican Bob Corker, leading to a confrontation about Ford's large, politically active family." Corker "has questioned the work of Ford's father, former U.S. Rep. Harold Ford Sr., as a lobbyist for Fannie Mae while Ford Jr. sat on the House committee overseeing the mortgage giant's activities. Ford Jr. said that no one in his family has ever lobbied him on congressional issues and that he would refuse them if they did. Corker had scheduled the Friday morning news conference at a Memphis airport to discuss a proposal to prohibit relatives of senators and representatives from lobbying their family members." Ford "told Corker that he wanted to debate him on the Iraq war, then mentioned Ford's plan to partition Iraq into three regions. But then Corker stopped him and said he had come to talk about ethics. Corker called Ford's visit to the news conference 'a true sign of desperation.'"

DOJ_NMG_0084421

NRSC's Ad Tying Ford To Playboy Party Described. The Financial Times (10/21, Daniel) reports, "The Republican attack advertisement starts with a clip from the rival candidate's campaign. It shows Harold Ford, sitting in church, saying he will not be painted as someone he is not. 'Fair enough,' intones the announcer. 'So what kind of man parties with Playboy playmates in lingerie, then films political ads from a church pew?' Cue: images of Mr Ford, the Democrat candidate for a Tennessee Senate seat, with James Bond-style silhouettes of Playboy bunnies, to highlight his hypocrisy. … The national Republican senatorial committee paid for the Ford ad. When Bob Corker, the candidate, was asked, he demurred: 'I haven't seen the ad.'"

Allen And Webb Seen As Avoiding Immigration Debate. The Washington Post (10/21, B5, Brulliard, 748K) reports Allen and James Webb "have stark differences on" immigration. Allen "brooks no sympathy for illegal immigrants and favors guest-worker plans." Webb "supports legalization for some immigrants and opposes broad programs for temporary foreign labor. Analysts say the relative absence of immigration in the race reflects the increasingly tricky proposition of campaigning on polarizing topics, especially in a traditionally conservative state with a changing political landscape. In recent elections, Northern Virginia voters' allegiance has shifted toward Democrats. Studies show that Virginia's illegal immigrant population has swelled in recent years and that growth has been densest in Northern Virginia. Herndon voters this spring ousted Town Council members who backed a hiring site for immigrant day laborers, but Republican Jerry W. Kilgore lost the Northern Virginia suburbs -- and the governor's race -- after a campaign in which he vowed, among other things, to crack down on illegal immigrants."

Wilder Offer Webb Advice. The Washington Times (10/21, A1, Bellantoni, 88K) reports Richmond Mayor Douglas Wilder, "a former governor and one of the state's leading Democrats, has some advice for" Webb – "let voters know what you stand for. 'The question is, what reasons will Jim Webb give people to vote for him,' Mr. Wilder, 75, told The Washington Times. 'There are so many people in the middle that want to have a reason to lean this way or that.' Mr. Wilder has yet to endorse anyone in Virginia's U.S. Senate contest."

Talent Handicapped By National GOP's Difficulties. NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 6, 3:30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Missouri -- always a political bellwether state and the Senate race there is no exception. … Unhappiness with the war in Iraq and Washington in general making things difficult for the Republican incumbent" Sen. Jim Talent, who is "in the political fight of his life. … His challenger, Democrat Claire McCaskill, now making serious headway by highlighting talent support for president Bush and the war in Iraq." Talent "doesn't dispute that the souring mood toward republicans nationally may hurt. … But his opponent McCaskill is also benefiting from a local initiative on the ballot to allow stem cell research. Polls show most in Missouri support it. So does McCaskill, but Talent is opposed."

Democrats' Find Success Targeting Open Seats. The New York Times (10/21, Hulse, 1.21M) reports, "Ed Perlmutter, a former Democratic state senator, has had other opportunities to run for the House seat representing the district around Denver, but he waited until this year, when the Republican incumbent decided to run for governor rather than seek re-election. … In the age of gerrymander, the open seat — one where incumbents step aside because of age, ambition, scandal or other considerations — is a rare but sometimes golden opportunity for one party to wrest control from the other. This year, Democrats like Mr. Perlmutter are taking full advantage, giving their party a potentially vital edge in the battle for control of the House." The Times continues, "This year, there are 33 open House seats, including three that are vacant at the moment but had been held steadily by one party, and polls suggest that Democrats have a good chance to capture enough Republican-held districts to put them well on their way to tilting the balance of power in Washington. Surveys show Mr. Perlmutter in command of his race against his Republican opponent, Rick O'Donnell, in the contest to succeed Representative Bob Beauprez, a Republican who is running for governor. In races for 20 other Republican open seats, recent polls show the Democrat leading in at least 8, putting the party more than halfway to the 15 seats needed to capture the House. Just one of 12 Democratic open seats appears at risk, and even that is considered a long shot."

Tight House Races In Indiana Feature Vulnerable GOP Incumbents. The New York Times (10/21, Purnick, 1.21M) reports Indiana "has become an unexpected battleground in this year's Congressional elections. Three of the state's seven Republican members of Congress are locked in tough races, with the campaigns drawing big money and big names from both parties." Rep. Chris Chocola "and the Democrat, Joe Donnelly, a lawyer and businessman, are in a race that was never supposed to be so close, though the district has elected Democrats in the past. The economy and immigration loom as large as Iraq in this blue-collar district. Many auto-parts plants have closed or been cut back. Workers are nervous, and some say that Mr. Chocola does not understand their predicament because he is independently wealthy." Rep. John Hostettler "is invariably described an unorthodox public official who does as he likes, from voting against the Iraq war to taking a loaded gun into the Louisville airport two years ago. … Political analysts say Mr. Hostettler has been more unorthodox than usual, campaigning and fund-raising less aggressively than might be expected, given his opposition — the telegenic sheriff of Vanderburgh County, Brad Ellsworth." In IN9 "the race is a rubber match, an unusually personal fight between two candidates with distinctly different styles — Representative Mike Sodrel, a Republican who two years ago beat the same Democratic opponent, Baron Hill, a former two-term congressman."

DOJ_NMG_0084422

Working Families Party Campaigns For Three Democratic House Candidates. The New York Times (10/21, Confessore, 1.21M) reports, "Even by the Lilliputian standards of minor political parties, the Working Families Party has typically played the part of feisty underdog. Only four states list the party on their ballots, and even in New York, where it is based and most active, Working Families usually draws far fewer voters than rivals like the Conservative Party or the Independence Party. … The party is focusing on unaffiliated voters in New York's 24th and 29th Congressional Districts and Connecticut's 5th Congressional District, which all have a Democratic candidate cross-endorsed by the Working Families Party."

GOP House Candidate Investigated Over Immigrant Threats. The New York Times (10/21, Chang, 1.21M) reports California state investigators "searched the offices of a Republican Congressional candidate, a day after he acknowledged that a campaign worker was responsible for a letter sent to as many as 14,000 Latino residents in an effort to keep them from the polls. The candidate, Tan Nguyen, left, will stay in the race against the incumbent, Loretta Sanchez, even though the Republican Party has urged him to withdraw, said his lawyer, David Wiechert. Mr. Nguyen has denied having any knowledge of the letter, which stated that immigrants could be jailed if they voted." The Los Angeles Times' Dana Parsons (10/21) writes, "It is truly a new day in Orange County, where a generation ago the previous Republican Party leadership would have tabbed Nguyen as an up-and-comer with a good head on his shoulders."

Ehrlich And O'Malley Concentrate On GOTV Efforts. The Washington Post (10/21, A1, Mosk, Barnes, 748K) reports that in 2002 Maryland Democrats "headed into the final stretch of a heated governor's race without much of a message to get their supporters to the polls, and there was a pointed lack of enthusiasm from black voters, the party's most loyal supporters. The Democrats got clobbered. … Democrats are determined to make this year different, said" top Democrats supporting Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley's "bid to retake the governor's office from Republican Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. This time, both Ehrlich and O'Malley have elaborate plans, in the works for more than a year, to maximize turnout that are the centerpiece of a two-week sprint to Election Day." The Post notes, "For Republicans, the task is more complicated. Because Democrats hold a nearly 2 to 1 edge on voter rolls, Ehrlich can't afford to merely try to drive more people to the polls. He needs to motivate his supporters to show up Nov. 7 while doing nothing to energize those backing his opponent."

Republican Governors Association Targets O'Malley's Record In Baltimore. The Washington Post (10/21, B4, Rich, 748K) reports O'Malley "may be the target but Baltimore also takes a beating in a television ad launched yesterday by the Republican Governors Association, a 30-second tableau of urban decay that declares Maryland's largest municipality 'the most dangerous city in America.' The ad, the first the group has aired in the state, features footage of a cemetery and a crime scene. The camera bounces erratically as the images lose and regain focus. The schools are in shambles, a female voice says, and the homicide rate is six times higher than New York City's. 'Baltimore,' the voice says, 'Martin O'Malley's legacy of mismanagement. And now he wants a promotion so he can do for the entire state of Maryland what he did for Baltimore.'"

Maryland Legislator Receives Stolen Voting Machine Software. The Washington Post (10/21, B1, Barr, 748K) reports, "A Maryland election official said yesterday that possibly stolen computer disks believed to be electronic voting software were 'apparently produced' for use by a testing firm hired by the Maryland legislature in November 2003. … Documents indicate that the disks were sent to Maryland so Raba Technologies Inc. could assess the security of the state's electronic voting system, which is provided by Diebold Election Systems. … Labels on the disks indicate that they contain the versions of two Diebold programs that powered electronic voting machines in Maryland in 2004, Goldstein said Thursday. Diebold said one version of one program is still in use in some jurisdictions elsewhere in the United States. Cheryl C. Kagan, a former Maryland delegate who has questioned the security of electronic voting systems, said the disks were delivered anonymously to her office in Olney on Tuesday."

DOJ_NMG_0084423

Angelides Urges Schwarzenegger To Release Controversial Recordings. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Nicholas, 918K) reports, "In private conversations in the governor's office earlier this year, Arnold Schwarzenegger spoke with aides about the 'failure of Mexican American immigrants to assimilate into American culture' and made 'ad hominem remarks about a variety of legislators,' Phil Angelides' gubernatorial campaign said Friday. An attorney for Angelides sent a 10-page letter to Schwarzenegger aides urging them to release recordings of the governor's conversations before the Nov. 7 election. … Angelides aides know what the recordings contain because they downloaded them from the governor's website in late August. But the campaign has declined to release the tapes on its own, calling on Schwarzenegger to take that step." Schwarzenegger aides "indicated that the governor would not release the recordings, saying they are not a matter of public record."

Schwarzenegger's Reaction To Special Election Defeats Spurred His Comeback. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Nicholas, 918K) reports, "Maybe the make-or-break moment of Arnold Schwarzenegger's governorship was the morning of Nov. 10, 2005, in his hotel suite across the street from the Capitol building. He had just been walloped in the special election that he had thrust before voters, capping a year when he had fought to put in place a distinctly conservative agenda. Prepping the Republican governor for a news conference, one of his aides urged a tough stance: Don't apologize, don't give ground. Schwarzenegger did the opposite. He appeared before the cameras and conceded that he had screwed up and promised to start listening to the Democrat-dominated Legislature. So began his political resurrection. From a nadir at which he was being compared with Jesse Ventura, the pro wrestler who flamed out as governor of Minnesota after one term, Schwarzenegger rose to be the front-runner in the Nov. 7 election."

History Of "October Surprise" Described. The Washington Post (10/21, C1, Weeks, 748K) reports on the history of the "October surprise." According to the Post, two developments that have been described as this year's "surprise" are a spate of books critical of President Bush and the Johns Hopkins study released last week that purported to find that as many as 600,000 Iraqis have been killed since the beginning of the war in 2003.

Columnist Dowd Questions Obama's Desire For Presidency. Maureen Dowd in her column in the New York Times (10/21, 1.21M) writes, "So the question before us is, should Barack Obama stop lounging around in fashion magazines and do some honest work, like running for president?" Obama's "appeal combines the political ability — alien to the Bush administration — to see something from your opponent's point of view with the cool detachment of a J.F.K." Obama's "been told by Democratic leaders to think about whether he really wants to be president, or whether he's just getting swept away by people who want him to do it." Dowd ponders whether Obama wants "to be a celebrity or a man of history — or is there no longer any difference?"

LATimes Notes California Democrats Disadvantaged By Redistricting. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, 918K), in an editorial, writes, "In an election year in which grumpy voters from coast to coast are gunning for the scalps of doddering Republicans, Rep. Gary Miller (R-Diamond Bar) would seem a vulnerable target." He "has earmarked road repairs near housing developments he co-owns, declined to pay taxes on three land sales and -- in a congressional district one-quarter Latino -- wrote legislation denying citizenship to the children of illegal immigrants. But Democrats have a competitive disadvantage in unseating the four-term congressman: Miller is running for reelection unopposed. This scene is playing out throughout Southern California and the rest of the state as competitive races and even challengers are becoming endangered species. Because of a cynical bipartisan agreement after the 2000 census, Democrats and Republicans represent frequently convoluted geographical footprints meticulously designed, it would seem, to ensure that no incumbent party will ever lose another election, no matter which way the political winds are blowing."

Chinese Leaders Assure Rice They Will Enforce North Korea Sanctions. ABC World News (10/20, story 4, 1:40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Secretary of State, Condoleezza Rice has wrapped up her Asian tour to rally support for United Nations sanctions. Today, she was in Beijing meeting China's leaders. We reported yesterday a Chinese delegation was in North Korea. And it appears the Chinese say they will enforce the sanctions against North Korea." ABC correspondent Karl added that "there were signs today that the effort to isolate North Korea is gaining momentum. Chinese leaders assured Secretary of State Rice, they'll help enforce sanctions. And China's four biggest banks said they would suspend transfers to North Korea. A move that potentially goes further than U.N. sanctions."

In a brief story The CBS Evening News (10/20, story 3, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) noted, "Kim Jong Il reportedly told Chinese envoys that he is sorry for conducting a nuclear test nearly two weeks ago and promised he won't do it again. Just the same, he held a huge rally today to celebrate that test. While that was happening, Secretary of State Rice was in Beijing hoping to persuade the Chinese to vigorously enforce U.N. sanctions against North Korea."

DOJ_NMG_0084424

NBC Nightly News (10/20, story 3, 1:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made the most important stop on her Asia trip today to press for tougher action against North Korea for conducting a nuclear test." NBC (Mitchell) added, "She was in China and met with China's president but also with a top Chinese envoy who had just returned from North Korea where he personally delivered a tough message to Kim Jong-Il. Rice says that the Chinese official told Kim he needs to return to regional talks and should not even think about exploding a second nuclear test. Rice says that China agreed to inspect North Korean cargo but that she won few hard commitments from them and contrary to earlier reports out of South Korea, Kim did not tell the Chinese he is ready to return to talks or end the nuclear showdown."

The New York Times (10/21, Shanker, Kahn, 1.21M) reports, "The United States and China spoke in a unified voice on Friday to call for the resumption of six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear program, but they did not announce concrete steps to increase pressure on the North Korean government." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "expressed confidence that China was committed to enforcing new United Nations military sanctions on North Korea, and that a number of economic and trade measures were under review." She "also said the Beijing leadership pledged to be 'scrupulous' about ensuring that North Korea does not ship prohibited materials across its lengthy border with China." Rice added "she had been told by the Chinese government that a special envoy sent by Beijing to North Korea had delivered 'a strong message.'" He "returned from Pyongyang, where he had met with Kim Jong-il, the North Korean leader. Chinese officials described the meeting as 'positive' and 'greatly significant,' but declined to provide details of what Mr. Kim had said. Accounts that "Kim had offered to resume nuclear talks under certain conditions, and said he gave assurances that he had no plans to conduct a second nuclear test," weren't "confirmed by either Chinese or American officials." Rice did stress "that North Korea should return to those talks 'without condition,' and that the financial restrictions the United States has imposed to crack down on North Korean counterfeiting would not be lifted just to entice the North back to the negotiations." Still, she added "that halting North Korea's trade in nuclear bomb-making materials and missiles would take time."

The Washington Post (10/21, A11, Kessler, 748K) adds, "China and the United States on Friday appeared to close ranks on North Korea." Rice also said, "Let's just watch and see what China will do." McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Strobel) reports that rice showed "unusual harmony with China on a key security issue." However, "senior Chinese leaders privately have expressed frustration with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il and questioned his judgment with unusual candor" and according to senior Rice aide "there's been a 'sea change' in China's attitude toward North Korea." The AP (10/21, Gearan) adds, "An exasperated China took a newly tough approach to communist ally North Korea on Friday, siding with the United States."

In contrast to the articles affirming China's cooperation with the US, the Wall Street Journal (10/21, A4, King, Fairclough, Hayashi, 2.03M) reports that "the U.S. is finding its allies are reluctant to enforce even the minimal sanctions imposed by the United Nations -- and that its own, tougher approach has serious gaps as well." The "immediate challenge" for Rice is getting "real cooperation from North Korea's neighbors. Yet she appeared to make little progress on that front during her Asia trip." South Korea is "reluctant to sign on, and members of Seoul's ruling liberal party argue that it shouldn't." The Chinese, "who are otherwise taking tough steps to crack down on North Korea, have said they may draw the line at interdicting shipments at sea," and "Japan, while more eager to crack down on Pyongyang, is severely limited by its pacifist constitution." Additionally, "getting sound intelligence on shipments is tough, especially when it is easy to disguise a vessel's identification and registration," and some U.S. officials "are wary of the consequences of stopping or seizing North Korean vessels or their cargoes at sea. One U.S. official said the military, currently fighting two wars, is short of the resources to effectively police shipping."

In the same vein, the Los Angeles Times (10/21, Magnier, 918K) adds that as "Rice left China today for Russia, her goal of uniting Northeast Asia in a strong, unambiguous punitive stance against North Korea remained elusive." So, "with no easy answers, a wily adversary in Pyongyang, the North's capital, and limited options, Rice sought Friday to lower expectations, even as she praised China's willingness to consider tougher measures."

The Washington Times (10/21, A1, Kralev, 88K) reports that Rice said "China has been brought into the process in a way that China never was before." The paper takes a different tone from the New York Times on the claims that China "won a pledge from North Korean leader Kim Jong-il not to conduct another nuclear test and at the same time blocked bank transfers to the isolated state," reporting that "U.S. and Chinese officials stopped short of confirming the reports, saying only that Mr. Kim pledged not to escalate the situation further."

Experts Said To Worry About North Korean Nuclear Sales. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Miller, 918K) reports, "U.S. intelligence officials and weapons proliferation experts say they are concerned that North Korea could add plutonium to the extensive inventory of arms components and technologies it already has sold to such nations as Syria, Pakistan and Libya," and "some experts are more worried about the government in Pyongyang spreading nuclear technology to other 'rogue' nations than about the possibility of it launching a nuclear attack." However, they agree that such a sale "would be an extreme and dangerous step even for one of the world's most defiant regimes."

DOJ_NMG_0084425

South Korea's Sunshine Policy Said To Be Ending. McClatchy Newspapers (10/21, Johnson) reports, "North Korea's entry into the global nuclear club may be a coda for the sunshine policy. Some South Koreans say engagement has failed to encourage significant reform in North Korea. Others view it as appeasement, saying their nation has served as a virtual ATM for North Korea." Recent "polls show that an increasing number of South Koreans think that Seoul should stand up more firmly to Pyongyang, even as their fear of North Korea has diminished."

ABC Profiles North Korean Culture. ABC World News (10/20, story 5, 1:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "North Korea, of course, is the most-isolated nation in the world. The hermit kingdom it's called. It's nearly impossible for reporters to get inside. But this week, ABC's Diane Sawyer has been the only Western journalist there. So we asked her tonight, to share some of her impressions with us." Sawyer, added that there are signs of a nation with no money. Dark halls. Few lightbulbs. Rundown buildings. But inside, people proud of their three rooms, carpeted and pictures of Kim il-Sung and Kim Jong-il. We notice that traveling through the streets, we never once saw an obese person. We never once saw a dog or cat, either, for that matter. We are looking at two worlds, very different views and few bridges between."

UN Report Says North Korea Imprisons "Those Deemed Subnormal." The Washington Times (10/21, Mcelroy, 88K) reports that a U.N. report released yesterday says "North Korea operates a rigorous system of eugenics that locks up those deemed subnormal, ranging from the disabled to dwarfs," and are "designed to ensure that those who do not conform to the state's designation of normal do not pass on their genes by having children." Base on evidence gathered from defectors to South Korea, the report says "the afflicted are subjected to harsh and subhuman conditions. Food is scarce and of poor quality and beatings are commonplace."

US Trade Rep To Discuss Trade Disputes With China. The AP (10/21, Crutsinger) reports that Deputy U.S. Trade Representative Karan Bhatia said "China has made progress in resolving long-standing trade disputes with the United States," such as an agreement to load legal software on all new computers sold in China, "but more needs to be done in a number of areas." He added that "when he holds talks next week with Chinese trade officials in Beijing, he would review a number of commitments China made last spring," including "ways it planned to crack down on the sale of illegal, pirated computer software and expanding the opportunity for U.S. and other foreign firms to compete for Chinese government contracts."

NYTimes Argues Bush's Excessive Borrowing Creates Vulnerabilities To China. The New York Times (10/21, 1.21M) editorializes, "America's indebtedness to China…is staggeringly high." While the Administration "seems unfazed," China's holdings' "size and growth…mean increasing vulnerability for the United States." If their lending "dried up quickly…the result could be a sharp financial crisis," but even a gradual change "could mean a long downward trend in American living standards as a higher cost of living took its toll." Also, "administration officials are concerned that developing nations, unhappy with conditions on loans from the International Monetary Fund, may decide to borrow directly from China. That would give Beijing more influence over emerging markets and their governments. To its credit, the Bush administration has repeatedly stressed that the rise of China is not to be feared or begrudged. But excessive borrowing during the Bush years has made the United States unnecessarily vulnerable."

Iran Dismisses UN Sanctions Possibility, Warns Europe Against Support For Israel. The New York Times (10/21, Fathi, 1.21M) reports that as "the United Nations Security Council is expected to begin public deliberations next week on whether to impose sanctions on Iran for defying a United Nations demand to suspend uranium-enrichment activities by the end of August," Iran's Foreign Ministry, with "its first official response to the threat of United Nations action…said in a statement that Iran would not 'remain idle if sanctions are imposed.'" At the same time, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad "warned Europe…that continued support for Israel could lead to an act of revenge by those in the Middle East angry about the Palestinians' plight," although "He did not describe what revenge could entail in his speech." He also "repeated…that Iran would not give in to international demands to suspend its uranium-enrichment program and dismissed United Nations efforts to impose sanctions on Iran as illegitimate."

Israel Says Iran Bribed Hamas To Block Soldier's Release. The AP (10/21, Lederer) reports, "Israel's U.N. Ambassador Dan Gillerman told the Security Council on Thursday that 'we heard news' earlier in the day that Tehran bribed Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal 'to sabotage the negotiations on the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit and prevent his release.'" Shalit is the Israeli soldier captured by Hamas-linked militants on June 25. "Gillerman later refused to divulge the basis of the allegation or provide details." Ianian diplomat Mansour Sadeghi responded that "his government 'categorically rejected' all allegations against his country made by Israel, dismissing Gillerman's allegations as 'baseless and absurd,'" and Osama Hamdan, Hamas' representative in Lebanon, called the report 'an obvious Israeli lie.'"

DOJ_NMG_0084426

Israel Said To Have Begun Hezbollah Conflict Without Strategy For Ending It. The Washington Post (10/21, A1, Wilson, 748K) reports, "An examination of the first days of the war" between Israel and Hezbollah "shows that leaders of Israel's newly elected government launched a broad military campaign without a clear strategy for how it was to end. It also reveals that while Israeli military officials anticipated an entrenched guerrilla force, front-line officers were surprised by just how well prepared Hezbollah was." Senior Israeli officers admitted "the extent of the tunnel networks, the size of the arsenal and some of the more sophisticated weapons in it were not anticipated." Two days after the counterattack began, "Israeli military and diplomatic officials were deeply split over war strategy." Their "internal consensus, trumpeted in public by Israel's leaders, crumbled" after "the research unit of Israel's military intelligence branch presented a report to senior Israeli officials that questioned the war plan's ability to achieve the government's goals."

Citing Security Concerns, Israel Restricts Muslims Entering Jerusalem To Pray At Holy Site. The New York Times (10/21, Myre, 1.21M) reports, "With Israel imposing tight restrictions on Palestinian movements, the holy month of Ramadan marks a rare occasion when large numbers of Palestinians from the West Bank can enter Jerusalem to worship at the Aksa Mosque compound, one of the most sacred sites in Islam." Although an estimated 180,000 Muslims prayed at the compound, "thousands of West Bank men who were turned back at the city's edge, some in scuffles with Israeli security forces," as "Israel, citing security concerns, only permitted West Bank men over age 45 to enter Jerusalem and the mosque compound." It "says that the huge crowds show its commitment to the freedom of worship, but insists that the restrictions are necessary to guard against possible violence at the site."

Israel's Revised Visa Policy Prevents Palestinian-Americans From Returning To West Bank. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Ellingwood, 918K) reports, "Activists say scores of Palestinians who carry foreign passports, mostly American, have been denied entry this year since Israel moved to close a loophole that once allowed residents to enter repeatedly on renewable Israeli tourist visas," and this "has created a quandary for the Palestinian Americans who remain: If they leave to get a new three-month stamp, they may not be allowed back. If they stay, their current Israeli visas will expire." U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice had "raised the visa issue in meetings with Israeli officials in Jerusalem this month," and "American diplomats say they have asked Israel to explain the policy." Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Israeli Foreign Ministry, "said the change was an attempt to curb misuse of tourist visas," which "were not meant to serve as documents for Palestinian residency or work in the West Bank and Gaza Strip." However, he admits that the changed policy "is having 'unintended consequences' that officials are now trying to correct."

US Said To Be Turning From Abbas To Rival Fatah Leader. The Washington Times (10/21, De Quetteville, 88K) reports, "Secular and tough -- some say brutal" - Mohammed Dahlan, "a member of the rival Fatah party, is being courted by U.S. diplomats eager to counter Hamas' burgeoning influence in the occupied territories." U.S. officials describe him "as a man who can 'get things done' in a violent climate. In less diplomatic terms, that means having the clout, if needed, to summon armed Palestinians into battle with Hamas." An official admits, "He can be viewed as a thug…but he is one of the very few people who has authority and can impose some order on the ground who is not from Hamas." While US officials are "outwardly backing" Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, "they privately condemn Mr. Abbas as hesitant and timid in taking on Hamas."

Brother Of Muslim Brotherhood Founder Advocates Liberal Islam. The New York Times (10/21, Slackman, 1.21M) reports that Gamal al-Banna, the brother of Sheik Hassan al-Banna, the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, "is no friend of the establishment," because he "is a liberal thinker, a man who would like to see Islamic values and practices interpreted in the context of modern times." He advocates women's rights, for example. He remains free because "he has been careful not to become involved in political movements," and his sister left him enough to live well on. He feels "Egypt, often looked to as a center of moderate Islam, is, like the rest of the Arab world, becoming more conservative and less tolerant of opposing religious views."

Administration Launches Effort To Extend Latin American Trade Deals. The Los Angeles Times (10/21, Kraul, 918K) reports, "The Bush administration has a prescription for fighting coca growing, sidelining Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez and saving thousands of jobs in Latin America: extending free trade for Andean nations." One "senior Bush administration official said this week that the White House would push Congress to pass a bill continuing trade benefits for Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia under a little-known law. It wants the bill passed during the 'lame-duck session' after the November elections and before the new Congress is sworn in in January -- while free-trade-friendly Republicans are still in control." So it "has mounted an 11th-hour campaign to preserve the trade perks, which have generated thousands of jobs, given birth to entire export industries and provided alternatives to drug trafficking."

DOJ_NMG_0084427

EU Leaders Confront Putin On Oil Contracts. The Financial Times (10/21, Parker) reports, "European leaders on Friday night pressed Vladimir Putin, Russia's president, to honour contracts with western oil companies." At the "strained summit dinner," the "EU leaders also chided Mr Putin on questions of human rights, press freedom and Moscow's tough treatment of the former Soviet republic of Georgia." However, it only served as a reminder that "their attempt to build a more equal energy partnership with Russia has so far yielded few positive results." Putin was "implacable," and responded "that he had no intention of bowing to European demands that Russia should open Gazprom's pipelines to other companies, as required under the energy charter treaty, which Russia has signed but has not ratified." He "also issued an uncompromising warning to Georgia."

The AP (10/21, Brand) agrees that Putin "sidestepped European appeals for moderation on Georgia" and for energy security. Estonian Prime Minister Andrus Ansip said, "The European Union was speaking in one voice — one single voice — and of course, Russia wasn't speaking in the same voice."

WPost Criticize Putin, Western Leaders On Handling Of Russian Journalist's Murder. The Washington Post (10/21, A18, 748K) editorializes that "it's revealing to examine how Mr. Putin and his regime have behaved" in response to the murder of Russian journalist Anna Politkovskaya. "The president's first reaction was a strange silence." Then, when "compelled to speak…Putin offered a rote condemnation of the attack. He then disparaged Ms. Politkovskaya" and "made the ugly suggestion that foreign-based enemies of his government were somehow behind the killing." If true, "Putin's enemies also must have found a way to manipulate his own security forces," as "interior ministry operatives…who violently broke up a peaceful vigil in Ms. Politkovskaya's memory." The "other part of this story has played out with depressing predictability: the absence of any serious follow-up by Western leaders. … Sadly, Mr. Putin has been given no reason to think" that should Ms. Politkovskaya's murder remain unsolved, it will "be an obstacle to 'partnership' between Russia and Europe."

Journalist Says Russian Treatment Of Georgia Encourages Future Ethnic Hatread, Loss Of Life. Masha Lipman, editor of the Carnegie Moscow Center's Pro et Contra journal and a columnist for The Post, writes in an op-ed in the Washington Post (10/21, A19, 748K), "In recent years intolerance and even violent ethnic and racial crime have become increasingly common in Russia." Recently "the political conflict between Russia and Georgia has led to an ugly outburst of political xenophobia" which "s different, in a scary way. Until now, if government authorities contributed to public xenophobia it was through inaction, incompetence or irresponsibility. Now ethnic hostility is being incited by government figures -- legislators and executive officials alike" and "the message was unambiguous: Georgia and Georgians were the enemies of Russia." While "the authorities seemed to realize that things had gone too far" and "have begun to backpedal," Russia's "desire to punish Georgia has broken the fragile taboo on ethnic hostility in official language. In the xenophobic atmosphere of today's Russia, this threatens to further encourage ethnic hatred and lead to more loss of life."

Kremlin Defends Putin's Remarks About Katsav Scandal. ABC World News (10/20, story 6, 0:30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The Kremlin is defending Vladimir Putin after the Russian President joked about rape and assault allegations against the Israeli President, Moshe Katsav. Meeting the Israeli prime minister, he said say hello to your President. He didn't look like a guy who would handle ten women. A Russian newspaper is conveying a more graphic version, quoting Putin saying of Katsa, 'we all envy him.' As many as ten women have complained about Katsav. The Kremlin says the meaning of Putin's remarks were lost in translation."

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Schwarzenegger Story Gets Another Rewrite."
"Words They've Lived By."
"Driver Guilty of Felony in Markey Crash."
"A Champion of Black History."
"Madam Speaker? Pelosi Likes the Sound."
"Bush Open to Shift in Iraq War 'Tactics'."

New York Times:
"Militias Battle for Iraqi City as Shiite Rivalry Escalates."
"As Trust Vanishes, Many Iraqis Look to Gunmen as Protection."
"Open Seats Lift Democratic Hopes in the House."
"Anger Festering in French Areas Scarred in Riots."
"Entrees Break the $40 Barrier, and, Sorry, the Sides Cost Extra."
"Doctors Rethink Widespread Use of Heart Stents."

Washington Post:
"Bush, Rumsfeld Defend Strategy."
"The Woman Who Would Be Speaker."
"Israeli War Plan Had No Exit Strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0084428

"Veil Debate in Britain is Also Divisive for Muslims."
Ehrlich O'Malley Focus on Turnout As Election Nears."
"Used Cellphones Hold Trove of Secrets That Can Be Hard to Erase."

Washington Times:
"China Wrest N. Korean Pledge."
"World Series Lifts Detroit's Morale."
"Bush Pins Label of "Defeat" Party on Democrats."
"Screen Horror Gives Guys, Girls Roles."
"Wilder Advises Webb to Make Stance Clear."
"Doing Deals on the Green."

Detroit Free Press:
"Bachynski wails over guilty verdict."
"It's time to get your Halloween costume."
"Detroiters look for equality."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"One Crash Every 2.8 Minutes."
"'I said 1, 2, 3, 4, Mommy, wake up!'"
"Shiites Seize a City in Iraq."
"Karr's Arrival in Sandy Springs Met with Unease."

Dallas Morning News:
"TXU Identified as Target of State's Energy Inquiry."
"U.S. Struggling to Curb Clout of Iraqi Militias."
"DA Scoffs at Test."
"Panel Clears Justice on Ethics Charges."

Houston Chronicle:
"Homicide Rate on Track to be Worst in a Decade."
"Rival Shiite Factions Battle for Iraqi City."
Clinic is World's 1st to Target a Rare Killer."
"The Force of Humanity"
"Elders Greet Festival of Lights, Wishing Hindus a Happy Diwali."
"Drug Plan May Fill Some Gaps."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Administration Iraq Strategy; Iraqi Militia Threat; GOP Pressure On Administration; US-China North Korea Sanctions; North Korean Culture; Putin Israeli Remarks; Universal Health Care Reform; OPEC, Oil Prices Down; Solar Power Alternative; Caring For US Troops' Families.
CBS: Administration Iraq Pressure; US Soldiers Frustrated; US-China North Korea Sanctions; Church Response To Foley Abuser; DHS Fund Distribution Questions; Campaign Ad Preview; Elderly Driving Dangers; Cassini Saturn Pictures; Sad Message In Bottle.
NBC: Bush Iraq Policy; Maghdi Siege Of Amarrah; Rice And North Korea; Ground Zero Remains Found; Football Stadium Hoax; Missouri Senate Race; RNC Terrorism Ad; Detroit Tigers; Ballet Charity.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Unavailable.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY -- Unavailable.

US Senate: No scheduled events.

US House: No scheduled events.

Other: Oct. 14 - 23. PSYCHIATRIC SERVICES _ The Americam Psychiatric Association hosts its 2006 Institute on Psychiatric Services. Location: Marriott Wardman Park Hotel, 2660 Woodley Road NW.

Oct. 16 - 21. SAFE KIDS _ Safe Kids Worldwide holds its 18th annual Leadership Conference. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW. Contacts: n/a, 202-662-0600

Oct. 19 - 21. AEROSPACE EDUCATION _ The Civil Air Patrol hosts a national aerospace education conference. Highlights:
8:15 a.m. Astronaut Robert ``Hoot'' Gibson. 8:45 a.m. President Ken Hyde Wright Flight Experience. 4:30 p.m. Asatronaut Buzz Aldrin. Location: Marriott-Crystal Gateway, 1700 Jefferson Davis Hwy., Arlington, Va. Contacts: Jim Tynan, 334-398-3312

Oct. 19 - 21. NAVAL ORDER _ The Naval Order of the United States holds its 2006 Annual Congress Program, ``Honoring Our Navy at Normandy.'' Highlights: 12 p.m. Coast Guard Commandant Adm. Thad Allen. 7:30 p.m. Retired Navy CNO Adm. Vernon Clark receives the Distinguished Sea Service Award and makes remarks. Location: Holiday Inn Rosslyn, 1900 N. Fort Myer Dr., Arlington. Contacts: Eric Berryman, 757-270-7487

Oct. 19 - 22. EDUCATION-DRUG ABUSE _ The 20th Annual National Meeting on Alcohol and Other Drug Abuse and Violence Prevention in Higher Education will be held. Location: Hyatt Crystal City , 2799 Jefferson Davis Highway. Contacts: Jo Ann Webb, 202-401-1576.

Oct. 20 - 21. ITALIAN AMERICANS _ The National Italian American Foundation holds its 2006 Convention and 31st Anniversary Gala. showcase Italian products and services. On Saturday evening, actor Alan Alda, baseball greats Yogi Berra and Tommy Lasorda, director Mel Brooks, Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia, Chicago mayor Richard M. Daley, and singers Neil Sedaka and Jerry Vale will join more than 3,000 people from across the U.S. and Italy at the Foundations 31st Anniversary Awards Gala. Academy Award-winning actress Anne Bancroft will be posthumously inducted into the NIAF Italian American Hall of Fame. Her husband, Mel Brooks, will represent Bancroft. Gala honorees are Samuel Alito Jr., Supreme Court justice; Raffaello Follieri, chairman and CEO of Follieri Yucaipa

DOJ_NMG_0084429

Investments; Tom W. LaSorda, CEO and president of the Chrysler Group; Catherine B. Reynolds, chairman of the Catherine B. Reynolds Foundation, and singer Frankie Valli. Highlights: 9 a.m. - 11 a.m. NIAF Council 2000/Youth Networking Continental Breakfast, featuring keynote speaker Tom Lasorda. 2:30 p.m. - 4:30 p.m. ``Judicial Independence, a panel discussion with Supreme Court Justices Samuel Alito Jr. and Antonin Scalia; Lynn Battaglia, judge, Court of Appeals of Maryland; William S. Sessions, partner, Holland & Knight. Note: Open to print media only. former FBI director and honorary co-chairman, ABA Commission on the 21st Century Judiciary. Location: Washington Hilton & Towers, 1919 Connecticut Ave. NW. Contacts: Elisa Ruffino, 202-939-3106.

Oct. 21 - 23. SWEDISH EMBASSY _ Cremonies marking the opening of the House of Sweden, the new Swedish Embassy.
Location: 2900 K St. NW. Contacts: Andres Ericson, 202-467-2655. Notes: All events RSVP. Press tent at 901 30th St. NW.

8:50 a.m. CHRISTIANS-ISRAEL _ The Holy Land Christian Ecumenical Foundation hyolds a panel discussion on the theology and practical implications of Christian Zionism during its 8th International Conference, with Rev. Gary Burge of Wheaton College and JoAnn Magnuson of Interfaith Relations for Bridges for Peace. Location: Stone Hall National Presbyteriaqn Church, 4101 Nebraska Ave. NW. Contacts: Jessica Rodgers, 301-951-9400 ext 219. 9 a.m.

WALK AGAINST AUTISM _ Cure Autism Now holds second annual WALK NOW, family-friendly 5K walk and community resource fair. Location: National Mall. Contacts: Cure Autism Now, 8888AUTISM

9:30 a.m. LEGAL ETHICS _ Georgetown University Law Center holds a symp 1/8osium on legal ethics over the past 20 years, with Judge George Miller of the U.S. Court of Federal Claims, others. Location: Hart Auditorium, McDonough Hall, 600 New Jersey Ave. NW. Contacts: Kara Tershel, 202-662-9500.

12 p.m. NIGHT COMMUTERS _ Rally and march in support with child ``night commuters" in northern Uganda and efforts to end the 20 year way in Uganda. Location: Rally and walk start at John Marshall Park, Pennsylvania Ave. and 4th St. NW. Contacts: Michael Poffenberger, 574-229-1301.

Copyright 2006 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, October 23, 2006 8:25 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Sunday, October 22, 2006
Attachments:	dojclips061022.pdf; dojclips061022.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, OCTOBER 22, 2006 7:45 AM EDT

TODAY'S EDITION

Homeland Response:

Muslim Scholar Denied Entry To U.S. (AP) 4
Islamic Scholar From South Africa Is Denied Entry Into United States (LAT/AP) 4
BYU Scholar, Sept. 11 Theorist, Resigns (AP) 4
More Human Remains Found At Ground Zero (AP) 5

War News:

U.S. To Hand Iraq A New Timetable On Security Role (NYT) ..5
U.S. Encourages Iraqi Government To Take More Responsibility (MCT) 7
At White House Meeting, No Big Changes On Iraq (WP) 8
Bush Holds Strategy Session On Iraq (AP) 10
Bush Sticks To Mission: U.S. Victory (WT) 11
Bush Reviews Iraq War Strategy As Violence Mounts (BLOOM) 12
Diplomat Cites U.S. 'Stupidity' In Iraq (AP) 14
Bush Holds Strategy Session On Iraq (AP) 15
Questions To Guide An Exit Policy (WP) 16
After Elections, A Democratic Push (WP) 17
Stark Lessons From Iraq (WP) 18
Change Course In Iraq (WP) 19
Blowing In The Wind (NYT) 20
On Baghdad Streets, A Police Partnership Falters (NYT) 21
U.K. Official: Iraqi Army 'Coming Along' (AP) 23
Bush Sticks To Mission: U.S. Victory (WT) 24
Precarious Cease-Fire In Amara Holds (NYT) 25
Mortar Attack Kills 32 In Mostly Shiite Iraqi City (WP) 27
Mortar Rounds Hit Iraqi Market; 18 Dead (SFC/AP) 28
Insurgents Kill 3 U.S. Troops In Iraq (LAT) 29
In A Land Without Order, Punishment Is Power (WP) 29
The Selfless And The Dead (LAT) 32
An Early Calculation Of Iraq's Cost Of War (NYT) 34
Poll: Iraqi Youth Want U.S. To Leave (WT/AP) 35
In The Land Of The Taliban (NYT) 36
After The Hugs, Reality Sets In -- Another Iraq Tour Looms (LAT) 48
As Part Of Military's Ground Force, Navy Firms Up Support Services (NVP) 48
Debt Is Keeping Troops From Overseas Duty, Study Finds (NYT/AP) 49
Quietly Accepting Another Iraq Death (LAT) 50
Doonesbury's War (WP) 52

Corporate Scandals:

Burden Of Enron's Collapse On Skilling (AP) 63
Pressure In The Boardroom (MINNST) 65
S.E.C. Inquiry On Hedge Fund Draws Scrutiny (NYT) 66
A Test For The SEC's Chief (LAT) 70

Criminal Law:

Pundit Settles Case On Education Laws (WT) 73
Bush's Family Profits From 'No Child' Act (LAT) 73
Exclusive: Feds Probe A Top Democrat's Relationship With AIPAC (TIME) 76
Houston Homicides Spike; Evacuees Cited (AP) 78
U.S. Summit Considered Some Options On School Safety (NYJN) 78
An Unwelcome Discovery (NYT) 78

Civil Rights:

A Fight To Keep Schools Integrated (LAT) 85
A.C.L.U. Allies Start Web Site To Rebut Critics Of Leadership (NYT) 87

Antitrust:

Smithfield Deal Reviewed (SFAL) 88

Environment:

Federal Prosecutions Of Area Polluters Drop (HC) 89
Power Execs Foresee Carbon Emission Caps (AP) 90

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds Set Sights On Gun Buys (ABH) 93

Tax:

5 (WP) 94

Congress-Administration:

Newest Vets Fed Up With VA Care (CHIST) 95

Other News:

U.S. Stocks' Three-Week Rally Slows After Dow Reaches Record (BLOOM) 96
Newsweek Says 55% Of U.S. Public Plans To Vote For Democrats (BLOOM) 97
A Possibly Fatal Flaw In GOP Formula For Success (LAT) ... 98
Voter Ire May Tip Scale In House (BOS) 99
Thinning The Herd (NYT) 102
The Mere Midterms (NYT) 103
Dept. Of Advice (WP) 105
Democrats Strengthen Chances For Senate (WP) 108
Democrats: More Seats Coming Into Play (AP) 109
Three States Could Swing Senate Control (LAT) 111
Guardedly, Democrats Are Daring To Believe (NYT) 113
Fighting For The Spoils (WP) 115
GOP Seeks To Get Back On Message (WT) 119
How Foley Skirted Rules To Pursue Relationships (WP) 120
Democrats Play Up Candidates' Service (NYT) 122
Immigrants Flocking To GOP Districts (AP) 124
Webb Struggles Against Stiff Style (WT) 126
In Md. Race, Groups Court 'Values Voters' (WP) 127
Steele's Aura Of Independence Needs Substance (WP) 128
Lamont Gives $2M To Flagging Campaign (AP) 130
Democrat, Republican Decry GOP TV Ad (AP) 130
Peace Now? A Stark Choice Between The Perception Of A Noble Effort And Of A Mistake (NYT) 131
Unbowed Jefferson Keeps Up The Fight (WP) 132
In Two New Mexico Towns, Voices Of Concern About The Party In Power (NYT) 133
Pa. Congress Candidates Spar Over War (LAT/AP) 135
GOP Candidate Seeking Bush's Home District Is Hurting (SA) 135
A Jeopardy Question For The Nov. 7 Crowd (NYT) 137
Times Endorses Spitzer And Other Democrats For Election (NYT) 139
Schwarzenegger Ramps Up Pressure Over Orange County Mailing (LAT) 140
No More Immigrant-Bashing In The O.C. (LAT) 141
Ehrlich Woos Anti-O'Malley Democrats (WT) 142
Kinky Friedman A 'Lone Ranger' On Trail (AP-) 143
Edwards Takes Heat Over Quotations About Hillary (WP) 146
Obama Is Not A Miracle Elixir (NYT) 146
Growing Absentee Voting Is Reshaping Campaigns (NYT) . 148
Californians Face Decisions, Decisions (WP/AP) 150
Wealthy Coal Executive Hopes To Turn Democratic West Virginia Republican (NYT) 151
Party Of Jesse Ventura Vies To Be More (WP) 153
Running For Office? Better Run From Colbert (LAT) 154
The GOP Victory (BAR) 156
The End Of An Era? (WP) 159
Rice Criticizes Russia's Limits On News Media (NYT) 161
Moscow Meeting Highlights Concerns On Press Freedom (WP) 162
Rice Takes Time Out From North Korea To Push Russia On Rights (AFP) 162
Rice Prods Moscow On Press Freedom, Iran (AP) 163
Rice's Visit To Newspaper Seen As Rebuke To Putin (WT/AP) 165
Diplomatic Juggling Act In Russia (LAT) 165
Thugs Pillage Moscow Art Gallery, Beating Its Activist Owner (NYT) 167
In Anti-Immigrant Mood, Russia Heeds Gadfly's Cry (NYT) .. 168
Georgia Denies Military Plan (LAT/AP) 169
Russia Warns Against Iran 'Regime Change' Through UN (AFP) 170
Rice Gets Russia Assurances On North Korea Sanctions (AFP) 170
Rice Sees Bright Spot In China's New Role Since N. Korean Test (WP) 172
U.S. Reaffirms Promise To Defend S.Korea (AP) 173
Seoul Hesitant To End N. Korea Projects (AP) 174
Envoy's Tirades Elicit Chuckles At U.N. (WT) 175
Tension, Desperation: The China-North Korean Border (NYT) 175
Send In The Fat Guys (NYT) 176
Radioactive Nationalism (NYT) 177
The Chinese Go After Corruption, Corruptly (NYT) 179
Egypt, Under Stress, Sees U.S. As Pain And Remedy (NYT) 181
Abbas Seeks To Curb Hamas In West Bank (AP) 183
For Multiculturalist Britain, Uncomfortable New Clothes (NYT) 184
Europe's Immigration Quagmire (LAT) 185
Schroeder: Bush's Faith Raised Suspicion (AP) 187
Schroeder Airs His Bush Reservations (LAT/AP) 188
Panama Steams Ahead On Vote To Expand Canal (LAT) ... 188
In Cuba, 'On The Left' Means A Flourishing Black Market (WP) 189

DOJ_NMG_0084433

Mexican Gangs Displaying Severed Heads (AP) 191
Torrent Of Mud Swamps Indonesia (WP/AP) 193
A New Tack On Darfur (WP) 194
Speaking To Syria (LAT) 195

DOJ_NMG_0084434

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Muslim Scholar Denied Entry To U.S. (AP)

AP, October 22, 2006

An Islamic scholar from South Africa has been denied entry into the United States, prompting questions from Bay Area Muslims who had invited him to participate in activities marking the end of the holy month of Ramadan.

Fazlur Rahman Azmi was detained by officials from U.S. Customs and Border Protection when he arrived at San Francisco International Airport from London on Friday afternoon, according to the Council on American-Islamic Relations, a civil liberties group.

Azmi, who made previous visits to the country as recently as April without problems, was questioned for hours before being denied entry and sent on a plane out of the country Saturday, the group said.

Michael Fleming, a Customs and Border Protection spokesman, confirmed Saturday that Azmi was forced to leave the country after a brief detainment. He refused to give any details of the case.

"His application for entry into the U.S. was determined to be inadmissible," he said.

The Islamic Society of East Bay had invited Azmi to lead prayers at mosques around the Bay Area and speak at a celebration in Fremont on Saturday night marking the end of the holy month of Ramadan.

"There's nothing suspicious about him," said Nawaz Khan, a member of the East Bay group. "He is not involved in any political groups. All he does is teach at the mosque and pray."

About 1,000 people are denied entry into the United States daily for reasons that include inadequate travel documents or because their names appear on a U.S. government watch list.

Islamic Scholar From South Africa Is Denied Entry Into United States (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times/AP, October 22, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — An Islamic scholar from South Africa was denied entry into the United States, prompting questions from Bay Area Muslims who had invited him to participate in activities marking the end of the holy month of Ramadan.

Fazlur Rahman Azmi was detained by U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials and then denied entry after he arrived at San Francisco International Airport from London on Friday afternoon, according to the Council on American-Islamic Relations, a civil liberties group.

Michael Fleming, a Customs and Border Protection spokesman, refused to give any details of the case other than to say, "His application for entry into the U.S. was determined to be inadmissible."

BYU Scholar, Sept. 11 Theorist, Resigns (AP)

AP, October 22, 2006

A Brigham Young University physics professor who suggested the World Trade Center was brought down by explosives has resigned, six weeks after the school placed him on leave.

"I am electing to retire so that I can spend more time speaking and conducting research of my choosing," physics professor Steven Jones said in a statement released by the school.

His retirement is effective Jan. 1, 2007.

Jones recently published theories about U.S. government involvement in the events of Sept. 11, including one suggesting that explosives inside the World Trade Center — not airplanes striking the twin towers — brought the complex down.

BYU stripped Jones of two classes and put him on leave in early September. It also began investigating his research.

The school abandoned its review Friday after reaching a retirement agreement with Jones, BYU spokeswoman Carri Jenkins said.

DOJ_NMG_0084435

Jenkins said the school did not pressure Jones to retire.

Jones, who helped found a group called Scholars for 9/11 Truth in 2005, said he plans to continue researching and speaking about his Sept. 11 theories. That includes completing an analysis of soils and metals from the towers that led him to the conclusions in his paper "Why Indeed Did the World Trade Center Collapse?"

Jenkins said Jones, not BYU, owns the materials.

Jones has not apologized for his remarks and declined comment on whether he regretted his disagreement with the school.

"I have a stewardship for my research and my teaching and my work, and I'm doing my best on that," he said.

Jones began teaching at BYU, which is owned by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, in 1985.

More Human Remains Found At Ground Zero (AP)

AP, October 22, 2006

Workers recovered more human remains Saturday from several manholes as the city began a new search for Sept. 11 victims.

The search was ordered after the surprise discovery of dozens of bones in an abandoned manhole this week.

Utility and city officials on Saturday hand-removed material from other manholes after tearing into the pavement on a service road along the site's western edge. It was then sifted onsite by forensic officials for fragments of human remains, said deputy mayor Edward Skyler.

City officials said that about 15 more pieces of remains had been recovered, bringing the total to nearly 100 this week.

Upset relatives of some Sept. 11 victims called for a federally led new search for remains in and around ground zero after construction workers discovered bones in one manhole excavated as part of work on a transit hub, officials said.

The 80 bones and fragments found earlier this week ranged from a little less than an inch to 12 inches long, said Ellen Borakove, spokeswoman for the city medical examiner's office. The bones possibly include ribs, arms, legs and vertebra, she said.

The active search for the dead ended at the site in 2002 after a massive cleanup of 1.5 million tons of debris. About 20,000 pieces of human remains were found, but the DNA in thousands of those pieces was too damaged by heat, humidity and time to yield matches in the many tests forensic scientists have tried over the years.

More than 40 percent of the 2,749 Sept. 11 victims in New York have never been identified.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. To Hand Iraq A New Timetable On Security Role (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 21 — The Bush administration is drafting a timetable for the Iraqi government to address sectarian divisions and assume a larger role in securing the country, senior American officials said.

Details of the blueprint, which is to be presented to Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki before the end of the year and would be carried out over the next year and beyond, are still being devised. But the officials said that for the first time Iraq was likely to be asked to agree to a schedule of specific milestones, like disarming sectarian militias, and to a broad set of other political, economic and military benchmarks intended to stabilize the country.

Although the plan would not threaten Mr. Maliki with a withdrawal of American troops, several officials said the Bush administration would consider changes in military strategy and other penalties if Iraq balked at adopting it or failed to meet critical benchmarks within it.

A senior Pentagon official involved in drafting the blueprint said Iraqi officials were being consulted as the plan evolved and would be invited to sign off on the milestones before the end of the year. But he added, “If the Iraqis fail to come back to us on this, we would have to conduct a reassessment” of the American strategy in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0084436

The plan is being formulated by General George W. Casey Jr. and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, the top military and civilian officials in Iraq, as well as by Pentagon officials.

General Casey has been in close consultations with the White House as the debate over the way forward in Iraq has intensified in recent weeks. And he and Mr. Khalilzad took part by videoconference on Saturday in a strategy meeting with President Bush and senior administration officials, including Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East, and Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

"We're trying to come up with ways to get the Iraqis to step up to the plate, to push them along, because the time is coming," a senior administration official said. "We can't be there forever."

Until now, the Bush administration has avoided using threats of deadlines for progress, saying conditions on the ground would determine how quickly Iraq took on greater responsibility for governing the country and how soon American troops could withdraw. CBS News has reported that the Pentagon was studying these questions, but the broad scope of the steps under consideration and the benchmarks that are being contemplated have not been disclosed.

The idea of devising specific steps that Mr. Maliki would have to take was described by senior officials who support the plan but would speak only on condition of anonymity. Their willingness to discuss a plan that has not been fully drafted appeared intended at least in part to signal renewed flexibility on the part of the administration, and perhaps also to pre-empt the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, a commission led by James A. Baker III and charged with formulating a new strategy in Iraq. It is expected to issue recommendations late this year or early next year.

The plan also moves the administration closer to an idea advocated by many Democrats, who have called for setting a date for beginning phased withdrawals of American troops from Iraq as a way to compel Iraq's government to resolve its internal divisions and take on more responsibility.

In a statement issued Saturday, a White House spokeswoman, Nicole Guillemard, said the Times's account was "not accurate," but did not specify what officials found to be inaccurate. "We've been coordinating with the Iraqis for months on a series of measures they can take to assume more control of their country," the statement said, "and to form the basis for a national compact between all communities in Iraq on the way forward."

Frustration is growing among senior American military officers and civilian officials in Iraq and at the Pentagon with Mr. Maliki for his failure to move decisively against Shiite militias and on a wide range of other fronts. Even the implied threat that the administration would reassess its presence in Iraq may not be enough, senior officials said.

In Baghdad, Iraqi leaders have been watching the discussions carefully and expressing uneasiness over the growing political pressure in the United States for a troop pullout.

Tensions between Washington and Baghdad reached a new point on Monday when Mr. Maliki, who took office in May, used a telephone call with Mr. Bush to seek assurances that the United States did not intend to oust him. The White House said after the call that Mr. Bush had pledged full support for the Iraqi.

Mr. Rumsfeld alluded to discussions about benchmarks on Friday at a Pentagon news conference, noting that Mr. Khalilzad and General Casey "are currently working with the Iraqi government to develop a set of projections as to when they think they can pass off various pieces of responsibility."

He emphasized the urgency of transferring more security and governing responsibilities to the Iraqis. "It's their country," he said. "They're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

But Mr. Rumsfeld was quick to play down expectations: "There's no doubt in my mind but that some of those projections we won't make; it will be later, or even earlier in some instances. And in some cases, once we meet the projection, we may have to go back and do it again."

Mr. Maliki's government has already announced its own set of benchmarks, including the establishment of a mechanism to disarm private militias. This week, the government removed commanders of the special police commandos and the public order brigade, both widely criticized as being heavily infiltrated by Shiite militias, in the first broad move against the top leadership of Iraq's unruly special police forces.

DOJ_NMG_0084437

But the surge in violence in Baghdad and other places recently has prompted consideration of even more far-reaching steps. An American official said that one proposed plan was to give the Iraqi Army the lead role in domestic security, downgrading the role of police units.

The Bush administration has emphasized building up the police this year so that they can take on the main role in providing security in many cities. The move would be another acknowledgment that the increase in sectarian violence in Baghdad and elsewhere has exposed deep problems with some police units, which have been blamed by Sunnis for carrying out sectarian attacks.

The American strategy in Iraq was thrown into disarray this week by attacks carried out by a Shiite militia in Amara, a town south of Baghdad, and by the acknowledgment from an American military spokesman that the latest plan to secure Baghdad was faltering.

In his radio address on Saturday, Mr. Bush emphasized that the administration was staying flexible in its planning and would "make every necessary change to prevail."

Saying the goal of victory was "unchanging,"" he added: "What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal. Our commanders on the ground are constantly adjusting their approach to stay ahead of the enemy, particularly in Baghdad."

Officials said they were still debating which benchmarks to include and how long the Iraqis should be given to achieve them. The plan is likely to cover a number of Iraqi ministries, including Finance, Interior and Defense, which have struggled to varying degrees with corruption and with delivering even the most basic services, officials said.

General Casey said this month that he hoped by the end of the year to have six or seven provinces under Iraqi administrative control. Currently, there are only two. But the plan is also likely to include timelines for turning over American-run military bases, an official said.

The decision about how far-reaching to make the blueprint is likely to be influenced by what Mr. Maliki and his ministers say they can reasonably accomplish. But American officials are discussing if they should specify whether Iraqi officials deemed incompetent or corrupt should be replaced, one official said. Officials are also considering a timetable for the Iraqi Defense Ministry to have in place systems for paying, feeding and equipping its units, jobs that are still overseen to a large degree by American advisers and by contractors, some of whom have not performed well, officials said.

U.S. Encourages Iraqi Government To Take More Responsibility (MCT)

By John Walcott

McClatchy Newspapers, October 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration will intensify its efforts to prod the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki to take greater responsibility for governing and pacifying the country, senior U.S. officials said Saturday.

The new plan, which is still being developed, calls for Maliki and other Iraqi leaders to agree to a series of milestones in 2007 for disarming Iraq's sectarian militias, restoring its economic infrastructure, rooting out official corruption, expanding government services and strengthening local governments, the officials said.

President Bush discussed the plan, as well as broader strategic and tactical issues in Iraq, with his top military commanders on Saturday, and the officials stressed that any effort to step up the pressure on the Iraqi government would be consistent with the president's longtime strategy.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld alluded to the evolving plan on Friday, when he said of the Iraqis: "It's their country. They're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

The U.S. officials, all of whom agreed to speak only on the condition of anonymity because the negotiations with the Iraqi government are sensitive, said the plan is likely to be backed by an explicit economic carrot and an implicit military stick.

They said that if the Iraqi government agrees to what one official called "reasonable and measurable benchmarks", the administration would be prepared to ask Congress to approve millions of dollars in additional aid to Iraq, much of it earmarked for economic and political purposes.

DOJ_NMG_0084438

If Maliki and other officials balk or continue to drag their feet, one of the officials said, the administration would be forced to "reconsider all its options." Asked what that meant, the official said that one option might be to announce plans to begin a gradual withdrawal of American troops from Iraq. That, he said, would give Maliki both time and an added incentive to reconsider his own options.

The new tactic could take some pressure off Republican candidates in next month's elections at a time when many are finding it increasingly difficult to defend the administration's "stay the course" rhetoric. It also could blunt Democratic calls for a new direction in Iraq or for a phased withdrawal of American forces.

However, U.S. military officers, diplomats and intelligence officials acknowledged that applying pressure to the Maliki government would carry some risks. They said that those include:

-While their intention is to work cooperatively with the Iraqis, the officials said, overt U.S. pressure could reinforce the impression among Iraqis and other Muslims that the Iraqi government is a U.S. puppet. That could undermine Maliki's legitimacy and aid recruiting by foreign terrorist groups and sectarian militias.

-The administration could ask the Maliki government to do more than it's capable of doing. For example, said one military officer who's served in Iraq, an effort to disarm the country's increasingly powerful Shiite militias could trigger even more violence and invite what the officer called "even more meddling by the Iranians".

Iran backs two major Shiite militias, the Badr Organization, which is allied with a major Shiite political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and the Mahdi Army of firebrand Shiite cleric Moqtada al Sadr.

But with many Iraqi Sunnis long since convinced that much of the Iraqi military and security force is allied with Shiite militias and death squads, Maliki would have no hope of dismantling the largely Sunni insurgency or defeating foreign terrorists, most of whom also are Sunnis, without confronting the Shiite militias.

"It's not clear whether al Maliki and his government could survive a campaign against the militias," said one senior official. That could drag American troops even deeper into Iraq's sectarian violence.

-The plan may not be enough to stem rising U.S. casualty rate in Iraq or the erosion of public support for the administration's Iraq policies. Democrats now appear poised to win control of the House of Representatives in the Nov. 7 congressional elections, and with it power over the federal budget.

A new Newsweek poll released on Saturday found that 65 percent of Americans think the U.S. is losing ground in Iraq, an all-time low in the Newsweek Poll, and that 54 percent think it was a mistake to take military action against Iraq, compared to 39 percent who think it was the right thing to do. The poll of 1,000 adults has a margin or error of plus or minus four percentage points.

The Pentagon Saturday reported the deaths of three more Marines in Iraq's violent Anbar province, making this the costliest month for U.S. troops in Iraq in two years, with 78 Americans killed so far.

In his weekly radio address on Saturday, the president acknowledged that "the last few weeks have been rough for our troops in Iraq, and for the Iraqi people" but likened the conflict to World War II and the Cold War. "The fighting is difficult, but our nation has seen difficult fights before," Bush said. "In World War II and the Cold War, earlier generations of Americans sacrificed so that we can live in freedom. This generation will do its duty as well."

However, said one senior administration official on Saturday, the Iraqi government must do its duty, too.

At White House Meeting, No Big Changes On Iraq (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

President Bush met with his top advisers and military commanders on Iraq yesterday in a White House session that, senior officials said, weighed options for forging a way forward amid the surging violence but did not contemplate any major shifts in strategy.

The participants in the 90-minute video conference -- who included Vice President Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the military commander in Iraq -- talked about tactical changes that could overcome the severe challenges posed by the war, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0084439

"The participants focused on the nature of the enemy, the challenges in Iraq, how to better pursue our strategy, and the stakes of succeeding for the region and the security of the American people," said White House spokeswoman Nicole Guillemard.

The meeting, which the White House called the third in a series Bush has held with this group to consult on the war, did not consider any significant policy changes, a senior official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss private meetings. And in his Saturday radio address, Bush offered no indications on any major shift, even as he acknowledged the increasing violence in Iraq.

"Our goal is clear and unchanging: Our goal is victory," he said. "What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal. Our commanders on the ground are constantly adjusting their approach to stay ahead of the enemy, particularly in Baghdad."

The high-level meeting came amid growing U.S. frustration with the deteriorating state of affairs in Iraq, where both civilian and U.S. military casualties have sharply increased in recent weeks. The surge in violence, coupled with the growing antipathy among the American public toward the war, is feeding a sense that the Bush administration will be forced to retreat from its open-ended support of the war.

In a news conference Friday, Rumsfeld emphasized that U.S. officials are pressing the Iraqi government to offer projections about when it will be able to take over a greater share of the responsibility for securing the country and making economic and political progress.

"The biggest mistake would be not to pass things over to the Iraqis," Rumsfeld said. "It's their country. They're going to have to govern it. They're going to have to provide security for it. And they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

White House officials denied a New York Times report, posted yesterday afternoon on the newspaper's Web site, that said the administration is drafting a timetable for the Iraqi government to take on that greater role in securing the country.

If the Iraqis fail to meet the timetable, the Times quoted an unnamed senior Pentagon official as saying, the Bush administration would consider an abrupt shift in policy short of troop withdrawals. It would mark the first time that the administration has used deadline threats to pressure the Iraqi government to more aggressively pursue progress.

"The story is not accurate," said Frederick L. Jones II, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

White House officials said the matter was not discussed at yesterday's meeting. Still, administration officials acknowledge that they have been pressing for months for the Iraqis to take greater responsibility for disarming warring militias and to take other steps to stabilize their country.

Benchmarks have been part of the U.S. policy in Iraq for months, said Dan Bartlett, a top aide to Bush.

"Implicit in that is that if they are not achieving the benchmarks, we are going to have to make changes accordingly," Bartlett said, adding that troop withdrawals or other dramatic changes in U.S. policy are not being contemplated.

Casey has been working on a series of benchmarks for handing over to the Iraqi government control of both military bases and entire areas of the country. At a recent news conference, Casey said he expects six or seven more provinces in Iraq to come under full control of the government by the end of the year, although Rumsfeld said Friday that "there's no doubt" some of Casey's projections will not be met.

Currently, the Iraqi government has control of two of the country's 18 provinces, meaning that local police can keep order without routine help from the U.S.-led military coalition.

"We are constantly developing new tactics to achieve our goal," Jones said. "We've been coordinating with the Iraqis for months on a series of measures they can take to assume more control of their country."

Diane Farrell, a Democratic candidate for Congress, gave her party's national radio response to Bush, saying: "To be blunt, the president and the Republican Congress have been wrong on Iraq and wrong to keep their failed strategy. . . . An arbitrary departure date could be dangerous, but real goals for the new Iraqi government and its army are necessary."

Farrell, who is running against Rep. Christopher Shays in Connecticut, said Democrats will hold Bush accountable for the war in Iraq if they gain control of either the Senate or House in midterm elections next month.

Yesterday's meeting took place amid a significant increase in violence around Iraq. At least 78 U.S. troops have been killed so far in Iraq this month -- the highest daily rate since January 2005. Attacks in Baghdad have surged 43 percent since midsummer, despite the presence of thousands of U.S. troops, while nationally more than 100 Iraqis a day are being killed, according to the United Nations.

DOJ_NMG_0084440

U.S. commanders are trying to decide whether to send more troops to Iraq.

Bush said in his radio address that the increase in violence is attributable in part to a more aggressive posture being taken by U.S. troops. Still, he said, Americans have faced tough battles before.

"In World War II and the Cold War, earlier generations of Americans sacrificed so that we can live in freedom," he said. "This generation will do its duty as well."

Staff writer Ann Scott Tyson contributed to this report.

Bush Holds Strategy Session On Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 22, 2006

President Bush on Saturday reviewed Iraq strategy with top war commanders and national security advisers, but indicated little inclination for major changes to an increasingly divisive policy.

"Our goal in Iraq is clear and unchanging: Our goal is victory," Bush said in his weekly radio address. "What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal."

Under bipartisan, pre-election pressure for a significant re-examination of the president's war plan, the White House is walking a fine line.

It made sure to publicize the president's high-level meeting on the deteriorating conditions in Iraq — October already is the deadliest month this year for U.S. troops. At the same time, officials characterized the session as routine and part of a continuing discussion that seeks merely tactical adjustments to — not a radical overhaul of — war policy.

"I wouldn't read into this somehow that there is a full-scale push for a major re-evaluation," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said about the White House meeting. Rice, traveling from Asia to Moscow, stressed to reporters that Bush talks often with his generals in Iraq, and did so recently at Camp David.

On Friday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said U.S. officials — Gen. George Casey, head of the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq, and U.S. ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad among them — are working with the Iraqi government to develop projections as to when they think they can pass off various pieces of responsibility for security and governing.

The New York Times, in an article posted on its Web page Saturday, said a plan being formulated by Casey and Khalilzad would likely for the first time outline to Iraq milestones for disarming sectarian militias and meeting other political and economic goals. But it said the blueprint, to be presented to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki by the end of this year, would not threaten Iraq with a withdrawal of U.S. troops.

In a candid assessment of the situation in Iraq, Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department, said in an interview aired Saturday on al-Jazeera television that the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq but was now willing to talk to any group, outside of al-Qaida, to further reconciliation in the country.

A senior Bush administration official questioned whether the remarks had been translated correctly. "Those comments obviously don't reflect our position," said the official, who asked not to be identified because a transcript had not been available for review.

The 90-minute White House session Saturday brought together Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East; Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley; and Rumsfeld and other officials. Participating by videoconference were Vice President Dick Cheney, Casey and Khalilzad.

The meeting followed up on Bush's half-hour talk on Friday with Abizaid.

The White House did not allow reporters to cover either and provided few details after each, but did release an official photo of Saturday's meeting.

DOJ_NMG_0084441

Recent developments in Iraq and at home have put Bush in a delicate political position ahead of the Nov. 7 elections. With GOP control of Congress at stake, voters are expected to be influenced greatly by the nearly four-year-old war.

The discussion of new approaches comes as public pessimism about the war rises. Almost two-thirds in a Newsweek poll released Saturday said the U.S. is losing ground in its efforts to establish security and democracy in Iraq. An AP-Ipsos poll this month found that just over one-third of Americans surveyed say they approve of Bush's handling of Iraq overall.

Last week, the U.S. military spokesman in Iraq acknowledged a stepped-up operation to secure Baghdad was failing after two months and that it needed to be refocused.

Though Bush and his aides publicly voice the utmost confidence in Maliki, frustration is growing with his lack of progress in reining in militias. On Friday, gunmen loyal to an anti-American Shiite cleric briefly seized a major southern city, an embarrassment for the local Iraqi security forces.

An independent commission led by former secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana is not expected to make its recommendations for a new strategy until December or January. But Bush and his aides have rejected the most drastic ideas that some have floated, such as partitioning Iraq into semiautonomous Shiite, Sunni and Kurd regions or setting a timetable for a phased withdrawal of troops.

Bush Sticks To Mission: U.S. Victory (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

President Bush yesterday acknowledged that U.S. commanders are changing tactics in Iraq nearly every day but declared that the mission "is clear and unchanging."

"Our goal," he said, "is victory."

The president's remarks aired in his weekly radio address as he met to discuss the situation in Iraq with top generals and other advisers at the White House.

Later, a senior State Department official said in an interview with an Arab television network that the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq.

Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department, told Al Jazeera that Washington was ready to talk with any group except al Qaeda in Iraq to bring about national reconciliation.

"We are open to dialogue, because we all know that, at the end of the day, the solution to the hell and the killings in Iraq is linked to an effective Iraqi national reconciliation," Mr. Fernandez said, speaking in Arabic from Washington.

But Mr. Bush indicated little intention to make major changes, although the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq so far this month climbed to 78 -- the highest monthly tally this year -- and despite reports that the White House is nearing a dramatic shift in war strategy.

"What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal," the president said in his radio address. "Our commanders on the ground are constantly adjusting their approach to stay ahead of the enemy, particularly in Baghdad."

Mr. Bush vehemently rejected pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq.

"There is one thing we will not do: We will not pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," he said. "There are some in Washington who argue that retreating from Iraq would make us safer. I disagree."

Mr. Fernandez, in the Al Jazeera interview, said there was room for criticism of the war "because, undoubtedly, there was arrogance and there was stupidity from the United States in Iraq."

Political pressure is growing for the president to make a decisive change to his war strategy, and Democratic candidates nationwide have campaigned on a theme of change.

Democratic congressional candidate Diane Farrell, of Connecticut, yesterday said Mr. Bush should fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. She said Congress should set clear benchmarks for Iraqis that, when met, would allow U.S. troops to leave the country.

"We need a new direction in Iraq," said Mrs. Farrell, who delivered her party's weekly radio address. "To be blunt, the president and the Republican Congress have been wrong on Iraq and wrong to keep their failed strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0084442

Meanwhile in Iraq, a dozen mortar rounds rained down yesterday on an outdoor market in Mahmoudiyah crowded with shoppers, killing at least 18.

Earlier, gunfights broke out in Hamza al Gharbi, about 60 miles south of Baghdad, after a bomb exploded near the offices of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a leading Shi'ite political party. At least two persons were killed and four injured.

As the violence continued in Iraq -- including the deaths yesterday of three U.S. Marines -- the president met with top commanders and national security advisers.

The 90-minute meeting brought together Mr. Rumsfeld; Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Peter Pace; Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East; National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and others. Participating by videoconference were Vice President Dick Cheney; Gen. George Casey, who heads the U.S.-led forces in Iraq; and Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

Polls nationwide indicate Republicans are in jeopardy in the Nov. 7 elections of losing their majority in Congress, which they have held since 1994. Democrats need to net 15 seats to win control of the House, and six seats to take the Senate.

With leaks from the independent Iraq Study Group (ISG), headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, swirling around Washington, the White House has rejected a few trial balloons floated in recent weeks. Those include partitioning Iraq into three sections based on ethnicity and religion and withdrawing 5 percent of U.S. troops every two months.

Under a partition plan, Iraq would be divided into Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish regions, each enjoying near-autonomy, with a central government handling defense, foreign policy and oil production.

Mr. Bush sounded more open to alternative tactics. He said the Iraqi prime minister recently met with tribal leaders from Anbar province, "who told him they are ready to stand up and fight the terrorists."

Fellow Republicans are beginning to criticize Mr. Bush's policy.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner of Virginia said after a recent visit to Iraq that U.S. efforts are "drifting sideways." Other Senate leaders, including Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Susan Collins and Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, have been critical of Mr. Bush's "stay the course" policy.

Almost two-thirds of respondents in a Newsweek poll released yesterday said the United States is losing ground in efforts to establish security and democracy in Iraq.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Friday that while Mr. Bush might change tactics, he would not change his overall strategy.

"He's not somebody who gets jumpy at polls," Mr. Snow said.

Bush Reviews Iraq War Strategy As Violence Mounts (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil And Tony Capaccio

Bloomberg, October 22, 2006

Oct. 21 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush conferred with his top Iraq commanders over strategy as stepped-up operations by U.S. and Iraqi troops in Baghdad have been met with a surge in sectarian violence.

The meeting occurred as the New York Times reported today that the administration is working on a timetable for Iraq's government to take over security responsibilities in the country. The plan would require the government to meet milestones over the next year including disbanding sectarian militias, the Times said, citing unidentified U.S. officials.

The Times said the plan wouldn't threaten a withdrawal of U.S. troops, though officials cited by the paper said the Bush administration would consider changes in military strategy and other penalties if it isn't adopted by Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki or the milestones aren't met.

Colonel Nelson McCouch, a spokesman for General George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said the approach described in the Times article wasn't new. ``We've been doing this all along," he said. The U.S., McCouch said, has already established milestones that are adjusted according to conditions in Iraq and aren't hard deadlines.

DOJ_NMG_0084443

The meeting at the White House today included Bush, General John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and General Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; Casey participated by videoconference, White House spokeswoman Nicole Guillemard said.

Focus on Strategy

The 90-minute meeting focused on ``the nature of the enemy, the challenges in Iraq, how to better pursue our strategy, and the stakes of succeeding for the region and the security of the American people," Guillemard said. ``The president expects to meet with this group again in a similar forum within the next weeks."

Earlier, Bush acknowledged that the situation in Iraq remains difficult. ``As we engage our enemies in their stronghold, these enemies are putting up a tough fight," he said in his weekly radio address.

Attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces in Baghdad rose 22 percent this month, even as extra U.S. troops moved into the Iraqi capital in an effort to restore stability, Major General William Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman, said this week. At least 70 U.S. military personnel have been killed so far this month compared with 61 killed in combat in September and 58 in August.

Challenge From Democrats

A dozen Democratic leaders in the House and Senate wrote to Bush yesterday urging a change in course in Iraq, the third such letter Democratic leaders have sent. White House spokesman Tony Snow, announcing the meeting with the generals yesterday, said Bush was planning to review, not change, strategy.

The U.S. strategy in Iraq allows military leaders to ``be flexible and adapt to changing circumstances, Bush said in his radio address. ``Our commanders on the ground are constantly adjusting their approach to stay ahead of the enemy," he said.

Republicans are struggling to retain their congressional majorities in the Nov. 7 elections as the increased bloodshed in Iraq has fueled voter skepticism about the war. Democrats will ``hold the president accountable," Diane Farrell, who's running against Representative Chris Shays, a Connecticut Republican, said in the Democrats' weekly radio address.

``Our troops deserve from their leaders in Washington, nothing short of a commitment equal to the dedication the troops bring to their duty every day," Farrell said. ``Instead they get a flat denial of the horrible reality."

Optimism about the outlook for the Iraq war fell to 20 percent, compared with 45 percent in June, according to a Wall Street Journal/NBC News Poll of 1,006 registered voters. The survey, published this week, has a margin of error of 3.1 percentage points.

`Media War'

In his speech today, Bush said the recent increase in attacks in Iraq also were the result of a ``media war" that terrorists are trying to wage by influencing public opinion.

``They have a sophisticated propaganda strategy," Bush said. ``They know they cannot defeat us in the battle, so they conduct high-profile attacks, hoping the images of violence will demoralize our country and force us to retreat."

Bush cited a recent message from the Global Islamic Media Front that said their goal is to ``carry out a media war that is parallel to the military war."

``The terrorists are trying to divide America and break our will, and we must not allow them to succeed," Bush said.

Democrats such as Senator Barack Obama of Illinois say the U.S. needs to press the Iraqis to take charge of their security. ``We need to be phasing down our troop levels," Obama said in an interview. The U.S. also should tell regional powers such as Iran and Syria to ``get involved" in preventing a failure in Iraq, Obama said.

No Retreat

An independent bipartisan commission established by Congress and headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Representative Lee Hamilton plans to make recommendations on U.S. policy in Iraq by year's end. Baker served in the administration of Bush's father, ex-President George H.W. Bush.

The president said today that the U.S. won't withdraw troops from Iraq ``before the mission is complete."

``Retreating from Iraq would dishonor the men and women who have given their lives in that country and mean their sacrifice has been in vain," he said. ``We will defeat the terrorists everywhere they make their stand."

DOJ_NMG_0084444

Also participating in today's talks with Bush were Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley and his deputy, J.D. Crouch, as well as Vice President Dick Cheney and U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad by video, Guillemard said.

Diplomat Cites U.S. 'Stupidity' In Iraq (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi

AP, October 22, 2006

A senior U.S. diplomat said the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq but was now ready to talk with any group except Al-Qaida in Iraq to facilitate national reconciliation.

In an interview with Al-Jazeera television aired late Saturday, Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department offered an unusually candid assessment of America's war in Iraq.

"We tried to do our best but I think there is much room for criticism because, undoubtedly, there was arrogance and there was stupidity from the United States in Iraq," he said.

"We are open to dialogue because we all know that, at the end of the day, the solution to the hell and the killings in Iraq is linked to an effective Iraqi national reconciliation," he said, speaking in Arabic from Washington. "The Iraqi government is convinced of this."

The question of negotiations between the United States and insurgency factions has repeatedly surfaced over the past two years, but details have been sketchy. One issue that was often raised in connection with such negotiations was the extent of amnesty the United States and its Iraqi allies were willing to offer to the insurgents if they disarmed and joined the political process.

Fernandez spoke to the Qatar-based Al-Jazeera after a man claiming to speak for Saddam Hussein's outlawed Baath Party told the network the United States was seeking a face-saving exodus from Iraq and that insurgents were ready to negotiate but won't lay down arms.

"Abu Mohammed", a pseudonym for the man, appeared to set near impossible conditions for the start of any talks with the Americans, including the return to service of Saddam's armed forces, the annulment of every law adopted since Saddam's ouster, the recognition of insurgent groups as the sole representatives of the Iraqi people and a timetable for a gradual, unconditional withdrawal of U.S. and other foreign troops in Iraq.

"The occupier has started to search for a face-saving way out. The resistance, with all its factions, is determined to continue fighting until the enemy is brought down to his knees and sits on the negotiating table or is dealt, with God's help, a humiliating defeat," he said. The man wore a suit and appeared to be in his 40s but his face was concealed.

"There is an element of the farcical in that statement," Fernandez said of Abu Mohammed's comments. "They are very removed from reality."

Still Fernandez warned that failure to pacify the widening sectarian strife in Iraq as well as an enduring insurgency would damage the entire Middle East.

"We are witnessing failure in Iraq and that's not the failure of the United States alone but it is a disaster for the region. Failure in Iraq will be a failure for the United States but a disaster for the region."

Although the actual identity of Abu Mohammed remains unknown, the interview adds to growing indications that Iraq's Sunni insurgents sense the tide may be turning against the United States and the Iraqi government it backs.

Fernandez's comments, on the other hand, join a series of sobering remarks by President Bush and the U.S. military in recent days.

Bush this week conceded that "right now it's tough" for U.S. forces in Iraq and on Saturday met with his top military and security advisers to study new tactics to curb the staggering violence in Iraq. Three U.S. Marines were killed also Saturday, making October the deadliest month for American forces in Iraq this year.

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell said attacks in Baghdad were up 22 percent in the first three weeks of the holy Muslim month of Ramadan despite a two-month old U.S.-Iraqi drive to crush violence in the Iraqi capital.

DOJ_NMG_0084445

On Wednesday, and again on Friday, Sunni insurgents believed to belong to al-Qaida in Iraq, staged military-like parades in the heart of five towns in the vast and mainly desert province of Anbar, including the provincial capital Ramadi. Some of these parades, in which hooded gunmen paraded with their weapons, took place within striking distance of U.S. forces stationed in nearby bases.

The parades proved to be a propaganda success, with TV footage of Wednesday's parade shown in many parts of the world, a likely embarrassment for the U.S. military as well as the embattled Iraqi government.

Bush Holds Strategy Session On Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 22, 2006

President Bush on Saturday reviewed Iraq strategy with top war commanders and national security advisers, but indicated little inclination for major changes to an increasingly divisive policy.

"Our goal in Iraq is clear and unchanging: Our goal is victory," Bush said in his weekly radio address. "What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal."

Under bipartisan, pre-election pressure for a significant re-examination of the president's war plan, the White House is walking a fine line.

It made sure to publicize the president's high-level meeting on the deteriorating conditions in Iraq — October already is the deadliest month this year for U.S. troops. At the same time, officials characterized the session as routine and part of a continuing discussion that seeks merely tactical adjustments to — not a radical overhaul of — war policy.

"I wouldn't read into this somehow that there is a full-scale push for a major re-evaluation," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said about the White House meeting. Rice, traveling from Asia to Moscow, stressed to reporters that Bush talks often with his generals in Iraq, and did so recently at Camp David.

On Friday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said U.S. officials — Gen. George Casey, head of the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq, and U.S. ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad among them — are working with the Iraqi government to develop projections as to when they think they can pass off various pieces of responsibility for security and governing.

The New York Times, in an article posted on its Web page Saturday, said a plan being formulated by Casey and Khalilzad would likely for the first time outline to Iraq milestones for disarming sectarian militias and meeting other political and economic goals. But it said the blueprint, to be presented to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki by the end of this year, would not threaten Iraq with a withdrawal of U.S. troops.

In a candid assessment of the situation in Iraq, Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department, said in an interview aired Saturday on al-Jazeera television that the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq but was now willing to talk to any group, outside of al-Qaida, to further reconciliation in the country.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, in Moscow with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said that Fernandez disputes the description of his comments, which were in Arabic.

"What he says is, that is not an accurate reflection of what he said," McCormack said. Asked whether the Bush administration believes that history will show a record of arrogance or stupidity in Iraq, McCormack replied "No."

A senior Bush administration official questioned whether the remarks had been translated correctly. "Those comments obviously don't reflect our position," said the official, who asked not to be identified because a transcript had not been available for review.

The 90-minute White House session Saturday brought together Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East; Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley; and Rumsfeld and other officials. Participating by videoconference were Vice President Dick Cheney, Casey and Khalilzad.

The meeting followed up on Bush's half-hour talk on Friday with Abizaid.

DOJ_NMG_0084446

The White House did not allow reporters to cover either and provided few details after each, but did release an official photo of Saturday's meeting.

Recent developments in Iraq and at home have put Bush in a delicate political position ahead of the Nov. 7 elections. With GOP control of Congress at stake, voters are expected to be influenced greatly by the nearly four-year-old war.

The discussion of new approaches comes as public pessimism about the war rises. Almost two-thirds in a Newsweek poll released Saturday said the U.S. is losing ground in its efforts to establish security and democracy in Iraq. An AP-Ipsos poll this month found that just over one-third of Americans surveyed say they approve of Bush's handling of Iraq overall.

Last week, the U.S. military spokesman in Iraq acknowledged a stepped-up operation to secure Baghdad was failing after two months and that it needed to be refocused.

Though Bush and his aides publicly voice the utmost confidence in Maliki, frustration is growing with his lack of progress in reining in militias. On Friday, gunmen loyal to an anti-American Shiite cleric briefly seized a major southern city, an embarrassment for the local Iraqi security forces.

An independent commission led by former secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana is not expected to make its recommendations for a new strategy until December or January. But Bush and his aides have rejected the most drastic ideas that some have floated, such as partitioning Iraq into semiautonomous Shiite, Sunni and Kurd regions or setting a timetable for a phased withdrawal of troops.

Questions To Guide An Exit Policy (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

A realist with a wintry smile, James A. Baker III, who helped make George W. Bush's presidency possible, is seeking ways to salvage it. After the 2000 election, Baker orchestrated the Bush campaign's lawyering against the Gore campaign's lawyering that tried to overturn Bush's 537-vote Florida margin. Today Baker is co-chairman -- with former congressman Lee Hamilton, the Indiana Democrat -- of the Iraq Study Group, which will issue recommendations after Thanksgiving.

International crises rarely conform tidily to electoral cycles. Too bad. America's electoral cycles are constitutional facts: Every two years elections take the nation's temperature; every four years the nation selects the occupant of the office responsible for formulating foreign policy.

Today the policy of "staying the course" means Americans dying to prevent Shiites and Sunnis from killing each other. If in January 2009 more than 100,000 U.S. forces remain in Iraq, there might be 100 fewer Republicans in Congress. So "stay the course" is a policy stamped with an expiration date. Here, then, are four questions the Iraq Study Group might address:

Â· What are 140,000 U.S. forces achieving in Iraq that could not be achieved by 40,000?

Â· If the answer to the first question is "creating Iraqi security forces," a second question is: Is there an Iraqi government? In "State of Denial," Bob Woodward quotes Colin Powell, after leaving the administration, telling the president that strengthening Iraq's military and police forces is crucial but that "if you don't have a government that you can connect these forces to, then, Mr. President, you're not building up forces, you're building up militias." And making matters worse.

Â· Third, what limits on U.S. aims are set by the character of the Iraqi people, as we now understand that? Bing West, a former Marine who frequently visits and writes about Iraq, wrote in the October issue of the Atlantic Monthly about accompanying coalition forces that seized an oil pumping station near Basra in March 2003:

"The engineers were appalled to find open cesspools, rusted valves, sputtering turbines, and other vital equipment deteriorating into junk. Heaps of garbage lay outside the walls of nearby houses. Yet inside the courtyards, tiny patches of grass were as well tended as putting greens. That defined Iraq: a generation of tyrannical greed had taught Iraqis to look out for their own, to enrich their families, and to avoid any communal activity that attracted attention."

Â· Hence, a fourth question: In a perhaps intentionally opaque statement on "The Charlie Rose Show" on Oct. 6, Baker said: "If we are able to promote representative -- representative government, not necessarily democracy, in a number of nations in the Middle East and bring more freedom to the people of that part of the world, [Iraq] will have been a success." Can President

DOJ_NMG_0084447

Bush's "freedom agenda," which Iraq has shredded, be recast by the Study Group's showing that there is more than semantic sleight of hand in the distinction between democracy and representation?

Perhaps the Iraq Study Group will function as did the Tower Commission, which provided a pivot point for the last two years of a troubled presidency. Chaired by former senator John Tower, the Texas Republican, it analyzed the Reagan administration's failings that produced the Iran-contra fiasco. This story is told in the book "Saving the Reagan Presidency" by David Abshire, to whom Reagan gave extraordinary powers to examine his administration's dysfunctions and recommend remedial measures.

Abshire, a seasoned diplomat now advising the Study Group, told Reagan that his presidency could not be revived without the removal of Don Regan as White House chief of staff. Regan was removed. The Study Group almost certainly will, like the Tower Commission, refrain from making personnel recommendations. But is it plausible that the Bush presidency can pivot without changing senior Defense Department personnel?

In September 1942 the U.S. government purchased 58,575 acres of wilderness in eastern Tennessee. Soon there was a town, Oak Ridge, and amazing scientific facilities. Thirty-four months after the purchase, an atomic blast lit the New Mexico desert. After 43 months in Iraq, U.S. forces still struggle to cope with improvised explosive devices.

On Sept. 19 Hamilton said that "the next three months are critical." On Oct. 5 Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said that the next "two or three months" are critical. If only the worsening insurgency were, as the president suggested Wednesday, akin to North Vietnam's 1968 Tet Offensive. The insurgency is worse: Tet was a military defeat for North Vietnam. The president says the war in Iraq will be "just a comma" in history books, but by Nov. 26, the Sunday after Thanksgiving, with the Study Group's recommendations due, the comma will have lasted as long as U.S. involvement in World War II.

georgewill@washpost.com

After Elections, A Democratic Push (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

No one speaks more authoritatively for the Democrats on defense and national security issues than Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island, both longtime members of the Armed Services Committee. If you want to know what Democratic gains in this midterm election would mean for national security policy, Levin and Reed can provide the answers.

In a conference call with reporters the other day, the two senators outlined the changes in U.S. policy toward North Korea and Iraq that they and their fellow Democrats would like to see. They signal to voters the kind of change a Democratic victory would mean.

In the case of North Korea, Levin called for doing something that President Bush has refused for six years to do -- engage directly in talks with representatives of the communist regime.

But he put a condition on it, saying such talks should take place only "providing our allies and partners want us to do it" and only as part of an agreed-upon strategy supported by Japan, South Korea, China and Russia.

Reed, who endorsed the idea, said any direct U.S.-North Korea talks would "most likely" take place in the context of the six-power talks, now stalled over Pyongyang's defiance of the United Nations and the regime's testing of a nuclear weapon.

Levin said he believes the other nations in those six-power talks -- Russia, China, Japan and South Korea -- all wish the United States would talk directly with the North Koreans. Our willingness to do so would not be a sign of weakness, he said, but a way of removing an excuse the North Koreans have used to explain their obduracy.

On Iraq, the two Democrats harked back to the amendment that 39 senators supported during a debate earlier this year -- an amendment that called for a start on U.S. troop withdrawals within six months but set no numbers and specified no target date for ending the U.S. military presence.

Reed, who has made many trips to Iraq and returned just weeks ago from his most recent visit, described the "very, very difficult situation" he found there. "We have to begin to work toward redeployment without setting a timetable," he said. "We have to start laying out some red lines for the Iraqis . . . give them some clear goals we want them to achieve." They need to set plans for disarming militias, conducting elections at the provincial level and spending some of the funds being hoarded in Baghdad on better services for the people, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0084448

Implicit in their comments is a belief, based on their firsthand observations, that the current rulers in Baghdad have a different agenda for themselves than the Bush administration's bland assurances suggest. As Levin put it, "Our only leverage for change is to force the politicians in Iraq to realize we're not there as their security blanket. When they recognize that reality, they're more likely to make the necessary compromises on sharing of oil revenues and sharing power. The prospect of losing us as their personal security blanket will focus their minds."

Reed agreed that unless something is done to change course, three separate violent struggles going on in Iraq (Sunnis vs. Shiites; Shiite factions fighting each other; Sunni insurgents fighting Americans) will probably merge into one massive calamity.

When the senators were asked if a Democratic majority in the House or Senate would force the issue in Iraq by threatening to cut off funds for the war, they quickly ruled out any such action. Levin said that a simple resolution recommending to the president that he set a date to begin redeployment might do the trick.

Other forces could nudge Bush in that direction, he said: the growing concern among senior uniformed officers about the impact of the lengthy Iraq deployment on troop morale and unit readiness; and the post-election report of the special Iraq Study Group, headed by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton.

But after all the debate on Iraq this year, a change in control of even one house of Congress "would have a major impact, a huge motivating force on the president to change course," Levin said. "More and more Republicans would join with Democrats in trying to get the administration to change course."

Those words will be -- and should be -- taken seriously.

davidbroder@washpost.com

Stark Lessons From Iraq (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

The bloody chaos of Iraq under U.S. occupation is shaking Western governments into sobering reassessments of that conflict and of war itself. More urgently, some of these governments have launched tightly held contingency planning for the consequences of a possible American failure in Iraq.

"There will be no papers or staff meetings on that subject in our main ministries," one European senior official told me recently. "It would leak, and that would be disastrous. But our intelligence agencies have begun to work on where the terrorists would go post-Iraq. That is a threat we cannot ignore now."

The deepening doubts about America's commitment and strategy in Iraq that dominate polling for U.S. midterm elections have spread across the Atlantic in recent months as insurgency has metastasized into sectarian warfare between Sunnis and Shiites.

Those doubts have reached even into the office of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who needed to be reassured by a telephone call from President Bush last week that Maliki's faltering "national unity" government still has U.S. support. The commitment had been called into question by on-the-record and anonymous comments by members of the Iraq Study Group headed by former secretary of state Jim Baker.

But Bush's reassurances to the beleaguered Maliki do not dispel the gathering sense at home and abroad that the administration is belatedly engaged in a search for a political-economic exit strategy. Such a strategy would quickly reduce the role of U.S. combat troops in Iraq and gradually increase the economic involvement of other countries, including Iraq's neighbors.

The Baker group's political recommendations in late autumn will roughly coincide with the rollout of a U.N.-sponsored International Compact for Iraq that would offer new reconstruction aid and debt relief if Maliki undertakes substantial economic reforms. In the view of international officials, new laws on oil exploration, production and revenue sharing are urgent and central to the reforms and to national reconciliation efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0084449

But military leaders and diplomats in Western capitals are not waiting for the Baker and U.N.-sponsored efforts to conclude before they assess the mistakes, poor strategy and changing conditions of warfare that have brought U.S. forces face to face with the bitter prospect of having to withdraw, mission unaccomplished.

The glaring contrast between the lightning victory over Iraq's conventional army in 2003 and the failure of U.S. forces to stabilize postwar Iraq is Topic A in these circles. It has become the subject of official planning exercises, classified Pentagon briefings, and public calls for retraining and reequipping Western forces to fight new forms of insurgency and terrorism fueled by extremist Islamic ideology.

The need for changes in practice and doctrine was reinforced by Israel's inconclusive July-August war in Lebanon against Hezbollah, a classic guerrilla force that also possesses a strategic missile arsenal capable of damaging and shutting down entire Israeli cities.

"Insurgency is here to stay," Jeb Nadaner, deputy assistant defense secretary for stability operations, said at a recent U.S.-British conference in Washington on reorganizing governments to fight irregular warfare.

Other speakers -- including conference organizer John Hillen, the State Department's top political-military expert -- spoke bluntly to the group about the continuing failure of the U.S. military and civilian bureaucracies to adapt to an era in which armor and infantry battles occupy only a small space on the overall battlefield and are in any event too costly to be carried on for very long.

Across the Atlantic, similar thinking is underway in defense ministries and force headquarters. "Classical warfare is probably dead. It is no longer a cost-effective tool to achieve political or economic goals," Gen. Vincent Desportes, the head of France's Doctrine Center for Forces Employment, wrote in a recent study of conflict in a post-Iraq-invasion world.

Instead, conventional wars "mutate very quickly into asymmetrical clashes, which do last," Desportes continued. "The decisive phase is no longer the initial short phase of intervention, but clearly the phase of long stabilization which follows it."

Mao Zedong made famous the idea that civilian populations are the sea in which guerrillas swim. But today's insurgencies use civilian populations as their most important weapon. Britain's Gen. Rupert Smith made the point in a recent book that military forces must be prepared to fight within and for populations, which previously have been seen by generals as little more than impediments to battle.

The extent to which U.S. forces were unprepared for insurgency and sectarian warfare in Iraq has become painfully apparent. The lessons they are learning -- which have become prohibitively costly for Americans and Iraqis -- must never again be forgotten.

jimhoagland@washpost.com

Change Course In Iraq (WP)

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

President Bush must revise the U.S. strategy for stabilizing the country.

PRESIDENT BUSH said this month that he was willing to "change tactics" in Iraq if U.S strategy was not working. We believe the time has come for such a change. The Iraqi coalition government that Mr. Bush has been counting on to forge political compromises and disarm sectarian militias doesn't seem to have the strength to carry out either mission. A U.S.-led attempt to pacify Baghdad by concentrating forces in the capital has failed, while contributing to a grievous spike in American casualties. Support for the war is rapidly slipping, in the country and in Congress; a congressionally mandated commission is likely to recommend a new course sometime after next month's election. Mr. Bush would be wise to act sooner than that: The rapidly deteriorating situation in Iraq needs to be addressed urgently.

The United States cannot afford to abandon Iraq or the government of Nouri al-Maliki, which was elected last January with millions of votes from Iraqis who did not choose civil war, partition or al-Qaeda. But U.S. policy must account for the fact that Mr. Maliki's administration has not been able to stop the acceleration of sectarian warfare, in many cases waged by militias linked to parties in the government. Nor has it taken the bold steps that might pave the way for a political settlement, such as an amnesty for insurgents and concessions by majority Shiites to minority Sunnis on the distribution of oil revenue or limitations on federalism.

DOJ_NMG_0084450

A revised U.S. strategy must aim to jump-start political accord and militia disarmament. But it must also provide for the possibility that decisive progress will not be achievable soon. It should position the United States to defend its interests during a protracted conflict, with levels of troops and other resources that will be sustainable. It should reach out to Iraq's neighbors and other governments with an interest in stabilizing the country. This calls for diplomacy far more deft and aggressive than the administration thus far has engaged in.

What could be done to foster a political settlement? The best option that has not yet been tried is a peace conference attended by all the Iraqi parties, as well as Iraq's neighbors, the United Nations and other powers, such as the European Union and the Arab League. Similar conferences brokered the end of civil wars in Lebanon, Bosnia and Congo. The United States and other outside powers cannot impose a solution, but they can press the Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds to make the deals they know are needed: on oil revenue; on an amnesty for insurgents and former Baathists; on the terms by which Iraq may be divided into federal regions.

The United States, Europe and Arab states could offer incentives for accord such as reconstruction funds linked to progress in implementing constitutional and economic reforms. At the same time, the Bush administration should help to create a contact group of all of Iraq's neighbors to discuss common interests in stabilizing the country and preventing the escalation and spread of civil war. Those common interests do exist, even between the United States and Iran and Syria; dialogue about them is long overdue.

Political progress, or the absence of it, should shape the future deployment of U.S forces. If there are breakthroughs toward Iraqi reconciliation in the coming months, American forces could help to consolidate them.

But if, as appears more likely, Iraq's civil war deepens and spreads, the United States should abandon attempts to pacify Baghdad or other areas with its own forces. It should adopt a strategy of supporting the Iraqi government and army in a long-term effort to win the war. The elements of such a strategy might include substantially upgrading the training, advising and support missions -- which have been woefully undersupported so far. U.S. airpower could back Iraqi troops, and U.S. money and equipment could flow to the Iraqi army, conditioned on government steps to demobilize Shiite militias and respect the constitution. Meanwhile, the U.S. and Iraqi governments should formally agree on a plan for turning the fighting over to Iraqi troops, province by province; Mr. Maliki himself has said he wants that transition to occur by the end of next year. A reserve force of U.S. troops could remain as a guarantor against a military victory by insurgents and as a rapid reaction force that could strike al-Qaeda targets.

A change of course won't necessarily rescue the U.S mission in Iraq. The government, political system and army that Americans and Iraqis have sacrificed so much to create could collapse without the prop of 140,000 U.S. troops or even with it. But there remains a chance the government could gain control over the country. As long as that prospect exists, the United States has a moral obligation and a practical interest to remain in Iraq.

Blowing In The Wind (NYT)

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

The generals who told President Bush before the war that Donald Rumsfeld's shock-and-awe fantasy would not work were not enough to persuade him to change his strategy in Iraq. The rise of the insurgency did not do the trick. Nor did month after month of mounting military and civilian casualties on all sides, the emergence of a near civil war, the collapse of reconstruction efforts or the seeming inability of either Iraqi or American forces to secure contested parts of Iraq, including Baghdad, for any significant period.

So what finally, after all this time, caused Mr. Bush to very publicly consult with his generals to consider a change in tactics in Iraq? The president, who says he never reads political polls, is worried that his party could lose some of its iron grip on power in the Congressional elections next month.

It is not necessarily a bad thing when a politician takes stock of his positions in the teeth of an election. Our elected leaders are expected to heed the will of the American people. And this page has been part of a chorus of pleas for Mr. Bush to come up with a more realistic approach to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0084451

But the way this sudden change of heart has come about, after months in which Mr. Bush has brushed off all criticism of his policies as either misguided, politically motivated or downright disloyal to America, is maddening. For far too long, the White House has looked upon the war as a tactical puzzle for campaign strategists. The early notion of combining Iraq and the war on terror as an argument for re-electing Republicans robbed the nation of any serious chance for a bipartisan discussion of these life-and-death issues. More recently, the administration seems to have been working under the assumption that its only obligations were to hang on, talk tough and pass the problem on to the next president.

The Iraqi government, which has had a hard time adopting most aspects of American democracy, seems to have eagerly embraced this administration's lessons on how to deny politically unpleasant realities. Just the other day, The Times reported that the Pentagon had decided there was nothing wrong with a program in which phony "positive news" was planted in Iraqi newspapers. And news reports said that the Iraqi government had decided to stop reporting civilian casualties to the United Nations so there would be no record of the war's increasing toll on ordinary Iraqis.

The way the Bush team is stage-managing the president's supposed change of heart about "staying the course" is unfair to the Americans who have taken him at his word that real progress is being made in Iraq — a dwindling but still significant number of people, some of whom have sons and daughters serving in the conflict. It is a disservice to the troops, who were never sent to Iraq in sufficient numbers to protect themselves or the Iraqi people. And it is a disservice to all Americans, who have waited so long for Mr. Bush to act that all that is left are a series of unpleasant choices.

And it is happening in the midst of a particularly ugly, and especially vacuous, election season. There is probably no worse time to begin a serious discussion about Iraq policy than two weeks before a close, bitter election. But now that the discussion has begun, it must continue, as honestly and openly as possible. It is time for the American people to confront all the things that the president never had the guts to tell them about for three and a half years.

On Baghdad Streets, A Police Partnership Falters (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 21 — When Lt. Col. John Norris led his Stryker battalion to the Baya district of Baghdad last month he planned to work hand in glove with the Iraqi police. But no sooner did he venture onto the streets than he discovered that the police who were to be his partners were part of the problem.

As his Stryker command vehicle drove along a crowded avenue Colonel Norris spied several Shiite women in black abayas wailing over a body sprawled near a mosque as distraught relatives smeared the dead man's blood on their faces. The American officer tried to wave down an Iraqi National Police truck for help, but the driver gave him an icy stare and kept going.

"I was disgusted by that," Colonel Norris recalled.

An investigation by the American battalion later determined that the murder victim was a Sunni army captain visiting his family while on leave.

He had been shot in the head and neck by two men armed with 9-millimeter pistols who escaped in a white van that drove unchallenged through a National Police checkpoint less than 200 yards away.

On Thursday, the American command acknowledged that the Baghdad security plan had yet to stem the escalating bloodshed in the city. A week spent with American units demonstrated a major reason: After spending billions on building up Iraqi forces, and making withdrawal contingent on that buildup, the Americans have discovered that many of the Iraqi security forces are still not ready to handle security on their own. Throughout much of the city many Iraqis do not trust their own police forces.

The American military operation to reduce the sectarian killings in Baghdad and avert a full-fledged civil war has focused on about a dozen neighborhoods where the bodies of tortured victims have been found in sewage-filled lots, civilians have been killed in drive-by shootings and sectarian-inspired kidnappings have soared.

The strategy is to use American and Iraqi forces to clear neighborhoods of violent militias, insurgent groups and arms caches, then hold them with security forces so that essential services can be restored and reconstruction can eventually begin. Two months into the operation, it is the "hold" phase that has run into trouble, partly because it depends on the Iraqi security forces to win the trust of the population and establish the rule of law.

DOJ_NMG_0084452

The Iraqi Army only provided two of the six battalions of additional troops that the Americans had requested to carry out the operation, known as Together Forward II, which means that with 15,600 Americans and 9,600 Iraqis, there are more American soldiers involved in the operation than Iraqi troops.

More than 30,000 National Police and regular police officers are also involved, but they are of uneven quality and some units have been infiltrated by the very militiamen they are supposed to control. American troops have been sorting the good policemen from the bad the hard way: on the streets of Baghdad, as they try to stop the spiraling sectarian killings.

An Extended Mission

Before Colonel Norris's unit arrived in Baghdad, his mechanized infantry battalion, the Fourth Battalion of the 23rd Infantry, was no stranger to Iraq. Its troops had secured Mosul, Tal Afar and Rawa before its yearlong tour of duty was extended by commanders eager to bring reinforcements to Baghdad.

Of his 644 soldiers, 200 had already returned to their home base in Alaska and another 100 were in Kuwait waiting to go home when they were ordered back to Iraq. The extension of the mission entailed hardship and sacrifice. Only one soldier in the battalion has been killed in the line of duty, by a sniper in Baghdad.

After conducting clearing operations in Ghazaliya, Adhamiya and other neighborhoods, the battalion was dispatched to the Baya district. They had worked well with Iraqi security forces and hoped for more of the same in their new sector.

The murder scene Colonel Norris stumbled upon on Oct. 1, the unit's first day in Baya, was a rude introduction to much tougher problems ahead. Although the battalion did not know it at the time, that same day 22 Iraqis were accosted at a Sunni-owned meat-packing plant. According to some witnesses, the assailants wore woodlawn-pattern camouflage uniforms and carried Glock pistols, which are customarily used by the National Police. They checked identity documents to separate the Sunnis from the Shiites. The Sunnis were blindfolded, thrown into meat trucks and driven off. Seven were shot and six of them died.

American military officers suspect the attack was instigated by the Shiite militia the Mahdi Army of Moktada al-Sadr, with the active or tacit support of the Second Battalion of the Eighth Brigade of the National Police. "The statistics indicate that they were doing nothing to support security," Colonel Norris said, referring to the police unit. "They were either responsible for the murders or were allowing them to happen."

The assault set off an uproar in the neighborhood. The next day a group of Sunnis lobbed four mortar shells and fired machine guns at a National Police checkpoint. That was followed by an angry demonstration. The very policemen who were supposed to help the Americans keep the lid on the sectarian strife in Baya had stoked old animosities.

Faced with a deteriorating security situation, Maj. Gen. J. D. Thurman, the commander of the Fourth Infantry Division and the senior American commander in Baghdad, recommended that the National Police unit be withdrawn and retrained. On his second day in his new sector, Colonel Norris had the delicate task of informing the unit that it was relieved of its duties.

He said he expected that the police would be replaced by an Iraq Army unit, a move he hoped would be more acceptable to residents. But Iraqi soldiers were in short supply. He was informed that the new force would be another unit of the National Police. That posed a huge challenge, since the National Police had lost the trust of the Sunnis in the Baya area.

A Web of Police Forces

The Americans finally received some good news when they learned that the new National Police unit they would be working with was led by Col. Ali Ibrahim Daboun, a commander they knew from Ghazaliya. He impressed them when he provided a tip about two teenagers involved in transporting triggering devices for bombs, setting up a joint American and Iraqi raid in which they were apprehended.

But in the balkanized network of Iraqi law enforcement Colonel Ali was in charge of one of three police units in the area. The key was to weld the disparate police forces in the neighborhood into an effective force and rebuild public confidence in their work. This was no small problem because Sunni residents had continued to shoot at the National Police, killing one of Colonel Ali's officers and wounding several others.

To encourage cooperation, Colonel Norris organized a meeting of tribal sheiks and neighborhood leaders. He did not tell the local officials that the police would be there for fear that would scare them away. At the meeting, Sunni representatives railed against the police for failing to stop Shiite militia attacks or protect residents when notices were posted on their door warning them to flee or be killed.

DOJ_NMG_0084453

Colonel Norris told the officials their complaints were justified. But he added that there was a new team in town and it wanted to make a fresh start. The neighborhood representatives were stunned. They did not know that the old police unit had been replaced.

Seeking to win over the representatives, Colonel Ali took the floor. He declared boldly that he was not a Shiite or a Sunni but an Iraqi and would enforce the law in an evenhanded way. With so many men running around in uniforms and renegade militias running rife, one participant asked how the citizens could tell the good policemen from the ones that meant them harm.

Colonel Ali offered advice that said a great deal about the long road ahead before Iraq's forces can assume the main burden of protecting the country. If an Iraqi policeman comes to your door, he advised, you should not open it unless he is accompanied by an American soldier.

An Act of Charity

Colonel Norris said more local people had offered tips to the Americans and their Iraqi partners because residents had come to believe that the Americans wanted to help. New threats to the police from local militias, who used to count on their cooperation, are another indication of progress, he said.

But the American officials say it is clear that the Iraqi forces vitally depend on the Americans for backup. "They are extremely vulnerable," Colonel Norris said of the Iraqi police. "The majority of force protection is provided by coalition forces."

None of the improvements helped Latif Abdul Kathum Hilal Janabi, the owner of a cellphone shop and a member of a prominent Sunni tribe, who was killed by assailants when he resisted a kidnapping.

One of the assailants was killed and the other wounded by a guard from a nearby mosque. The wounded gunman was taken to a hospital but disappeared in the medical system. One policeman said he had heard that the assailant had been moved by his confederates to a hospital in Sadr City so he would be beyond the reach of the American-led coalition forces.

Capt. Matthew Albertus, the 30-year-old commander of Company A, was able to perform an act of charity. As he was leaving a police station, he spied the distressed wife of the murder victim who was waiting at the gate, the very picture of frustration. She had come to plead for help in getting the necessary paperwork to secure the release of her husband's body from the morgue for burial, and it was not clear when she was going to get it.

Captain Albertus took matters into his own hands. He told the local police chief to get the documents, drove with him to the hospital in his armored vehicle and then insisted that the morgue take action. The murdered man's wife sobbed as the body was placed in a simple plywood coffin. His father tried to choke back his tears. Then the coffin was tied to the roof of a Chevrolet Caprice.

Even hospitals can be dangerous places these days because militias know they are gathering places for relatives. So Captain Albertus formed a convoy around the car and then drove through Baghdad so the grieving relatives could make their way through the city streets and checkpoints. Nobody could stop the men who took Mr. Janabi's life, but the Americans provided the final escort.

U.K. Official: Iraqi Army 'Coming Along' (AP)

By Jill Lawless

AP, October 22, 2006

Iraqi police and military should be ready to take on much of the work being done by U.S.-led forces within a year, a British government minister said Saturday.

Another governing-party lawmaker, however, warned it was unlikely Iraq could remain a single, united country once U.S. and British troops pull out.

"The Iraqi army is coming along very well," Foreign Office Minister Kim Howells told British Broadcasting Corp. radio. "I would have thought that certainly in a year or so there will be adequately trained Iraqi soldiers and security forces — policemen and women and so on — in order to do the job," Howells added.

"I would be very surprised if there was not that kind of capacity taking on a lot of the work done by the coalition forces."

DOJ_NMG_0084454

However, Howells warned "it's going to take a lot of blood yet" before Iraq becomes a stable democracy.

British officials have spoken in recent months of cutting their troop levels in Iraq from 7,000 to between 3,000 and 4,000 by mid-2007, but no firm date for withdrawal has been set.

Prime Minister Tony Blair has been under growing pressure to set a timetable for a pullout. Last week, the country's top soldier Gen. Richard Dannatt called for British troops to be withdrawn "sometime soon" and said their presence was provoking rather than preventing violence.

Blair said this week that it would be a "gross dereliction of our duty" to withdraw before Iraqi forces were able to take responsibility for security.

Labour Party lawmaker Doug Henderson, a former defense minister, said in comments reported Saturday that Iraq would probably break into at least three countries — Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish — once allied troops have withdrawn.

"I doubt if Iraq can be retained as one nation in the future," Henderson told GMTV television in an interview to be broadcast Sunday. "I hope it can be, but I think it's very unlikely that that will be the case."

Excerpts from the interview were released late Saturday by the broadcaster.

Bush Sticks To Mission: U.S. Victory (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

President Bush yesterday acknowledged that U.S. commanders are changing tactics in Iraq nearly every day but declared that the mission "is clear and unchanging."

"Our goal," he said, "is victory."

The president's remarks aired in his weekly radio address as he met to discuss the situation in Iraq with top generals and other advisers at the White House.

Later, a senior State Department official said in an interview with an Arab television network that the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq.

Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department, told Al Jazeera that Washington was ready to talk with any group except al Qaeda in Iraq to bring about national reconciliation.

"We are open to dialogue, because we all know that, at the end of the day, the solution to the hell and the killings in Iraq is linked to an effective Iraqi national reconciliation," Mr. Fernandez said, speaking in Arabic from Washington.

But Mr. Bush indicated little intention to make major changes, although the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq so far this month climbed to 78 -- the highest monthly tally this year -- and despite reports that the White House is nearing a dramatic shift in war strategy.

"What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal," the president said in his radio address. "Our commanders on the ground are constantly adjusting their approach to stay ahead of the enemy, particularly in Baghdad."

Mr. Bush vehemently rejected pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq.

"There is one thing we will not do: We will not pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," he said. "There are some in Washington who argue that retreating from Iraq would make us safer. I disagree."

Mr. Fernandez, in the Al Jazeera interview, said there was room for criticism of the war "because, undoubtedly, there was arrogance and there was stupidity from the United States in Iraq."

Political pressure is growing for the president to make a decisive change to his war strategy, and Democratic candidates nationwide have campaigned on a theme of change.

Democratic congressional candidate Diane Farrell, of Connecticut, yesterday said Mr. Bush should fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. She said Congress should set clear benchmarks for Iraqis that, when met, would allow U.S. troops to leave the country.

"We need a new direction in Iraq," said Mrs. Farrell, who delivered her party's weekly radio address. "To be blunt, the president and the Republican Congress have been wrong on Iraq and wrong to keep their failed strategy."

DOJ_NMG_0084455

Meanwhile in Iraq, a dozen mortar rounds rained down yesterday on an outdoor market in Mahmoudiyah crowded with shoppers, killing at least 18.

Earlier, gunfights broke out in Hamza al Gharbi, about 60 miles south of Baghdad, after a bomb exploded near the offices of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a leading Shi'ite political party. At least two persons were killed and four injured.

As the violence continued in Iraq -- including the deaths yesterday of three U.S. Marines -- the president met with top commanders and national security advisers.

The 90-minute meeting brought together Mr. Rumsfeld; Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Peter Pace; Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East; National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and others. Participating by videoconference were Vice President Dick Cheney; Gen. George Casey, who heads the U.S.-led forces in Iraq; and Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

Polls nationwide indicate Republicans are in jeopardy in the Nov. 7 elections of losing their majority in Congress, which they have held since 1994. Democrats need to net 15 seats to win control of the House, and six seats to take the Senate.

With leaks from the independent Iraq Study Group (ISG), headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, swirling around Washington, the White House has rejected a few trial balloons floated in recent weeks. Those include partitioning Iraq into three sections based on ethnicity and religion and withdrawing 5 percent of U.S. troops every two months.

Under a partition plan, Iraq would be divided into Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish regions, each enjoying near-autonomy, with a central government handling defense, foreign policy and oil production.

Mr. Bush sounded more open to alternative tactics. He said the Iraqi prime minister recently met with tribal leaders from Anbar province, "who told him they are ready to stand up and fight the terrorists."

Fellow Republicans are beginning to criticize Mr. Bush's policy.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner of Virginia said after a recent visit to Iraq that U.S. efforts are "drifting sideways." Other Senate leaders, including Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Susan Collins and Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, have been critical of Mr. Bush's "stay the course" policy.

Almost two-thirds of respondents in a Newsweek poll released yesterday said the United States is losing ground in efforts to establish security and democracy in Iraq.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Friday that while Mr. Bush might change tactics, he would not change his overall strategy.

"He's not somebody who gets jumpy at polls," Mr. Snow said.

Precarious Cease-Fire In Amara Holds (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 21 — Iraqi troops patrolled a tense cease-fire in the southeastern city of Amara on Saturday, but scattered clashes between rival Shiite militias farther north raised new concerns about the potential for a widening of the chaos that shook the city the day before.

With 2,300 Iraqi troops rushed to Amara from Baghdad and the southern oil hub of Basra, the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki appeared to have regained control of the city from the gangs of militiamen who ruled the streets there for most of Friday. Local officials said that at least 25 people had been killed, including militiamen and police officers, and more than 160 others wounded.

A government spokesman said senior officials dispatched from Baghdad were investigating the Friday upheaval and were working with tribal leaders and representatives of the rival militia groups on ways of reinforcing the truce, including steps to address the grievances that had caused the clashes.

“All the shops are open, and there are traffic jams in the streets,” said Muhannad al-Gharawi, a government spokesman in the city.

DOJ_NMG_0084456

He said government troops were being helped by police commandos, also drafted into the city after the local police headquarters and two other police stations were destroyed Friday by bombs set by fighters from the Mahdi Army, the pervasive militia force led by Moktada al-Sadr, a volatile cleric with a mass following among impoverished Shiites.

Government officials said Saturday that Mr. Sadr played a crucial role in calming Friday's violence, and that Mr. Sadr's representatives in the city were cooperating in talks aimed at avoiding a resumption.

But there were other indications that the Amara crisis was far from over, and that the Maliki government, led by Shiite groups that include both Mr. Sadr's political faction and the political leaders who control the Badr Organization, the other militia group involved in the Friday clashes, was concerned that the violence could resume and spread elsewhere in the Shiite homeland in southern Iraq.

The concern appeared to be shared by coalition military commanders, who moved a 600-man British battle group to the outskirts of Amara, 230 miles southeast of Baghdad, and ordered the group to stand ready to move into the city if Iraqi commanders requested reinforcements.

"The situation is calm, but it's very tense," Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a spokesman for the British forces in Basra, told Agence France-Presse.

British troops had maintained a garrison at a major base on Amara's western outskirts until August, when they were withdrawn as part of a wider handover to Iraqi forces across the south.

Major Burbridge added, "We suspect there is a capacity for it to brew up again without any warning."

The first signs that the violence between the Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization had spread beyond Amara came in reports of clashes in two other southern towns. The police in Suweira, a mainly Shiite town 35 miles southeast of Baghdad, said two Mahdi Army fighters and one civilian had been killed in clashes between the militias in the town on Saturday.

In Hamza al-Sharqi, a town about 80 miles south of Baghdad, the police said American troops had intervened to restore calm after the Mahdi Army was accused of planting a bomb on Friday night in the offices of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the political group that controls the Badr Organization. Local officials said two people were killed in a gunfight between American troops and militiamen that followed the bombing.

A senior official of the Maliki government in Baghdad sought to play down the wider significance of the Amara clashes, saying the violence, involving two militia groups whose political masters are important partners in the ruling coalition, had local causes and posed no threat to the government's survival.

Accounts given by local leaders and others in Amara said that the violence began after a Mahdi Army bombing that killed a top Badr official serving in the local police, and that the Badr group retaliated by kidnapping the brother of the top Mahdi Army commander in Amara. The police in Amara, the accounts said, ware under Badr control, and became the target of Mahdi Army reprisals.

"It was a case of a local commander taking the law into his own hands," the official said, insisting that he not be quoted by name because of the political sensitivities involved and because of his own involvement in talks with Mr. Sadr. He said Mr. Sadr, based in the Shiite holy city of Najaf, had "behaved very responsibly" by sending a representative to Amara to help quell the violence.

The Amara upheaval erupted less than 48 hours after Mr. Maliki flew to Najaf from Baghdad to see Mr. Sadr and Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most powerful Shiite cleric, and urged both men to rein in the Mahdi Army, which American commanders have identified as having been responsible for much of the sectarian killing in recent months.

American commanders have been pressing the Maliki government for clearance for a broad crackdown on the Mahdi Army and other sectarian militias, but Mr. Maliki, dependent on the Sadr faction in Parliament for his government's survival, has insisted that the problem of the militias be solved politically. The senior official who discussed the Amara developments said Mr. Maliki, on his Najaf trip, had been assured by Mr. Sadr that the Mahdi Army was not involved in killings.

"The prime minister asked him to disband and disarm" the Mahdi Army, the official said, and Mr. Sadr had responded by offering assurances that the militia, which challenged American troops in two uprisings in 2004, had been transformed into "a political army that was not allowed to take any violent actions against Sunnis." The official, speaking of the Sadr militiamen, said, "I think they are tamable."

DOJ_NMG_0084457

The American military command said that three marines were killed in action on Saturday in Anbar Province, bringing to 78 the number of Americans who have died in October. The toll for the first three weeks of the month, if sustained at similar levels for the last 10 days, would make October the third worst month of the war for American troops.

Elsewhere in Iraq on Saturday, the sectarian violence that has wracked the country continued. In Baghdad, a suicide bomber detonated his device aboard a minibus packed with shoppers who had been to the Shorja market in northern section of the city to buy food and other gifts for the Muslim festival of Id al-Fitr, celebrating the end of the holy month of Ramadan. An Interior Ministry official said four people had been killed and 15 wounded; the victims were mostly Shiites, and women and children were among the casualties.

Witnesses described children's toys scattered beside the wreckage of the bus, which was crossing the Sharafiya bridge over the Tigris River when the bomb exploded.

At dusk on Saturday, bombs left on five motorcycles parked at the main market in Mahmudiya, 15 miles south of Baghdad, exploded while the area was packed with shoppers.

Officials at one of Baghdad's main hospitals said that a total of 16 people were killed and 60 wounded. Police officials in the town said some of the casualties were caused when the market was hit by mortar fire as rescue teams moved in to help the bombing victims.

In the northern oil city of Kirkuk, the police said a policeman had been killed when gunmen attacked his vehicle, and said a similar attack had taken place at Hawija, 40 miles south of Kirkuk, killing two Iraqi soldiers. In Mosul, a roadside bomb wounded two police officers and a woman in a market, police officials there said. Kirkuk and Mosul have been the scenes of suicide bombings in recent days, some of the worst violence there in months.

The United States military command said American-led forces had killed a senior leader of Al Qaeda during a raid early on Saturday in the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi in Anbar Province, 80 miles west of Baghdad. A command statement said that the raid also resulted in the detention of seven others, including a man that the statement said was believed to be responsible for coordinating the supply of weapons and finances for foreign-born insurgents infiltrating Iraq, as well as "facilitating the movement of explosives and participating in multiple operations against Iraqi and coalition forces."

In Baghdad, the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, issued a statement hailing a meeting on Friday in Mecca where 29 Iraqi religious leaders representing different sects, including figures from the Sunni and Shiite communities, signed a pact urging Iraqis to end sectarian killing and "join ranks with a view to the independence of Iraq and its territorial integrity."

Mortar Attack Kills 32 In Mostly Shiite Iraqi City (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

U.S. Toll for Month Is Highest in a Year

BAGHDAD, Oct. 21 -- Mortar rounds fired by suspected Sunni Arab insurgents rained on a market crowded with shoppers Saturday, killing 32 Iraqis in a predominantly Shiite city south of Baghdad, hospital officials said.

Three Marines were killed in attacks in the western province of Anbar, making October the deadliest month for U.S. forces in a year. Seventy-eight American troops have died this month in Iraq, the highest monthly toll since 84 U.S. troops were killed in November 2005.

The deaths are part of rising violence that has pushed attacks on Iraqi civilians and troops to wartime highs. The U.S. military said this week that attacks on American forces had increased 22 percent this month.

The attack on the market in Mahmudiyah, about 15 miles south of Baghdad, came days before the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Fitr. The market was crowded with families buying food for the holiday, said Farhan Ali, a member of Mahmudiyah's City Council.

Members of the Mahdi Army, the powerful militia of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, also were in the open-air market when the attack occurred, said Salih Mohammed, 33, who owns a food stand there. Several of the militiamen were among the dead, Mohammed said.

At least 53 people were wounded, said Abdul Abdul Rahman Khalid al Maadihi, a doctor.

DOJ_NMG_0084458

A previously unknown Sunni insurgent group in Mahmudiyah, calling itself the Jihadist Soldiers, asserted responsibility for the assault, saying in a statement posted in a mosque in the center of the city that Shiite families and the Mahdi Army militia had a week to leave the city.

Sunni families hid in their homes after the attack, fearing retaliation, Mohammed said.

At least 21 other Iraqis died Saturday in attacks across the country, including seven people killed in a bus bombing in Baghdad.

The unrelenting bloodshed came despite the signing of an accord by Sunni and Shiite religious leaders late Friday in Mecca, Islam's holiest city. Organizers of the meeting described it as an effort to stop sectarian killings. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad issued a statement welcoming the accord and urging Iraqis to do "everything possible to stop the killing of the innocent."

Meanwhile, a senior State Department official said the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq. Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department, also said the United States would talk with any group except al-Qaeda in Iraq to facilitate national reconciliation.

"We tried to do our best, but I think there is much room for criticism because, undoubtedly, there was arrogance and there was stupidity from the United States in Iraq," he said in an interview with al-Jazeera television aired late Saturday.

Other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Mortar Rounds Hit Iraqi Market; 18 Dead (SFC/AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin

San Francisco Chronicle/AP, October 22, 2006

(10-21) 10:38 PDT BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) --

A bomb rigged to a bicycle followed by a dozen mortars tore through a crowded outdoor market south of Baghdad on Saturday, killing at least 18 people, police said.

After the bicycle exploded, at least a dozen mortars rained down on the market in Mahmoudiyah, which was crowded with shoppers ahead of the upcoming Eid al-Fitr holiday, said army Capt. Oday Abdul Ridha. Such dual attacks are frequently employed by armed groups to inflict additional damage on crowds that form after the initial bombing.

Lt. Hayder Satar of the Mahmoudiyah police said 18 people were confirmed dead and 52 injured in the attack on the city about 20 miles south of Baghdad.

Earlier in the day, gunfights broke out in Hamza al-Gharbi, about 60 miles south of Baghdad, after a bomb exploded near the offices of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a leading Shiite political party that sponsors the Badr Brigades militia.

The party's supporters accused members of the Madhi Army headed by the radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr of being behind the blast, Police Capt. Muthana Khalid Ali said. He said Iraqi army and police called for reinforcements and backup from American forces, who imposed a curfew. There was no immediate confirmation of U.S. involvement from a military spokesmen.

Father south in the city of Amarah, where the Mahdi Army briefly took control on Friday, shops and government offices reopened and Iraqi army units manned checkpoints, keeping the militia fighters off the streets.

The fighting in both cities underscored alarm about the growing influence of the Shiite militias, who are linked to political blocs wielding strong influence over the shaky four-month-old government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

At least two people were killed in Hamza al-Gharbi and 25 in Amarah, a city of 750,000 people at the head of Iraq's famous marshlands.

Haider Ali Abdullah said he rushed to reopen his tiny restaurant after hearing that fighting had ended in Amarah.

"We were terrified," Abdullah said by phone. "The last two days had a major effect on our lives since we depend on this business to make a living."

U.S. forces said they killed a key coordinator of foreign fighters under al-Qaida in Iraq in an early morning raid in Ramadi, on a booby-trapped building in the heartland of the Sunni insurgency west of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0084459

It said the man, who was not identified by name, had been a senior leader of al-Qaida in Iraq responsible for providing weapons and financing to foreign fighters in the country, as well as producing and distributing video clips and other propaganda.

Iraq's main Sunni Arab party on Saturday strongly backed the accord signed between Sunni and Shiite religious figures in Islam's holiest city, Mecca, on Friday evening.

Organizers of the Mecca meeting say they aim only to stop sectarian killings between rival Sunnis and Shiites, rather than impose a truce to halt attacks against U.S. forces in the country.

"We praise this step and call upon all Iraqis and the government to respond to this blessed event and support it," said Adnan al-Dulaimi, the head of the Iraqi Accordance Front, whose party holds 44 seats in the 275-member parliament.

He also called for a cease-fire between American forces and insurgent groups during the upcoming Eid al-Fitr holiday that marks the end of the fasting month of Ramadan.

Al-Dulaimi's endorsement was echoed by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who issued a statement urging Iraqis to do "everything possible to stop the killing of the innocent."

The Shiite Fadhila party, a member of al-Maliki's ruling alliance, also organized a rally in support of the agreement, attended by about 2,000 people who chanted "no to terrorism, yes to the Mecca edict," and "stop the bloodshed."

Sectarian differences were exacerbated when parliament adopted a Shiite-backed law this week allowing provinces in the Shiite and oil-rich south to establish an autonomous region like the Kurdish one in the north.

Sunni Arabs and some Shiites opposed the law, arguing that federalism would lead to the eventual breakup of Iraq.

President Bush was meeting Saturday with top military officials over refining tactics after commanders said the two-month-old campaign to stabilize Baghdad had largely failed.

"The last few weeks have been rough for our troops in Iraq, and for the Iraqi people," Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address. "The fighting is difficult, but our nation has seen difficult fights before."

In addition to the market bombing, at least 21 people were killed in violence around the country, including seven who died in a suicide bombing on a Baghdad bus and four killed in clashes Friday between Shiite and Sunni tribes just south of Baghdad. Five tortured bodies were found dumped along roads or in the Tigris River.

Insurgents Kill 3 U.S. Troops In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

So far this month, 78 have died, the most in nearly a year.

An insurgent attack in western Iraq killed three Marines on Saturday, the U.S. military said in a news release, disclosing no further details about the incident.

The latest deaths bring to 78 the number of U.S. military personnel killed in Iraq so far this month, making it the deadliest month for Americans in nearly a year.

Anti-American insurgents have launched a bombing and shooting campaign that has in part coincided with Ramadan, the Muslim holy month of fasting and atonement, as well as the midterm U.S. election and a more active American military presence in Baghdad and other areas.

On Friday, a roadside bomb near the southern city of Diwaniya killed a Salvadoran army captain and injured four of his fellow soldiers, according to news agencies.

At least five Salvadoran soldiers have been killed in Iraq since the conflict started.

Three soldiers from El Salvador, Denmark and Britain have died in Iraq this month.

At least 2,791 American military personnel, 119 British troops and 119 soldiers from other countries have died in Iraq since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

In addition to an increase in deaths, more than 1,300 U.S. military personnel have been wounded in action since Sept. 1.

This total compares with about 1,100 for July and August, according to Pentagon figures compiled by icasualties.org, a website that tracks coalition casualty figures in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In A Land Without Order, Punishment Is Power (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0084460

By Anthony Shadid, Washington Post Foreign Service

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Conflicts Among Shiites Challenge a Village Sheik in Southern Iraq

YUSUFAN, Iraq -- A year or so ago, just one poster adorned Sheik Adnan Aidani's wall. It was a portrait of Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraq's faded but still preeminent cleric, whose stern visage glared down on visitors to the tribal sheik's house along a forest of date palms in the southern Iraqi countryside. Today, there are perhaps a dozen posters with new faces. The names blur, but together they represent the power, beyond appeal, of men with guns.

Aidani smiled, a little sheepishly, as he surveyed the posters. Gifts, he called them, the kind you don't return.

"Everyone's on his own," he explained.

Far from the killing fields of the capital, Baghdad, and a half-hour drive from the southern city of Basra, which has been racked by thousands of assassinations, Aidani has an unenviable task in his warren of mud brick, cinder block and concrete: keeping order in a land without it, where society is fracturing, crumbling, even disintegrating.

The brutality of today's Iraq has washed over his largely Shiite village of 4,000: In the past few months, 10 people have been killed in Yusufan. Among them were a mother and child. "Who knows?" he said when asked the reason. In Basra, and even more in Baghdad, governments are sources of gossip rather than confidence. The police, who he said never set foot here, are best at taking bribes.

There is a saying in southern Iraq today, "No one pays respect to the saint who won't mete out punishment." Violence is the cadence of the country. To navigate the chaos, Aidani tries to draw on centuries-old traditions honed by Bedouins in the desert, rules built on honor, respect and reciprocity. He relies on the intimacy of a village where every neighbor knows the other. But in the end, the threat of punishment secures respect for Aidani. That same threat gives power to militias, gangs and criminals who now hold sway even in the streets of a village like Yusufan.

A division of Iraq is sometimes offered as a way to end the country's sectarian strife, but that glosses over the bitter and bloody fights that torment Basra and other predominantly Shiite regions in the south. With fewer sectarian fault lines, there is less killing in Basra than in Baghdad; residents, a little bitterly, insist it is just more organized, as the various Shiite factions battle for money and power. And the sheik, now more than ever, finds himself buffeted by the building squall.

"Who knows?" he asked again, almost rhetorically.

"These days, life is like a jungle. A rabbit doesn't survive in a jungle. Only a lion does."

He turned more literal. Anarchy, the sheik said. "Actually, it's a little worse than anarchy."A Judge of the Streets

It was Ramadan, the sacred month when Muslims fast from sunrise to sunset. Forgoing tea, cigarettes and food had darkened the sheik's mood. So had the news he received that morning. Four days earlier, gunmen had attacked six Shiite Muslims from his village at a bakery on the outskirts of Baghdad. Sitar Yusuf Zaalan, his three sons and two nephews survived the initial assault, only to be killed when the gunmen returned a little later and, from their car, tossed a bomb inside the bakery.

They weren't even that devout, he said. "They were just Shiites by name, just by their identity card."

He shook his head. "No one asks any questions about the crimes."

Aidani is 52, father of 12 children born to two wives, and sheik for two years with a genealogy that traces back 33 generations. He still sometimes carries the bearing of his days as an employee at the South Oil Co. in Basra: an understated delivery and a bureaucrat's weary patience. Other times, his voice thunders. His writ stretches, with varying influence, through the village, which sits along the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates known as the Shatt al Arab, in a region famed for poets and dates.

On this morning, as on others, the sheik negotiated disputes he estimates have increased 200 percent over the past year, from the frivolous to the serious. There was the story of the mouse. It scurried into a neighbor's home, frightening a girl. Her family demanded arbitration and, to keep the peace, the other family agreed to pay compensation. Days later, her family saw the neighbor's mouse again. They killed it. "That mouse was ours," the sheik recalled the neighbors arguing. And, this time, they demanded compensation.

"I have one even funnier than that," the sheik said.

A driver killed a chicken on the road. Without making excuses, he said he was willing to pay the price of the chicken.

DOJ_NMG_0084461

"It's not the chicken that's the problem," the sheik recalled its owner arguing. "The problem is with its orphans."

"And what about the rooster?" he recalled another person asking.

That dispute was settled with $20.

"People around Basra are not afraid of anything," said Sayyid Suleiman al-Musawi, another tribal leader who was visiting the sheik. Tall, with a black head scarf, he had a sense of irony. "If there's a problem, they go straight to their house and get the gun."

The week before, he recalled, there was an argument at a fruit stand near Yusufan. A customer insisted the vendor cut open the watermelon before he bought it. It was still white inside, and he declared that it was not yet ripe. No, it's red, the vendor insisted. They argued, the customer left and then returned with 30 men. Musawi said a gunfight erupted. Unbelievably, no one was killed.

"Thirty guns because a watermelon wasn't ripe," Musawi said ruefully.

"In Iraq, our blood is very hot," he added. "No one speaks slowly here."

The sheik and Musawi lamented the chaos, each complaint growing in exasperation. Their anger was directed everywhere -- at Shiite militias whose men often wear police uniforms, at a national government beholden to Americans and sharing power with Sunni politicians "building car bombs in their houses," at their own people, who they maintained don't understand the word hesitation, and at Sunnis who, the sheik insisted with wide eyes, cannot sleep with their wives as long as Shiites are in power.

"You cannot rule people without a big stick," Musawi insisted. "No one cares anymore, because no one is punished."

Still gloomy, the sheik shrugged his shoulders. Optimistic?

"With all this killing in the streets?" he asked. "Every day is worse than the day before."Fragmented Authority

The posters on the sheik's wall represent the forces in Basra and his region -- the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the splintered Dawa party and the Mahdi Army of Moqtada al-Sadr, whose followers regularly attack British troops patrolling Basra. As it has for years now, often still functioning as a clandestine force, the Supreme Council focuses on the instruments of government power -- the police, provincial council and intelligence service in Basra. Sadr and his unruly force have the streets.

But even the Sadrists are divided. The Mahdi Army is perhaps the most powerful in places like Basra and Nasiriyah. But it contends with breakaway factions -- Fadhila, whose representative serves as Basra's governor; followers loyal to Mahmoud Hassani; and another group known as the Movement of Rebels of the Intifada. They sometimes cooperate, more often not.

In all, residents estimate there are about 19 Islamic parties in the region around Basra, each with armed followers.

"Each head of the militia is his own dictator. This is the reality," said Sayyid Abdel-Aal al-Musawi, a 46-year-old cleric whose father heads an influential but apolitical Shiite sect known as the Shaikhiya. "They don't adhere to any limits."

In Basra, anywhere from a few to two dozen people are killed on most days -- clerics, former Baathists, Sunni Muslims, rivals and many for reasons no one quite understands. The same goes for Yusufan. The sheik listed those killed: an official with the Ministry of Health who was kidnapped and whose body was found in a Sadrist stronghold; a fruit vendor; a cattle salesman suspected of being a Baathist. A little while ago, a lawyer was shot in the leg from a passing car. The gunmen got out and then shot him in the head.

"People are cheap," the sheik said. "After they kill, they walk with their weapons back to the police station."

"No one will ask anything," he added.

There is no real government in Yusufan, bisected by a canal overgrown with weeds and overrun with trash.

The sheik has his authority, backed by what he says are the hundreds of armed men he can cull from the tribe's 12,000 members. But in a sign of his curtailed reach, he twice failed to get elected to parliament, and villagers sometimes treat him as just another player.

Militiamen rarely roam with their weapons through the narrow dirt roads bordered by dried palm fronds, cattails, bougainvillea and fields of clover. But everyone knows who they are, and their graffiti clutter the walls. "Long live Moqtada," one slogan reads. "All of us will sacrifice to defend Sadr," another declares. In green is written, "Yes, yes to Islam." Next to it in blue, a little out of place, is scrawled, "Long live Real," a show of support for the Spanish soccer team Real Madrid.

DOJ_NMG_0084462

Authority, in a way, has atomized. Few go out after dark, when many feel militias are most active. Police never enter, so to protect religious celebrations at the Hajji Ahmed Husseiniya, a local worship hall, neighbors gather a dozen youths with their guns and post them at each end of the street.

When trouble arises, villagers say, they try to settle it themselves, then go the sheik, representatives of the Islamic parties or the town's part-time cleric. (Another alternative: "I'd run away," said Jalal Abdel-Amir, a 27-year-old villager.) Usually, they keep to themselves. With violence endemic, it is often heard that if it's not your neighbor, friend or family killed, you keep quiet.

"You can say that the people protect themselves," said Shihab Ahmed Allawi, a 35-year-old construction worker.

Down the street, a little way from the trash-strewn banks of the eddying Shatt al Arab, Kifah Mahmoud, a 47-year-old grocer, stood in a store adorned with portraits of Shiite clerics and named after the sword of a Shiite saint, Dhu al-Fiqar. It takes faith these days, he said. "You can't be sure you'll go somewhere and come back safely. You can't reassure yourself about that."Serial Strife

In his tribal reception hall, near a television hooked to a satellite dish, the drone of the generator outside, Aidani bellowed into his cellphone. "He must bring the gun to us!" he shouted, flashing his more temperamental side.

The dispute had begun simply. The day before, Mahmoud Shaker, a 16-year-old from Aidani's tribe, was riding his bicycle laden with pots for iftar , the traditional meal that breaks the Ramadan fast. Someone cleaning part of a sidewalk sprayed water on him as he rode by. Shaker protested, and the man pulled a gun and pistol-whipped him. The sheik wanted a sit-down with the assailant's tribe.

"They have to be in our place within five days," he told the mediator.

He hung up the phone, his third call in 15 minutes. Each time, the tribe had refused to meet.

"They better come," the sheik said. "If they don't, I'll have something else to hold against them."

He leaned back on a cushion resting against a grimy wall, three fans overhead churning the hot air.

"Problems create problems, one becomes two," he said. "These kinds of things should be dealt with by the law."

A little later, Sheik Fawzi Kaabi entered. Everyone in the room stood. "Take your rest," Aidani said afterward.

Kaabi, a stout man in a head scarf checkered white and black, is 46, but said he should be 460: "Every year has become 10 years because of the problems." Kaabi, called "the judge" by a friend, had come to mediate another dispute.

Men from Aidani's tribe had killed three people from the Abadi, a neighboring tribe, although the circumstances were in dispute. A death these days costs between 20 million and 25 million Iraqi dinars, or $13,300 to $16,600. Each person in the tribe is expected to contribute, effectively an insurance policy. But Aidani was resisting, pleading his case that the neighboring tribe had refused to pay blood money earlier.

"We're on standby," the sheik warned, with the mildest bluster.

He said no more. Everyone understood it meant sending his armed men to settle it another way.

"It's like a serial," the sheik said after Kaabi left. "It never has an ending."

As he spoke, there was a hint of hesitation, even doubt in his voice. He ran through the conflicts he had to arbitrate: murder, theft, kidnapping, rape, broken contracts, land disputes and on and on. "There's nothing that's not present in Iraq anymore," he said. "Anything you can imagine in your head is here." In each, he had to negotiate, cajole and, more often than not, threaten.

Each time, the stakes seemed to be raised; each refusal drew a bigger warning.

"It wears me out," he admitted.

As he often does, the sheik spoke in proverbs. He uses one frequently these days. It is as much imperative as reality.

" Lil qawi ," he said. "To the strong."

The Selfless And The Dead (LAT)

By Raheem Salman And Doug Smith

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

An Iraqi burial society pays its respects to unclaimed war victims.

Twice a week, the large delivery truck from Baghdad rolls into the vast cemetery in this holy Shiite Muslim city. A bus follows, bearing wooden caskets on its roof.

DOJ_NMG_0084463

Half a mile beyond the cemetery gates, at the edge of the desert, the passengers get out of the bus and set to work unloading the truck's grim cargo. On an average trip, there will be 70 to 100 bodies, victims of the sectarian bloodletting that has gripped Iraq.

The men belong to a word-of-mouth burial society for the unclaimed dead, formed during the 1980s war with Iran, starting small and growing with the need. Today, about 500 men — laborers, professionals, clerics and tribal leaders — are members of the legation of the dead in this country where deep piety and terrible brutality have repeatedly intertwined.

The society has no name and no officers. It adheres to no religious sect or political agenda. Thirty to 60 men make each trip. Some go every time; those who have to take time off from work may go only once every few weeks. They pay their own expenses and have rejected government compensation.

"We told them that if there will be money for this work we withdraw, as an act cannot be evaluated with money," said taxi driver Hashim Saadi, 53. "We want the blessing of God only."

Many who belong were drawn to it by their own experiences.

"When I look at them, I feel deeply sad," Saadi said. "Each one of them I see as my son, who was kidnapped five months ago. He was in his last year in the college of economy and administration at Baghdad University. I expect to see his body any time with any group we are bringing."

Mohammed Sabbar, an official with the Iraq Board of Tourism, said he joined the society after his brother disappeared about a year ago and later turned up in the morgue. The family suffered for weeks not knowing his fate.

"I did not go to my work today, preferring to join this act, which is filled with human feelings," Sabbar said. "We feel sad for them. Sometimes I weep. Repeatedly doing this has elicited a sort of acceptance of the sight, but feelings of sadness are still there."

The depth of his commitment is astonishing.

Each two-day trip begins at 4 a.m. after morning prayers. Sabbar walks three-quarters of a mile from the Ur neighborhood of Baghdad to a mosque in Sadr City, where several of the men converge. At the mosque, they pick up two or three caskets, which they tie to the roof of the bus.

The bus drives to the Baghdad morgue, an impersonal building of yellow brick, where other men arrive in their cars.

They load the truck with bodies that have been unclaimed for two weeks — at that point, the morgue has to clear them out to make room new ones.

Leaving Baghdad at 7 a.m., they must traverse Latifiya, an insurgent stronghold and one of the most dangerous places in Iraq. Kidnappings, shootings and roadside bomb attacks occur there almost daily.

The caskets on the bus could be a liability in the Sunni Arab city, giving the impression that the men are Shiites on the road to Najaf. But they also ensure speedier passage through the many checkpoints on the 110-mile highway. Mourning parties are less likely to be stopped for identity checks.

About noon, the bus arrives at the cemetery. The men say their midday prayers before they unload the bodies on stretchers into the desert heat, loudly chanting, "There is no God but God, and Muhammad is the prophet of God." They remove the bodies from black nylon sacks. To each they attach a tag bearing all that is known about the deceased.

Some are headless, some bloated and purple. If the body is too decomposed to wash, the men perform what is called the tayamum, rubbing the face and hands with clean sand, in accordance with Islamic tradition.

They return the body to a sack sprinkled with camphor and pungent leaves. Then they wrap the body with a white cloth. They lower bodies into double graves according to their morgue numbers, odd on one side, even on the other. The graves are marked with flat stones that say "Unclaimed."

"When I look at any one of these victims, we feel that he is my brother or father," said Abu Muntadhar, 44, who receives a government salary to drive one of the delivery trucks but has volunteered for this job. "We cry as if they are our relatives. I imagine how their wives will behave if they see them, or their children."

Caring for the unclaimed began as a charity supported by wealthy residents of Baghdad to provide proper burials for the indigent, said Sheik Mehdi Abdul Zahara, one of about 100 burial brokers who work out of tiny offices at the cemetery. Paid by families of the dead, they acquire plots, hire gravediggers and maintain monuments.

DOJ_NMG_0084464

The numbers of dead have grown with each traumatic turn in Iraq's course.

During Saddam Hussein's brutal repression after the failed 1991 Shiite uprising, 30 to 40 bodies arrived each month. After the overthrow of Hussein, the number jumped to 30 a week and kept climbing.

Now, a truck carrying 70 to 100 bodies comes twice a week, and a separate truck carries as many to Karbala, another holy city.

Traditionally, charitable donations paid for burials of the unclaimed. With the increasing numbers, the Health Ministry recently took over. Zahara and his gravediggers do the work for reduced pay.

Bodies go unclaimed mostly because the morgue can't identify them. Relatives may check with police and hospitals or wait for a ransom note, hoping for any information that their loved one is alive. Even when family members go to the morgue, the deteriorated condition of some bodies may give them reason to delay positive identification in the hope that it is someone else.

Zahara does a little detective work of his own, hoping to relieve families of the pain of not knowing.

Once, he received a beheaded man and found an address book in his shoe. He telephoned someone who turned out to be a brother.

"He was afraid, thinking that I was a terrorist or a kidnapper," Zahara said.

The brother called back several times before deciding to trust Zahara. The sibling came at night, accompanied by three carloads of family and friends, who were there to provide support, but also protection in the event of a trap.

"They were too sad for the killing of their son, but at least this put an end to their suffering and searching," Zahara said.

The unofficial leader of the group, Sheik Jamal Soodani, has been going on the burial trips since their outset. He is responsible for the roster of volunteers and attends every journey.

Although he has been accused of having political or sectarian motives, he and other members of the group have no aim but getting closer to God, Soodani said.

"We bury the Sunni, Shiite, Christian, Muslim and non-Iraqi," he said. "We deal with the human being as a human being, regardless of considerations like color and religion."

At the end of each day's work, the men are tired and it is too late to return to Baghdad. They retire instead to a rented two-room house at the edge of the cemetery.

They sleep on mattresses spread across the floor like gravestones. Others sleep on the porch outside — they prefer the fresh air.

doug.smith@latimes.com

Times special correspondent Saad Fakhrildeen in Najaf contributed to this report.

An Early Calculation Of Iraq's Cost Of War (NYT)

By Anna Bernasek

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

HERE'S a basic question: What has been the cost of the Iraq war for Iraq? As it turns out, it's not easy to find an economist who can provide an answer. Although several studies have dealt with the war's cost to Americans, there has been no comparable work addressing the cost to Iraqis.

Of course, the loss of human life has always been evident. Recently, the United Nations estimated that 100 Iraqis were dying each day, on average, as a result of the war. Others have put the number much higher. A recent study in The Lancet, the British medical journal, placed the average daily figure at about 500, amounting to the loss of 2 percent of Iraq's population since the invasion in March 2003.

The economic cost has been less visible. Published information on the subject is very limited, although one economist, Colin Rowat, has made some preliminary calculations using the best sources available. Professor Rowat, a specialist on the Iraqi economy at the University of Birmingham in Britain, relied mainly on data from the International Monetary Fund to estimate the war's overall effect on the Iraqi economy. His calculations are a work in progress, but what he has found so far is sobering: the cost amounts to a cut of at least 40 percent in Iraq's national income.

DOJ_NMG_0084465

Professor Rowat looked at the six-year stretch from 2000 to 2005 and divided it into thirds. During the first period, 2000-2001, United Nations trade sanctions against Iraq were beginning to crumble; the Security Council lifted the cap on Iraqi oil sales to the rest of the world, and the Iraqi government was becoming adept at getting around the remaining trade restrictions. The second period, 2002 -2003, covers the buildup to war and the invasion itself. The last period, 2004-2005, covers post-invasion years when sanctions were removed.

Professor Rowat made several kinds of calculations. First, he estimated the actual change in the size of Iraq's economy. Then he considered the economic effects of foreign aid in 2005, much of it from the United States. (Because foreign aid is regarded as temporary and is expected to taper off, he said, excluding it reveals Iraq's underlying economic performance.)

Finally, he estimated how the economy might have performed had the war never happened. This last estimate, of course, depends on a host of assumptions, as Professor Rowat would be the first to say. He assumed, for example, that in the absence of war, Iraq's economy would have been driven by the price of oil. Oil prices are, in fact, crucial to Iraq; according to the World Bank, oil revenue represents 60 percent of the total economy. Professor Rowat also assumed that the economy would have grown from 2002 to 2005 as it did from 2000 to 2001 — at a pace equal to 71 percent of the rate of increase in world oil prices. Of course, some of the oil-price increase in recent years must be attributed to the Iraq war itself; Professor Rowat acknowledged this but did not attempt to remove that factor from these rough calculations.

He readily acknowledged the difficulty of coming up with an undisputed set of figures; nevertheless, his analysis is at least a starting point.

Looking first at the actual Iraqi economy, he calculated that it may have grown 3.1 percent a year, on average and after adjusting for inflation, from 2000 through 2005. When he subtracted foreign aid from that total, however, he found that the economy actually contracted 0.2 percent a year over the same period. He said aid was especially crucial in 2005, when it kept the economy afloat.

Finally, based on the steep rise in oil prices, he estimated that without a war and with steady oil production, Iraq would have grown 12 percent a year after adjusting for inflation. That rate would have made Iraq one of the fastest-growing economies in the world, albeit one that was expanding from a very small economic base.

How realistic is this projection? It's hard to say, because so much of it depends on oil economics. Still, the I.M.F. has concluded that the Iraqi economy has the capacity to grow very quickly — under the right conditions. It now forecasts Iraq's real growth over the next five years at an annual rate averaging better than 10 percent.

Using Professor Rowat's calculations, what might the economic cost of the war be for Iraq? If there had been no war, Iraq's economy in 2005 might have amounted to $61 billion in today's dollars, compared with the actual $37 billion, he estimates. That works out to a loss of $24 billion because of the war. Excluding foreign aid from the calculations, the loss estimate is around $30 billion.

Consider the more conservative figure, $24 billion. It amounts to a 40 percent cut in gross domestic product per capita — an average loss of around $900 for each Iraqi in 2005.

Straightforward comparisons with the United States aren't possible, but rough estimates of the war's overall cost to Americans are in the neighborhood of $1 trillion over a 10-year period. That works out to around 1 percent of the nation's income during that period.

FOR Iraq, there is no doubt that continuing violence and turmoil are hurting the economy. The I.M.F. stated in a report in August that Iraq's growth was coming from the non-oil economy and that oil production was expected to remain flat this year. Iraq's oil production has not yet returned to prewar levels. The I.M.F. attributed the lack of progress in the oil sector to the violence, which is preventing much-needed investment, and to infrastructure problems.

While Professor Rowat's calculations represent just one economist's efforts to wrestle with extremely limited data, his work may encourage others to follow. Assessing the war's economic cost for Iraq, of course, doesn't provide an answer to whether the war is worthwhile in the long run. But it does provide a clue.

Poll: Iraqi Youth Want U.S. To Leave (WT/AP)

By Katherine Shrader

DOJ_NMG_0084466

The Washington Times/AP, October 22, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Majorities of Iraqi youth in Arab regions of the country believe security would improve and violence decrease if the U.S.-led forces left immediately, according to a State Department poll that provides a window into the grim warnings provided to policymakers.

The survey - unclassified, but marked "For Official Government Use Only" - also finds that Iraqi leaders may face particular difficulty recruiting young Sunni Arabs to join the stumbling security forces. Strong majorities of 15- to 29-year-olds in two Arab Sunni areas - Mosul and Tikrit-Baquba - would oppose joining the Iraqi army or police.

The poll has its shortcomings; regional samples are small and the results do not say how many people refused to respond to questions. The private polling firm hired by the State Department also was not able to interview residents of al-Anbar, a Sunni-dominated province and an insurgent stronghold.

But the findings of the summer survey - circulated to policymakers last month and obtained by The Associated Press last week - nevertheless provide a solemn reminder of the difficulty that the U.S.-backed Iraqi government faces as it tries to add ethnic diversity to its security institutions.

In The Land Of The Taliban (NYT)

By Elizabeth Rubin

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

One afternoon this past summer, I shared a picnic of fresh mangos and plums with Abdul Baqi, an Afghan Taliban fighter in his 20's fresh from the front in Helmand Province in southern Afghanistan. We spent hours on a grassy slope under the tall pines of Murree, a former colonial hill station that is now a popular resort just outside Pakistan's capital, Islamabad. All around us was a Pakistani rendition of Georges Seurat's "Sunday on La Grande Jatte" — middle-class families setting up grills for barbecue, a girl and two boys chasing their errant cow with a stick, two men hunting fowl, boys flying a kite. Much of the time, Abdul Baqi was engrossed in the flight pattern of a Himalayan bird. It must have been a welcome distraction. He had just lost five friends fighting British troops and had seen many others killed or wounded by bombs as they sheltered inside a mosque.

He was now looking forward to taking a logic course at a madrasa, or religious school, near Peshawar during his holiday. Pakistan's religious parties, he told me through an interpreter, would lodge him, as they did other Afghan Taliban fighters, and keep him safe. With us was Abdul Baqi's mentor, Mullah Sadiq, a diabetic Helmandi who was shuttling between Pakistan and Afghanistan auditing Taliban finances and arranging logistics. He had just dispatched nine fighters to Afghanistan and had taken wounded men to a hospital in Islamabad. "I just tell the border guards that they were wounded in a tribal dispute and need treatment," he told me.

And though Mullah Sadiq said they had lost many commanders in battles around Kandahar, he and Abdul Baqi appeared to be in good spirits, laughing and chatting loudly on a cellphone to Taliban friends in Pakistan and Afghanistan. After all, they never imagined that the Taliban would be back so soon or in such force or that they would be giving such trouble to the Afghan government of Hamid Karzai and some 40,000 NATO and U.S. troops in the country. For the first time since the fall of 2001, when the Taliban were overthrown, they were beginning to taste the possibility of victory.

As I traveled through Pakistan and particularly the Pashtun lands bordering Afghanistan, I felt as if I were moving through a Taliban spa for rehabilitation and inspiration. Since 2002, the American and Pakistani militaries have focused on North Waziristan and South Waziristan, two of the seven districts making up Pakistan's semiautonomous tribal areas, which are between the North-West Frontier Province and, to the south, Baluchistan Province; in the days since the 9/11 attacks, some tribes there had sheltered members of Al Qaeda and spawned their own Taliban movement. Meanwhile, in the deserts of Baluchistan, whose capital, Quetta, is just a few hours' drive from the Afghan city of Kandahar, the Afghan Taliban were openly reassembling themselves under Mullah Omar and his leadership council. Quetta had become a kind of free zone where strategies could be formed, funds picked up, interviews given and victories relished.

In June, I was in Quetta as the Taliban fighters celebrated an attack against Dad Mohammad Khan, an Afghan legislator locally known as Amir Dado. Until recently he was the intelligence chief of Helmand Province. He had worked closely with U.S. Special Forces and was despised by Abdul Baqi — and, to be frank, by most Afghans in the south. Mullah Razayar Nurzai (a nom de guerre), a commander of 300 Taliban fighters who frequently meets with the leadership council and Mullah Omar, took credit for the ambush. Because Pakistan's intelligence services are fickle — sometimes supporting the Taliban, sometimes arresting its members — I had to meet Nurzai at night, down a dark lane in a village outside Quetta.

DOJ_NMG_0084467

My guide was a Pakistani Pashtun sympathetic to the Taliban; we slipped into a courtyard and behind a curtain into a small room with mattresses and a gas lamp. In hobbled a rough, wild-looking graybeard with green eyes and a prosthetic limb fitted into a permanent 1980's-era shoe. More than a quarter-century of warring had taken its toll on Nurzai's 46-year-old body but not on his spirit. It was 10 at night, yet he was bounding with energy and bombast about his recent exploits in Kandahar and Helmand. A few days earlier, Nurzai and his men had attacked Amir Dado's extended family. First, he told me, they shot dead his brother — a former district leader. Then the next day, as members of Dado's family were driving to the site of the first attack, Nurzai's men ambushed their convoy. Boys, cousins, uncles: all were killed. Dado himself was safe elsewhere. Nurzai was mildly disappointed and said that they had received bad information. He had no regrets about the killings, however. Abdul Baqi was also delighted by the attack. He would tell me that Dado used to burn rocket casings and pour the melted plastic onto the stomachs of onetime Taliban fighters he and his men had captured. Abdul Baqi also recalled that during the civil war that ended with the Taliban's seizure of Kabul, Dado and his men had a checkpoint where they "grabbed young boys and robbed people."

Mullah Omar and his followers formed the Taliban in 1994 to, among other things, bring some justice to Afghanistan and to expel predatory commanders like Dado. But in the early days of Karzai's government, these regional warlords re-established themselves, with American financing, to fill the power vacuum that the coalition forces were unwilling to fill themselves. The warlords freely labeled their many enemies Al Qaeda or Taliban in order to push the Americans to eradicate them. Some of these men were indeed Taliban. Most, like Abdul Baqi, had accepted their loss of power, but they rejoined the Taliban as a result of harassment. Amir Dado's own abuses had eventually led to his removal from the Helmand government at United Nations insistence. As one Western diplomat, who requested anonymity out of personal safety concerns, put it: "Amir Dado kept his own prison, authorized the use of serious torture, had very little respect for human life and made security worse." Yet when I later met Amir Dado in Kabul, he pulled out a letter that an officer in the U.S. Special Forces had written requesting that the Afghan Ministry of Defense install him as Helmand's police chief and claiming that in his absence "the quality of security in the Helmand Province has dramatically declined."

One Place, Two Stories

I went to Afghanistan and Pakistan this summer to understand how and why the Taliban were making a comeback five years after American and Afghan forces drove them from power. What kind of experience would lead Afghans to reject what seemed to be an emerging democratic government? Had we missed something that made Taliban rule appealing? Were they the only opposition the aggrieved could turn to? Or, as many Afghans were saying, was this Pakistan up to its old tricks — cooperating with the Americans and Karzai while conspiring to bring back the Taliban, who had been valued "assets" before 9/11?

And why has the Bush administration's message remained that Afghanistan is a success, Iraq a challenge? "In Afghanistan, the trajectory is a hopeful and promising one," Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld wrote on the op-ed page of The Washington Post earlier this month. Afghanistan's rise from the ashes of the anti-Taliban war would mean that the Bush administration was prevailing in replacing terror with democracy and human rights.

Meanwhile, a counternarrative was emerging, and it belonged to the Taliban, or the A.C.M., as NATO officers call them — the Anti-Coalition Militia. In Kabul, Kandahar and Pakistan, I found their video discs and tapes in the markets. They invoke a nostalgia for the jihad against the Russians and inspire their viewers to rise up again. One begins with clattering Chinooks disgorging American soldiers into the desert. Then we see the new Afghan government onstage, focusing in on the Northern Alliance warlords — Abdul Rashid Dostum, Burhanuddin Rabbani, Karim Khalili, Muhammad Fahim, Ismail Khan, Abdul Sayyaf. It cuts to American soldiers doing push-ups and pinpointing targets on maps; next it shows bombs the size of bathtubs dropping from planes and missiles emblazoned with "Royal Navy" rocketing through the sky; then it moves to hospital beds and wounded children. Message: America and Britain brought back the warlords and bombed your children. In the next clip, there are metal cages under floodlights and men in orange jumpsuits, bowed and crouching. It cuts back to the wild eyes of

DOJ_NMG_0084468

John Walker Lindh and shows trucks hauling containers crammed with young Afghan and Pakistani prisoners — Taliban, hundreds of whom would suffocate to death in those containers, supposedly at the command of the warlord and current army chief of staff, General Dostum. Then back to American guards wheeling hunger-striking Guantánamo prisoners on gurneys. Interspliced are older images, a bit fuzzy, of young Afghan men, hands tied behind their backs, heads bowed, hauled off by Communist guards. The message: Foreigners have invaded our lands again; Americans, Russians — no difference.

During the period from 1994 to 2001, the Taliban were a cloistered clique with little interest in global affairs. Today they are far more sophisticated and outward-looking. "The Taliban of the 90's were concerned with their district or province," says Waheed Muzhda, a senior aide at the Supreme Court in Kabul, who before the Taliban fell worked in their Foreign Ministry. "Now they have links with other networks. Before, only two Internet connections existed — one was with Mullah Omar's office and the other at the Foreign Ministry here in Kabul. Now they are connected to the world." Though this is still very much an Afghan insurgency, fueled by complex local grievances and power struggles, the films sold in the markets of Pakistan and Afghanistan merge the Taliban story with that of the larger struggle of the Muslim umma, the global community of Islam: images of U.S. soldiers in Iraq and Israelis dragging off young Palestinian men and throwing off Palestinian mothers clinging to their sons. Humiliation. Oppression. Followed by the same on Afghan soil: Northern Alliance fighters perching their guns atop the bodies of dead Taliban. In the Taliban story, Special Forces soldiers desecrate the bodies of Taliban fighters by burning them, the Koran is desecrated in Guantánamo toilets, the Prophet Muhammad is desecrated in Danish cartoons and finally an apostate, Abdul Rahman, the Afghan who was arrested earlier this year for converting to Christianity, desecrates Islam and is not only not punished but is released and flown off to Italy.

It is not at all clear that Afghans want the return of a Taliban government. But even sophisticated Kabulis told me that they are fed up with the corruption. And in the Pashtun regions, which make up about half the country, Afghans are fed up with five years of having their homes searched and the young men of their villages rounded up in the name of counterinsurgency. Earlier this month in Kabul, Gen. David Richards, the British commander of NATO's Afghanistan force, imagined what Afghans are thinking: "They will say, 'We do not want the Taliban, but then we would rather have that austere and unpleasant life that that might involve than another five years of fighting.'" He estimated that if NATO didn't succeed in bringing substantial economic development to Afghanistan soon, some 70 percent of Afghans would shift their loyalty to the Taliban.

Nation-Building, Again

In the middle of Lashkar Gah, the capital of Helmand Province, a metal sign tilts into the road advertising the New York English Language Center. It is a relic of the last American nation-building scheme. Half a century ago, this town, built at the confluence of the Arghandab and Helmand Rivers, was the headquarters for an ambitious dam project partly financed by the United States and contracted out to Morrison-Knudsen, an engineering company that helped build Cape Canaveral and the Golden Gate Bridge.

Lashkar Gah (literally, "the place of soldiers") was to be a model American town. Irrigation from the project would create farms out of the desert. Today you can still see the suburban-style homes with gardens open to the streets, although the typical Afghan home is a fort with walls guarding the family's privacy. Those modernizing dreams of America and Afghanistan were eventually defeated by nature, culture and the war to drive the Russians out of Afghanistan in the 1980's. What remains is an intense nostalgia among the engineers, cooks and farmers of Lashkar Gah, who remember that time as one of employment and peace. Today, Lashkar Gah is home to a NATO base.

Down the road from the base stands a lovely new building erected by an N.G.O. for the local Ministry of Women's Affairs. It is big, white and, on the day I visited, was empty except for three women getting ready to leave. "It's so close to the foreigners, and the women are afraid of getting killed by car bombs," the ministry's deputy told me. She was a school headmistress and landowner, dressed elegantly in a lime-colored blouse falling below the knees and worn over matching trousers. She weighed the Taliban regime against this new one in terms of pragmatic choices, not terror or ideology. She said that she had just wrapped up the case of a girl who had been kidnapped and raped by Kandahari police officers, something that would not have happened under the Taliban. "Their security was outstanding," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0084469

Under the Taliban, she said, a poppy ban was enforced. "Now the governors tell the people, 'Just cultivate a little bit,'" she said. "So people take this opportunity and grow a lot." The farmers lease land to grow poppies. The British and the police eradicate it. The farmer can't pay back the landowner. "So instead of paying, he gives the landowner his daughter."

A few weeks before I arrived in Helmand, John Walters, the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, told reporters that Afghan authorities were succeeding in reducing opium-poppy cultivation. Yet despite hundreds of millions of dollars being allocated by Congress to stop the trade, a United Nations report in September estimated that this year's crop was breaking all records — 6,100 metric tons compared with 4,100 last year. When I visited Helmand, schools in Lashkar Gah were closed in part because teachers and students were busy harvesting the crop. A prosecutor from the Crimes Department laughed as he told me that his clerk, driver and bodyguard hadn't made it to work. They were all harvesting. It requires a lot of workers, and you can earn $12 a day compared with the $2 you get for wheat. Hence the hundreds of young, poor Talibs from Pakistan's madrasas who had flocked to earn that cash and who made easy converts for the coming jihad.

Walters had singled out Helmand for special praise. Yet just a short drive from the provincial capital, I was surrounded by poppy farmers — 12-year-old boys, 75-year-old men — hard at work, their hands caked in opium paste as they scooped figlike pulp off the bulbs into a sack tied around their waists. One little boy was dragging a long poppy stem attached to a car he had made out of bulbs. Haji Abdul, a 73-year-old Moses of a man, was the owner of the farm and one of those nostalgic for the heyday of the Helmand Valley project. He had worked with Americans for 15 years as a welder and manager. He was the first to bring electricity to his district. Now there was none.

"Why do you think people put mines out for the British and Italians doing eradication when they came here to save us?" He answered his own question: "Thousands of lands ready for harvest were destroyed. How difficult will it be for our people to tolerate that! You are taking the food of my children, cutting my feet and disabling me. With one bullet, I will kill you." Fortunately he didn't have to kill anyone. He had paid 2,000 afghanis per jerib (about a half acre) of land to the police, he told me, adding that they would then share the spoils with the district administrator and all the other Interior Ministry officials so that only a small percentage of the poppy would be eradicated.

When I asked Manan Farahi, the director of counterterrorism efforts for Karzai's government, why the Taliban were so strong in Helmand, he said that Helmandis had, in fact, hated the Taliban because of Mullah Omar's ban on poppy cultivation. "The elders were happy this government was coming and they could plant again," Farahi told me. "But then the warlords came back and let their militias roam freely. They were settling old scores — killing people, stealing their opium. And because they belonged to the government, the people couldn't look to the government for protection. And because they had the ear of the Americans, the people couldn't look to the Americans. Into this need stepped the Taliban." And this time the Taliban, far from suppressing the drug trade, agreed to protect it.

A Dealer's Life

The Continental Guest House in Kandahar, with its lovely gardens, potted geraniums and Internet access in every room, was mostly empty when I arrived, a remnant of the city's recently stalled economic resurgence.

To find out how the opium trade works and how it's related to the Taliban's rise, I spent the afternoon with an Afghan who told me his name was Razzaq. He is a medium-level smuggler in his late 20's who learned his trade as a refugee in Iran. He was wearing a traditional Kandahari bejeweled skull cap, a dark blazer and a white shalwar kameez, a traditional outfit consisting of loose pants covered by a tunic. He moved and spoke with the confident ease of a well-protected man. "The whole country is in our services," he told me, "all the way to Turkey." This wasn't bravado. From Mazar-i-Sharif, in northern Afghanistan, he brings opium in the form of a gooey paste, packaged in bricks. From Badakhshan in the northeast, he brings crystal — a sugary substance made from heroin. And from Jalalabad, in the east on the road to Peshawar, he brings pure heroin. All of this goes through Baramcha, an unmanned border town in Helmand near Pakistan. Sometimes he pays off the national soldiers to use their vehicles, he said. Sometimes the national policemen. Or he hides it well, and if there is a tough checkpoint, he calls ahead and pays them off. "The soldiers get 2,000 afghanis a month, and I give them 100,000," he explained with an angelic smile. "So even if I had a human head in my car, they'd let me go." It's not hard to see why Razzaq is so successful. He has a certain charm and looks like the modest tailor he once was, not a man steeped in illegal business.

DOJ_NMG_0084470

Razzaq's smuggling career began in Zahedan, a remote and unruly Iranian town near the border with Afghanistan and Pakistan. It is filled with Afghan refugees who, like Razzaq and his family, fled after the Russian invasion in 1979. Razzaq apprenticed as a tailor under his father and eventually opened his own shop, which the Iranians promptly shut down. They said he had no right as a refugee to own a shop. He began painting buildings, but that, too, proved a bureaucratic challenge. He was paid in checks, and the bank refused to cash them without a bank account, which he could not get.

Razzaq was newly married with dreams of a good life for his family. So one day he took a chance. "I had gotten to know smugglers at my tailoring shop," he told me over a meal of mutton and rice on the floor of my hotel room. "One of them was an old man, so no one ever suspected him. The smugglers asked me to go with him to Gerdi Jangel" — an Afghan refugee town in Pakistan — "and bring back 750 grams of heroin to Zahedan. The security searched us on the bus, but I'd hidden it in the heels of my shoes, and of course they didn't search the old man. I was so happy when we made it back. I thought I was born for the first time into this world."

So he took another chance and managed to fly to Tehran carrying four kilos in his bag. Each time he overcame another obstacle, he became more addicted to the easy cash. When the Iranian authorities imported sniffing dogs to catch heroin smugglers, Razzaq and his friends filled hypodermic needles with some heroin dissolved in water and sprayed the liquid on cars at the bus station that would be continuing on to Tehran, Isfahan and Shiraz. "The dogs at the checkpoint went mad. They had to search 50 cars. They decided the dogs were defective and sent them back, and that saved us for a while." Eventually, he said, they concocted a substance to conceal the heroin smell from the new pack of dogs.

After the fall of the Taliban, Razzaq moved back to Helmand, built a comfortable house and began supporting his extended family with his expanding trafficking business. Razzaq's main challenge today is Iran. While the Americans have turned more or less a blind eye to the drug-trade spree of their warlord allies, Iran has steadily cranked up its drug war. (Some 3,000 Iranian lawmen have been killed in the last three decades battling traffickers.) To cross the desert borders, Razzaq moves in convoys of 18 S.U.V.'s. Some contain drugs. The rest are loaded with food supplies, antiaircraft guns, rocket launchers, antitank missiles and militiamen, often on loan from the Taliban. The fighters are Baluch from Iran and Afghanistan. The commanders are Afghans.

Razzaq's run, as he described it, was a scene out of <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="30657">"Mad Max." Three days were spent dodging and battling Iranian forces in the deserts around the earthquake-stricken city of Bam. Once they made it to Isfahan, however, in central Iran, they were home free. They released the militiamen, transferred the stuff to ordinary cars and drove to Tehran, where other smugglers picked up the drugs and passed them on to ethnic Turks in Tabriz. The Turks would bring them home, and from there they went to the markets of Europe. </object.title>

Should he ever run into a problem in Afghanistan, he told me, "I simply make a phone call. And my voice is known to ministers, of course. They are in my network. Every network has a big man supporting them in the government." The Interior Ministry's director of counternarcotics in Kabul had told me the same thing. Anyway, if the smugglers have problems on the ground, they say, they just pay the Taliban to destroy the enemy commanders.

Razzaq has at times contemplated getting out of the smuggling trade, he said, but the easy money is too alluring. Depending on the market, he can earn from $1,500 to $7,500 a month. Most Afghans can't make that in a year. Besides, he said, "all the governors are doing this, so why shouldn't we?"

Losers Become Winners

In December 2001, not long after the Taliban were routed, I visited the Shah Wali Kot district, several hours' drive on unpaved roads from Kandahar, a Mordor land of rock mountains shaped like sagging crescents and mud-baked houses melting into the dunes. The Taliban leaders had fled, mostly to Pakistan. Gul Agha Shirzai, formerly a local warlord and soon-to-be new governor, and his soldiers had swarmed into power while the Americans set up their operations base in Mullah Omar's Xanadu-like residence. I was with a large group of Populzai, the clan of the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai.

We were in a big guest room with more than a dozen men gathered in a circle, all wearing the kind of turbans that look like gargantuan ice-cream swirls. The ones in black turban swirls were giggling, chatting and slapping one another on the back. The ones in white turban swirls were sulking, grumbling or mute. In this group, the miserable white turbans were Taliban men. They had just lost their pickup trucks, weapons, money, prestige and jobs, all of which had gone to the gleeful black turbans.

DOJ_NMG_0084471

Today those miserable white turbans have taken to the mountains to fight. The gleeful black turbans are under siege. I saw one of the black turbans this summer, the Shah Wali Kot district leader, in the garden of the Kandahar governor's palace. He was a mess. He chuckled loudly when I asked him how it was back in Shah Wali Kot. "Frankly, we are just defending ourselves from the Taliban," he said. "Our head is on the pillow at night, but we do not sleep."

That small division among the Populzai in Shah Wali Kot echoes the larger division of the Pashtun into two main branches: the Durrani and the Ghilzai. The Durrani, Karzai's tribe, have dominated for the last two centuries in Afghanistan and regard themselves as the ruling elite. In the south, the Ghilzai were often treated as the nomadic, scrappy cousins. With the exception of Mullah Omar, who had been a poor Ghilzai farmer, the leaders of the Taliban tended to be Durrani. These days, the perception among the southern Ghilzai is that they are persecuted, that the jails are filled with their people, while the Durrani in the south received all the Japanese, U.S. and British contracts and jobs. From what I could gather during my weeks in Afghanistan, these perceptions were mostly true. But even if they were exaggerated, such perceptions, in an illiterate society, have a way of quickly morphing into reality.

Take Panjwai, a district just outside Kandahar, where hundreds of Taliban massed this summer, taking advantage of the changeover from American soldiers to a NATO force of Canadian troops. One afternoon I met a red-haired propagandist and writer for the Taliban in a Kandahar office building. With his slight lisp, chain-smoking habit and eclectic reading — French novelists and Arabic philosophers — he seemed more a tormented graduate student than the landless villager from Panjwai he was. Panjwai is a mishmash of tribes, and the Taliban were exploiting the grievances of the Nurzai, a tribe that has felt persecuted and unfairly targeted for poppy eradication. Traders in Kandahar, he said, were donating money to the Taliban. Landowners were paying them to fight off eradicators. The Taliban were paying poor, unemployed men to fight. And religious scholars were delivering the message that it was time for jihad because the Americans were no different from the Russians. Just a few weeks earlier, the Taliban went on a killing spree in Panjwai. They beheaded a tribal leader in his home, shot another in the bazaar and hanged a man near a shrine with a note tacked on his body: <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="290327;46304;111485">"SPY."</object.title>

The Taliban were feeling bold enough that one afternoon Mullah Ibrahim, a Taliban intelligence agent, dropped by my hotel for lunch. He was a Ghilzai, from Helmand, and told me he had tried to lead a normal life under the official amnesty program. Instead, he was locked up, beaten and so harassed by Helmandi intelligence and police officers that his tribal elders told him to leave for Pakistan and join the Taliban there. Then, about a year ago, he decided that he was tired of fighting and living as a fugitive and accepted a reconciliation offer from an Afghan general. Pakistani intelligence got wind of this and imprisoned him; upon his release, the Pakistanis gave him money and a motorbike and pressured him to go back to war. He is still tired of war, but the Pakistanis won't let him live in peace, and now if he tries to reconcile with the Kabul government, he told me, the Taliban will kill him.

When fighting broke out on the main highway near Kandahar, I saw that the police had tied up a group of villagers — but the Taliban had all escaped. One of those village men, his hands bound behind his back, told me that he had peeped out from his house earlier that day and saw some 200 Taliban with new guns and rocket launchers. They wanted food and threatened him and other villagers. "But I am not afraid of them," he said loudly. "I am only afraid of this government." Why? "Look at what they do. They can't get the Taliban, so they arrest us. We have no hope from them anymore. And when we call and tell them Taliban are here, no one comes." As an engineer from Panjwai who had been an Afghan senator during the Communist era told me: "We are now like camels. In Islam, a camel can be slaughtered in two different ways.

"The Taliban are using rivalries and enmities between people to get soldiers, the same tactics as the mujahedeen used against the Russians," the engineer continued. "Just like in Russian times they come and say, 'We are defending the country from the infidels.' They start asking for food. Then they ask the people for soldiers and say, 'We will give you weapons.' And that's how it starts. And the emotions are rising in the people now. They are saying, 'Kaffirs have invaded our land.'"

Qayum Karzai, the president's older brother and a legislator from Kandahar, seemed utterly depressed when I met him. "For the last four years, the Taliban were saying that the Americans will leave here," he said. "We were stupid and didn't believe it. Now they think it's a victory that the Americans left."

DOJ_NMG_0084472

With the Americans on their way out and the NATO force not yet in control, the Kandahar Police were left on the front line: underfinanced, underequipped, untrained — and often stoned. Which is perhaps what made them so brave. One afternoon I ran into a group who said their friends had just been killed when a Talib posing as a policeman served them poisoned tea. A shaggy-haired officer in a black tunic was standing by his pickup, freshly ripped up by a barrage of bullets, and staring at my feet. "I envy your shoes," he said, looking back at his own torn rubber sandals. "I envy your Toyota," he said and laughed. And then looking at my pen and notebook, he said, "I envy you can read and write." It's not too late, I offered feebly, but he tapped his temple and shook his head. "It doesn't work anymore," he said. "I smoke hash. I smoke opium. I'm drinking because we're always thinking and nervous." He was 35. He had been fighting for 20 years. Four of his friends had been killed in the fighting the other night. He had to support children, a wife and parents on a salary of about $100 a month. And, he said, "we haven't been paid in four months." No wonder, then, that the population complained that the police were all thieves.

At Kandahar's hospital I met a 17-year-old policeman (who had been with the police since he was 14) tending to his wounded friend. He was in a jovial mood, amazed he wasn't dead. He said they had been given an order to cut the Taliban's escape route. Instead they were ambushed by the Taliban, ran out of bullets and had no phones to call for backup. "We ran away," he said with a nervous giggle. "The Taliban chased us, shouting: 'Hey, sons of Bush! Where are you going? We want to kill you.'"

Last month, NATO forces struck back around Panjwai with artillery and aerial bombardments, killing an estimated 500 Taliban fighters and destroying homes and schools. But unless NATO can stay for years, create a trustworthy police force and spend the millions necessary to regenerate the district, the Taliban will be back.

Deciding to Fight

Inside the old city walls of Peshawar, Pakistan, a half-hour drive from the Afghan border, in a bazaar named after the storytellers who enthralled Central Asian gold and silk merchants with their tales of war and tragic love, sits the 17th-century Mohabat Khan Mosque. It is a place of cool, marble calm amid the dense market streets. Yousaf Qureshi is the prayer leader there and director of the Jamia Ashrafia, a Deobandi madrasa. He had recently announced a pledge by the jewelers' association to pay $1 million to anyone who would kill a Danish cartoonist who caricatured the Prophet Muhammad. Qureshi himself offered $25,000 and a car. I found Qureshi seated on a cushion behind a low glass desk covered with papers and business cards — ambassadors, N.G.O. workers, Islamic scholars, mujahedeen commanders: he has conversed with them all. His office resembles an antiques shop, the walls displaying oversize prayer beads, knives inlaid with ivory and astrakhan caps. It was day's end, and Qureshi was checking the proofs for his 51st book, called "The Benefits of Koran."

Qureshi told me that he meets with Pakistan's president, Pervez Musharraf, about twice a year. Qureshi understands Musharraf's predicament: "The heart of this government is with the Taliban. The tongue is not." He didn't claim total insider knowledge, but he said, "I think they want a weak government and want to support the Taliban without letting them win." Why? "We are asking Musharraf, 'What are you doing,' and he says: 'I'm moving in both ways. I want to support the Taliban, but I can't afford to displease America. I am caught between the devil and the deep sea.'"

Not long ago, Qureshi said, he received three emissaries from Mullah Omar who wanted Qureshi to warn another religious leader to stop preaching against the Taliban. "I refused," he said. Later Sheikh Yassin, one of the messengers, was arrested by the I.S.I., Pakistan's military intelligence service. So why, I asked, does Qureshi say the I.S.I. is supporting the Taliban? "That is the double policy of the government," he replied. Even in the 1990's, he said, Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif was supporting the official Afghan government of Burhanuddin Rabbani while the I.S.I. was supporting his opponent, Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, as he rained thousands of rockets upon Rabbani's government and the citizens of Kabul. Qureshi told me that if he and local traders didn't want Al Qaeda or the Taliban to flourish, then they wouldn't. "We are supporting them to give the Americans a tough time," he said. "Leave Afghanistan, and the Taliban and foreign fighters will not give Karzai problems. All the administrators of madrasas know what our students are doing, but we won't tell them not to fight in Afghanistan."

The new Taliban fighters in Afghanistan are of three basic types. There are the old war-addicted jihadis who were left out of the 2001 Bonn conference, which determined the postwar shape of Afghan politics and the carve-up of the country. There are the "second generation" Afghan refugees: poor, educated in Pakistan's madrasas and easily recruited by their elders. And then there are the young men who had jobs and prestige in the former Taliban regime and were unable to find a place for themselves in the new Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0084473

Coincidentally, there are also now three fronts. One is led by Mullah Omar's council in Quetta. The second is led by Jalaluddin Haqqani, a hero of the jihad against the Soviets who joined the Taliban. Although well into his 80's, he orchestrates insurgent attacks through his sons in Paktia, Khost and Paktika, the Afghan provinces close to Waziristan, where he is based. Finally, there is Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, the former leader of Hezb-i-Islami, the anti-Soviet fighters entrusted with the most money and arms by the U.S. and Pakistan. He had opposed the Taliban, living in uneasy exile in Iran until the U.S. persuaded Tehran to boot him out; he sneaked into the mountainous eastern borderlands. Since the early days of Karzai's government, he has promised to organize Mullah Omar's followers with his educated cadres and finance their jihad against Karzai and the American invaders. Old competitors are coming together in much the way the mujahedeen factions cooperated to fight the Russians. Hekmatyar adds a lethal ingredient to this stew: his ties and his followers extend all through Afghanistan, including the north and the west, where he is exploiting factional grievances that have nothing to do with the Pashtun discontent in the south.

An Afghan I met outside Peshawar — for his safety he asked me not to use his full name — was typical of the 20-something Talibs who had flourished under the Taliban regime. He was from Day Chopan, a mountainous region in Zabul Province, northeast of Kandahar. When the Northern Alliance and the Americans took Afghanistan, he escaped through the hills on an old smuggling route to the North-West Frontier Province.

It was familiar terrain. A.'s father had been a religious teacher who studied in Sami ul-Haq's famous Haqqaniya madrasa near the Khyber Pass and preached jihad for Harakat, one of the southern mujahedeen parties whose members filled Mullah Omar's ranks. Those old ties still bind and have provided a network for recruiting. A. grew up in madrasas in the tribal Pashtun lands of Waziristan, where he learned to fire guns as a child in the American-financed mujahedeen camps. As a teenage religious student in Wana, the capital of South Waziristan, he would go door to door collecting bread for his fellow Talibs. Behind one of those doors, he saw a girl and fell in love. When his father wouldn't let him marry the girl, he threatened to go fight in Afghanistan. His father would not relent, and A. signed up at the local Taliban office in Peshawar. "We got good food, free service, everything was Islamic," he told me. "It was the best life, rather than staying in that poor madrasa." His father soon did relent, and A. became engaged, but he was only 15 and had no money. So he went back to the Taliban and was soon working beside the deputy defense minister. "Of course, then there were bags of money," he said.

A., now 28, was living in an Afghan refugee village that used to belong to Hekmatyar's group. Weak with malaria, he was nevertheless plump and jovial, even funny at times. Only when the Pakistani intelligence services came up did his already sallow hues pale to old bone.

After fleeing the American bombardment in 2001, he told me, the Taliban arrived in Pakistan tattered, dispersed and demoralized. But in the months after the collapse, senior Taliban leaders told their comrades to stay at home, keep in touch and wait for the call. Some Taliban told me that they actually waited to see if there was a chance to work with Karzai's government.

"Our emir," as A. referred to Mullah Omar, slowly contacted the commanders and told them to find out who was dead and who was alive. Those commanders appointed group commanders to collect the underlings like A. Weapons stashed away in Afghanistan's mountains were excavated. Funds were raised through the wide and varied Islamic network — Karachi businessmen, Peshawar goldsmiths, Saudi oil men, Kuwaiti traders and jihadi sympathizers within the Pakistani military and intelligence ranks.

Mullah Omar named a 10-man leadership council, A. explained. Smaller councils were created for every province and district. Most of this was done from the safety of Pakistan, and in 2003 Mullah Omar dispatched Mullah Dadullah to the madrasas of Baluchistan and Karachi to gather the dispersed Talibs and find fresh recruits. Pakistani authorities were reportedly seen with him. Still, neither Musharraf nor his military men in Baluchistan did anything to arrest him.

It was a perfect job for Dadullah, whose reputation for bravery was matched by his savagery and his many war wounds, collected in more than 25 years of fighting. In 1998, his fighters slaughtered hundreds of Hazaras (Shiites of Mongol descent) in Bamiyan Province, an act so brutal it was even too much for Mullah Omar, who had him disarmed at the time. Dadullah's very savagery, filmed and now often circulated on videotape, coupled with his promotional flair, were just the ingredients Omar needed to put the Taliban back on the map.

DOJ_NMG_0084474

Today, Quetta has assumed the character of Peshawar in the 1980's, a suspicious place of spies and counterspies and double agents. It is not just the hundreds of men in typical Afghan Pashtun clothing — the roughly wound turbans, dark shalwar kameez, eyes inked with kohl — who squat on Thursday afternoons outside the Kandahari mosque in the center of town, comparing notes on the latest fighting in Helmand or the best religious teachers. Rather, as I wandered the narrow alleyways of the Afghan neighborhoods, my local guides would say, "That's where Mullah Dadullah was living" or "That's where Mullah Amir Khan Haqqani is living." (Haqqani is the Taliban's governor in exile for Zabul Province.) Mullah Dadullah is now a folk hero for young Talibs like A. And all the Taliban I met told me that every time Dadullah gives another interview or appears on the battlefield, it serves as an instant injection of inspiration.

By 2004, A. said, he was meeting a lot of Arabs — Saudis, Iraqis, Palestinians — who taught the Afghans about I.E.D.'s (improvised explosive devices) and suicide bombings. "They taught us how to put explosives in plastic," he told me. "They taught us wiring and triggers. The Arabs are the best instructors in that." But now the Afghans are doing fine on their own. Pakistani jihadis in Afghanistan received their training, they told me, from Pakistani officers in Kashmir.

The southerners have also forged ties with the Pakistani Taliban in Waziristan. There is a free flow of arms and men between Waziristan and the Afghan provinces across the border. According to A., even Uzbeks from the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan have joined some of the fighters now in A.'s home mountains in Day Chopan.

It was disheartening to hear A. describe his first encounter with Americans, who were trying to set up a base in a remote region of Zabul. Though they were building a road where no roads had gone before, he could perceive that asphalt only as a means for the Americans to transport their armored vehicles and occupy Muslim lands. A friend of his joined us as we were talking. He had just arrived in Pakistan from the Day Chopan region and said that the Americans were like a cyclone of evil, stealing their almonds and violating their Pashtunwali (the Pashtun tribal laws). In this instance, he meant the law by which even a cousin will not enter your house without knocking first.

A. is now a media man in Pakistan, coordinating the editing of films for discs, censoring them in case there are commanders who don't want their faces seen and distributing them. He proudly offered me the latest disc of Mullah Dadullah beheading some "spies for the Americans." He said he had sold 25,000 CD's about the fighting in Waziristan.

He was full of contradictions. He said that if he didn't have a house in Day Chopan, he would never spend a single night there because there was no education, no electricity, no power, nothing, just a heap of stones. Yet he did not want America to change all that. "We don't like progress by Americans," he declared. "We don't like roads by Americans. We would rather walk on tired feet as long as we are walking in an Islamic state."

Was it all just bravado speaking? Was an opportunity to build bridges to young men like A. somehow lost or just neglected? It was hard to tell. But when the I.S.I. subject came up again, his tone changed. "They are snakes," he told me. He said that they were trying to create a new, obedient leader and oust the independent-minded Mullah Omar, and for that, the real Taliban hated them. Then he said: "I told you that we burn schools because they're teaching Christianity, but actually most of the Taliban don't like this burning of schools or destroying roads and bridges, because the Taliban, too, could use them. Those acts were being done under I.S.I. orders. They don't want progress in Afghanistan." An Indian engineer was beheaded in Zabul in April, he said, and that was also ordered by Pakistan, which, from fear of the influence of its enemy, India, was encouraging attacks on Indian companies. "People are not telling the story, because no one can trust anyone, and if I.S.I. knows I told you," he said, he would be dead.

Pakistan's Assets

There are many theories for why Pakistan might have wanted to help the Taliban reconstitute themselves. Afghan-Pakistani relations have always been fraught. One among the many disputes has to do with the Durand Line, the boundary drawn up by the British in 1893 partly to divide the Pashtun tribes, who were constantly revolting against the British. The Afghan government has never recognized this line, which winds its way from the Hindu Kush mountains of North-West Frontier Province 1,500 miles down to the deserts of Baluchistan, as its border. Nor have the Pashtun tribes. The Pakistanis may hope to force Karzai to recognize the Durand line in exchange for stability.

Another theory is that Musharraf must appease the religious parties whom he needs to extend his power past the end of his term next year. Musharraf bought them off, gave them control of the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan and let them use the Taliban. And finally, the Pakistanis see Afghanistan as their rightful client. They want an accommodating regime, not Karzai, whose main backers are the U.S. and India, Pakistan's nemesis.

DOJ_NMG_0084475

Pakistan's well-established secular Pashtun nationalist political leaders remain distraught that their lands have again become sanctuaries for the Afghan Taliban and the Pakistani religious parties, which, since elections in 2002, rule these provinces and are completing a Talibanization of the region. The secular leaders point to another layer in Pakistan's games: keeping the tribal areas autonomous enables Pakistan's intelligence services to ward off the gaze of Westerners and keep their jihadis safely tucked away.

One thing you notice if you visit the homes of retired generals in Pakistan is that they live in a lavish fashion typical of South America's dictatorship-era military elite. They control most of the country's economy and real estate, and like President Musharraf, himself a former general, they do not want to relinquish power.

Although there is a secularist strain in the Pakistani military, it has been aligned with religious hard-liners since the army's inception in 1947. Many officers still see their duty as defending the Muslim world, but their raison d'être has been undermined by the fact that though Pakistan was founded as a refuge for South Asia's Muslims, more Muslims today live in India. They seem to envy the jihadis' clarity. The militants had no identity crises. According to Najim Sethi, a prominent Pakistani journalist, military officers often have "a degree of self-disgust for selling themselves" to the Americans, and they still bear a grudge against the United States for abandoning them after the Afghan jihad and, more recently, for sanctioning Pakistan over its nuclear program. The standard army phrase about the Americans was, he said, "They used us like a condom."

Officers spoke to me as if they were simply translating the feelings of the jihadis for a tone-deaf audience, but they sounded more like ventriloquists. One retired colonel I spoke to was a relative of a Taliban leader from Waziristan, Abdullah Massoud, who had earned both sympathy and reverence for his time in Guantánamo Bay. Massoud was captured fighting the Americans and the Northern Alliance and spent two years there, claiming to be a simple Afghan Talib. Upon his release, he made it home to Waziristan and resumed his war against the U.S. With his long hair, his prosthetic limb and impassioned speeches, he quickly became a charismatic inspiration to Waziristan's youth.

Since 2001, some of Waziristan's tribes have refused to hand over Qaeda members living among them. Under intense American pressure, Pakistan agreed for the first time in its history to invade the tribal areas. Hundreds of civilians and soldiers were killed. American helicopters were seen in the region, as were American spies. The militants (with some army accomplices) retaliated with two assassination attempts against Musharraf late in 2003. He struck back, but as the civilian casualties mounted and the military began to balk at killing Pakistanis, Musharraf agreed to a deal in the spring of 2004 whereby the militants would give up their guests in return for cash. Pakistani officers and the militants hugged and shed tears during a public reconciliation. But the militants did not relinquish their Al Qaeda guests, and they took advantage of the amnesty to execute tribal elders they said had helped the Pakistani military. The tribal structure in Waziristan was devastated, and the Taliban took to the streets to declare the Islamic emirate of Waziristan. Since Musharraf signed a truce with the militants last month, attacks launched from Waziristan into Afghanistan, according to NATO, have risen by 300 percent.

"Muslim governments are not able to face the Americans," the retired colonel from Waziristan said, explaining the mujahedeen mind-set. "If Muslim governments should stand up against duplicity and foreign hegemonic designs, and they don't, who will? Someone has to stand up to defend the Muslim countries, and it's this that gives the jihadis the courage and zeal to stand up to the worst atrocities. This is the core issue of the mujahedeen movement. You call it the war on terror. The mujahedeen call it jihad." And so, essentially, did he.

One afternoon, in the midst of a monsoon, I sought out one of the founders of the pro-jihadi strategy, the retired general Mirza Aslam Beg. He lived in Rawalpindi, the military capital half an hour from Islamabad, in a brick and tile-roofed mansion with a basketball hoop, flowing greenery and Judy, his one-eyed cocker spaniel. The house was immaculate, with marble floors, rugs, fine china and porcelain on display behind glass and an amusing portrait of Aslam Beg as a young, Ray-Banned, pommaded officer. His mansion sits across the street from Musharraf's.

Aslam Beg played a leading role in the military's creation of "asymmetrical assets," jargon for the jihadis who have long been used by the military as proxies in Kashmir and Afghanistan. He was chief of the army staff from 1988 to 1991, while the Pakistani nuclear scientist A.Q. Khan was selling the country's nuclear technology to Iran, Libya and North Korea. Beg held talks with the Iranians about exchanging Iranian oil for Pakistani nuclear skill.

DOJ_NMG_0084476

Aslam Beg likes to remind visitors that he was one of a group of army officers trained by the C.I.A. in the 1950's as a "stay-behind organization" that would melt into the population if ever the Soviet Union overran Pakistan. Those brigadiers and lieutenant colonels then trained and directed the Afghan jihadis.

In the 1980's, "the C.I.A. set up the largest support and administrative bases in Mohmand agency, Waziristan and Baluchistan," Aslam Beg told me. "These were the logistics bases for eight long years, and you can imagine the relations that developed. And then Chechens, Uzbeks, Tajiks, Saudis developed family relations with the local people." The Taliban, he said, fell back after 2001 to these baselines. "In 2003, when the U.S. attacked Iraq, a whole new dimension was added to the conflict. The foreign mujahedeen who'd fought in Afghanistan started moving back to Afghanistan and Iraq." And the old Afghan jihadi leaders stopped by the mansion of their mentor, Aslam Beg, to tell him they were planning to wage war against the American occupiers.

As the rain outside turned to hail, banging against the windows, Aslam Beg ate some English sandwiches that had been wheeled in by a servant. "As a believer," he went on, "I'll tell you how I understand it. In the Holy Book there's an injunction that the believer must reach out to defend the tyrannized. The words of God are, 'What restrains you from fighting for those helpless men, women and children who due to their weakness are being brutalized and are calling you to free them from atrocities being perpetuated on them.' This is a direct message, and it may not impact the hearts and minds of all believers. Maybe one in 10,000 will leave their home and go to the conflicts where Muslims are engaged in liberation movements, such as Chechnya, Palestine, Iraq, Afghanistan and Kashmir. Now it's a global deterrent force."

The Authentic Jihad

The old city of Lahore, with its broad boulevards and banyan-tree canopies, remains the cultural and intellectual heart of Pakistan. It is home to a small elite of journalists, editors, authors, painters, artists and businessmen. Najam Sethi, editor in chief of The Friday Times, and his wife, Jugnu Mohsin, the publisher, are popular fixtures among this crowd. Like so many of Pakistan's intellectuals, they have had their share of run-ins with government security agents. For pushing the bounds of press freedom, Sethi was dragged from his bedroom during Nawaz Sharif's reign, beaten, gagged and detained without charge. Musharraf, in his new autobiography, claims that Nawaz Sharif wanted him to court-martial Sethi for treason, an act that seemed ludicrous to him, and he refused.

I met him one afternoon at the newspaper's offices as he was preparing his weekly editorial. He is a tall, affable man with smiling eyes and large glasses. And he got right down to business, providing an analysis of why Pakistan had decided to bring its "assets" — by which he meant the Taliban and Kashmiri jihadis — off the shelf.

In the days following 9/11, when Musharraf gathered together major editors to tell them that he had no choice but to withdraw his support for the Taliban, Sethi raised the touchy issue of the other jihadis. He said that if Musharraf was abandoning the Taliban, he would have to abandon the sectarian jihadis (fighting the Shiites), the Kashmir jihadis, all of the jihadis, because they were all trained in mind by the same religious leaders and in body by the same Pakistani forces.

In January 2002, Musharraf gave an unusually long televised speech to the nation. He reminded the people that his campaign against extremism was initiated years before and not under American pressure. He vowed that Pakistan would no longer export jihadis to Kashmir, that he was again placing a ban on several jihadi organizations, that camps would be closed and that while the madrasas were mostly educating the poor, some were centers of extremist teaching and would be reformed. A month later, Musharraf was at the White House next to President Bush, who praised him for standing against terrorism.

Sethi characterized Pakistani authorities as believing that the U.S. in Iraq "will be a Vietnam." He said: "Afghanistan will be neither here nor there. So we cannot wrap up our assets. We must protect them." The I.S.I. realized it could help deliver Al Qaeda to the U.S. while keeping the Taliban and the jihadis on the back burner. At the same time, Musharraf's moderate advisers were telling him that holding on to those assets would eventually boomerang. And soon enough, the assets began to come after Musharraf — while the people of Pakistan were turning against him for being pro-American. "So going after jihadis who were protecting the Taliban came to a halt," Sethi said.

DOJ_NMG_0084477

Meanwhile the landscape next door in Afghanistan was changing. The warlords were back in action. The drug economy was surging. By 2003 and 2004, Musharraf's men were becoming hysterical about what they saw as a growing Indian presence in Afghanistan, particularly the Indian consulates in Kandahar and Jalalabad, the Pashtun strongholds that Pakistan considered its own turf. Karzai was doing business with Indians and Americans and was no longer a Pashtun whom Pakistanis would want to do business with.

As Sethi spoke, I recalled a meeting I had with one of Kandahar's prominent tribal leaders. He recounted a visit from a former Pakistani general who had been active in the I.S.I. The general invited Kandahar's leaders to lunch and warned them not to let the Indians put a consulate in Kandahar and to remember who their real benefactors were. Today there is a consulate there, and Indian films and music are sweeping through the Pashtun lands. What is more, many Pakistanis believe India is backing the Baluch insurgency in Pakistan's far south, clouding the prospects for the new, Chinese-built port in Gwadar. The port is Pakistan's single largest investment in its economic future and has been attacked by Baluch rebels.

In many ways, Pakistani policy is already looking beyond both Karzai and the Americans; they believe it is prudent to imagine a future with neither. That future will be shaped by the past: the past with India, the past with the Soviet Union, the past with America. For Pakistan's hard-liners, at least, the obvious choice was to take their assets off the shelf and restart the jihad.

A Difficult Choice

On the wall outside the Eid Ga madrasa, in Kuchlak, a parched town near Quetta, Afghan students and teachers were debating the merits of jihad. One boy had just fled an American assault on Day Chopan in Zabul Province. He had never been to Pakistan before. He was frenzied, in shock. As a student from Kandahar led the others in dusk prayer, a young boy whispered to me, "I like America." They were hardly a unified group. One young Helmandi told me, "We want our traditions of Islam and Sharia, not your democracy," while another argued for peace. Then the Helmandi asked, with genuine confusion: "Why are Muslims being tortured everywhere in the world, and no one is there to stand up for them? But if you touch one Westerner, the sky is on your head?"

Most madrasas in Pakistan are run by the Jamiat Ulema-e-Islam, the religious-party alliance that has joined with Musharraf to keep the popular parties of Benazir Bhutto and Nawaz Sharif from regaining power. The J.U.I. madrasas usually endorse jihad, although even here I met madrasa students who were against the war. They subscribed to a vision of jihad as a struggle for self-improvement and the improvement of society. Mawlawi Mohammadin, a cleric from Helmand, went so far as to tell me that these are the true roots of jihad, though he confessed that his is a lonely voice. He was afraid of everyone — Taliban, Pakistani intelligence, even his pupils. "If we start openly supporting Karzai, we could be killed by our own students," he told me with nervous laughter. Only a month earlier, a Taliban official from Helmand who had reconciled with Karzai's government was gunned down by assassins on a motorbike in Quetta.

Mohammadin said that it is now open season for jihad in Afghanistan under J.U.I. guidance. Government ministers were even attending funerals to praise Pakistani Pashtuns who had died fighting in Kandahar. He estimates that there are some 10,000 Taliban fighters in Baluchistan. Despite the intimidation, he says he feels that his mission is to steer his students away from war.

One of these was Mohamed Nader, who had just attended a cousin's funeral and was wondering what it all meant. His cousin's family was poor, and without their knowledge, he had gone to earn money first by harvesting poppies in Helmand and then by fighting for the Taliban. Finally he was killed. Among the biggest problems, Nader told me, was that the cohesion of the Afghan family has been shredded by decades of poverty and refugee life in Pakistan. In a typically strong Afghan family, young adults obey their parents, even asking for permission to go fight. But here, boys just run off.

Rahmatullah was one of those who had run off and returned. He was skinny and disheveled, having just faced heavy fighting in Kandahar. Though an Afghan, he had grown up in Baluchistan, near the border, in an area where he said 200 fighters were now living. The mullah at his madrasa told all the students that it was time for jihad. And the I.S.I. was paying cash. But his father was old and against the war; he pleaded with him to abandon fighting. So he sent Rahmatullah to his friend Mohammadin, hoping he might open another path for his son. Rahmatullah told me that he wasn't sure yet which mullah he would listen to.

(Next week, Part 2: How U.S. and NATO forces have been battling the Taliban and fighting for hearts and minds.)

DOJ_NMG_0084478

After The Hugs, Reality Sets In -- Another Iraq Tour Looms (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

Several hundred family members, after months of worrying and praying, turn out at Miramar air station to greet returning Marines.

SAN DIEGO — By their nature, military families tend to be respectful of authority.

But no rope line was going to restrain family members Saturday from sprinting onto the tarmac at Miramar Marine Corps Air Station to embrace loved ones returning from a seven-month deployment to Iraq.

Sgt. Garland Joyner, as the bearer of the squadron guidon, or pennant, had the honor of being the first Marine to deplane from the chartered United Airlines 747. His children — Malik, 8, Imanie, 9, Kasey, 13, and Jasmine, 14 — were the first to run for their welcome-home hug.

"Daddy!" screamed Malik as he raced toward his father, who has now done three tours in Iraq.

But amid the kisses and tears of relief there was the reality that Joyner and other members of the 3rd Marine Aircraft Wing will probably return to Iraq, maybe next year.

For families, another deployment means another prolonged period of constant worry in which every knock on the door carries the potential of the worst possible news.

Jamie Macdonald of Carmel knows all about the anxiety. She was waiting for her son, Sgt. Colin Macdonald, 25, who was returning after his fourth tour.

"It's horrible," she said. "You don't take a deep breath the whole time they're gone. It's like playing Russian roulette. You know that if you play often enough, something bad is going to happen."

Several hundred family members displaying small American flags, handmade banners and commemorative T-shirts awaited the arrival of the plane after its 11-hour flight from Germany.

Twenty-one members of Sgt. Tony Portillo's family turned out wearing red T-shirts with his name and picture. He was returning from his third deployment to Iraq.

"It gets harder each time," said his mother, Angie Portillo, of Los Angeles. "You just get numb, because you know what to expect. You're afraid the whole time."

Different family members have different strategies to cope with anxiety. Some won't watch television news.

Some put in extra hours at work. Others busy themselves with volunteer work or join groups of other family members of deployed Marines.

"You pray. Every night and every morning, you pray," said Hilda Lopez of Fresno, waiting with her daughter Rosa Kong for the return of her husband, Cpl. Phirak Kong, 21.

Cyndi DeBoer of Boulder City, Nev., followed a mantra she found in a book during the second tour of her stepson Cpl. Nathan DeBoer, 22.

"I read that you can either have faith or you can have fear," she said. "Every time I started to have fear, I prayed."

Cynthia Drake, who came to San Diego from her home in Fritch, Texas, for the homecoming, wore a T-shirt with a picture of her son, Cpl. Tanner Drake, 26, and the slogan, "A Piece of My Heart Served in Iraq."

tony.perry@latimes.com

As Part Of Military's Ground Force, Navy Firms Up Support Services (NVP)

By Louis Hansen

Norfolk Virginian Pilot, October 22, 2006

VIRGINIA BEACH - The military calls them "IAs," shorthand for individual augmentees.

They're the 46,000 men and women who have been picked from Navy units to serve, often facing danger, with soldiers and Marines in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Once considered a short-term program, the Navy and defense experts acknowledge these sailors are now a permanent part of today's ground force.

DOJ_NMG_0084479

The Navy this month created the Expeditionary Combat Readiness Center at Little Creek to track and assist those sailors uprooted from their ships and shore commands. About 150 people are assigned to the center and at bases in battle zones.

At any given time, about 8,500 Navy personnel are deployed for fill-in roles in the two wars. Their jobs include logistical support, civil affairs and military police. Deployments have grown, and now typically last 12 months.

The readiness center aims to ease the stresses on sailors, many stationed in combat areas without their shipmates to rely on.

"They don't have embedded unit support with them," said Capt. Jeffrey

McKenzie, the center's commander. "They're a unit of one."

Sailors at forward bases in Iraq, Afghanistan, Guantanamo Bay and other stations can meet with staff advisers. They will help sailors manage their career and advancement exams, and smooth out payroll problems and health-care issues, he added.

McKenzie said he begins every morning by answering e-mails from sailors in Baghdad who need help.

McKenzie said his new command can also help families - something as simple as contacting a sailor at a forward base. Augmentee families have a disadvantage: They lack the ready community support as when a 300-crew warship deploys for six months.

The Navy handles an average 1,000 IAs each month, he said. The new command can handle twice that number.

Early in the Iraq war, sailors sometimes received bare-bones combat training and makeshift equipment, McKenzie said. Combat skills training has since been bolstered and standardized at Fort Jackson, S.C.

Dan Goure, a senior researcher with the Lexington Institute, said the Navy should expect to fill its support role for a long time.

Army and Marine units have been overstretched, deploying three and four times since the Iraq war began.

The IAs will continue being used more widely, he said, because the military became smaller after the Cold War and conflicts have become longer, straining manpower.

"The global war on terrorism has shown us we can't do our business the old-fashioned way," said Goure, who studies military personnel issues for the Northern Virginia-based think tank.

The military needs active-duty and reserve troops from all branches to boost Army and Marine Corps missions, he said. "These are the new realities."

Capt. Ed Burdick, a personnel and manpower administrator for surface fleet headquarters in Norfolk, said the combat experience often creates better, battle-tested sailors for the Navy.

The migration of sailors to ground-combat roles have not diminished the fleet's readiness, he said, because less than 3 percent of any ship's crew has been selected for ground duty.

Sailors usually volunteer, although some are ordered.

Cmdr. Jim Lowther, a supply and financial officer for the surface fleet, requested a six-month tour in Iraq in 2005. He said he wanted to directly contribute to the war and gain experience.

He spent a week training at Fort Bliss, Texas, then joined a command in Iraq. "It was pretty quick," Lowther said.

Among other duties, he managed contracts for military and civilian construction in Iraq.

The deployment "makes you appreciate what you have here," he said during an interview at Norfolk Naval Station.

Capt. Robert Irelan left a staff job with the surface fleet for Baghdad, where he served as a liaison between the U.S. military and the Iraqi Navy. It was one of the most rewarding duties of his 22-year career, he said.

Irelan said a combat deployment can be much easier and safer aboard a warship patrolling the Persian Gulf.

But, he said, "it's not really my idea of war."

Debt Is Keeping Troops From Overseas Duty, Study Finds (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

SAN DIEGO, Oct. 21 (AP) — Thousands of American troops are being barred from overseas duty because they are so deep in debt that they are considered security risks, according to a review of military records by The Associated Press.

DOJ_NMG_0084480

The number of troops held back has climbed sharply in the past few years. And while it appears to represent a small percentage of all military personnel, the increase is occurring at a time when the armed forces are stretched thin by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We are seeing an alarming trend in degrading financial health," said Capt. Mark D. Patton, commander of Naval Base Point Loma in San Diego.

The Pentagon contends that financial problems can distract troops from their duties or make them vulnerable to bribery and treason. As a result, those who fall heavily into debt can be stripped of the security clearances they need to go overseas.

The number of revoked clearances has surged since the beginning of the Iraq war, but military officials say there is no evidence that troops are deliberately running up debts to stay out of harm's way.

The problem is attributed to several factors, including a lack of financial acumen among young recruits; reckless spending among those exhilarated to make it home from a tour of duty; and the profusion of so-called payday lenders, businesses that allow military personnel to borrow against paychecks at extremely high interest rates.

The debt problems have persisted despite financial counseling offered to the troops by the Pentagon and crackdowns on payday lenders.

Data supplied by the Air Force, the Marines and the Navy show that the number of clearances revoked for financial reasons rose every year from 2002 to 2005, climbing to 2,654 last year from 284 at the start of the period. Partial numbers from this year suggest the trend is continuing.

About 6,300 troops in the three branches lost their clearances in that four-year period. Roughly 900,000 people are serving in the three branches, though not all need clearances.

The figures represent just a piece of the problem, because the Army — which employs an additional 500,000 people and accounts for the majority of the 160,000 troops in Iraq and Afghanistan — rejected requests to supply its data, saying such information was confidential.

Security clearances are revoked when service members' debt payments total 30 to 40 percent of their salary. The exact amount depends on the military branch.

Not all military jobs require security clearances. Marine infantryman does not, but some Marine specialties do. So do many jobs in the Navy and Air Force.

Financial problems are the overwhelming reason security clearances are revoked. Other reasons include criminal activity, questionable allegiance and ill health.

A primary reason the military revokes clearances on financial grounds is the fear that soldiers in debt may be tempted to sell secrets or equipment to the enemy.

In addition, "when they are over there fighting, we like them to have their heads in the game," said Maj. Gen. Michael Lehnert, commander of Marine bases in the Western United States.

Military officials also blame high interest rates at payday lending businesses, many of which are clustered outside bases around the country. Several states have cracked down on the lending practices. On Tuesday, President Bush signed legislation limiting how much these businesses could charge military personnel.

Quietly Accepting Another Iraq Death (LAT)

By Steve Lopez

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

I knock on the house with the flag out front. A cousin comes to the door, then asks me to wait on the porch while she checks to see if Kenny Stanton's parents are strong enough to greet a visitor.

"OK," she says a few minutes later, swinging open the screen door. "Come on in."

Gloria Stanton, Kenny's mother, sinks into the sofa, crushed by grief. She manages a gracious smile, her eyes red-rimmed and weary. Daughters Terry and Brandie are with her, and before long Kenny's dad, Kenny Sr., joins us along with brother Mario, 17.

"I'm sorry," I say, and the words feel ridiculously inadequate.

DOJ_NMG_0084481

Cpl. Kenny F. Stanton Jr., 20, was killed in Baghdad on Oct. 13, when a bomb exploded near his vehicle. He was the third graduate of Hemet High School killed in Iraq, and his death came in one of the bloodiest months since the war began.

"The Plague that Hit Hemet," one of Stanton's acquaintances called it in an entry on the fallen soldier's MySpace website.

Stanton's family has erected a memorial in the living room, with flickering candles and photos of Kenny, a nice-looking kid with a sweet smile. He loved words, say his parents. He worked for the school newspaper and wanted to be a writer, a poet and teacher. But he chose to join the Army first.

His family can't say exactly why, although a close cousin, Michael Islas, says Kenny was fascinated by weaponry and wanted to see the world, if not necessarily Iraq. His parents tell me Kenny's grandfather, a Vietnam vet, tried to talk him out of it.

"He wanted to pay him not to go," says Mr. Stanton, a pressman for a label company. "He was ready to write him a check for $40,000 to go to college."

"I said, 'Sweetheart, I don't want you to go,' " Gloria Stanton says. "He said, 'But Mom, I could do some good.' "

In the end, they supported him. How could they argue with a young man who just wanted to do something for his country and make his parents proud?

The whole family drove to LAX when Kenny shipped out.

"We couldn't cry," Mr. Stanton says. "We didn't want him to see us cry. But when he left and we turned to leave, we all had tears in our eyes."

Mr. Stanton says he didn't support the war but supported his son's decision.

"I support our troops. That's all I want to say."

Hemet is a town east of Lake Elsinore with just under 70,000 residents, and Mayor Robin Lowe has been struck by the sacrifice it has made. Another local high school, West Valley, also lost a former student to the war, she says, bringing the local body count to four.

Lowe ordered the City Hall flag to fly at half staff for Stanton, just as she did in June when Marine Cpl. Michael Estrella, also 20, was killed.

"Hemet has many retired military living here, and has always been a center of patriotic pride," Lowe says. "I think our core beliefs are very firm and concrete when it comes to the United States and what it stands for."

Stanton's parents had suggested I get in touch with Aracely Colmenares, one of Kenny's closest friends at Hemet High. I give her a call, and we meet in Mary Henley Park, where she and Kenny used to sit under a tree, look up at the mountains and talk about everything.

They weren't a couple, just friends, but he was the one she called if she needed someone to talk to. She recalls how upset he was by the Sept. 11 attack. Although she wouldn't have pegged him a military man, she says he wanted to do something, someday. Something to make his family proud.

The Armed Forces Career Center, where Stanton enlisted, is not far from the park. It's on the main drag, Florida Avenue, conveniently if not ironically located in the same shopping center as Target, with its big bull's-eye out front.

There's a Taco Bell, a Carl's Jr. and a 99-cent Store. A See's Candy store is two doors from the Jenny Craig weight loss center. The Army, Navy and Marine recruiting stations neatly complete this blending of American commerce and culture.

Army Sgt. 1st Class Ronnie V. Sarmiento tells me the nationwide goal of 80,000 annual recruits has just been topped, but he's not at liberty to disclose the numbers in Hemet. I notice three youngsters in the office, though.

One tells me he might sign up but doesn't want to talk about it. Another guy who's thinking about it, 18-year-old Brent, is just out of Hemet High and says he hasn't heard the news that three former students have been killed.

The third, 18-year-old Jessica Katrow, heard about Stanton's death but is enlisting anyway to serve her country and experience something new.

"It's sad, but it happened," she says. "There's nothing I can do."

I ask if she wants to go to Iraq.

"I don't want to," she says, but she'll take whatever comes her way.

DOJ_NMG_0084482

When I walk into the office at Hemet High the first thing I notice is a young female in an Air Force ROTC uniform. She's wandering behind the counter in crisp blue threads. Prominently displayed in the waiting area are brochures for the Navy ("accelerate your life"), Marines ("the few, the proud") and Army ("who you become will be better than who you were").

An assistant principal tells me no one can speak to me without permission from the district superintendent. Before leaving campus, I ask the assistant principal if it seems appropriate to display military recruiting brochures so prominently at a school that has lost three former students to war.

He politely tells me he thinks it's a government requirement, and refers me again to the superintendent, who does not return my calls.

When the school bell rings, I talk to about 10 students as they leave.

Julian, a freshman wearing an ROTC uniform, hasn't heard about the deaths of former Hemet grads, and he seems alarmed by the news. But he tells me he intends to follow the men in his family into the military.

Kyle, 16, says he heard about Stanton, but he's still considering enlisting after high school.

"It happens," he says, holding a binder on which he's drawn a U.S. flag. "People die."

He tells me none of his teachers have discussed Stanton or the war in class.

"In history? We're studying the Puritans."

Driving away, I find that I'm disturbed by the quiet acceptance of sacrifice to what has been a dubious mission from the beginning. I can't help but remind myself that the architects of the war have risked no personal loss, staying the course with someone else's children.

I ask Mayor Lowe if too many young people in Hemet, if not elsewhere, fall in line before they're equipped to challenge the seduction of war, as well as the definitions of valor and patriotism.

"I don't think anyone in this town — anyone — is promoting war," she says, telling me she'll never forget that 14 students from her own school, Inglewood High, died in Vietnam.

"None of us, especially those of us who lived through Vietnam, are promoting any war of any kind by this country, and I say that emphatically. I don't think any teachers are promoting the war and I don't think the recruiters are promoting war. What I do see is … kids who are not really sure what to do with the rest of their life."

And so they join, with patriotic intentions and hope for a better future.

Kenny F. Stanton will be laid to rest this week in Hemet.

Doonesbury's War (WP)

By Gene Weingarten

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Revealing more about himself than he ever has, Garry Trudeau gives us tantalizing clues about what's behind his venerable comic strip's recent burst of genius, and pain.

IN THE BANQUET ROOM WERE MEN WHO WERE BLIND, men with burns, men with gouges, men missing an arm, men missing a leg, men missing an arm and a leg, men missing an arm and both legs, men missing parts of their faces, and a cartoonist from the funny pages.

We were just a few blocks from the White House, at Fran O'Brien's Steak House. Fran's was hosting a night out for casualties of the current war, visiting from their hospital wards.

It's hard to know what to say to a grievously injured person, and it's easy to be wrong . You could do what I did, for example. Scrounging for the positive, I cheerfully informed a young man who had lost both legs and his left forearm that at least he's lucky he's a righty. Then he wordlessly showed me his right hand, which is missing fingertips and has limited motion -- an articulated claw. That shut things right up, for both of us, and it would have stayed that way, except the cartoonist showed up.

Garry Trudeau, the creator of "Doonesbury," hunkered right down in front of the soldier, eye to eye, introduced himself and proceeded to ignore every single diplomatic nicety.

"So, when were you hit?" he asked.

"October 23."

DOJ_NMG_0084483

Trudeau pivoted his body. "So you took the blast on, what . . . this side?"

"Yeah."

Brian Anderson, 25, was in shorts, a look favored by most of the amputees, who tend to wear their new prostheses like combat medals. His legs are metal and plastic, blue and knobby at the knee, shin poles culminating abruptly in sneakers.

Trudeau surveyed Brian's intact arm. "You've got dots."

"Yeah." Dots are soldier-speak for little beads of shrapnel buried under the skin. Sometimes they take a lifetime to work their way back to the surface. At this, Brian became fully engaged and animated, smiling and talking about the improvised explosive device that took his vehicle out; about his rescue; his recovery; his plans for the future. Trudeau, it turned out, had given him what he needed.

("In these soldiers' minds," Trudeau will explain afterward, "their whole identity, who they are right now, is what happened to them. They want to tell the story, they want to be asked about it, and you're honoring them by listening. The more they revisit it, the less power it has over them.")

Trudeau has been talking to injured vets for a couple of years now. It's partly compassionate support for people he has a genuine regard for, and it's part journalism -- the damnedest sort of reporting, for a professional cartoonist.

This was April 25. On the comics pages that day, Dagwood fixed himself an absolutely ENORMOUS sandwich; Garfield kicked Odie off the table again; and in Beetle Bailey, the only military-themed comic strip, Lt. Fuzz accidentally dropped a glass of water and cussed in funny cartoon hieroglyphics.

In Doonesbury, this was the story: B.D., the football coach and Vietnam vet who went to Iraq with the National Guard and lost a leg in a rocket-grenade attack near Fallujah, has been shamed into entering therapy for post-traumatic stress disorder because he overheard his little girl, Sam, tell a friend that she'd become afraid of her daddy. On this day, B.D. will begin to relive the battlefield event he has repressed, the one that made him a moody, alcoholic paranoiac and that torments him with guilt and shame that he does not understand. Through the rest of the week, B.D. will retell what happened when his armored vehicle came under attack from insurgents and -- desperate to escape and save himself and his men -- he gave the order to flee through a crowded marketplace, mowing down civilians.

Not many of the injured vets in Fran O'Brien's were where B.D. was yet. Their deepest wounds, like the dots, had not yet surfaced. On that day they were jovial, mostly, and indomitable, all of them, stolid and impervious, more so than the moms, wives and girlfriends who hovered at their elbows, lovingly kneading shoulders, patting thighs, holding on, looking bravely upbeat and just a little overwhelmed.

Trudeau bellied up to another vet.

"So, when were you hit?"

IF YOU DON'T KNOW MUCH ABOUT GARRY TRUDEAU, AND YOU PROBABLY DON'T, it's because he has done his best to keep it that way. With the exception of the time in 1980 when his island wedding to America's sweetheart, TV personality Jane Pauley, turned him into a sullen bridegroom hounded by paparazzi in boats and helicopters, Trudeau, now 58, has managed to remain comfortably obscure. Aside from a couple of semi-recent TV interviews, he's had almost no public presence for three decades. Considering the extraordinary reach of his comic strip, and the role it has had over the years in analyzing, reflecting and even helping shape American culture, he may be the most famous unknown person.

It's an odd type of fame, one that attaches hungrily to what you do but not at all to who you are. Take this woman here, at a lunch counter in the Dallas/Fort Worth airport. Her name is Connie Dubois. A candle maker, Connie lives in Ethel, La., pop. 2,000, a fleck on the map of East Feliciana Parish, which itself contains only two traffic lights. Connie, who is 50, has just flown on a plane for the first time in her life, heading to a trade show for candle makers.

"Do you know what 'Doonesbury' is? I ask her.

"Sure," she says, putting down her sandwich. "It's a cartoon. In the paper. Been around a long time. It's a little off-center and radical, and I like that."

"Do you know the name of the guy who draws it?"

Dubois scrunches up her face, thinking.

DOJ_NMG_0084484

"Nope. No idea."

Dubois says she wouldn't know the cartoonist if she saw him, which is undeniable, since at the moment Trudeau is sitting four feet away. He is head-down, digging into his Caesar salad, doing his best to disappear. He hates things like this. Trudeau is so viscerally averse to self-promotion that he once threw up before a scheduled interview for a Time magazine cover story, then canceled it. (Time wrote the story anyway.)

I'm at Trudeau's elbow on a trip out West because I'm doing the first extensive profile of him in the 36 years since he began the comic strip that became an American icon. That's reason enough, but the fact is, something astonishing has happened to "Doonesbury" in the last 2 1/2 years, after the United States invaded Iraq and Trudeau made the startling, un-cartoonish decision to mutilate one of his characters.

It was not just any character. B.D. had been a Doonesbury fixture since Day One. Literally. On the day the strip debuted in 28 newspapers nationwide -- October 26, 1970 -- B.D. was alone in the opening panel, sitting in his dorm room on the first day of school, football helmet inexplicably on his head, wondering what kind of roommate he'd get. To his everlasting annoyance, it turned out to be Michael Doonesbury.

That was so many years ago -- a generation and a half, really -- that the strip has outlasted even its original cultural references. Does anyone remember that "B.D." were the initials of Brian Dowling, the hotshot quarterback at Yale when Trudeau was there in the late '60s? Or that in Eastern prep-school lexicon of the time, a "doone" was something of a doofus?

It's "Doonesbury" that survived and metamorphosed over the years into what is essentially an episodic comic novel, with so many active characters that Trudeau himself has been known to confuse them. "Doonesbury" has always remained topical, often controversial. Unapologetically liberal and almost religiously anti-establishment, Trudeau has been denounced by presidents and potentates and condemned on the floor of the U.S. Senate. He's also been described as America's greatest living satirist, mentioned in the same breath as Mark Twain and Ambrose Bierce.

But for simple dramatic impact and deft complexity of humor, nothing else in "Doonesbury" has ever approached the storyline of B.D's injury and convalescence. It hasn't been political at all, really, unless you contend that acknowledging the suffering of a war is a political statement. What it has been is remarkably poignant and surprisingly funny at the same time. In what Trudeau calls a "rolling experiment in naturalism," he has managed every few weeks to spoon out a story of war, loss and psychological turmoil in four-panel episodes, each with a crisp punch line.

Here's one :

It is a cliche, and it is also true, that humor springs from existential pain -- from a need to blunt the awareness that life is essentially a fatal disease of unpredictable symptoms and unknown duration. Usually, though, the laughter comes through indirection -- acknowledging that death awaits us all, for example, by joking about memory loss as we age. But there's been nothing comfortably oblique in these episodes of "Doonesbury," no comic exaggeration, no use of metaphor. There is no distance whatever between the pain and the humor.

Over the years, "Doonesbury" has been remarkably consistent in its quality, if not universally beloved. Republicans can make a reasonable case that Trudeau's lefty politics sometimes make him seem a water boy for Democrats. He is not above the occasional cheap shot, such as when he devoted an entire week in 1991 to a felon's unsubstantiated charges that Vice President Quayle had been a pothead. At times, he has seemed to lapse unattractively from political satire to political advocacy -- lending his characters' support to John Anderson in 1980 and Howard Dean in 2004. Some feel he has occasionally been tone-deaf to popular culture -- buying too readily, for example, into the notion of a slacker Generation Y. Undeniably, the strip's edge dulled a little in the mid-1990s, when a Democratic ascendancy left him without a meaty political issue to lampoon.

But there aren't many people -- especially among experts who read and critique comics for a living -- who are calling the continuing saga of B.D. anything other than genius.

"What it is," says comics historian R.C. Harvey, "is breathtaking. Just a stunning body of work."

SO, WHO IS TRUDEAU, REALLY?

It turns out he's not afraid of publicity so much as he's horrified at being perceived as the kind of person who wants publicity. He treasures his literary license to kill but feels a twinge of guilt that it isn't really a fair fight. He's a genuinely humble know-it-all.

DOJ_NMG_0084485

His regard for injured soldiers is sincere, his knowledge of their lingo profound, almost as if he's one of them; watching this, you can't help but hear faint, soul-rattling echoes of Vietnam, which he escaped, like many sons of privilege, by gaming the system. He's got the greatest job on Earth -- no boss, his own hours, enormous clout, public adulation, a seven-figure income, absolute creative freedom -- but he speaks with longing about a different career altogether, one that the huge success of "Doonesbury" ensured he'd never have.

Also, he's a smartass.

But you knew that.

IT'S MONDAY NIGHT OUT FOR THE MEATHEADS, as they call themselves. These are Trudeau and some of his best friends, who assemble irregularly on weeknights in Manhattan to attend excellently terrible movies their wives won't see with them. Today's choice is "Poseidon." They're pumped for a real stinker.

"A lot of research goes into this," Trudeau explains, "so we don't make many mistakes. We get these movies when they're dying, so we have the theater to ourselves. We like to talk to the screen."

"And throw popcorn."

This is David Levinthal, 57, who looks like the manager of a Jiffy Lube but is an acclaimed modern artist. Levinthal's medium is plastic toys: He arranges them in unusual ways, photographs them in intriguing lighting and sells the pictures for thousands of dollars. Not long ago he had a show entirely of made-in-Japan erotic dolls.

Levinthal is not the most unusual guy here. That would probably be Fred Newman, 53, who is, at this very moment, barking like a dog. It's the best imitation bark you'll ever hear. Newman's a professional sound-effects man, author of a popular how-to book called MouthSounds and is a regular whistle, boing and honk man for Garrison Keillor's "A Prairie Home Companion." When you're doing a woof, Newman is saying, the rookie error is to blow out. You've got to suck in.

We're sitting outdoors at an East Side Manhattan burrito joint, so Newman is entertaining more than just our table. He once taught Meryl Streep how to convince a radio audience that she was lighting a cigarette and blowing out the match, which isn't as easy as it sounds.

The guy with the graying ponytail is David Stanford, who handles the elaborate Doonesbury.com Web site and edits Trudeau's Doonesbury books.

Trudeau is the normal one. He "travels incognito," as Levinthal says. It's true. The guy could blend into a room of waiters. He dresses with an elaborate lack of vanity. He is a millionaire many times over, but Jane cuts his hair.

Dinner over, the meatheads assemble in the second row of a mostly empty downtown Manhattan theater, as the credits for "Poseidon" are beginning to roll. The meatheads are hoping this one will be a lot worse than the last film they saw, "Good Night, and Good Luck," which turned out to have some disappointingly redeeming qualities. The best worst recent choice was a Lou Diamond Phillips flick where a car exploded and then, in a later scene, the same car drove off a cliff.

In the opening minutes of "Poseidon," as the characters are being introduced, Trudeau and his friends start to loudly handicap who will live and who will drown. "You think Kurt Russell will live?"

"No, he'll die, because the kids are the future."

"Okay, right, he'll die, but he'll die saving people."

Popcorn is definitely being flung.

"The nasty guy's gonna die in a really bad way."

Fred is making excellent glub-glub noises.

"Richard Dreyfuss is suicidal? If he wants to die, then he won't die."

"Right, he needs to learn that life is a gift."

If you've seen the movie, you know the meatheads were right about everything.

LIKE ANY SATIRIST WHOSE WORK ENDURES, Trudeau has been right about a lot of things. From the moment that hippie college deejay Mark Slackmeyer looked at the reader and gleefully declared that an as-yet-unindicted Attorney General John Mitchell was "Guilty! Guilty! Guilty!" Trudeau has shown a world-class instinct for piercing a babble of crosstalk and nailing the truth. He was right about Vietnam (When a conservative columnist said that he saw a "a light at the end of a tunnel," Mic hael asked him: "When you've dug yourself into a hole, why do you always insist on calling it a tunnel?"). Trudeau was right about the greed of '80s big business, about the cynicism of the marketing industry, about Bill Clinton's flippy-flop, polls-based approach to governance ("Doonesbury" regularly portrayed Clinton as a greasy waffle).

DOJ_NMG_0084486

At times his prescience seemed more clairvoyant than calculated: During the waning years of the Reagan administration, Trudeau sent his trench-coated TV newsman, Roland Hedley, into the president's brain, where he confronted a desolate, soupy wasteland of fizzling synapses. It seemed funny then, if mean-spirited; if you look at those strips now, they're chilling.

Most recently, Trudeau was right about Iraq. As the invasion began amid optimistic forecasts of a quick and decisive victory, before mandatory re-ups became routine, National Guardsman B.D. matter-of-factly informed his stunned wife, Boopsie, that he'd see her again "in five to seven years."

Surely, after three decades of being right, the man is bound to be a little smug. I went searching for signs of this in his studio, an airy fourth-floor walkup in the East Seventies. Though the walls are covered with original classic comic art -- Saul Steinberg, Jeff MacNelly, George Herriman's "Krazy Kat" and Winsor McCay's "Little Nemo in Slumberland" -- there is no "Doonesbury" visible anywhere. Just . . . nothing.

"Why would I have my own art up?" Trudeau asks. "I want to show the work of people I admire."

The quality of Trudeau's drawing has been a matter of some debate in the cartooning world since the strip's debut. Back then, a common joke was that Trudeau had "made the comics pages safe for bad art," which was, in a sense, true. Before there were Dilbert" and "Pearls Before Swine" and other strips drawn with meticulous infantilism, there was "Doonesbury," which resembled, in its early years, the sort of thing someone's moderately talented kid brother scribbled into the flyleaf of his textbook.

There was nothing meticulous about it. Trudeau was consciously trying to imitate Jules Feiffer's sparsely sophisticated style, but he didn't progress much past sparse. Sometimes he just didn't bother giving his characters mouths. They never had feet -- their legs would just flutter off the page in mid-calf. Heads would swivel in physiologically irreproducible ways.

Over time -- particularly after Trudeau's famed 20-month hiatus in 1983 and 1984, when he allowed his characters to ripen into reluctant adulthood off the page -- he seemed to learn the fundamentals of cartooning, and then some. The art in "Doonesbury" became far more professional, with inventive angles, cinematic shading, even intimations of an occasional foot. This led to a widespread suspicion that Trudeau was getting major help from the man who ostensibly just did his inking -- a suspicion nudged into an assumption a few years ago when Entertainment Weekly stated flatly that Trudeau wasn't drawing it himself.

"For years," he says, laughing, "I was blamed for my art, and then I couldn't get credit for it."

For the record, the art is his. I'm looking right now at Trudeau's pencil drawings of a recent week of "Doonesburys" before they were sent to the inker. They are rich in detail, identical to the finished version, and every line is Trudeau's, even the lettering.

"It's serviceable, is the best I can say about it," Trudeau demurs. "I will say this: It's a signature style. It doesn't look like anyone else's." Even this modest bit of immodesty does not go immediately unpunished.

"But my stuff's amateur hour compared to this."

Trudeau is pulling open a drawer. Inside are a few originals drawn by the great Walt Kelly, whose "Pogo" strips of the 1940s and '50s were among the first to mine politics for humor. Kelly was a masterful artist. "Look at this -- this one's pure motion," Trudeau says. "And look at this detail; look at the bugs." It was a single-panel Sunday strip of the Pogo characters poling a raft through their swamp. Even the tiniest characters -- insects a few millimeters high -- had expressive faces.

Eventually, I did find some Doonesiana displayed in Trudeau's studio. There were nine framed covers of major magazines -- Time, Newsweek, Rolling Stone, Mother Jones, etc., spanning 30 years, all either drawn by Trudeau or about him. And yes, Trudeau's got 'em right up there, framed, on a wall, plain as day, inside a closet where he stores pushpins and computer paper.

ON THE MORNING OF April 19, 2004, newspaper readers were served something startling with their morning coffee. The first panel of "Doonesbury" was completely black, except for the word "Hey." Then, framed by the smoke of war, a soldier's face. It's Ray Hightower, B.D.'s buddy. He's sweating, looking scared. He calls for a medic. Then, black again, as though someone is drifting in and out of consciousness. The gut-punch line comes at the end, with a shouted name. "B.D.?"

DOJ_NMG_0084487

And here is the image people saw two days later:

It was shocking for obvious reasons, but in another way, as well: B.D. had never been seen without his helmet. It was as if Trudeau was declaring that something fundamentally and forever had changed.

Ask creative people where they get their ideas, and they will roll their eyes. It's the most common question, but it's also a bad one because the answer is inevitably disappointing. From the inside, creativity seems like an arduous task, often involving plebeian, imperfect choices, driven less by inspiration than by deadline. And Trudeau is a deadline junkie, always pushing it to the limit. ("Once a week," he says, "I am a very desperate man.")

So when you ask him why he decided to take B.D.'s leg, the answer isn't very satisfying. Trudeau doesn't regard his characters in romanticized terms, or even as people; "Doonesbury" has always been more about ideas than personalities, so Trudeau thinks of Mike and B.D. and Zonker and Joanie as puppets. He pulls the appropriate ones out of the closet when he has a point he wants to make. In this case, he says, he wanted to make a statement about the suffering in this war.

Originally, he was going to kill Ray, but Ray got spared when Trudeau decided that a death would not leave much of a storyline to pursue. So, with a bit of sang-froid, he amputated B.D.'s left leg, on the theory that he'd . . . think of something.

What happened next was unusual, to say the least. Within a day or two of B.D. lying broken on that stretcher, Garry Trudeau, bane of every presidential administration since Nixon's (particularly the current one, which he has absolutely lacerated), got a call from the Pentagon. The brass was offering to help him figure out where to go next.

THE TYPICAL DAILY NEWSPAPER COMIC STRIP HAS A DEGENERATIVE ARC. The cartoonist's best years come early, when the ideas are fresh, the gimmick is still a novelty and the grind of daily deadlines has not yet taken its toll on creativity. Three years of excellence is a pretty good run before the inevitable decline, as the cartoonist runs out of new things to say and becomes content to imitate himself. It's easy to forget, but many of today's formulaic, intellectually listless strips, such as "B.C.," "Cathy" and "Dennis the Menace," were once lively and daring and different. They're still around because their bland familiarity becomes a sort of comfort food, and newspaper editors are loath to drop them.

"Having a successful daily comic strip," Trudeau says wryly, "is the closest thing to tenure that popular culture offers. But it doesn't seem to have freed up creativity any more than tenure for professors has. It's been an open invitation for complacency."

"Doonesbury" has never become complacent, partly because Trudeau is no ordinary creative talent but also because the strip feeds continually off the culture it lampoons. Trudeau is very much a reporter -- what Newsweek's Jonathan Alter once called "an investigative cartoonist." When two of his principal characters were homeless, Trudeau spent time working in shelters. When "Doonesbury" accompanied President Ford to China, so did Trudeau. When B.D. served in the Persian Gulf War, Trudeau briefly went to Kuwait. So when the new invitation came from the Pentagon -- essentially, carte blanche to visit injured vets -- the investigative cartoonist leapt at it, not sure what he would find.

The very first person he spoke to was a 27-year-old MP named Danielle Green. She had been a college basketball star, a left-handed point guard at Notre Dame. Green had just lost that hand in Iraq. She'd been on the roof of a police station, behind sandbags, trying to defend it from enemy fire, when she took a direct hit from a rocket-propelled grenade.

"This was an elite athlete, and she'd lost her whole professional identity," Trudeau said, "but that's not what she wanted to talk about. What she wanted to talk about was how her buddies carried her down, put her on the hood of a Humvee, where they stopped the bleeding, then went back up to the roof, against orders, and found her hand buried under sandbags. They took off her wedding ring and gave it to her. She's telling me this with a million-dollar smile. This was not about bitterness or loss. It was about gratitude."

And so Trudeau started taking notes.

"DOONESBURY" HAS DEALT WITH EMOTIONAL SUBJECTS BEFORE, most notably when gay lawyer Andy Lippincott died of AIDS in 1989, wisecracking to the end. Trudeau was never entirely satisfied with that sequence, because Andy was two-dimensional -- literally and figuratively. He became a bravely noble funny man dying with bravely noble humor. "Andy handled it with more grace and humility than any human would," Trudeau says. The problem was, Trudeau hadn't known people with AIDS.

DOJ_NMG_0084488

The access he has had to injured vets has given him a sure-handedness he didn't have then; the B.D. storyline has shown extraordinary emotional complexity.

At a VA program for post-traumatic stress disorder in Menlo Park, Calif., Trudeau was allowed to sit in on the treatment of a 40-year-old military truck driver who had been delivering a weapons system to Baghdad airport when his convoy came under fire. He to flee through a crowd -- just as Trudeau would later have B.D. do.

"The guy was back home, living with his parents, isolated with his TV, his PC and his alcohol," Trudeau says, consulting his notes. "He hated public places and would only go shopping at night at 24-hour stores, when no one was around. He told us he was late for a job interview, but he had an hour, and it wasn't an hour away. It turned out he had to go by back roads, because he would not drive under an overpass. Overpasses freaked him out." Overpasses could give snipers cover.

"He was a computer expert, but he decided to take a $10-an-hour job over a $25-an-hour job," Trudeau said, "because he wanted to work at a nursery, with plants. It was only when he talked about working with plants that his face softened."

HE'S GARRY, NOT GARY, BECAUSE HIS GIVEN NAME IS GARRETSON. Trudeau is a blueblood, albeit one of a strange sort. The boring summary is that he's the end-of-the-line son of four generations of physicians. But to leave it there would be a grave disservice to the narrative arts.

Trudeau's great-great- grandfather, James de Berty Trudeau, was a friend of John James Audubon, for whom he shot birds. He lived in the wilds with the Osage Indians in the Louisiana territories. Oh, and he was a medical doctor in 19th-century New York City who ran afoul of his peers over his hobby of sculpting amusing figurines of the most dignified medical men of his era. To this they did not take kindly, drumming him out of polite society and down to New Orleans.

During the Civil War, he was made a brigadier general in the Confederate Army, apparently more for his status as a gentleman than for his military prowess. In short order, he assisted in the mismanagement of not one but two enormous Confederate defeats -- Shiloh, which was the turning point of the war, and the battle of Island No. 10, which left the Mississippi undefended clear to Vicksburg. Who knows how many more miserable, crushing losses he would have helped midwife, had he not been captured, held under house arrest and released to continue his medical practice?

Meanwhile, the general's wife had left him and headed for Paris, where their son -- Trudeau's great-grandfather, a lad of just 10 or so -- distinguished himself by whapping the Confederate ambassador in the back with a pellet from a slingshot. ("Actually, I see a lot of myself in him," Trudeau laughs.)

Tuberculosis ravaged the family, which brought the next generations of Trudeau doctors to the fresh air of Saranac Lake, N.Y., in the Adirondacks, where they set up the nation's first TB research sanitorium. Garry's father, Francis Trudeau, was the town's family physician, a man with grave responsibilities and appropriately sober mien. He once informed his son: "Life is not something to be enjoyed, so just get on with it," a statement so splendid and outrageous it would eventually find its way into "Doonesbury."

Francis Trudeau was dignified and reserved, and a father figure to an entire city. "I would hear him leave the house at 4 a.m., sometimes in snowshoes. I knew even then that the sense of mission was too big for me to take on."

Eleven years ago, Francis called his son into his den, handed him a medical book and asked him to read an entry on a relatively rare illness called amyloidosis. "Now," Francis said, "as you can see from the prognosis at the bottom of the page . . ." That is the way Garry learned his father was dying.

We're sitting on the roof deck of Trudeau's studio, talking about the cartoonist's famous aversion to publicity. The conversation goes right to his father.

"Late in his career, he was sued by a patient. He didn't share it with me for three years. It was nothing, just a nuisance suit that was thrown out, but it shattered him to have his integrity challenged in a public forum. I grew up in a household where reputation was placed above all else."

So?

"So it helped me when fame was introduced into the mix."

There's a difference between reputation and image, Trudeau explains. "These get confused in people's minds," he says, but one involves character, the other public relations.

DOJ_NMG_0084489

"I just refused to get entangled by issues of image maintenance that fame implied. I made a deliberate retreat from a publicly visible life."

What resulted was an unusual guy with a wall between his public and private selves, a guy who is intellectually fearless but so personally unassuming, Jane Pauley says, "that's he's afraid to return a shirt that's the wrong size."

"Inside Garry, there's a little boy and a man," Pauley says. "And the little boy is secretive and vulnerable, and the man isn't. It would hurt him if I made a joke at his expense, but if the president of the United States says something negative about him, he puts it on the cover of his book."

"SUFFICE IT TO SAY THAT I HOLD HIM IN UTTER CONTEMPT."

This is John McCain, the former prisoner of war, speaking about Trudeau on the floor of the U.S. Senate in 1995. He was angered by a "Doonesbury" strip suggesting that presidential candidate Bob Dole was exploiting his war injury for political gain. That was then. This past year, it was McCain who wrote the introduction to Trudeau's The Long Road Home , a for-charity book compiling the strips about B.D.'s injury and recovery.

A curious thing has happened to Trudeau's image as a result of the B.D. subplot -- nothing the cartoonist could have predicted. The predictable, in fact, happened almost immediately: Calling Trudeau a "committed leftist," Fox News Channel host Bill O'Reilly wrote in an online column that "a case can be made that Trudeau is attempting to sap the morale of Americans vis-à-vis Iraq by using a long-running, somewhat beloved cartoon character to create pathos."

O'Reilly doesn't talk about Trudeau anymore. He can't, really.

We're in Tucson, at the National Leadership Conference of the Vietnam Veterans of America, where Trudeau is about to take the stage to receive the group's award for excellence in the arts. These are fifty- and sixtysomething guys, many with ponytails, tattoos, ample guts and an attitude. They weren't treated right; they want better for new vets, returning home scarred.

This is a potentially tricky audience for Trudeau's acceptance speech. As they've aged, their politics have moved rightward, and many of them have a lingering distaste for antiwar talk, particularly from people they might consider draft dodgers. (Back in 1970, Trudeau pulled a disastrously low draft-lottery number -- 27, which he later bestowed on his slacker surfer-dude character, Zonker, in the strip. Trudeau wound up getting a medical deferment because of old stomach ulcers that hadn't given him trouble for years, and haven't since. His dad the doctor suggested he try that.)

As apolitical as the B.D. story is, elsewhere in the strip Trudeau regularly unleashes his disgust for the Iraq war and the man who is waging it. Trudeau's time at Yale overlapped with George W. Bush's -- he knew him slightly and disliked him even then, largely for what he saw as a sense of smug entitlement ("all noblesse and no oblige.") In the strip, often on Sundays, with maximum readership, Trudeau just kills Bush. One Sunday this year, Michael Doonesbury and his old friend Bernie were discussing the Iraq war and wondering whether it keeps the president awake at night because of its enormous, heartbreaking human toll. In the final panel, Trudeau cuts to a signature exterior nighttime view of the White House. From inside come two dialogue balloons: "What's wrong, dear?" And: "It's the stem cells. I hear their cries."

So is Trudeau going to play it safe in this speech and stay away from politics? I'm apparently not the only one wondering. The instant the cartoonist rises to take the mike, a large American flag behind him suddenly and inexplicably crashes to the ground. From a group of organizers near me comes a whisper, "Oh [expletive], not a good sign."

The speech starts benignly, praising the courage of the soldiers he had met, but here's how Trudeau wraps it up:

"When I talk to wounded veterans, I usually don't ask them what they think the mission was. I don't presume, because their lives are wrenching enough without the suggestion that their sacrifices may have been without meaning. Moreover, if that is so, it will become apparent to them soon enough . . . The young men and women who we've repeatedly put in harm's way are paying the price for this misbegotten mission, and as long as it continues, I, like so many of our countrymen, must walk this strange line between hating the war but honoring the warrior. I don't know how long we can keep it up. . ."

He finishes to a standing ovation.

If there had been any lingering antipathy to Trudeau in this crowd, the story of B.D. appears to have wiped it out. It's as though he's been in the jungle with these guys.

DOJ_NMG_0084490

IT IS A BALMY 90 DEGREES AT NIGHT IN TUCSON. In a patio outside the convention hotel, Vietnam veterans are slow-dancing with their wives, in a mournful shuffle, to a live band's version of "A Whiter Shade of Pale."

"She said, There is no reason, and the truth is plain to see . . ."

If there is one thing this convention has made plain, it's that plenty of Vietnam vets still live with the madness of that war, still suffer from PTSD. You can hear it in their stories, read it in their eyes. It won't be different in this war. B.D.'s story is fiction, but it is true.

Inside at the bar, Trudeau and I have taken shelter from the heat. We're discussing whether he believes in God ("Why should I? Is there anything in the last five years in particular that suggests to you a divine purpose to life?") and whether he thinks Bush is evil or just stupid. ("I think he is smart but willfully ignorant, and he uses his ignorance for strategic advantage, which is appalling. He substitutes belief for thought. It protects you from self-doubt.") The only fact marring the sepulchral seriousness of this conversation is that it is occurring as we sit side by side on full-size Western saddles, mounted on poles, facing the bar. There's an enthusiastic cowboy theme here.

You can take only so much of that, so we grab our drinks, dismount and mosey on over to a table.

Trudeau claims that he never thinks about "Doonesbury" unless he is actually drawing it; it may be true, but it's misleading. He's a born listener, and, in a sense, he is always thinking about "Doonesbury" and filing things away.

At the table is a filmmaker named Chuck Lacy, who just produced a documentary called "The War Tapes," which followed three National Guardsmen to Iraq and back home. Lacy is saying there is something about this war unlike any other in history. The Internet has made it possible for soldiers to be in country, in a theater of war, but still communicate daily with their families, in real time, sometimes with video.

Is that good or bad? Trudeau asks.

Both, says Lacy: The soldiers say it's their lifeline, but it's also a terrible drain on their emotions; they're dealing not only with their own anxieties but also with the anxieties of their families 6,000 miles away. It can be surreal. They'll come back from a firefight and then try to resolve a mortgage problem.

A few weeks after returning from Tucson, I opened the newspaper to "Doonesbury" and saw this.

It was Day One of what would be a very funny, oddly disturbing week of the strip, in which Ray tries to stay alive while placating his wife and stepson back at the home front. I immediately e-mailed Trudeau. Until I told him, he said, he hadn't remembered exactly where the idea came from.

"CLINTON MADE A MISTAKE in letting 'Don't ask, don't tell' be the defining issue of his first month in office, to be followed by the health-care disaster. He should have gone directly to welfare reform. It was intellectually dishonest to say the existing system was working. If welfare had been his biggest priority . . ."

We are on the plane heading back to New York , and Trudeau is in his geek-drone mode. He is a highly opinionated public policy wonk, and this sort of thing just happens from time to time. When he reads a book, he edits in the margins, correcting errors of grammar, syntax or cloudy thinking.

Bingo. Trudeau's a nerd! It's no big deal, but I'll take it. Negative assessments are important when you write profiles, but with this guy they've been hard to come by. He's generous with his time, gracious to everyone and shrewd with me. I tried to bait him, asking where a dillweed like him gets off having the nerve to date Candice Bergen (he did, way back when) and then marry America's Sweetheart? I was hoping for an unattractive defense of his virility, but Trudeau wouldn't bite.

Finally, in desperation, I decided to get help from America's greatest living satirist. What would Trudeau ridicule, if the subject were himself?

Basically, he says, though not in so many words -- he's a bully.

"Occasionally, people accuse me of courage," he says. "And that's wrong. I'm sitting on a perch of safety. Cartoonists have a tar-baby immunity. The more people react to us, and the more angrily they react, the better it is for us. So we're invulnerable. It just doesn't seem fair."

The first George Bush learned that the hard way. When "Doonesbury" accused him of having "put his manhood in a blind trust" after becoming vice president and changing his politics to match Reagan's, Bush repeatedly lashed out at the cartoonist -- at least five times between 1984 and 1988. ("Garry Trudeau is coming out of deep left field. The American people are going to be speaking out, and we are going to see whether they side with 'Doonesbury' or the Reagan-Bush message." "He speaks for a bunch of brie-tasting, Chardonnay-sipping elitists.") This blowback further elevated Trudeau's stature and made Bush seem like a petulant, humorless old fud.

DOJ_NMG_0084491

As the plane begins its descent to LaGuardia, Trudeau remembers something interesting, something from his teens, when he had a summer job working at Time magazine.

"As I was walking out the building one day on my lunch break, two-thirds of a block away this spectacularly beautiful young woman in a very short miniskirt was walking toward me . . ."

Not sure where this is going, but I'm taking notes as fast as I can.

"She was in her early twenties. I was 16 and looked all of 12. You could feel it in the air, her coming at you. Her presence was destabilizing the street for a one-block radius. Guys were gawking, cars were slowing. This woman was a menace. She was walking in a confident way, with a swing to her hips. I was geeky and shy, too shy to make eye contact. I wouldn't even have known what to DO with eye contact. My discomfort must have been obvious because, as she passes me, she leans over, her breath is warm, and she softly . . . growls in my ear."

Wow.

"I thought to myself: I've just been handed the most extraordinary gift. She showed such wisdom, with such a generous use of power. She just changed the life of a young boy. I thought , Anything is possible."

Trudeau sits back in his seat, smiles. "So I guess you could connect the dots to Jane, actually."

Or you could extrapolate it to the entirety of his life, the whole improbable arc of it, the combination of a fundamental humility and humanity empowered by an otherwise inexplicable, blazing self-confidence. You could find, in one moment from a man's teens, the entire key to who he is and the unlikely, monumental achievement of his professional life.

I vocalize some of this. Trudeau just looks at me.

Okay, we'll just stick with connecting the dots to Jane.

TRUDEAU IS A YANKEES FAN, so we're catching a Sunday afternoon game at Yankee Stadium against the White Sox. Some people's lives just seem to be charmed, and so it's not surprising that this afternoon turns out to be historic -- Yankees great Mariano Rivera comes in with a 6-4 lead and closes out the last two innings for the 400th save of his career.

At one point, Trudeau's attentions turn to the ballpark itself -- specifically, the facing of the mezzanine deck, a long, narrow strip that, as in many modern stadiums, is used as an electronic crowd-hooching display board. "The dimensions are about 1 to 20," Trudeau says, "but see how much they get out of it, how much they say with just a suggestion? That's great use of design."

Trudeau's got a master's degree in graphic design. It was his first career choice until "Doonesbury" -- a success right from his college newspaper days -- made everything else moot. Design remains, to this day, the thing Trudeau longs to be doing. In all the time we'd spent together, the only artwork of his that he'd shown me with any particular pride were "Doonesbury"-themed coasters, cups, T-shirts and figurines that he had designed for free. They wound up raising $1 million for a Starbucks-sponsored reading charity. It was a subtle piece of work, marrying the Starbucks corporate logos and design with the Doonesbury characters.

"I had more flow as a designer," Trudeau explains. "I could just drop down into the zone and stay there for hours. With cartooning, I'm constantly coming up for air, procrastinating, looking for reasons not to be doing it. I spend all day granting myself special dispensation, with 'creative process' as my cover story. Carpenters and deli countermen can't do that, so I think they may feel better about themselves at the end of the day."

Midway through the game, Trudeau's younger son shows up. Tommy, 20, a student at Brown, has a summer job in the Yankees' front office. He gets to fraternize with the players and play pickup softball games with co-workers in the outfield, from which he's hit balls into the upper deck. Not bad, for a summer job.

Pauley and Trudeau's two other children, twins Ross and Rickie, are both 22. Ross graduated from Brown and is heading off on a teaching career; his sister, a Yalie, wants to be a pop singer, which worries Trudeau more than a little.

DOJ_NMG_0084492

He played me an audio file of Rickie singing Alicia Keys's "I Ain't Got You." Kid's definitely got the voice. It's all personality. Trudeau knows this but also knows the odds against success in that business. "I want her to follow her passion," he says, "but I just hope she's sturdy enough."

It's an interesting worry for a guy who could easily have been a doctor in a long-established family practice, but chose cartooning despite certain initial practical obstacles, such as a basic inability to draw. Being a father inspires a completely different risk-aversion calculus.

As we leave the stadium, the three of us are joined at the subway by Ross, who was sitting elsewhere with friends. The camaraderie between father and sons is effortless and unencumbered. The whole family thing seems almost comic-strippy perfect, like Dagwood and Blondie and Cookie and Alexander. Only this is real family, not to mention a "Doonesbury" family, so you know you're going to have some complexity, somewhere.

AT 55, JANE PAULEY IS STILL BEAUTIFUL, and she still projects frank vulnerability, or vulnerable frankness, or whatever is that subtle combination of qualities that made her America's preeminent morning-show host in the 1980s. We're meeting for breakfast because there is something Trudeau wouldn't really talk about, and Pauley will.

In 2001, Pauley nearly lost her mind. After receiving steroids to control a case of the hives, she began doing oddly intense things. How intense? She bought a house one day, for no good reason, on impulse, from an ad on the Web. Misdiagnosed with depression, she was hospitalized under an assumed name, to protect her privacy. Eventually, she was found to have a bipolar disorder -- triggered but not caused by the steroids -- for which she is still undergoing treatment. Pauley chronicled her struggle in a 2004 memoir, Skywriting .

Trudeau was largely absent from Skywriting , and he had been guarded with me about the effect of Pauley's illness on him and the family. He volunteered only two things: "I was told by a doctor that 40 percent of marriages just don't survive it, so from the beginning I knew we were up against something really significant"; and, "The disease subverts your basic survival instinct in the sense that the people who you need to help you survive are the same people you are attacking."

So that's what I ask Pauley about.

"Yes," she says, dryly, "there is a free-floating anger that needs a target and will find one."

For a year or so, Pauley says, before her symptoms were under control, Trudeau and the family lived with her irrational rages. The twins were hunting for colleges, Trudeau was pressed by deadline after deadline, and Mom was a fulminating piece of work -- demanding, histrionic, impossible. "It was just incredible torment for them," Pauley says. "Garry was keeping the house together. It has to have been the most painful part of his life."

Pauley has recovered with the help of lithium, a drug she says she will be on for the rest of her life. Things are mostly fine, she says, except for some side effects, such as a persistent tremor to the hands. She looks murderously at her coffee cup, which the waiter has overfilled, almost to the brim.

"For example, I can't risk trying to pick that up."

Pauley thinks the story of B.D. has been something special, the best work Trudeau has ever done. And then she says:

"I don't think he's consciously aware that it has anything to do with me."

With . . . her?

Pauley smiles. "Garry's mind is very compartmentalized. The department doing the strip in his brain is not directly connected to the husband part, but . . ."

Pauley takes a forkful of scrambled eggs.

". . . it defies credulity that on some level it is not present in his work. What is he writing about, really? He's writing about mental illness, and how it's possible to find a way out of it, with help. It's very hopeful."

I start to say that Trudeau has never made that connection to me, in fact denies that his private life ever intrudes into the strip. But Pauley is ahead of me.

"He'll want to say no, but it's hard to argue with. Isn't it?"

DOJ_NMG_0084493

TRUDEAU'S GREATEST WORK is coming at a time when "Doonesbury" is fading a bit from the national consciousness. He's still in 600 newspapers, but that number has been higher; there simply aren't as many newspapers as there once were, and their readership is dwindling. Young adults who know "Doonesbury" today are mostly picking it up haphazardly from the Web. The "Doonesbury" compilation books are not selling the way they used to.

Trudeau is considering experimenting with sophisticated animation, for "Doonesbury" online. He's just finished a screenplay, a comedy about a teenager who is elected mayor of a small town. His newest "Doonesbury" compilation -- The War Within , about B.D. dealing with his mental health issues -- has just hit the bookstores, and a second compilation, Heckuva Job, Bushie , is due out this month.

Since I last saw him, the investigative cartoonist traveled to New Orleans to see the hurricane desolation firsthand. This past September 11, as politicians on both sides sought political traction in a battle of coordinated outrage and strategic shows of grief, the meatheads took in pro wrestling at Madison Square Garden. (In the main event, Vince McMahon defeated Triple H with the help of a folding chair.)

And week after week in the newspapers, the quite remarkable story of B.D. continues. Check out this one.

Let's see what's going on here. B.D. appears to be considering cheating on Boopsie, which hasn't happened to our knowledge in 20-plus years of an eccentric but strong marriage. It's surprising, but maybe not that surprising. From the swiftness and specificity of Celeste's reaction, it's clear that she -- the secretary at the vets' clinic -- has seen this sort of behavior before. Can it be that many vets who've lost a limb might well be tempted to assert their manhood in unwise ways? But see how nimbly Celeste deals with it, in what one might call a generous use of power? She redirects B.D.'s attention to what's really important, reproaching him for hitting on her, but in a way that leaves his vulnerable dignity intact.

There are many types of therapy, and it's not all dispensed by licensed professionals.

Four panels. Forty-eight words. Funny, too.

Meanwhile, the same day, in "Blondie," Dagwood and Herb go fishing, but Dagwood is so hungry he eats the bait!

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Burden Of Enron's Collapse On Skilling (AP)

By JUAN A. LOZANO, The Associated Press

AP, October 22, 2006

HOUSTON - Ken Lay's death wiped away his convictions. Andrew Fastow got a reduced six-year sentence. That leaves former CEO Jeffrey Skilling as the sole top Enron Corp. executive who could be given at least 20 years in prison when he is sentenced Monday for helping orchestrate the biggest corporate scandal in U.S. history.

In addition to the legal consequences of his actions, the burden of lost jobs, worthless pension plans and ruined lives that resulted from Enron's 2001 collapse has now shifted solely onto Skilling's shoulders.

Lay's death and the lighter than expected sentence handed last month to Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, will work against Skilling when he faces sentencing, former federal prosecutor Robert Mintz said.

Skilling was convicted in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors. Lay, Enron's founder, was convicted of 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks in two separate cases. His death in July vacated those convictions.

Both men repeatedly lied about Enron's financial health when they knew an illusion of success was propped up by accounting maneuvers that hid debt and inflated profits.

"In theory, the death of Ken Lay should have no impact on the sentence that Mr. Skilling receives. But it's hard to ignore the reality that Jeff Skilling is now standing alone as the figurehead who orchestrated Enron's demise," Mintz said. "There will certainly be pressure to make an example of Jeff Skilling and send a message with his sentence."

Skilling has had two brushes with the law since his indictment on Enron charges. Last month, Skilling pleaded no contest and paid a fine to settle his arrest in Dallas for public intoxication. In April 2004, he was involved in a scuffle with patrons of a cigar bar in New York City. He wasn't arrested, but he and his wife, Rebecca, who was hurt in the incident, were taken to a hospital where a blood test showed Skilling's blood-alcohol level to be 0.19.

DOJ_NMG_0084494

Under federal sentencing guidelines, which U.S. District Judge Sim Lake has said he will rely on, Skilling faces more than 20 years in prison if investor loss tied to his actions exceeds $80 million. Skilling also faces more than $18 million in fines for his crimes.

Prosecutors and Skilling's attorneys have agreed on an investor loss figure, but it is in sealed court documents and none of the lawyers would discuss it.

"The government and we have agreed on a loss number to avoid a protracted hearing on the subject," Skilling's attorney Daniel Petrocelli said. "Any sentence is a meaningful sentence. I don't want to talk about or speculate on the length of it."

Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor in Washington and an expert on federal sentencing guidelines, said Skilling will probably get more than 20 years in prison but an exact figure is hard to determine without knowing the final calculation of investor loss.

Charles Prestwood, a former pipeline operator for Enron who lost $1.3 million in retirement savings with Enron's bankruptcy, said if it was up to him, Skilling would get 100 years in prison.

"I think about all the families that man helped destroy and all the hard working people that believed the top executives," he said. "He knows he broke the law. He knows he's done us wrong. I'll always believe until I go to my grave that man knew exactly what he was doing."

Prestwood said he is not surprised Skilling, who professed his innocence before and after his trial, has asked that his convictions be dismissed.

"He'll go down to the wire trying to say he is innocent," he said.

The 68-year-old Prestwood, who has heart problems, said he's been saving his strength to speak at Skilling's sentencing.

Lake is allowing Enron's victims to speak about how the company's financial implosion hurt them. Ten to 12 people who signed up in advance are expected to speak at the sentencing, as well as some who will talk on Skilling's behalf. A list of speakers was not available.

The collapse wiped out thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in market value and more than $2 billion in pension plans.

Rod Jordan, chairman of the Severed Enron Employee Coalition, said it is easier for ex-workers to focus their anger and frustration on Skilling now that Lay is gone. Many, he said, always believed Skilling was guilty while they had doubts about Lay.

"It was more due to their personalities," he said. "Lay was more of a people oriented person. Skilling was more behind the scenes. He came across as more arrogant and self centered and not the cheery, 'hi-how-are-you' kind of guy that Lay was."

Lake has allowed attorneys representing ex-Enron workers who took part in the company's savings plan and its employee stock ownership plan to speak on their request for restitution from Skilling.

Robin Harrison, one of the attorneys representing about 20,000 such people, put his clients' losses at an estimated $1.3 billion.

Petrocelli said Enron's former workers will probably talk about their losses, but that shouldn't affect the sentence Skilling gets.

"While that is undoubtedly true, it doesn't assist in the determination of Mr. Skilling's sentence, at least in our view," he said. "Mr. Skilling is not criminally responsible for the demise of Enron."

Prosecutors want Skilling to turn over nearly $183 million, which they allege he pocketed while participating in fraud. The U.S. government had divided that amount between Skilling and Lay. But Lay's death has left that amount solely on Skilling.

The government contends about $60 million in Skilling's cash and property that has been frozen since his indictment could be applied to the total amount they are seeking.

Petrocelli has said Skilling owes his legal defense team more than $30 million beyond the $23 million that the Justice Department allowed Skilling to set aside for legal fees before it froze his assets.

Brian Durbin, a small-time Enron investor who spoke at Fastow's sentencing last month, encouraged people affected by Enron's collapse to attend Skilling's sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0084495

"It might help them get a little bit of closure and help the rest of the country see there was a human face to this," he said. "Greed drove the actions of a few to make really bad decisions. What they did had such a wide reaching impact for so many people."

Pressure In The Boardroom (MINNST)

By David Phelps, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 22, 2006

Richard Burke faces the difficult task of rebuilding UnitedHealth's reputation and righting a board perceived as having strayed from its oversight role.

To fix a board gone bad, UnitedHealth Group Inc. turned to the guy who started the company's big push for profits 30 years ago.

Richard Burke, the new chairman of UnitedHealth Group, has a long history in Minnesota health care. In the 1980s, Burke ran a small company, then called UnitedHealthcare, that managed one of Minnesota's first HMOs, Physicians Health Plan (PHP). PHP eventually became Medica while UnitedHealth grew under William McGuire into the country's second-biggest health insurer.

Now, after McGuire's ouster a week ago in a stock-option scandal, Burke, 62, is presiding over a company with a badly wounded reputation and a board whose future is in doubt.

More than a dozen shareholder lawsuits await the company in federal court. The Internal Revenue Service, Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and the Minnesota attorney general's office are sifting through corporate documents looking for legal violations.

"This is a board scrambling to catch up on something they let get out of control," said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services, an influentional research firm that advises large shareholders on merger proposals and corporate governance matters. "They allowed so much to happen on their watch."I'd be surprised if in three years any of those board members are still around," he said.

Fred Zimmerman, a recently retired professor of manufacturing at the University of St. Thomas who also has served on the board of directors at 14 corporations, described the board as woefully weak in its response to the options scandal.

"The entire compensation committee should have stepped down, also some of the lead directors," Zimmerman said.

Backdating for profit

To some, Burke was a visionary who opened the closed walls of traditional HMOs and gave patients a greater choice of care. But to the doctors who worked for PHP, Burke was too profit-oriented, an assertion that still lingers with UnitedHealth.

"He was years ahead of the rest of the world," said Doug Leatherdale, retired CEO of the St. Paul Companies Inc. and a board member of UnitedHealth since its beginning.

"He's a very smart guy who really innovated a lot in the industry," said Minneapolis attorney Tim Thornton, who represented PHP in the mid-1980s.

Burke returned to the chairmanship of UnitedHealth Group last week, the result of the Sunday-night reshuffle that cost McGuire his role as chairman and CEO of the Minnetonka-based health care giant.

The company's general counsel, David Lubben, and 15-year board member William Spears also were gone when the dust settled from a stock-option backdating scandal that had been percolating since March.

A report conducted at the board's request by the Washington law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr questioned the propriety of a 1999 employment agreement with McGuire and concluded that options "were likely backdated," to allow top executives to maximize their profits when they exercised those options.

The report also raised red flags about the private business relationship between McGuire and Spears, who was head of the board's compensation committee when the employment contract was negotiated. McGuire gave Spears personal amounts ranging from $15 million to $55 million to manage professionally and also invested in Spears' financial management company.

DOJ_NMG_0084496

In addition to the personnel changes, the company pledged to strengthen internal management and accounting procedures, create a new executive position of chief legal officer and replace five board seats with new independent directors in the next three years.

McGurn called the board's actions "a day late and a lot of dollars short."

Business as usual?

On Thursday, Burke, as a nonexecutive chairman, took the unusual step of participating in the company's conference call with Wall Street analysts to discuss third-quarter financial results. Burke's presence showed the board's support for Stephen Hemsley, the new CEO.

"Steve is a very easy drill on contracts that involve him," Burke joked with the analysts. "It'll be very easy to take advantage of him."

Burke also went out of his way to minimize industry rumors that Executive Vice President Richard Anderson was the board's first choice for CEO. "There was nobody else considered," Burke said.

Stephen Parente, an associate professor at the University of Minnesota's Carlson School of Management who studies the managed care industry, said Burke is a vote for continuity, because he's been there since the company's inception in 1977.

"In some respects, this is a guy who can bookend McGuire's beginning and end," Parente said. "This move is perceived as the board saying, 'We want to bring in someone with no strikes against them and someone who has a solid history of the place.' "

Burke, who grew up in Georgia and North Carolina, started UnitedHealthcare in the mid-1970s and built it into one of the largest HMO managers in the country. But there were dark days in the 1980s as managed care struggled to gain favor in the medical community.

"For the first few years we were not on the strongest financial footing," Leatherdale recalled. "But we survived."

Burke left daily management in 1988 as it began its financial recovery. McGuire assumed Burke's leadership role, becoming president in 1989 and chairman and CEO in 1991.

Burke dabbled in professional sports in the mid-1990s, buying the National Hockey League's Winnipeg Jets, which became the Phoenix Coyotes after an unsuccessful attempt to bring them to Minnesota. He sold his interest in 2000.

But he didn't step down from the UnitedHealth board. Among executives and other board members, Burke is the third-largest shareholder behind McGuire and Hemsley.

To most analysts and outside observers, UnitedHealth remains fundamentally sound.

"This is no Enron," McGurn said. "There is real value in UnitedHealth. This [management] team created that value. They just got greedy."

David Phelps • 612-673-7269 • dphelps@startribune.com

S.E.C. Inquiry On Hedge Fund Draws Scrutiny (NYT)

By Walt Bogdanich And Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

By the evening of June 20, 2005, the government's investigation of possible insider trading by Pequot Capital Management, a prominent hedge fund, had reached a critical stage.

Throughout the day, Robert Hanson, a branch chief in the Washington office of the Securities and Exchange Commission, had been questioning his lead investigator in the case about taking the testimony of John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive.

The investigator, Gary J. Aguirre, was trying to find out if Mr. Mack had obtained inside information about a merger and passed it to his friend, Pequot's founder, Arthur J. Samberg.

Finally at 8:25 p.m., Mr. Hanson sent Mr. Aguirre a message from his BlackBerry expressing enthusiasm about the inquiry. "Okay Gary you've given me the bug," he wrote, according to confidential S.E.C. documents. "I'm starting to think about the case during my non work hours."

But three days later, the investigation abruptly changed course. Mr. Aguirre later told a Senate committee that after news broke that Mr. Mack was being considered to run Morgan Stanley, his supervisor said he could not interview the executive because of his political power. Mr. Aguirre protested and was eventually fired in September 2005, just days after receiving a two-step merit pay increase.

DOJ_NMG_0084497

Mr. Mack and Mr. Samberg have both repeatedly denied any improper conduct. Earlier this month, the S.E.C. informed them that it would not bring any charges.

Now, it is the S.E.C. that is under scrutiny. Two Senate committees — Finance and Judiciary — are investigating how diligently the S.E.C. pursued its Pequot inquiry, whether Mr. Aguirre's firing was an attempt to silence him, and whether senior S.E.C. officials gave special treatment to Mr. Mack by not taking his testimony when Mr. Aguirre wanted to. Mr. Mack, a major fund-raiser for President Bush's 2004 campaign, was eventually interviewed last August, after Congress began asking questions.

The congressional inquiry centers on dozens of pages of internal S.E.C. documents that Mr. Aguirre turned over to Congress and were obtained by The New York Times. The documents, including e-mail messages from Mr. Samberg and his associates, as well as contemporaneous e-mails from investigators, provide the first inside look at the case, and shed light on why the two Senate panels are interested in the matter.

The primary focus of the congressional inquiry is the S.E.C.'s investigation into Pequot's purchase of stock in Heller Financial, a financial services firm, and the dispute over taking Mr. Mack's testimony. The documents say that Pequot became the nation's biggest purchaser of Heller stock in the four weeks before the company was acquired by GE Capital in July 2001. Mr. Samberg bet $44 million on Heller and wanted to invest even more, according to the documents, but his trader could not fill all the orders.

The file shows that after Mr. Aguirre was blocked from questioning Mr. Mack about the Heller deal, Mr. Hanson, the S.E.C. branch chief, acknowledged in e-mail messages that he had discussed Mr. Mack's "political clout" and the "juice" of his lawyers with officials at the commission.

In an exchange of e-mails in the summer of 2005, Mr. Hanson said that he had merely been trying to "alert folks above me," and that politics did not influence S.E.C. decisions. Mr. Aguirre replied: "Bob, this is spin. You told me it would be tough to take Mack's testimony because he has political clout."

In the documents, S.E.C. officials argued that Mr. Aguirre was not justified in taking Mr. Mack's testimony because he could not show that Mr. Mack had inside information or a clear motive for giving it to Mr. Samberg. But Mr. Aguirre said he was only asking for permission to interview Mr. Mack, not bring charges.

The file portrays the S.E.C. as a place where stock exchange referrals of suspected insider trading can languish for years without serious investigation.

In the Pequot case, senators are examining how the S.E.C. handled a total of 18 referrals. In addition to the Heller deal, they include an investigation involving federal prosecutors into whether the hedge fund bought Microsoft options based on inside information. E-mails show that Mr. Samberg solicited information about the software company's financial performance from a Microsoft manager he was recruiting shortly before Pequot invested in the company.

"I shouldn't say this, but you have probably paid for yourself already!" Mr. Samberg wrote to the former Microsoft manager as he was preparing to join Pequot in 2001.

None of the 18 referrals, including the one involving Microsoft, led to an enforcement action, according to people briefed on the matter.

Mr. Aguirre's documents have surfaced amid rising concern on Capitol Hill about the lightly regulated world of hedge funds. The chairman of the finance committee, Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, said last week that after questioning S.E.C. officials about the Pequot investigation, "my initial concerns haven't been put to rest by what I've learned so far."

The file is not a full record of Mr. Aguirre's investigation, and it is silent about what happened in the inquiry after he left the commission. In the papers, Mr. Aguirre acknowledged before his firing that he had not proved that Pequot had engaged in insider trading, or that Mr. Mack ever had inside information about Heller.

Since The New York Times first reported Mr. Aguirre's allegations last June, the inspector general for the S.E.C. reopened his investigation into the firing after it was disclosed that he had not interviewed Mr. Aguirre. The inspector general, whose conduct is also being examined by the Senate, declined to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0084498

Mr. Aguirre declined to be interviewed for this article, but in an Aug. 21 letter, he told the banking committee, which oversees the S.E.C., that he had little faith in either investigation. "The same I.G. who did the first whitewash would do the new one," he wrote. "The senior enforcement attorneys who pretended no grounds existed to take Mack's testimony will now pretend to take Mack's testimony."

In a statement, Jeanmarie McFadden, a spokeswoman for Morgan Stanley, said: "Mr. Aguirre's allegations against John Mack are irresponsible and without any evidence whatsoever to support them. John Mack had nothing to do with the S.E.C.'s decision if or when it would seek his testimony. As soon as he was asked, John Mack immediately agreed to provide his testimony and was subsequently advised that the S.E.C. would take no action regarding him in this matter."

Jonathan Gasthalter, a Pequot spokesman, said in a statement: "The S.E.C. staff conducted an extensive, two-year investigation of Pequot's trading and that investigation is over. During the course of the S.E.C.'s investigation, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York reviewed the firm's 2001 trades in Microsoft and concluded that no action was warranted."

Officials at the S.E.C. declined to comment on the Pequot investigation and its outcome. But Walter G. Ricciardi, deputy director of enforcement, said that if investigators uncovered evidence that supported an insider trading case, they would pursue it vigorously. He denied Mr. Aguirre's contention that referrals from the stock exchanges languish, saying that the commission's staff follows up on three-quarters of the 350 to 450 referrals received each year.

"Insider trading is a very big priority for us," Mr. Ricciardi said. "We recognize that the integrity of the marketplace is at stake."

Focusing on the Heller Deal

The following account is largely based on the investigative files and letters Mr. Aguirre sent to Senate investigators in August.

According to these records, two days after joining the commission in September 2004, Mr. Aguirre was assigned to look into suspicious trading by Pequot in an information management company shortly before it was acquired in 2003.

In a matter of months, Mr. Aguirre said he discovered 13 referrals involving Pequot that had not been fully investigated by the S.E.C. Eventually, he would look into 18 referrals, including one older one where Pequot suddenly began buying the stock of Heller Financial.

That referral soon became the focus of the S.E.C.'s Pequot investigation.

What intrigued federal investigators, Mr. Aguirre said, was that before buying Heller stock, Mr. Samberg apparently did not follow the financial services industry or Heller. Mr. Samberg's bet had paid off: On July 30, 2001, the GE Capital Corporation announced that it was buying Heller, sending Heller's stock up 50 percent. Pequot made $18 million on the deal, primarily by investing in Heller, but also by short-selling GE Capital's parent, General Electric, which dropped on news of the buyout.

After the deal was announced Mr. Samberg sent an e-mail containing six "smiley" faces, Mr. Aguirre said.

According to Mr. Aguirre, Mr. Samberg told the S.E.C. in May 2005 that he had six reasons for buying Heller stock, including the company's strong financial model, analysts' reports and speculation that Heller might be a takeover candidate.

But Mr. Aguirre says that when Mr. Samberg testified a second time in June, he was less certain, saying he had "no recollection specifically of how I started the Heller investment other than to know that I had been doing this for many years and recognized these opportunities when they come up."

Mr. Samberg said he could not recall seeing any newspaper articles about Heller or point to any specific analysts' reports he had read about the company, according to an e-mail Mr. Aguirre sent to his supervisor, Mr. Hanson, on June 27, 2005. Nor did Mr. Samberg remember speaking with others at Pequot about the deal, Mr. Aguirre wrote. After Mr. Aguirre was fired, the S.E.C. interviewed Mr. Samberg a third time, but the files do not reflect what he said.

Microsoft Trading Raises Concern

Beyond Mr. Samberg's testimony, Mr. Aguirre said his suspicions were fueled by Pequot's trading in Microsoft.

In early 2001, Mr. Samberg sought financial information on Microsoft from a product manager at the company, David Zilkha, whom he was trying to recruit, according to Mr. Aguirre.

"Might as well pick your brain before you go on the payroll," Mr. Samberg wrote in an e-mail message to Mr. Zilkha on Feb. 28, 2001. After expressing unhappiness with Pequot's research on Microsoft, Mr. Samberg asked: "Do you have any current views that could be helpful?"

DOJ_NMG_0084499

On April 6, 2001, Mr. Samberg pressed Mr. Zilkha about Microsoft's upcoming earnings report. "Any tidbits you might care to lob in," Mr. Samberg asked in an e-mail, after noting "the recurring indications from knowledgeable people" that Microsoft's earnings might fall short.

Mr. Zilkha responded the next day, saying he would get back to him "ASAP."

There is no record of Mr. Zilkha's response or evidence that he passed information to Mr. Samberg.

Mr. Aguirre told the banking committee that between April 9 and 11, 2001, Mr. Samberg bought 30,000 options contracts, apparently believing Microsoft "would beat its earnings, the reverse of his belief stated in his e-mail."

A little more than a week later, on April 19, Microsoft reported better-than-expected earnings, sending its stock sharply higher the next day. Mr. Samberg made a $12 million profit on his Microsoft options, Mr. Aguirre said. The next day Mr. Samberg sent Mr. Zilkha, still three days away from joining Pequot, the gushing e-mail that said, "you have probably paid for yourself already." On Mr. Zilkha's first day on the job, Mr. Samberg alerted others to the new employee's "great p.& l." — or profit and loss — based on his Microsoft "input."

Mr. Aguirre told the banking committee that "critical gaps in the evidence" prevented the S.E.C. from charging anyone with insider trading in connection with the Microsoft investigation. The Justice Department also took no action.

Mr. Zilkha, who no longer works for Pequot, declined to comment. But his lawyer, Henry Putzel III, issued a statement: "David Zilkha worked in a nonfinancial capacity, primarily in marketing for the MSN division of Microsoft. For approximately five months before his employment at Pequot, Mr. Zilkha was on family leave from Microsoft. David Zilkha never obtained and did not communicate any material, nonpublic information, nor did he attempt to do so."

A Dispute Over Testimony

The Zilkha e-mail messages fed Mr. Aguirre's belief that Mr. Samberg might have had nonpublic information when, around the same time, he invested in Heller Financial. His suspicion fell on Mr. Mack, a longtime friend of Mr. Samberg's who was Pequot's chairman for several weeks in June 2005. "There are hundreds of Pequot e-mails referring to Mack, including a dozen in July 2001," Mr. Aguirre wrote in a June 2005 e-mail message to S.E.C. officials.

None of those e-mails show Mr. Mack passing on any tips about the Heller deal. Nor do they prove that he even knew about the deal before Pequot started buying Heller stock on July 2, 2001.

But what the e-mails and trading records do show, Mr. Aguirre believed, was enough circumstantial evidence to warrant taking Mr. Mack's testimony — a standard procedure in such a situation, he said — and to issue more subpoenas to Credit Suisse First Boston, the investment bank that advised Heller during its talks with G.E. Mr. Mack became chief executive of Credit Suisse in July 2001.

In e-mails to S.E.C. officials in the summer of 2005, Mr. Aguirre made his case, noting that Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack were close and trusted each other, and that Mr. Mack was allowed to invest in hot Pequot funds and financings. In addition, Mr. Aguirre speculated that Mr. Mack might have learned about the upcoming Heller-GE Capital deal while negotiating his job with Credit Suisse. Mr. Mack began at Credit Suisse on July 12, 2001, a little more than a week after Pequot began buying Heller stock. Pequot continued to buy Heller stock in the following weeks.

"Samberg's aggressive buying of Heller suggests he received the tip shortly before July 2," Mr. Aguirre said in an e-mail to Mr. Hanson, his S.E.C. supervisor. And Pequot's e-mails show that Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack spoke after the market closed on Friday, June 29, according to Mr. Aguirre. "That matched perfectly with Samberg's decision to begin buying Heller with a vengeance the next trading day after he spoke with Mack," Mr. Aguirre said in his letter to the banking committee.

The committee files show that until late June of last year, S.E.C. officials appeared to support Mr. Aguirre's investigation. Around that time, Mr. Aguirre said, his supervisors authorized him to contact the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a federal prosecutor about the investigation.

But when Morgan Stanley was considering hiring Mr. Mack as chief executive, Mr. Aguirre said, a regulatory official at the investment bank called to ask if Mr. Mack was a serious target in the Pequot investigation. The official "explained that the prospect of such an action against Mack could affect Morgan Stanley's decision whether to rehire him as its C.E.O.," Mr. Aguirre told the banking committee.

DOJ_NMG_0084500

Before answering, Mr. Aguirre said, he consulted with his two supervisors, Mr. Hanson and Mark Kreitman, an assistant director of enforcement at the agency. According to Mr. Aguirre, Mr. Kreitman favored telling Morgan Stanley that Mr. Mack was indeed a target, but first he informed his boss, Paul R. Berger, an associate director of enforcement, by speakerphone.

With Mr. Aguirre listening in, Mr. Berger quickly overruled Mr. Kreitman, saying in effect that the S.E.C. would most likely not file charges against Mr. Mack and that nothing should be said to Morgan Stanley, Mr. Aguirre said.

Mr. Aguirre was stunned. He told the banking committee that after the call, "The usual routines and protocols went out the window." Suddenly, Mr. Aguirre said, he was excluded from senior staff meetings about the Pequot investigation. And subpoenaed records that ordinarily would go directly to him were instead directed to Linda Thomsen, the agency's chief of enforcement, he said.

Mr. Berger, now a lawyer at Debevoise & Plimpton, declined to comment.

For the next two months, Mr. Aguirre pressed his superiors for permission to take Mr. Mack's testimony. He failed to change their minds.

"I need greater specificity than the information provided here," Mr. Kreitman wrote in a July 25, 2005, e-mail to Mr. Aguirre. Mr. Kreitman said the evidence of motive "may have substance but it's too vague." And while contacts between Mr. Mack and Mr. Samberg "were potentially significant," they were not "aberrational."

"I have indicated repeatedly that concrete evidence of when Mack obtained access to material nonpublic information re the G.E./Heller deal is the sine qua non for focused investigation of Mack," Mr. Kreitman wrote.

To Mr. Aguirre, this standard had not been applied to other executives he had subpoenaed. Just as troubling, he said, were references by Mr. Hanson to the power of Mr. Mack and his lawyers, who included former S.E.C. officials.

"Mack's counsel will have 'juice,' as I described last night — meaning that they may reach out to Paul and Linda (and possibly others)," Mr. Hanson told Mr. Aguirre in an e-mail on Aug. 4, 2005. The reference apparently was to Mr. Berger and Ms. Thomsen.

Three weeks later, on Aug. 24, Mr. Hanson again acknowledged Mr. Mack's status. "Most importantly the political clout I mentioned to you was a reason to keep Paul and possibly Linda in the loop on the testimony," Mr. Hanson wrote. But he added: "As far as I know politics are never involved in determining whether to take someone's testimony. I've not seen it done at this agency."

Mr. Aguirre disputed Mr. Hanson's account, calling it "spin," and added: "An artificially high barrier has been set for his exam. I do not think this is proper."

Mr. Ricciardi of the S.E.C., speaking generally, said, "Every day enforcement deals with powerful people and we treat them equally with an appropriate level of fairness for the people being investigated and fierceness for the investors we protect." He also said that lawyers representing possible targets often approach top enforcement officials. "They don't have to be a famous lawyer, and they don't have to have a famous client," he said.

An S.E.C. spokesman declined to provide comments from Mr. Kreitman, Mr. Hanson or Ms. Thomsen.

By the end of August, Mr. Aguirre was complaining that the Heller investigation "has slowed to a snail's pace." He was fired about a week later while on vacation.

In late August of this year, Senator Grassley, the finance committee chairman, wrote to the S.E.C. chairman, Christopher Cox, raising questions about how the agency handled the investigation. He wrote that congressional investigators had found that the S.E.C.'s Heller inquiry had stopped, and had resumed only after Congress began looking at the matter.

Senator Grassley also took the inspector general's office to task, saying it had shown little interest in Mr. Aguirre's contention that Mr. Mack's political clout was a factor in not taking his testimony last year.

The inspector general "closed its inquiry, claiming it found no evidence that S.E.C. officials had referenced Mack's political clout," Mr. Grassley wrote, adding, "Contrary to the I.G. report, however, documentary evidence exists and corroborates" that assertion.

A Test For The SEC's Chief (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

Christopher Cox is being forced out of his comfort zone to tackle a shareholder rights issue.

WASHINGTON — In his first year as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, Christopher Cox is widely credited with bringing accord to a panel that was bitterly divided over how aggressive it should be in policing corporate wrongdoing in the wake of Enron and other scandals.

The former Republican congressman from Newport Beach has shepherded a handful of reform-oriented measures without controversy, steering clear of proposals on which the odds of finding common ground appeared slim.

Now, however, a federal appeals court decision has tossed a grenade-like issue into the SEC's chambers — putting Cox's diplomatic and leadership skills to their toughest test.

The court decision is forcing the agency to again confront demands to give shareholders a bigger say in the nomination of corporate directors. Former SEC Chairman William H. Donaldson unveiled a plan to do so in 2003, but it fizzled after triggering a partisan split on the commission and generating business opposition so fierce that many believe it contributed to Donaldson's departure.

Although the panel's makeup has changed, it is not clear that the group of three Republicans and two Democrats can take more than a cautious step to open up elections before exposing its own ideological differences. Nor is it clear that Cox is prepared to follow his predecessor in bringing up matters that force him to cast contentious, tie-breaking votes.

"Having a unanimous commission is ideal, and Chairman Cox has done an excellent job of building consensus," said Harvey J. Goldschmid, who left the SEC last year and is now a professor at Columbia University School of Law. "But on issues of this significance, doing the right thing is of far greater consequence than having a dissenting vote."

Goldschmid, a Democrat, believes regulators should make it easier for shareholders to nominate candidates for corporate boards and to have these nominees included in a company's official election materials.

For years, the SEC has allowed companies to reject such requests. In September, however, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit ruled that the agency was wrong when it allowed insurer American International Group Inc. to block such a resolution by the pension plan for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

The court found that despite the SEC staff's routine rejection of such requests, the agency's policy statements on the matter had been contradictory.

Within hours of the ruling, the SEC said it would address the issue at an October meeting to make sure its rules were applied consistently.

But soon before the meeting last week, the SEC postponed the public airing until December.

"It's simply not soup yet," one official said.

Regulators now hope that in December they will be able to offer companies guidance on the issue.

More broadly, they are trying to write a rule that would give shareholders greater rights to place independent board candidates on the corporate ballot card.

In an interview, Cox expressed support for the basic principle that shareholders deserve a say in the corporate nomination process.

"The right of the owners of the company to choose the directors who represent them is fundamental," he said. "The Securities and Exchange Commission has among its significant responsibilities protecting that right."

The matter of moving beyond principle to a specific proposal is where the issue gets thorny and emotions get hot, and Cox declined to elaborate on his views.

For investor activists, including unions and public pension funds, the goal of nominating board members goes to the heart of shareholder democracy. Inside the executive suite, however, that same goal may be seen as an unwelcome effort by special interests to meddle in running the company.

Currently, shareholders who wish to oppose nominees that are handpicked by the company have little choice other than to withhold their votes or shoulder postage costs for a write-in revolt — limits that place a heavy burden on all challenges.

In 2004, for example, the full-bore assault on Michael Eisner as chairman of Walt Disney Co. was deemed a big success when about 45% of shareholders withheld their support.

Cox, who as chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security tried to smooth over differences between its Republican and Democratic members, has tried to keep schisms out of the five-member SEC, which was deeply divided before he took the helm in 2005.

Among the most divisive issues was the matter of shareholder rights to nominate directors. That measure prompted the biggest barrage of public comments, pro and con, in the agency's history.

Donaldson, a former Wall Street investment banker, was unable to win support among fellow Republicans, and business groups complained angrily about his proposal to the White House, which accepted his resignation.

Republican Commissioners Paul S. Atkins, a leading opponent of the 2003 proposal, and newcomer Kathleen L. Casey did not respond to requests for comment. Democratic Commissioners Roel C. Campos and Annette L. Nazareth are known to sympathize with the shareholders' goal, although Nazareth has publicly supported a cautious, go-slow approach this time around.

"I don't think the commission wants to go back to that experience" of 2003, said Fred R. Buenrostro Jr., chief executive of the California Public Employees' Retirement System. He recently led a delegation to meet with each commissioner on the matter.

A technology enthusiast, Cox would like to defuse the shareholder voting issue, at least in part, through the Internet's potential to give investors an easy and cheap way to make their feelings known. He called it a "happy coincidence" that a separate proposed rule allowing companies to deliver their election materials on the Internet is also scheduled for the December meeting.

"In the future the Internet will help alleviate a great deal of the expense that has made it difficult for shareholders to participate in the process," he said.

Activists, however, generally don't view access to the Web as the full answer to their goal of democratizing board elections, and they want to be able to place the names of independent candidates directly on corporate ballot cards.

When a company continually ignores shareholder resolutions, or when executives or board members engage in misconduct, such efforts may be necessary, they contend. Revelations that Hewlett-Packard Co. detectives spied on board members and journalists, for example, recently prompted a group of pension funds to propose that the company alter its rules so that shareholders could nominate members of the board.

Activists say the goal is no less than democracy: "If it's good enough in Afghanistan and Iraq, why not in corporate boardrooms?" asked CalPERS' Buenrostro.

On the other side, however, business lobbyists are making the case that a rule change could do more harm than good. Corporate America, they contend, is still absorbing the Sarbanes-Oxley reforms that were passed after the Enron debacle. Further, they say that other changes, such as growing acceptance of a majority-vote requirement to win board seats, have improved governance and made directors more vigilant than ever.

They oppose a broader role for shareholders in board elections.

"This would be tremendously disruptive and could require expenditure of significant corporate resources and discourage directors from serving on corporate boards," cautioned Steve Odland, CEO of Office Depot Inc., in a letter to the SEC on behalf of the Business Roundtable, which represents large U.S. corporations.

Since taking the helm in August 2005, Cox has helped impose stricter disclosure rules for executive compensation and new restrictions on "soft dollar" arrangements that reward stockbrokers with higher commissions in return for research and other services.

Shareholder voting, however, goes directly to the balance of power between management and shareholders, making a pain-free compromise harder to reach. Moreover, establishing a rule could require difficult decisions on how large a bloc of shareholders is required to merit a say in nominations and how long they should own their shares.

The proposal from the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, for example, would apply to shareholders owning 3% of a company's stock for a year or more. These and other details are grist for the emerging SEC debate.

"Chairman Cox has worked hard and successfully to keep commissioners on the same page," said Amy Borrus, deputy director of the Council of Institutional Investors, which represents public, labor and corporate pension funds whose combined assets exceed $3 trillion. "Proxy access, though, will be a tough test of his consensus-building skills."

DOJ_NMG_0084503

jonathan.peterson@latimes.com

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pundit Settles Case On Education Laws (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

The Justice Department has reached a settlement with conservative commentator Armstrong Williams, closing a yearlong investigation into his promotion of Bush administration education reforms.

The final eight-page agreement among Mr. Williams, the Education Department and its subcontractor, Ketchum Communications, was reached Thursday.

The carefully worded settlement papers, a copy of which was obtained by The Washington Times, state that Mr. Williams is not guilty of any criminal violations, but must repay a portion of his fee to the federal government. According to the documents, Mr. Williams will have to pay $34,000 to settle the case.

"It's a complete and absolute vindication for me as far as my involvement in this. I did not break the law," Mr. Williams said.

He became the central figure last year in a brouhaha in which the Education Department contracted with several radio, television and print commentators to promote the No Child Left Behind Act.

House Democrats and Republicans denounced the public relations deal as an illegal propaganda campaign using taxpayers' dollars.

Mr. Williams' contract with Ketchum required that he create two television and two radio advertisements regarding the effectiveness of No Child Left Behind, which settlement papers state he performed.

It also called for Mr. Williams to "actively promote" the law to minorities as part of a six-month outreach program, but he said he refused to honor that portion of the contract.

"If I had done that, it would have been unethical and illegal," he said. "So basically, I have to pay them $34,000 back for not breaking the law."

The incident damaged the reputations of many journalists because the public viewed many of the people used to promote the education law as journalists, not as opinion writers and pundits on television and radio talk shows.

"The one thing I do regret, and I have always said this, is not disclosing this contract and my duties to my media clients who run my columns and broadcast commentaries," Mr. Williams said.

Bush's Family Profits From 'No Child' Act (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

A company headed by President Bush's brother and partly owned by his parents is benefiting from Republican connections and federal dollars targeted for economically disadvantaged students under the No Child Left Behind Act.

With investments from his parents, George H.W. and Barbara Bush, and other backers, Neil Bush's company, Ignite! Learning, has placed its products in 40 U.S. school districts and now plans to market internationally.

At least 13 U.S. school districts have used federal funds available through the president's signature education reform, the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001, to buy Ignite's portable learning centers at $3,800 apiece.

The law provides federal funds to help school districts better serve disadvantaged students and improve their performance, especially in reading and math.

But Ignite does not offer reading instruction, and its math program will not be available until next year.

The federal Department of Education does not monitor individual school district expenditures under the No Child program, but sets guidelines that the states are expected to enforce, spokesman Chad Colby said.

Ignite executive Tom Deliganis said that "some districts seem to feel OK" about using No Child money for the Ignite purchases, "and others do not."

DOJ_NMG_0084504

Neil Bush said in an e-mail to The Times that Ignite's program had demonstrated success in improving the test scores of economically disadvantaged children. He also said political influence had not played a role in Ignite's rapid growth.

"As our business matures in the USA we have plans to expand overseas and to work with many distinguished individuals in Asia, Europe, the Middle East and Africa," he wrote. "Not one of these associates by the way has ever asked for any access to either of my political brothers, not one White House tour, not one autographed photo, and not one Lincoln bedroom overnight stay."

Funding laws unclear

Interviews and a review of school district documents obtained under the Freedom of Information Act found that educators and legal experts were sharply divided over whether Ignite's products were worth their cost or qualified under the No Child law.

The federal law requires schools to show they are meeting educational standards, or risk losing critical funding. If students fail to meet annual performance goals in reading and math tests, schools must supplement their educational offerings with tutoring and other special programs.

Leigh Manasevit, a Washington attorney who specializes in federal education funding, said that districts using the No Child funds to buy products like Ignite's would have to meet "very strict" student eligibility requirements and ensure that the Ignite services were supplemental to existing programs.

Known as COW, for Curriculum on Wheels (the portable learning centers resemble cows on wheels), Ignite's product line is geared toward middle school social studies, history and science. The company says it has developed a social studies program that meets curriculum requirements in seven states. Its science program meets requirements in six states.

Most of Ignite's business has been obtained through sole-source contracts without competitive bidding. Neil Bush has been directly involved in marketing the product.

In addition to federal or state funds, foundations and corporations have helped buy Ignite products. The Washington Times Foundation, backed by the Rev. Sun Myung Moon, head of the South Korea-based Unification Church, has peppered classrooms throughout Virginia with Ignite's COWs under a $1-million grant.

Oil companies and Middle East interests with long political ties to the Bush family have made similar bequests. Aramco Services Co., an arm of the Saudi-owned oil company, has donated COWs to schools, as have Apache Corp., BP and Shell Oil Co.

Neil Bush said he is a businessman who does not attempt to exert political influence, and he called The Times' inquiries about his venture — made just before the election — "entirely political."

Big supporters

Bush's parents joined Neil as Ignite investors in 1999, according to U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission documents. By 2003, the records show, Neil Bush had raised about $23 million from more than a dozen outside investors, including Mohammed Al Saddah, the head of a Kuwaiti company, and Winston Wong, the head of a Chinese computer firm.

Most recently he signed up Russian fugitive business tycoon Boris A. Berezovsky and Berezovsky's partner Badri Patarkatsishvili.

Barbara Bush has enthusiastically supported Ignite. In January 2004, she and Neil Bush were guests of honor at a $1,000-atable fundraiser in Oklahoma City organized by a foundation supporting the Western Heights School District. Proceeds were earmarked for the purchase of Ignite products.

Organizer Mary Blankenship Pointer said she planned the event because district students were "utilizing Ignite courseware and experiencing great results. Our students were thriving."

However, Western Heights school Supt. Joe Kitchens said the district eventually dropped its use of Ignite because it disagreed with changes Ignite had made in its products. "Our interest waned in it," he said.

The former first lady spurred controversy recently when she contributed to a Hurricane Katrina relief foundation for storm victims who had relocated to Texas. Her donation carried one stipulation: It had to be used by local schools for purchases of COWs.

Texas accounts for 75% of Ignite's business, which is expanding rapidly in other states, Deliganis said.

The company also has COWs deployed in North Carolina, Virginia, Nevada, California, the District of Columbia, Georgia and Florida, he said.

COWs recently showed up at Hill Classical Middle School in California's Long Beach Unified School District. A San Jose middle school also bought Ignite's products but has since closed.

Neil Bush said Ignite has more than 1,700 COWs in classrooms.

Shift in strategy

But Ignite's educational strategy has changed dramatically, and some are critical of its new approach. Shortly after Ignite was formed in Austin, Texas, in 1999, it bought the software developed by another small Austin firm, Adaptive Learning Technology.

Adaptive Learning founder Mary Schenck-Ross said the software's interactive lessons allowed teachers "to get away from the mass-treatment approach" to education. When a student typed in a response to a question, the software was designed to react and provide a customized learning path.

"The original concept was to avoid 'one size fits all.' That was the point," said Catherine Malloy, who worked on the software development.

Two years ago, however, Ignite dropped the individualized learning approach. Working with artists and illustrators, it created a large purple COW that could be wheeled from classroom to classroom and plugged in, offering lessons that could be played to a roomful of students.

The COWs enticed students with catchy jingles and videos featuring cartoon characters like Mr. Bighead and Norman Einstein. On Ignite's website, a collection of teachers endorsed the COW, saying that it eliminated the need for lesson planning. The COW does it for them.

The developers of Adaptive Learning's software complain that Ignite replaced individualized instruction with a gimmick.

"It breaks my heart what they have done. The concept was totally perverted," Schenck-Ross said.

Nevertheless, Ignite found many receptive school districts. In Texas, 30 districts use COWs.

In Houston, where Neil Bush and his parents live, the district has used various funding sources to acquire $400,000 in Ignite products. An additional $240,000 in purchases has been authorized in the last six months.

Correspondence obtained by The Times shows that Neil Bush met with top Houston officials, sent e-mails and left voice mail messages urging bigger and faster allocations. An e-mail from a school procurement official to colleagues said Bush had made it clear that he had a "good working relationship" with a school board member.

Another Ignite official asked a Texas state education official to endorse the company. In an e-mail, Neil Bush's partner Ken Leonard asked Michelle Ungurait, state director of social studies programs, to tell Houston officials her "positive impressions of our content, system and approach."

Ungurait, identified in another Leonard e-mail as "our good friend" at the state office, told her superiors in response to The Times' inquiry that she never acted on Leonard's request.

Leonard said he did not ask Ungurait to do anything that would be improper.

Houston school officials gave Ignite's products "high" ratings in eight categories and recommended approval.

Some in Houston's schools question the expenditures, however. Jon Dansby was teaching at Houston's Fleming Middle School when Ignite products arrived.

"You can't even get basics like paper and scissors, and we went out and bought them. I just see red," he said.

In Las Vegas, the schools have approved more than $300,000 in Ignite purchases. Records show the board recommended spending $150,000 in No Child funding on Ignite products.

Sources familiar with the Las Vegas purchases said pressure to buy Ignite products came from Sig Rogich, an influential local figure and prominent Republican whose fundraising of more than $200,000 for President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign qualified him as a "Bush Ranger."

Rogich, who chairs a foundation that supports local schools, said he applied no pressure but became interested in COWs after Neil Bush contacted him. Rogich donated $6,000 to purchase two COWs for a middle school named after him.

DOJ_NMG_0084506

Christy Falba, the former Clark County school official who oversaw the contracts, said she and her husband attended a dinner with Neil Bush to discuss the products. She said Rogich encouraged the district "to look at the Ignite program" but applied no pressure.

Mixed reviews

Few independent studies have been done to assess the effectiveness of Ignite's teaching strategies. Neil Bush said the company had gotten "great feedback" from educators and planned to conduct a "major scientifically valid study" to assess the COW's impact. The results should be in by next summer, he said.

Though Ignite's products get generally rave reviews from Texas educators, the opinion is not universal.

The Tornillo, Texas, Independent School District no longer uses the Ignite programs it purchased several years ago for $43,000.

"I wouldn't advise anyone else to use it," said Supt. Paul Vranish. "Nobody wanted to use it, and the principal who bought it is no longer here."

Ignite's website features glowing videotaped testimonials from teachers, administrators, students and parents.

Many of the videos were shot at Del Valle Junior High School near Austin, where school district officials allowed Ignite to film facilities and students.

In the video, a student named India says: "I was feeling bad about my grades. I didn't know what my teacher was talking about." The COW changed everything, the girl's father says on the video.

Lori, a woman identified as India's teacher, says the child was not paying attention until the COW was brought in.

The woman, however, is not India's teacher, but Lori Anderson, a former teacher and now Ignite's marketing director. Ignite says Anderson was simply role-playing.

In return for use of its students and facilities, a district spokeswoman said Ignite donated a free COW. Five others were purchased with district funds.

District spokeswoman Celina Bley acknowledged that regulations bar school officials from endorsing products. But she said that restriction did not apply to the videos.

"It is illegal for individuals to make an endorsement, but this was a districtwide endorsement," Bley said in an e-mail.

wally.roche@latimes.com

Exclusive: Feds Probe A Top Democrat's Relationship With AIPAC (TIME)

By Timothy J. Burger, Washington

Time, October 22, 2006

The Department of Justice is investigating whether Rep. Jane Harman and the pro-Israel group worked together to get her reappointed as the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee

Did a Democratic member of Congress improperly enlist the support of a major pro-Israel lobbying group to try to win a top committee assignment? That's the question at the heart of an ongoing investigation by the FBI and Justice Department prosecutors, who are examining whether Rep. Jane Harman of California and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) may have violated the law in a scheme to get Harman reappointed as the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee, according to knowledgeable sources in and out of the U.S. government.

The sources tell TIME that the investigation by Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has simmered out of sight since about the middle of last year, is examining whether Harman and AIPAC arranged for wealthy supporters to lobby House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi on Harman's behalf. Harman said Thursday in a voicemail message that any investigation of — or allegation of improper conduct by — her would be "irresponsible, laughable and scurrilous." On Friday, Washington GOP super lawyer Ted Olson left voicemail messages underscoring that Harman has no knowledge of any investigation. "Congresswoman Harman has asked me to follow up on calls you've had," Olson said. "She is not aware of any such investigation, does not believe that it is occurring, and wanted to make sure that you and your editors knew that as far as she knows, that's not true... . No one from the Justice Department has contacted her." It is not, however, a given that Harman would know that she is under investigation. In a follow-up phone call from California, Olson said Harman hired him this morning because she takes seriously the possibility of a media report about an investigation of her, even though she does not believe it herself.

A spokesman for AIPAC, a powerful Washington-based organization with more than 100,000 members across the U.S., denied any wrongdoing by the group and stressed that it is not taking sides in regards to the committee assignment. Spokespersons for Justice and the FBI declined to comment. The case is a spin-off of a probe that has already led to charges under the Espionage Act against two AIPAC lobbyists, whose case is still pending, and to a 12-and-a-half-year prison sentence for former Defense Intelligence Agency official Lawrence A. Franklin. Franklin pleaded guilty a year ago to three felony counts involving improper disclosure and handling of classified information about the Middle East and terrorism to the two lobbyists, who in turn are accused of passing it on to a journalist and a foreign government, widely believed to be Israel. The two lobbyists, who have denied any wrongdoing but were dismissed by AIPAC in April of 2005, were indicted on felony counts of conspiring with government officials to receive classified information they were not authorized to have access to and providing national defense information to people not entitled to receive it.

Around mid-2005, the investigation expanded to cover aspects of Harman's quiet but aggressive campaign to persuade House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi to reappoint her to the prestigious position on the House intel panel. The alleged campaign to support Harman for the leadership post came amid media reports that Pelosi had soured on her California colleague and might name Rep. Alcee Hastings of Florida, himself a major supporter of Israel, to succeed Harman.

The sources say the probe also involves whether, in exchange for the help from AIPAC, Harman agreed to help try to persuade the Administration to go lighter on the AIPAC officials caught up in the ongoing investigation. If that happened, it might be construed as an illegal quid pro quo, depending on the context of the situation. But the sources caution that there has been no decision to charge anyone and that it is unclear whether Harman and AIPAC acted on the idea.

AIPAC spokesman Patrick Dorton denies that the organization has engaged in any improper conduct. "Both Congressman Hastings and Congresswoman Harman are strong leaders on issues of importance to the pro-Israel community and would be exemplary Democratic leaders for the House intelligence committee," Dorton said. "AIPAC would never engage in a quid pro quo in relation to a federal investigation or any federal matter and the notion that it would do so is preposterous. AIPAC is not aware that the Justice Department is looking into issues involving the intelligence committee, and has not been asked any questions or contacted by the government on this matter, but certainly would cooperate with any inquiry." Dorton added that AIPAC has previously been assured that the organization and its current employees are not being investigated. In this same investigation, the Justice Department has previously suggested that AIPAC had questionable motives in trying to help a valued government contact remain in a sensitive national security post. The Justice Department alleges in its indictment of Franklin that he asked one of the two AIPAC lobbyists to "put in a good word" for him in seeking assignment to the National Security Council. The document says the AIPAC official noted that such a job would put Franklin "by the elbow of the President" and said he would "do what I can."

AIPAC lists praise from Pelosi among a series of quotes from world leaders on its website: "The special relationship between the United States and Israel is as strong as it is because of your [AIPAC's] fidelity to that partnership..." But congressional sources say Pelosi has been infuriated by pressure from some major donors lobbying on behalf of Harman. In a story touching on tensions between Pelosi and Harman, an alternative California publication, LA Weekly, reported in May that Harman "had some major contributors call Pelosi to impress upon her the importance of keeping Jane in place. According to these members, this tactic, too, hasn't endeared Harman to Pelosi."

A congressional source tells TIME that the lobbbying for Harman has included a phone call several months ago from entertainment industry billionaire and major Democratic party contributor Haim Saban. A Saban spokeswoman said he could not be reached for comment. A phone call pushing for a particular member's committee assignment might be unwelcome, but it would not normally be illegal on its own. And it is unclear whether Saban — who made much of his fortune with the Mighty Morphin Power Rangers children's franchise — knew that lobbying Pelosi might be viewed by others as part of a larger alleged plan.

Saban has donated at least $3,000 to Harman's campaign, according to Federal Election Commission records, and the Saban Center for Middle East Policy, which he sponsors at the prestigious Brookings Institution, boasts Harman among its biggest fans. "When the Saban Center talks, I listen," Harman said at a Saban Center briefing in February on U.S. strategy in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0084508

Harman quipped that, in order to attend the session at Brookings, she had to "blow off" a senior intelligence official's appearance before a House committee.

Houston Homicides Spike; Evacuees Cited (AP)

AP, October 22, 2006

Evacuees from Hurricane Katrina have contributed to an increase in Houston's annual murder rate, which could climb this year to its highest level in more than a decade, police said.

Houston had 316 homicides as of Oct. 16. That's an increase of 25 percent from the 252 slayings tallied at this time last year, putting the city on pace to record nearly 400 killings before the end of 2006.

"We recognize that the homicide rate is up as far as raw numbers and as well as percentages relative to the population," Capt. Dwayne Ready said. "We also recognize that Katrina evacuees continue to have an impact on the murder rate."

When Katrina swamped New Orleans last year, 250,000 people fled to Houston. As many as 150,000 evacuees remain in the city.

Houston's homicide rate has been much higher in the past, especially 1981, when the city was dubbed the nation's murder capital with 701 slayings. Even if the city reaches 400 homicides, Ready said, "it's not a bleak picture."

At least 65 slayings in 2006 have been classified as Katrina-related, meaning either the victim, suspect or both evacuated to Houston after Katrina. Police have not kept records of how evacuees have affected crime rates other than homicide.

The murder rate began to rise at the end of last year, when the city recorded 334 homicides. During the previous 10 years, Houston never exceeded the 316 slayings counted in 1995.

U.S. Summit Considered Some Options On School Safety (NYJN)

By Leah Rae, THE JOURNAL NEWS

New York Journal News, October 22, 2006

President Bush's school security conference this month considered a long list of safety strategies, including emergency planning, metal detectors, student counseling and even God.

"We call this in education a 'teachable moment,' " U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said during the Oct. 10 conference in Maryland, which was organized after the shooting deaths of five Amish girls in Pennsylvania on Oct. 2 and two other deadly attacks in Colorado and Wisconsin.

The emphasis was on the need for communication and planning. Panelists stressed that most school attacks carried out by students followed some form of warning. They reviewed danger signs, such as a student's sudden changes in behavior, depression and suicidal thoughts.

Cathy Paine, a school psychologist who witnessed a 1998 shooting in Springfield, Ore., said schools there were forming "care teams" of teachers who discussed concerns about students and connected them to mental health services.

Craig Scott, whose sister was killed at Columbine, called for more moral guidance, and education "that touches and teaches the heart and helps form the character."

Security precautions like metal detectors were another strategy under discussion, but Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pointed out that one in five school shootings occurred outside a school building.

The conference was criticized for not exploring another angle: the prevalence of guns, a common denominator in the recent attacks.

"Let's make sure that gun owners are responsible," state Assemblywoman Amy Paulin, D-Scarsdale, said last week. "I really believe that that's the more important angle. I don't know that we want to have barriers to our local schools."

An Unwelcome Discovery (NYT)

By Jeneen Interlandi

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

On a rainy afternoon in June, Eric Poehlman stood before a federal judge in the United States District Court in downtown Burlington, Vt. His sentencing hearing had dragged on for more than four hours, and Poehlman, dressed in a black suit, remained silent while the lawyers argued over the appropriate sentence for his transgressions. Now was his chance to speak. A year earlier, in the same courthouse, Poehlman pleaded guilty to lying on a federal grant application and admitted to fabricating more than a decade's worth of scientific data on obesity, menopause and aging, much of it while conducting clinical research as a tenured faculty member at the University of Vermont. He presented fraudulent data in lectures and in published papers, and he used this data to obtain millions of dollars in federal grants from the National Institutes of Health — a crime subject to as many as five years in federal prison. Poehlman's admission of guilt came after more than five years during which he denied the charges against him, lied under oath and tried to discredit his accusers. By the time Poehlman came clean, his case had grown into one of the most expansive cases of scientific fraud in U.S. history.

DOJ_NMG_0084509

"I need to start out by apologizing," Poehlman said now, standing at the lectern before the judge. Speaking quickly and stammering occasionally, he apologized to friends and former colleagues, some of whom were listening in the back of the courtroom. He apologized to his mother, who sat in the front row, crying. And he apologized to Walter DeNino, the former protégé who turned him in, who was also sitting in the courtroom, several rows back on the prosecution's side.

"I have wanted to say I'm sorry for five years," Poehlman said, without turning around to face DeNino. "I want to make it very clear I am remorseful. I accept the responsibility. There's no way that I can turn back the clock. And I'm not that individual that I was years ago."

Before his fall from grace, Poehlman oversaw a lab where nearly a dozen students and postdoctoral researchers carried out his projects. His research earned him recognition among his peers and invitations to speak at conferences around the world. And he made nearly $140,000, one of the top salaries at the University of Vermont. All of that began to change six years ago, when DeNino took his concerns about anomalies in Poehlman's data to university officials. The subsequent investigation — a collaboration among the University of Vermont, the Office of Research Integrity (which is within the Department of Health and Human Services) and the United States Department of Justice — uncovered fraudulent research that stretched back through almost half of Poehlman's career. The revelations led to the retraction or correction of 10 scientific papers, and Poehlman was banned forever from receiving public research money. He was only the second scientist in the United States to face criminal prosecution for falsifying research data.

At 50, with his career in ruins and his reputation destroyed, Poehlman could only hope to avoid one final humiliation: becoming the first researcher sentenced to prison for scientific misconduct. Citing the nearly $200,000 Poehlman had paid in restitution, his attorneys had asked the judge to sentence him to supervised probation. "I am hoping that you can consider this sentence fair and just to me, as well as the community," Poehlman pleaded, without "a sentence of incarceration or imprisonment."

In the fall of 2000, Walter DeNino was comparing measurements in some data Poehlman had given him when he found something odd. DeNino, who was then 24, had started working in Poehlman's lab during his senior year at UVM. The young man admired the senior researcher and enjoyed the camaraderie of his peers. Poehlman pushed his team hard, but he was also charming and energetic, and he attracted people who were active athletes like himself. Lab members regularly went to the campus gym during lunch breaks and often competed in marathons together. Poehlman ran daily with students and colleagues alike.

DeNino fit in right away. A driven athlete, he ran so much in high school that he suffered dozens of tiny stress fractures in both legs. When a doctor suggested he run less, DeNino responded by riding his bike more. During college, after finishing in the top three in three triathlons, he was invited to join the U.S.A. Triathlon Olympic Resident Team to train in California and Colorado.

Professionally ambitious, DeNino graduated with a double major in nutritional sciences and dietetics at UVM and won several awards for the research he completed under Poehlman's tutelage. When Poehlman invited him back to the lab as a paid technician — allowing him to continue to train for the Olympics part time — DeNino saw it as the ideal way to strengthen his candidacy for medical school. Although technicians are usually at the bottom of the lab hierarchy, carrying out the more mundane aspects of their principal investigator's work, a generous scientist will give them credit on publications. DeNino figured that getting his name on one of Poehlman's papers could make the difference on a med-school application.

The fall that DeNino returned to the lab, Poehlman was looking into how fat levels in the blood change with age. DeNino's task was to compare the levels of lipids, or fats, in two sets of blood samples taken several years apart from a large group of patients. As the patients aged, Poehlman expected, the data would show an increase in low-density lipoprotein (LDL), which deposits cholesterol in arteries, and a decrease in high-density lipoprotein (HDL), which carries it to the liver, where it can be broken down. Poehlman's hypothesis was not controversial; the idea that lipid levels worsen with age was supported by decades of circumstantial evidence. Poehlman expected to contribute to this body of work by demonstrating the change unequivocally in a clinical study of actual patients over time. But when DeNino ran his first analysis, the data did not support the premise.

DOJ_NMG_0084510

When Poehlman saw the unexpected results, he took the electronic file home with him. The following week, Poehlman returned the database to DeNino, explained that he had corrected some mistaken entries and asked DeNino to re-run the statistical analysis. Now the trend was clear: HDL appeared to decrease markedly over time, while LDL increased, exactly as they had hypothesized.

Although DeNino trusted his boss implicitly, the change was too great to be explained by a handful of improperly entered numbers, which was all Poehlman claimed to have fixed. DeNino pulled up the original figures and compared them with the ones Poehlman had just given him. In the initial spreadsheet, many patients showed an increase in HDL from the first visit to the second. In the revised sheet, all patients showed a decrease. Astonished, DeNino read through the data again. Sure enough, the only numbers that hadn't been changed were the ones that supported his hypothesis.

Confused by the discrepancy between the data sets, DeNino went back to Poehlman and asked to see the patient files. When Poehlman brushed him off, a disquieting feeling came over DeNino. Seeking advice, he e-mailed Andre Tchernof, a former postdoctoral fellow of Poehlman's who had recently left to head his own lab in Quebec City. Tchernof confided to DeNino that something similar had happened before to another lab member.

"He confronted him with the fact that it did not add up," Tchernof wrote in an e-mail message to DeNino. "The response was a job-loss threat, more or less." Tchernof warned DeNino to proceed cautiously. Being associated with either falsified data or a frivolous allegation against a scientist as prominent as Poehlman could end DeNino's career before it even began. Poehlman also had a reputation for playing favorites in the lab. While DeNino had always been on Poehlman's good side, both he and Tchernof had seen Poehlman reduce other subordinates to tears for relatively minor infractions. If Poehlman's career was on the line, there was no telling what he would do to protect himself.

DeNino shared his concerns over the data with a handful of graduate students and postdocs and discovered that others had questions, too. Emboldened, he approached Dwight Matthews, a faculty member who shared lab space with Poehlman. Matthews and Poehlman had written a number of papers and grants together over the years, and DeNino worried that Matthews might alert Poehlman to his suspicions. But DeNino could not shake the feeling that Poehlman was hiding something, and he wanted guidance from a faculty member.

"First, understand that no matter how you proceed, everyone loses," Matthews told DeNino when they met to discuss Poehlman. "Your career will be ruined because no one is going to protect you." Matthews was brutally frank. "The university will come out bad," he continued, "and Eric's reputation will be destroyed." He told DeNino that he would have to decide for himself what to do. As an afterthought, Matthews told me in a recent interview, he offered one suggestion: "If you're going to do something, make sure you really have the evidence."

DeNino spent the next several evenings combing through hundreds of patients' records in the lab and university hospital, trying to verify the data contained in Poehlman's spreadsheets. Each night was worse than the one before. He discovered not only reversed data points, but also figures for measurements that had never been taken and even patients who appeared not to exist at all. In the mornings he would return to the lab and continue working as Poehlman's technician, waiting for the right moment to confront the principal investigator.

The scientific process is meant to be self-correcting. Peer review of scientific journals and the ability of scientists to replicate one another's results are supposed to weed out erroneous conclusions and preserve the integrity of the scientific record over time. But the Poehlman case shows how a committed cheater can elude detection for years by playing on the trust — and the self-interest — of his or her junior colleagues.

The principal investigator in a lab has the power to jump-start careers. By writing papers with graduate students and postdocs and using connections to help obtain fellowships and appointments, senior scientists can help their lab workers secure coveted tenure-track jobs. They can also do damage by withholding this support.

DOJ_NMG_0084511

A less self-assured person than DeNino might never have questioned Poehlman's revised data in the first place — and not just because it might have meant risking future job prospects. The principal investigator is not just a boss; he is also a teacher with knowledge and experience. "Trust is an essential component in any relationship, but especially between a student and mentor, especially in a research environment," Tchernof told me in a telephone conversation last spring, before Poehlman's sentencing hearing. "If you didn't trust the person you were working with, you'd have to check every single raw data point. It simply would not work. But then it takes a substantial amount of doubt to overcome that established trust."

Once that trust has been breached, the aftershocks can be far-reaching. Not only does any research touched by tainted data have to be re-examined, but high-profile cases of misconduct can also shake public confidence. "We already have a large subculture in society of people who don't trust science to begin with," says John Dahlberg, one of the Office of Research Integrity investigators who oversaw Poehlman's case. "This doesn't help at all."

Most people involved in Poehlman's case say that fraud as extensive as his represents an uncommon pathology, similar to what drove the South Korean scientist who claimed to have cloned human stem cells or the Lucent Technologies physicist who falsified extensive amounts of nanotechnology data. More frequent, according to a study published in Nature in June 2005, are smaller lapses in ethical judgment, like failing to present data that contradicts your previous research or inappropriately assigning author credit. Brian Martinson, who conducted that study with colleagues from the University of Minnesota, suggests that those gray areas, which many scientists inhabit at one time or another during their careers, portend a greater ailment for the scientific process. Minor transgressions, largely undetected and easily rationalized, can build up like plaque, compromising scientific integrity over time.

In late October 2000, as DeNino's suspicions festered, Poehlman was presented with the Lilly Scientific Achievement Award at the annual conference of the North American Association for the Study of Obesity. The weeklong event took place in Long Beach, Calif., and Poehlman and his entire lab flew out to celebrate. More than 100 scientists attended Poehlman's 40-minute lecture, in which he summarized the research he had conducted over the past decade. Much of the work he discussed focused on energy dysregulation — an imbalance between the energy a person consumes and what he expends. This imbalance grows more pronounced as a person ages, or when a woman reaches menopause, and it can lead to a loss of muscle mass and an increase in total body fat, which, in turn, may predispose older people to obesity and cardiovascular disease.

Because most studies that examine the physiology of aging look at only one point in time, researchers can't tell whether the differences measured are because of age, menopause or individual variation. Poehlman's longitudinal study on menopause collected the same measurements from each person twice over a six-year period. This enabled him to show, for the first time, that some metabolic changes were from menopause, not aging. Published in 1995 in the Annals of Internal Medicine, the study confirmed a long-held assumption and helped establish Poehlman's reputation.

As he summarized this and other work for his colleagues, Poehlman exuded grace and confidence, mixing scientific slides with pictures of his lab team and waxing philosophical about the themes that had shaped his career. He mentioned the outstanding work of his assistants and concluded with the following advice: "Work with people who are smarter than you."

Andre Tchernof left Poehlman's lab two months before the Long Beach meeting but attended the Lilly Award lecture with his former labmates. The facet of Poehlman's research that most interested Tchernof involved whether hormone-replacement therapy — providing menopausal patients with supplemental estrogen — could help them lose weight. When he was still in Poehlman's lab, Tchernof had analyzed H.R.T. data from what was apparently the same group of patients Poehlman was discussing in his talk and had found no significant difference in abdominal-fat loss between women who took estrogen and women who didn't. But the slides Poehlman presented at the meeting showed a big difference: women who had received estrogen lost twice as much abdominal fat as those not taking supplements.

"I have no idea where those numbers came from," Tchernof whispered to DeNino, who was sitting next to him in the front row. "That's not what we found, at all."

After the presentation, Tchernof and Poehlman went running along the beach outside their hotel. The two enjoyed a warm relationship during Tchernof's time as a postdoc. Now Tchernof found himself questioning Poehlman on the H.R.T. data he'd presented. Poehlman assured him that the data were fine and brushed off Tchernof's suggestion to double-check the numbers.

DOJ_NMG_0084512

As he stretched his muscles under the waning Pacific sunlight, Tchernof could not shake the feeling that something was very wrong.

By December, DeNino's relationship with Poehlman had deteriorated badly. When Poehlman learned that DeNino was raising questions about data integrity with other people in the lab, they all but stopped talking to each other. Late in the month, following a series of letters, e-mail and confrontations between Poehlman and DeNino, none of which laid the technician's concerns to rest, DeNino went to Thomas Mercurio, the university's general counsel, to lodge a formal, written accusation of scientific misconduct against his former mentor. The process he set in motion would take almost six years to conclude.

All universities that receive public money to conduct research are required to have an integrity officer who ensures compliance with federal guidelines. But policing its scientists can be a heavy burden for a university. "It's your own faculty, and there's this idea of supporting and nurturing them," says Ellen Hyman-Browne, a research-compliance officer at the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, a teaching hospital. Moreover, investigations cost time and money, and no institution wants to discover something that could cast a shadow on its reputation.

"There are conflicting influences on a university where they are the co-grantor and responsible to other investigators," says Stephen Kelly, the Justice Department attorney who prosecuted Poehlman. "For the system to work, the university has to be very ethical."

Dr. Burton Sobel, the chairman of Poehlman's department, was determined to do everything by the book. After meeting with DeNino, whom he later described as "forthright, composed, clearly troubled," he contacted Poehlman, saying he needed to discuss something unpleasant with him. Sobel was astonished by Poehlman's response. The accused scientist gave him the impression that nothing was wrong and seemed mostly annoyed by all the fuss. In his written response to the allegations, Poehlman suggested that the data had gotten out of hand, accumulating numerous errors because of handling by multiple technicians and postdocs over the years.

"I found that noncredible, really, for an investigator of Eric's experience," Sobel later told the investigative panel.

"There had to be a backup copy that was pure," Sobel reasoned before the panel. "You would not have postdocs and lab techs in charge of discrepant data sets." But Poehlman told Sobel that there was no master copy. Once the formal inquiry got under way, Poehlman called Sobel at home and asked him to stop the proceedings, telling him there was nothing to it. Sobel refused, assuring Poehlman that it was in everyone's best interest to proceed. He sensed that Poehlman's facade of indifference was beginning to crack.

Two days after DeNino filed his formal accusation, Richard Galbraith, the program director of the university's General Clinical Research Center, escorted the campus police chief to Poehlman's office. It was the week between Christmas and New Year's Day, and only a handful of researchers continued to hunch over their lab benches. Galbraith had the task of impounding the evidence necessary for an investigation into DeNino's claim.

Galbraith had personally recruited Poehlman to UVM. Poehlman started his career at the university in 1988 but left during a mass exodus of clinical researchers. When Galbraith came to the university in 1995, he figured the best way to revive the ailing clinical-research center was to hire prominent scientists with the potential to secure grants. Poehlman, who had just published his menopause study, seemed an ideal candidate to bring both prestige and grant money to the institution.

Some faculty members had expressed misgivings about Poehlman. Galbraith never quite got the full story about why he left in the first place, but during the recruitment, rumblings surfaced about Poehlman's tactics and data. When he met with the investigative panel, five years later, Galbraith recalled questioning everybody he could think of. Poehlman had definitely stepped on some toes and made a name as an aggressive self-promoter, but this was nothing remarkable for a successful researcher. And no one had any evidence of misconduct. Not wanting to disqualify such a promising candidate based on rumors, the university decided to hire Poehlman in 1996. And Poehlman delivered for the university, securing $2.9 million in N.I.H. grants out of the $11 million he had applied for.

The inquiry itself fell to five faculty members picked by the dean of the medical school. One of them, Charles Irvin, had just joined UVM's College of Medicine from a research institute affiliated with the University of Colorado. Irvin had only one experience with a misconduct investigation, and he remembered it as an insignificant case. "What we'd been told at U.C. Denver was that most of these cases are alike — they tend to be trivial or they tend to be 'he said, she said,' " he told me. "You just don't know because there tends to be insufficient data to do anything."

DOJ_NMG_0084513

When the panel investigating Poehlman began to meet in January 2001, however, Irvin realized that this case was different. The panel's search quickly expanded beyond DeNino's initial accusation, and the body of evidence it accumulated — through a careful review of Poehlman's computer hard-drive and interviews with DeNino and others — revealed a disturbing pattern of blame-shifting and backpedaling.

"It was clear after a very short period of time that this was not trite, it was not trivial, but the allegations were in all likelihood some substantive thing," Irvin explained. "And then once you get a little further down, after you come across a couple of things, well, for me, it was like, Oh, boy."

On Feb. 9, 2001, Poehlman appeared before the panel to address the charges against him. Irvin was appalled by his responses. Poehlman's entire defense seemed to hinge on a series of flimsy notions. First, he attributed his mistakes to his own self-proclaimed ineptitude with Excel files. Then, when pressed on how fictitious numbers found their way into the spreadsheet he'd given DeNino, Poehlman laid out his most elaborate explanation yet. He had imputed data — that is, he had derived predicted values for measurements using a complicated statistical model. His intention, he said, was to look at hypothetical outcomes that he would later compare to the actual results. He insisted that he never meant for DeNino to analyze the imputed values and had given him the spreadsheet by mistake. Although data can be imputed legitimately in some disciplines, it is generally frowned upon in clinical research, and this explanation came across as hollow and suspicious, especially since Poehlman appeared to have no idea how imputation was done.

"Why did Walter . . . say all these things and go to this length?" Irvin asked Poehlman, according to the hearing transcript. "I mean, to me that is the crux of it, is the motivation" for the allegations.

Poehlman responded that DeNino was very popular in the lab and had influenced others to follow his lead.

"I feel like they were plotting during this time," Poehlman told Irvin. "I am as shocked as you are."

When the university decided to proceed from an inquiry to a formal investigation, Poehlman fought back, seeking an injunction from Judge William K. Sessions against UVM and stalling the proceedings for several months. During this time, Poehlman tried to undermine DeNino's credibility as a whistle-blower by suggesting that the technician was homophobic — Poehlman is gay — among other things. Eventually, DeNino hired his own attorney, Philip Michael of the New York firm Troutman Sanders.

"A lot of whistle-blowers are retired," Michael, who specializes in such cases, said recently. "For Walter, this is something that will follow him for the rest of his life."

Poehlman's desperate defense, however, eventually unraveled. After the injunction was dropped, a two-year investigation by UVM led to further review of Poehlman's work by the integrity office. By March 2005, his case had expanded to include a rare criminal prosecution by the United States Department of Justice. By then Poehlman had left UVM for the University of Montreal. But with the threat of prison looming, Poehlman changed his mind and offered his full cooperation.

He waived his right to an indictment and pleaded guilty to falsifying information on a federal grant application. He also agreed to pay $180,000 to settle a civil complaint filed by the University of Vermont plus $16,000 in attorneys' fees for DeNino. The plea came with an especially devastating admission: he acknowledged that his most noted research, the longitudinal study on menopause, was almost entirely fabricated. Poehlman had tested only 2 women, not 35.

The length of time that Poehlman perpetrated his fraud — 10 years — and its scope make his case unique, even among the most egregious examples of scientific misconduct. Some scientists believe that his ability to beat the system for so long had as much to do with the research topics he chose as with his aggressive tactics. His work was prominent, but none of his studies broke new scientific ground. (This may also be why no other scientists working in the field have retracted papers as a result of Poehlman's fraud.) By testing undisputed assumptions on popular topics, Poehlman attracted enough attention to maintain his status but not enough to invite suspicion. Moreover, replicating his longitudinal data would be expensive and difficult to do.

"Eric excelled at telling us what we wanted to hear," Matthews, Poehlman's former colleague, told me. "He published results that confirmed our predisposed hypotheses." Steven Heymsfield, an obesity researcher at Merck Pharmaceuticals in New Jersey, echoed Matthews's sentiments and added that Poehlman's success owed more to his business sense and charisma than to his aptitude as a scientist.

DOJ_NMG_0084514

"In effect, he was a successful entrepreneur and not a brilliant thinker with revolutionary ideas," Heymsfield wrote me via e-mail. "But deans love people who bring in money and recognition to universities, so there is Eric."

At his sentencing hearing, Poehlman took responsibility for his actions, but between the lines, he seemed to be placing some blame on the system that requires principal investigators to raise money for their research through government grants.

"I had placed myself, in all honesty, in a situation, in an academic position which the amount of grants that you held basically determined one's self-worth," he told the court in June. "Everything flowed from that." With a lab full of people dependent on him for salaries, Poehlman said he convinced himself that altering some data was acceptable, even laudable. "With that grant I could pay people's salaries, which I was always very, very concerned about."

He continued: "I take full responsibility for the type of position that I had that was so grant-dependent. But it created a maladaptive behavior pattern. I was on a treadmill, and I couldn't get off."

Having all those people to pay, of course, was not just a burden; it was proof of his success. Poehlman wasn't after the grant money for his own material benefit. He was seduced by a different kind of status. "Certainly there is this point of having a grant because it raises your esteem and raises your standing vis-à-vis your colleagues," he told the court. The big publications, the National Institutes of Health grants, the invitations to speak, all gave him a feeling of importance. He was a man of prestige in his community.

Had Poehlman done the hard work in the menopause study, had he followed through on the unexpected data on lipids, he might have eventually achieved the same status. That is the tragic twist. "Much is revealed when studies don't go the way you expect them to," says Sally Jean Rockey of the N.I.H. "Because Poehlman was working in critical areas for lots of people, what he learned would have been important either way."

On that day in the courthouse just a few miles from the university where he had so enjoyed playing the role of prominent scientist, Poehlman cast himself as a changed man, one with a new, humbler vision for his future. He implored the judge to spare him a prison sentence so that he could spend time with his ailing father and continue teaching science to elementary-school children, which he had been doing for the past year. He also outlined a plan for community service that included talking to other students and scientists about the error of his ways.

Federal sentencing guidelines called for five years in prison based on the amount of grant money Poehlman had obtained using fraudulent data. But no scientist had ever spent time in prison for fabricating data. (One did spend 60 days in a halfway house.)

Rockey, who delivered a statement to the court on behalf of the N.I.H., said that lost grant money was not the only, or even the most significant, cost incurred. "Science is incremental," she said, explaining that most scientific advances build on what came before. "When there's a break in the chain, all the links that follow that break can be compromised." Moreover, she said, fraud as extensive as Poehlman's would inevitably lead to further erosion of the public's trust in science. Poehlman's sentence, she said, should send a clear message to the scientific community and the public at large that fraud would not be tolerated.

The sentencing judge was William Sessions, the same judge to whom Poehlman denied all allegations of misconduct at the injunction hearings four years earlier. He told Poehlman to stand and receive his sentence: one year and one day in federal prison, followed by two years of probation.

"When scientists use their skill and their intelligence and their sophistication and their position of trust to do something which puts people at risk, that is extraordinarily serious," the judge said. "In one way, this is a final lesson that you are offering."

DeNino, who wore a dark suit and tie to the hearing, betrayed no emotion as the sentence was read. When I asked him about it later, he said that Poehlman "deserves every single day he serves in prison." Nothing Poehlman had said, not the least his personal apology to DeNino, changed the young man's opinion about his former mentor. "I don't believe for a second that any of what he said was sincere," he told me. "Of course he's going to say those things now that he's facing a prison sentence."

After the hearing, Poehlman walked through downtown Burlington with his mother and a group of young colleagues from Montreal who had come to show their support. The rain had stopped and the sun cast a bright shimmer over the wet cobblestone streets. When I approached Poehlman on Church Street, he was warm and gracious. We talked briefly about his time teaching at the American University in Tehran, his plans to continue teaching elementary school — anything but his impending prison sentence. We agreed to have that discussion in the near future. But there were just 60 days standing between Poehlman and a year in federal prison, and he wanted to sort out his affairs and prepare himself for what lay ahead.

DOJ_NMG_0084515

"I just need some time," he said apologetically. "We can sit down one day soon." But as the summer progressed and 60 days became 30 and then 20, Poehlman did not respond to repeated e-mail messages, telephone calls and letters. Finally, two weeks before his sentence was set to begin, I reached his mother. Eric had decided to start his sentence early, she explained, and he wouldn't be talking about what happened anymore.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

A Fight To Keep Schools Integrated (LAT)

By Jenny Jarvie, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

In Birmingham, Ala., a group of residents and activists opposes a bid to end a court's school desegregation order.

For 35 years under court order, the yellow buses have picked up black children from the city's Oxmoor Valley and carried them up the hill and across city limits to affluent, mostly white suburban public schools.

Rita Jones Turner was one of the first children to be bused to Vestavia Hills after a 1970 federal court order required the district to enroll African Americans from her neighborhood. The bus, which was often late and sometimes never came, took her to a middle school where teachers tried to put her in remedial classes and white classmates tore her barrettes from her hair.

Today, her youngest son, a ninth-grader at Vestavia Hills High School, makes the same journey up the hill into a friendlier environment.

But last month, he came home with a letter informing her that the Vestavia Hills school board had filed a motion to end the desegregation order. The district is among a growing number across the nation seeking to have the decades-old orders overturned; this year, dozens have succeeded.

Now, Jones Turner, a 45-year-old consumer debt counselor, finds herself struggling against the idea that the personal hardships she endured during the 1970s would just be part of a failed social experiment.

"We were used, mistreated, downtrodden and discriminated against," she said, her firm voice swelling as she retraced her old bus route one recent afternoon. "I have no problem with being a sacrificial lamb for the good of the community, but to have the system back out now is not fair. They made a commitment to educate black children."

Home of civil rights history

Those fighting to keep the order in place are particularly disappointed that the issue would be revisited in Birmingham, where so much of the civil rights movement's history was made. In the last 15 years, city leaders have built museums and monuments to commemorate the four schoolgirls who died in the 1963 bombing of a black church, and the demonstrators who were met with attack dogs in a march led by the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. the same year.

But the district says its request is a matter of economics, not race — that absorbing the children of Oxmoor Valley is an unfair burden on its budget.

Vestavia Hills' desegregation order was to be in place until 25% of the school system's population was African American. Today, 7% of its students are black, with about a quarter of those coming from Oxmoor Valley. Some vestiges of the old South remain: The Vestavia Hills High School mascot is the Rebel, depicted as a white-haired man in Confederate-era garb; although the practice is now discouraged by the school, some students still display Confederate flags at football games.

After the U.S. Supreme Court's landmark 1954 Brown vs. Board of Education decision found school segregation to be unconstitutional, and a follow-up ruling in 1968, many school systems were ordered to bus children from other districts to achieve integration.

This fall, the justices will hear appeals from parents in Seattle and in Louisville, Ky., who say it is unconstitutional for officials to consider race when deciding what school a student will attend. Meanwhile, over the last 15 years, courts have lifted desegregation orders in more than 100 school districts from Alabama to California — often after districts showed they were making a good faith effort, successful or not, to achieve racial integration. This year, federal courts have sided 36 times with districts seeking to overturn desegregation orders involving the Justice Department.

DOJ_NMG_0084516

Only a few requests to end the orders have been rejected. In June, for example, a federal appeals court upheld a lower court decision to keep the school district of Little Rock, Ark., under its desegregation order, arguing it did not sufficiently appraise how its academic programs helped black students.

Opponents come together

In Birmingham, a well-connected group of civil rights activists, lawmakers, attorneys, pastors and residents has come together over the last month to oppose Vestavia Hills' request to end the desegregation order.

"They are saying to Martin Luther King, 'To hell with your dream: This is 2006 and it's business as usual in Vestavia Hills,' " said the Rev. Jonathan McPherson, who was jailed with King in 1963 and is board chairman of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference's Birmingham chapter.

The Vestavia Hills desegregation order was issued after the affluent southeastern suburb established its own school system to avoid sending its children to integrated Birmingham city schools. A federal judge ruled that the 99% white system had to accept children from a designated portion of the neighboring Oxmoor Valley.

Now, Vestavia Hills is asking a federal judge to grant it unitary status, freeing it from court supervision and further desegregation obligations.

"It feels like we're back in the '60s again," said Theodore Lawson, a Jefferson County attorney who lives in Oxmoor Valley and opposes lifting the order. "If this is not racism, what is it?"

Vestavia Hills Supt. Jamie Blair said the issue was one of funding and capacity. In the last four years, he said, the number of Oxmoor students in the district has risen from 75 to 132.

"Simply put, it's an overcrowding issue," he said. "Our city has no control over the amount of housing built in that area. We're providing schooling to all the folk in Oxmoor, but their tax dollars go to the city of Birmingham."

Oxmoor Valley, which at the time of the court order was home to a small community of mostly poor blacks, is a nearly 8,000-acre pine forest south of downtown Birmingham. An increasing number of real estate developers are now eyeing the valley, attracted in part by its school zoning. Two upscale subdivisions have been built in the last decade, and hundreds more homes and apartments are planned.

The valley's new residents — mostly African American professionals — bristle at the notion that Vestavia Hills schools are overcrowded. Not all of the new homes in Oxmoor Valley, they note, are zoned to the Vestavia Hills school district. Furthermore, Vestavia Hills recently annexed two predominantly white communities.

"The only effort to relieve overcrowding has been to remove 132 black students from the school system," said Lawson, who is president of the Ridgeview Estates subdivision association.

According to Vestavia Hills' request, which is now before a federal judge, the school system would continue educating the 132 students now enrolled from Oxmoor Valley and offer enrollment to their younger siblings. Other students would attend Birmingham city schools. A U.S. district judge has scheduled a status conference on the case for Wednesday.

Since the board publicized its request, supporters of the 1970 court order have scrutinized Vestavia Hills' progress on racial desegregation.

Although a small number of African Americans have moved to Vestavia Hills in recent years, it remains one of most exclusively white areas of Jefferson County. According to the 2000 census, Vestavia Hills has a 94% white population and a median household income of $70,000. In contrast, Birmingham has a 24% white population and a median household income of $26,000. Only 5% of Birmingham public school students are white.

In a legal strategy meeting last month at the Oxmoor Valley home of Birmingham City Councilor Miriam Witherspoon, residents noted the Vestavia Hills school district's low number of black administrators (1 out of 16), the relatively high number of black special-education students (60 out of 546), and that just 3% of the district's teachers are black.

"The schools are as segregated in 2006 as they were in 1966," said Ronald Jackson, executive director of Citizens for Better Schools, a watchdog group in Birmingham.

Vestavia Hills viewpoints

DOJ_NMG_0084517

On a recent day in Vestavia Hills, many of the parents picking up their children from football at Louis Pizitz Middle School were reluctant to talk about the court order.

Waiting for her ninth-grade son in a navy-blue Lexus, Kim Tortorice, who is white, said she did not believe race was an issue.

"Our school really is a melting pot," she said. "We have Chinese, Mexican, Russian."

Vestavia, she thought, was handling the situation fairly.

"I just think everyone should pay the same property tax, that's all," she said. "I work hard. Those people across town don't pay our property taxes."

But Darryl Dancey, 40, an African American truck driver who moved to Vestavia Hills last year for the benefit of his children's education, said he hoped the court order would stay in place.

"The original decision was for integration," he said with a shrug. "I don't think integration has truly happened yet."

jenny.jarvie@latimes.com

A.C.L.U. Allies Start Web Site To Rebut Critics Of Leadership (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

Supporters of the leadership of the American Civil Liberties Union have created a Web site in response to one started last month by critics of that leadership.

"This Web site came about because those of us who know the A.C.L.U. very well were very disturbed that a few unhappy people were attacking the organization at a time when the A.C.L.U. is doing such a great job — and is greatly needed," said Laura W. Murphy, a former director of the organization's Washington office and a leader behind the new Web site, voicesfortheaclu.org.

Ms. Murphy said the critics were "simply dead wrong, and we are saying enough is enough."

Ira Glasser, a former executive director of the civil liberties union and a founder of savetheaclu.org, the Web site calling for a change in the organization's leadership, said his group had no complaint about the A.C.L.U.'s work or the growth of its membership and financing.

"The disagreement," Mr. Glasser said, "is over whether those achievements excuse or justify the betrayal of fundamental principles we're complaining about on the Web site. About those complaints, they have said not a single word."

That site was started last month by more than 30 longtime supporters of the A.C.L.U. who say that actions taken by the executive director, Anthony D. Romero, and supported by the board have violated the organization's principles. For example, they questioned the extent of the organization's use of data mining to collect information on donors, a proposal to monitor employees' e-mail messages and efforts to control board members' access to staff members and information.

Voices for the A.C.L.U. has statements of support signed by, among others, the executive directors of 18 of the organization's state-level affiliates, senior A.C.L.U. staff members and leaders of nonprofit groups that work on some of the same issues, including Human Rights Watch and the Feminist Majority Foundation.

A spokeswoman for the civil liberties union, Emily Whitfield, said, "I think this Web site demonstrates that there is widespread support for the A.C.L.U.'s leadership and strong appreciation for the tremendous battle the A.C.L.U. is waging to defend our civil liberties at a time when they are under attack as never before."

The site is not affiliated with the A.C.L.U. Ms. Murphy said she and other former leaders had paid a firm less than $1,500 to set it up.

Janet Murguia, president and chief executive of the National Council of La Raza, the country's largest Hispanic advocacy group, said she had signed a statement of support for the A.C.L.U.'s leadership because she thought it was doing a good job.

"I understand that there are some issues among the board there," she said, "but I think the way we can weigh in is to express our confidence, particularly in Anthony Romero."

Ms. Murguia said she had not seen the site criticizing the leadership. "My understanding is, a lot of stuff on the Web site is a lot of insider-baseball-type stuff," she said, "and is really just a distraction from the good work the organization is doing."

DOJ_NMG_0084518

ANTITRUST:

Smithfield Deal Reviewed (SFAL)

By Kevin Dobbs

Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader, October 22, 2006

Senate plans hearings after consolidation fears raised

The U.S. Justice Department has begun an antitrust investigation of Smithfield Foods' plan to buy rival Premium Standard Farms of Missouri, a deal that would combine the nation's two largest hog producers.

Additionally, at the behest of Midwest lawmakers and farmers who worry the deal would hasten the consolidation of livestock markets and allow the merged company to inflate pork prices for consumers, a Senate antitrust committee is planning hearings on the matter. At such hearings, lawmakers often hear testimony from company executives and their critics.

"This merger takes place in an industry already witnessing the decline of independent family farmers and rapid consolidation in meat production and packing. If this merger goes through, farmers will have even fewer choices for selling their hogs, and consumers will certainly be affected by the deal," said Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio.

DeWine chairs the Senate subcommittee that oversees antitrust concerns. He said in a recent statement that he plans to hold hearings on the Smithfield deal in the near future, and lawmakers "will need to scrutinize this deal very carefully."

A Justice Department spokeswoman would not confirm the deadline to complete the investigation. Nor has a date been set for the Senate committee hearings, according to Andrew Langworthy, a spokesman for DeWine.

But both could happen before the end of the year because Virginia-based Smithfield, which owns the John Morrell & Co. meatpacking plant in Sioux Falls, plans to finalize the acquisition in the first quarter of 2007. The company announced in September it would buy its rival for about $650 million in cash and stock.

Dennis Treacy, Smithfield vice president of government affairs, said shortly after the deal was announced that the merged companies will continue to work closely with independent producers and that he expects the Justice Department will approve the deal.

A national coalition of agriculture and consumer groups - including Dakota Rural Action and Dakota Resource Council - earlier this month lined up behind Sens. Tim Johnson and John Thune, both of South Dakota, and lawmakers from Iowa and Nebraska who called for the antitrust investigation.

If Smithfield completes the buy, it will own about 20 percent of the nation's hogs. That could limit independent hog producers' options and ability to get good prices for their meat, Johnson and Thune have said.

They worry that a mammoth Smithfield will have the power to stifle its competition, limit producers' options when it comes to selling their hogs and eventually inflate pork prices for consumers.

That, critics contend, should raise antitrust concerns for federal investigators.

Tom Buis, National Farmers Union president, said the livestock industry already is heavily concentrated, and allowing the acquisition "is only going to make the situation worse."

Smithfield's move for Premium Standard Farms is among a string of acquisitions and expensive projects the company has made this year. Last week, Smithfield announced a joint agreement with ContiGroup Cos. to build a $200 million beef processing facility in Oklahoma.

Smithfield had planned a $100 million update and expansion of its aging Morrell plant in Sioux Falls. Work was supposed to start earlier this year. But then the company launched into other projects, including the $571 million acquisition of ConAgra Foods' refrigerated meats business earlier this year.

The company since has put the Sioux Falls project on hold, and company officials have refused to provide any information on when or if the work ever will get under way.

But Ron Bell, the chief building official in Sioux Falls, said in a recent interview that, with winter around the corner, crews would have broken ground by now if they intended to start on the 232,000-square-foot expansion yet this year.

DOJ_NMG_0084519

ENVIRONMENT:

Federal Prosecutions Of Area Polluters Drop (HC)

By Harvey Rice

Houston Chronicle, October 22, 2006

Critics say U.S. Attorney's Office isn't doing enough to pick up where state has failed

After illegally using a pesticide to kill feral hogs — and in the process killing raccoons, mourning doves and crows — two Fayette County farmers were fined $500 in 2004.

That was the most recent conviction Houston's federal prosecutors have obtained on their own for an environmental crime. The lack of new environmental prosecutions by the U.S. Attorney's Office is remarkable for a city that has vied with Los Angeles for the title of the nation's smog capital, say environmentalists and some current and former officials.

"We've got more (pollution) than anyone else in the country and, therefore, we should have a lot of prosecutions," said Neil Carman, clean-air program director for the Sierra Club.

Carman, who worked for 12 years for the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, noted that the Houston Ship Channel has the largest concentration of petrochemical plants in the nation and that Harris and Brazoria counties rank among the nation's most polluted.

Data from the Transactional Records Access Clearing House show, however, that the number of new environmental prosecutions by the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas dwindled from 20 in fiscal 1998 to zero in 2005, the last year for which figures are available.

Bigger federal roleU.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle, who took office in March, said the figures collected by TRAC, a research group associated with Syracuse University, don't show that his office is involved in 17 cases under investigation or before a grand jury. The only two new prosecutions in fiscal 2006, which ended Sept. 30, were led by a special unit based in Washington, D.C., he said.

The sharp decline worries Sabrina Strawn, executive director of the Galveston-Houston Association for Smog Prevention, which has asked the federal government to take a stronger role.

Although TCEQ has primary responsibility for enforcing environmental laws, many environmentalists say the state agency has been ineffective and that federal prosecutors have a duty to fill the void. Roger Haseman, who heads the Harris County district attorney's environmental unit, said TCEQ rarely brings pollution cases to his office.

"Many violations were handled informally, but you would come back a year later and (violators) would be doing it again," Carman said.

Rebecca Rentz, TCEQ's regional air-quality director, disagreed, saying the agency works hard to reduce pollution.

No specialized staffJustice Department figures collected by TRAC show Houston's federal prosecutors ranked 78th among 94 offices across the nation in the percentage of environmental referrals prosecuted in 2000-05. DeGabrielle said, however, that his office prosecutes such cases whenever it has the evidence.

The Southern District consists of 43 counties stretching from Huntsville to Laredo and has the largest concentration of petrochemical operations in the country, according to U.S. Coast Guard and Environmental Protection Agency data.

Despite environmental groups' complaints about pollution, 2005 was the first fiscal year since 1992 without at least one new federal environmental prosecution here.

Such cases ranked last among 11 types of cases prosecuted, according to TRAC data for 2000-05. Nationally, environmental prosecutions by all federal judicial districts ranked eighth.

The only other U.S. attorney's office in Texas with a port and a heavy petrochemical presence, the Beaumont-based Eastern District, filed two environmental prosecutions in fiscal 2005.

Unlike some U.S. attorneys' offices in cities with serious environmental problems, such as Los Angeles, New Orleans and Miami, Houston's has no full-time prosecutor or team of prosecutors specializing in such cases. Eric Schaeffer, a former EPA official who now leads the Environmental Integrity Project in Washington, D.C., says this region has a greater need than anyplace else.

DOJ_NMG_0084520

EPA resources criticizedBut DeGabrielle said he doesn't have the staff or budget to spare someone for that role.

The only other office that can prosecute environmental crimes in Houston is the Harris County District Attorney's Office, whose environmental unit opened 203 cases last year, said Haseman, who has led the unit since 1991. Most cases were brought to him by a special Houston police unit.

The EPA brought at least three cases to his office last year, he said. TRAC data show the EPA took none to the U.S. Attorney's Office in fiscal 2005.

Shortly before his death in July, former U.S. Attorney Michael Shelby said he had never been satisfied with the number of environmental prosecutions by his office.

"This is one of the largest cities and ports in the world, and we can't generate one clean-air case? A city the size of ours deserves to have an aggressive environmental team," said Shelby, who was U.S. attorney here from December 2001 to June 2005.

He blamed the EPA, saying it has not provided enough investigators. Four EPA investigators here and one special agent in charge are responsible for all of the Southern District.

EPA denies understaffing

Via e-mail, the EPA denied being understaffed and said the TRAC data differ from its own. Officials refused to comment further.

Shelby said his office received so few EPA cases that his criminal enforcement chief urged him to have all environmental cases prosecuted by the Justice Department's environmental crimes section in Washington.

Although the advice was not followed, DeGabrielle said that unit is involved in three current environmental cases here, two of which led to the filing of charges.

Heavy workloadAmong the reasons for the scarcity of federal environmental prosecutions here is the U.S. Attorney's Office caseload, the heaviest in the nation. There also are budget constraints, priorities set in Washington and the complexity of environmental cases, prosecutors and environmental groups say.

TRAC figures show the local office prosecuted 20,758 cases of all types in fiscal 2005 — about 13,000 more than were handled by the Arizona office, the next-busiest.

"The immigration and narcotics cases that come in are overwhelming," DeGabrielle said. "All this at a time that I am down 13 prosecutors that I cannot hire because of our budget."

He said environmental crimes are not among the top priorities set by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, but they will be prosecuted.

Environmental cases, especially violations of the Clean Air Act, are among the most difficult to prosecute, said Eric Reed, who handled such cases as an assistant U.S. attorney under Shelby.

The criminal cases are so hard to prove that many jurisdictions file lawsuits instead. Criminal cases require proof that someone meant to break the law, but civil cases often require only proof that a violation occurred.

Jim Tarr, a consultant who sat on the Texas Air Control Board in the 1970s, says it boils down to a political problem.

"And until those political problems get solved, the people of Houston will suffer," he said.

Power Execs Foresee Carbon Emission Caps (AP)

By Brad Foss

AP, October 22, 2006

When Duke Energy Corp. CEO James E. Rogers considers global warming, he sees more than a costly quagmire for the U.S. power industry; he sees grand monuments. Notre Dame in Paris, St. Peter's Basilica in Rome.

Rogers has adopted what he calls "cathedral thinking," a view that tackling climate change is a chance for the industry to leave a proud environmental legacy for future generations.

DOJ_NMG_0084521

This philosophy may not deliver results as quickly as environmentalists would like, or sit well with all his counterparts, but it does aptly describe an approach toward reducing greenhouse gases that a small but growing number of power executives are embracing.

"The science says we need to act," said Rogers. Of course, shifting political winds are an equally persuasive force in an industry that accounts for almost 40 percent of U.S. carbon dioxide emissions.

Rogers and many other executives are convinced the United States is likely to join Europe in placing limits on carbon dioxide emissions — believed by scientists to cause global warming — perhaps as early as next decade. This rising expectation of mandatory carbon caps is reviving interest in nuclear power, accelerating the use cleaner coal-burning technologies and spurring investment in alternative fuels such as wind and biomass.

Some of the country's biggest power producers are even setting voluntary greenhouse-gas reduction goals now in hopes of gaining a competitive edge down the road.

"The first movers now kind of realize... there will be a carbon regime in this country," said Peter Fusaro, chairman of Global Change Associates and a longtime proponent of clean energy. "This is not just talk," he added.

Despite good intentions, however, it will likely be several decades before any meaningful progress is made on reducing carbon emissions, according to experts on energy and the environment. That is because half the country's electricity comes from burning coal — by far the largest industrial source of carbon dioxide — and the most promising technology for capturing these emissions and sequestering them underground is still in the experimental phase.

Meantime, the Edison Electric Institute, the industry's main trade association, is lobbying to prevent mandatory carbon caps, calling them an unnecessary financial burden at a time when the power industry needs to invest billions just to meet anticipated demand.

Rogers, who is the chairman of EEI through next June and welcomes economy-wide carbon caps, is at odds with the association's official position: it favors voluntary measures, a stance also advocated by the Bush administration.

U.S. electricity demand is expected to rise by about 1.5 percent a year, resulting in a 50 percent increase from current levels by 2030. Factor in the anticipated industrialization of China, India and other developing nations, and the global rate of growth for electricity demand is even higher.

The Electric Power Research Institute forecasts that, with today's technology, global carbon dioxide emissions will more than double by 2050 to 80 billion metric tons a year. The U.S. already accounts for more than 7 billion tons a year.

Increasing energy efficiency standards and deploying "improved versions" of today's power plants would substantially slow the rate of growth, according to EPRI, a non-profit that provides scientific and technical research on electricity. But in order to actually reduce annual global carbon dioxide emissions by 2050, EPRI estimates that nearly half of the world's electricity would need to come from carbon-free fuels, such as nuclear, wind and solar. Today, carbon-free fuels account for a third of global power generation.

This is one reason why some U.S. power executives vow to fight carbon limits unless the constraints are carried out worldwide.

"The issue is global warming, not U.S. warming," said Mike Morris, the chief executive of American Electric Power of Columbus, Ohio, the largest coal-burning utility in the country. Unless China, India and other developing nations also are forced to adopt costly alternatives to traditional fossil fuels, U.S. manufacturers — a major customer for AEP — will be at an unfair competitive disadvantage, Morris said.

But Morris has a pragmatic side as well, which is why AEP is part of a small group of companies that has voluntarily agreed to cap their carbon emissions in the United States as part of an experimental market that is based in Chicago.

Indeed, there is enough momentum at the state level that a critical mass of pragmatists say it would be foolish to ignore the writing on the wall in terms of eventual federal legislation.

• In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger last month signed legislation aimed at reducing greenhouse gas emissions from utilities, refineries and manufacturing plants to 1990 levels by 2020.

• In the Northeast, a regional "cap and trade" system of buying and selling emissions allowances is being developed to cut greenhouse gases from Maine to Delaware.

DOJ_NMG_0084522

• And more than 20 states require utilities to buy a share of their electricity from renewables such as wind, solar and geothermal energy.

Some opponents of mandatory carbon caps say the power industry would be better off with one federal standard than a hodgepodge of state regulations with which to comply. But, either way, the basic principle of putting a price on carbon is gaining traction: the Congressional Budget Office said last month that any cost-effective U.S. policy on global warming will require emissions taxes or a cap and trade system similar to Europe's.

It is against this backdrop of legislative activity at the state level — and with help from federal tax breaks included in last year's energy bill — that some utilities are tweaking their long-term strategies.

David Crane, the head of Princeton, N.J.-based NRG Energy, said at a recent conference that the industry's long-standing attitude of "see no carbon, hear no carbon, speak no carbon" is increasingly out of touch with mainstream American values.

Crane, who oversaw NRG's July acquisition of wind-farm developer Padoma Wind Power, predicted that "companies and industries which deny the issue will be marginalized."

The growing long-term appeal of carbon-free power in the U.S. is exemplified by the phenomenal growth of wind power, which has quadrupled since 2000 to more than 10,000 megawatts nationwide. That said, wind still represents less than 1 percent of all U.S. power capacity.

Perhaps more telling is the resurgence of interest in the U.S. for nuclear power, whose image was battered by the Three Mile Island accident in 1979 and bruised by the Chernobyl accident in 1986. Concerns about nuclear waste also run high.

But sensing that public resistance to nuclear will wane as concerns about global warming rise, more than a dozen companies, including Duke, NRG, Entergy Corp. and Exelon Corp., have notified the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission that they plan to apply for licenses to build new reactors.

Notifications began pouring in after Congress passed an energy bill last summer that included tax credits and other perks to encourage nuclear power, which is also seen as a way to become less reliant on high and volatile natural-gas prices.

Constellation Energy Group Inc. of Baltimore, in a partnership with France's Areva called UniStar Nuclear, is considering building five new reactors, including one each at existing nuclear facilities in Maryland and New York.

For Constellation, nuclear is "the most preferred energy supply of the future," said Mike Wallace, head of the company's power-generation division.

If all goes smoothly, the first new reactor in the U.S. since the mid-1970s could be completed within ten years, analysts and industry officials said.

While nuclear presents a significant opportunity in the fight against carbon emissions, the country's unbridled dependence on traditional coal is a major obstacle.

More than 150 new coal plants have been proposed in the U.S., which has the world's largest coal reserves. And while there is much optimism about the long-term potential for "clean coal" technology, it will only be used in about 10 percent of the plants currently on the drawing board.

Even these so-called coal gasification plants will not solve global warming overnight. While they are far more efficient than older coal plants, the real promise rests in their compatibility with emissions-capture equipment. Unfortunately, "a laundry list of technical challenges" could take a decade or more to resolve, according to Revis James, director of EPRI's technology assessment division.

The dearth of simple carbon-free solutions leaves an executive like Duke's Rogers in a difficult position. Sure, he is making plans to add nuclear and coal-gasification power plants, but an important aspect of "cathedral thinking" is a recognition that addressing global warming requires immediate action.

For that reason, Rogers is promoting the need for greater energy efficiency whenever he can.

But in order for that to succeed, Rogers said elected officials and regulators will have to come up with financial incentives that will encourage utilities to sell less electricity.

"Hope," he said, "is not a plan."

DOJ_NMG_0084523

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Feds Set Sights On Gun Buys (ABH)

By Joe Johnson

Athens (GA) Banner-Herald, October 22, 2006

More investigations to target illegal sales

The owner of a Madison County gun shop told a convicted felon that silencers were "illegal as hell," but that he had a contact in Florida who could make one.

Within nine months, the felon bought two silencers from 46-year-old Michael Curtis Oakley of Athens, in addition to a revolver, three semi-automatic pistols, an assault rifle and boxes of ammunition - all without a background check or filling out the required paperwork.

That's the allegation in a complaint filed this week in U.S. District Court in Athens. An agent with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives said that a felon wore a hidden camera and microphone to capture each illegal transaction, as he helped make a case against the owner of Oakley Outdoor Sports in downtown Colbert.

The complaint convinced a U.S. magistrate on Monday to authorize police and ATF agents to arrest Oakley for violating federal firearms regulations. The magistrate also signed warrants that led authorities to seize dozens of weapons from Oakley's gun shop and search his house at 356 Oak Meadows Drive, where officials confiscated documents and other evidence.

The agent's complaint purports to show how guns are winding up on the streets and in the wrong hands, even when the source is a federally licensed firearms dealer.

In a similar ATF sting last month, authorities arrested another Athens man and four others for allegedly trafficking in guns at the J&J Flea Market in Jackson County. According to indictments filed in U.S. District Court in Gainesville, the men weren't licensed firearms dealers, but they sold guns to convicted felons, illegal immigrants and an undercover ATF agent posing as an out-of state resident.

Agents seized 130 firearms in that case.

Firearms trafficking is not necessarily on the rise, but the number of investigations to find the source of illegal guns is, according to Special Agent Marc Jackson of the ATF's Atlanta field division.

"Part of our mission is to reduce violent crime and protect the public by disrupting the source (of illegal guns), and that source could be the dealers themselves," Jackson said.

Federal, state and local law enforcement agencies are working more closely in the wake of Project Safe Neighborhoods, according to Jackson. The 2001 initiative has tripled the number of suspects police and ATF agents forward to the U.S. Justice Department for prosecution, he said.

Backed by $1.5 billion in federal money, Project Safe Neighborhoods also has allowed the ATF to hire more agents to help state and local police to decide whether cases should be prosecuted on the federal level and train licensed dealers to spot "straw buyers" who buy guns in their own names for people who cannot.

"It's a collaborative effort which seeks to combat the problem of gun violence through more aggressive prosecutions," Jackson said.

Athens-Clarke police Lt. Mike Hunsinger, who heads the Western Judicial Circuit Drug Task Force, says his unit's investigations are the main way local police find illegal weapons, because guns and drugs go hand in hand.

"Any time we recover a firearm associated with a drug-related crime, we pursue federal prosecution if needed," Hunsinger said. "We're working more closely with the ATF than ever to conduct these investigations."

In Oakley's case, it took a criminal to catch another alleged criminal.

According to the ATF agent's complaint, an informant who pleaded guilty to unspecified drug charges, but hadn't yet been sentenced, told Athens-Clarke police last December that Oakley had sold guns to another convicted felon and known drug trafficker.

DOJ_NMG_0084524

The informant was not given or promised anything in return for the information, according to the ATF agent, and had helped Athens-Clarke police in at least seven previous investigations that landed two other people in federal custody on drug and firearms charges.

Oakley allegedly violated several federal laws when he sold guns to the informant, including failing to note transactions in an "acquisition and disposition" ledger that licensed dealers are required to maintain.

Oakley's gun shop also held weapons that weren't registered under the National Firearms Act, according to the ATF complaint. Under the law, licensed dealers must register and pay taxes on certain firearms and accessories, like machine-guns and silencers.

Since it's illegal for a dealer to sell guns to certain people - convicted felons, illegal aliens, dishonorably discharged soldiers and people convicted of misdemeanor domestic violence - gun sellers must conduct background checks on customers.

And each time he sells a gun, the dealer must file a form with the ATF that has the buyer's information on it.

Dealers must keep records for each transaction for 20 years, according to Jackson, and those records help investigators trace the history of a gun used in a crime from the time it was made to the last time it was sold.

Joseph Thornton Jr., who manages Thornton's Pawn Center for his father, is a federally licensed gun dealer who says some dealers don't keep proper records because they are too lazy.

"There is a lot of paperwork you've got to do, but either you want to do the right thing or not," Thornton said. "We've been in business 27 years and I'd like to stay in business another 27 years, and if I abide by the law, I will be in business."

Some people sell guns without licenses because the black market is lucrative, according to Thornton, who said he saw an assault-style rifle sold at J&J Flea Market before last month's sting, and recognized the black market price was twice the legitimate value.

"There's so much money that can be made and people allow the fruit to become so tasty," he said.

TAX:

5 (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Taxing Lessons, 20 Years In the Making

Twenty years ago today, President Ronald Reagan signed into law the broadest revision of the federal income tax in history. The Tax Reform Act of 1986 -- the biggest and most controversial legislative story of its time -- had lawmakers, lobbyists and journalists in Washington in an uproar for two years. Despite nearly dying several times, the measure eventually passed, producing a simpler code with fewer tax breaks and significantly lower rates. The changes affected every family and business in the nation.

In the years since, however, rates have gradually risen and Congress has passed nearly 15,000 changes to the tax law. Many of the loopholes that disappeared two decades ago are back. Now, as then, politicians (including President Bush) are branding the income tax unfair and calling for reform. And now, as then, few expect it to happen.

But what lessons from the tax revisions of 1986 might apply to a similar effort today?

1 Fair or simple -- take your pick. Politicians claim to desire a tax system that is both fair and simple, but one goal precludes the other. The tax code can be fair -- meaning that the government offers taxpayers incentives to do meritorious deeds such as buy houses and give to charity. Or it can be simple -- devoid of those exceptions and complications. But it can't be both. In '86, Congress bought off state and local governments by keeping their pet tax breaks alive, clearing the way for the elimination of hundreds of less resilient benefits and the creation of a much simpler code.

2 Divide and conquer. Divided government is a boon to reform, not an obstacle. In 1986, Republicans controlled the White House and the Senate while Democrats held the House. Neither party wanted the blame for killing a bill that the public favored, so the measure kept moving forward. If the Democrats take back the House, Senate or both in next month's elections, that could be good news for advocates of Tax Reform II.

DOJ_NMG_0084525

3 Block K Street. Any tax-reform effort will be doomed if lobbying groups are united against it. In 1986, light industries such as wholesalers and consumer-products companies supported reform because they wanted lower tax rates, whereas heavy industries such as steel makers and oil refiners wanted to hold on to their tax breaks and thus tried to squash the bill. (In fact, the bill spurred so much lobbying on both sides that pundits dubbed it the Lobbying Relief Act of 1986.) A new tax reform would have to create -- or hope for -- a similar rift. However, K Street has grown much more powerful since then. Having learned the hard way 20 years ago, lobbyists are wise to that game now.

4 Stick it in neutral. Tax reform passed 20 years ago in part because its drafters decided early on that the measure should be "revenue neutral," that is, neither raise nor lower overall taxes. However, today's already stressed system doesn't raise enough money to fund the federal government and will soon be deeper in the hole thanks to the exploding costs of Social Security and Medicare. Any future reform probably would have to increase tax revenue, whether through rejiggering the code or by introducing new taxes -- making reform efforts that much more difficult and unlikely.

5 Don't lose those hedge clippers. The tax code is like shrubbery. The more severely it's pruned, the bigger and stronger it will grow back. Whatever changes a new bout of tax reform might bring, interest groups will almost certainly persuade Congress to clutter the code once again. If a second tax reform act comes to pass, rest assured that a third one will be needed a couple of decades later.

kstreetconfidential@washpost.com

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Newest Vets Fed Up With VA Care (CHIST)

By Shamus Toomey

Chicago Sun-Times, October 22, 2006

As an Army combat medic in Iraq, Sgt. Bob Stead was proud to wear the uniform and proud to help wounded soldiers.

But after getting his right leg blown apart and becoming a wounded soldier himself in 2003, Stead says he often doesn't see the same level of pride from the Veterans Affairs Department workers who help treat him.

"If you've got a job taking care of veterans, you should be proud to come to work," said Stead, 34, of Addison.

So Stead went to Rosemont this weekend to try to do something about it. He was part of a national conference sponsored by Amvets that aims to improve the lives of young veterans by using their experiences to reshape the VA.

The first National Symposium for the Needs of Young Veterans drew hundreds of vets to the Hyatt Regency O'Hare during its four-day run, which ended Saturday. They listened to speakers like retired Gen. Tommy Franks and Democratic congressional nominee Tammy Duckworth, and broke into small groups to come up with answers.

VA holds off on commenting "The goal is to develop an update of the veterans' benefits system," said Thomas C. McGriff, national commander of Amvets. "The system really hasn't been looked at since World War II -- and we now have a new set of young veterans coming from Iraq and Afghanistan."

Amvets plans to compress what it learned from the vets into a report to be released Nov. 9 in Washington, D.C.

The VA had nearly a dozen senior benefits officials at the conference but will wait to see what recommendations Amvets develops before commenting, VA spokesman Ryan Steinback said.

For Stead, he wants to see more accountability for VA workers who deal directly with the veterans. He was injured outside of Fallujah three years ago and is still in constant pain from his leg injury.

He recognizes that, with his severe post traumatic stress disorder, he is not always the easiest patient to deal with. But he still fumes at "being treated like crap" at some VA facilities during his recovery. "The bottom line is, the vets are the customers," he said.

'No magic pill' Steinback said "we certainly hope that is not the average experience at our medical centers," and noted that VA centers nationwide have better customer satisfaction records than non-military hospitals.

DOJ_NMG_0084526

At the Jesse Brown VA Medical Center on the Near West Side, a program named CREW -- Civility, Respect and Engagement in the Workplace -- was implemented in August. An outside consultant is on site, assessing the customer service environment, Steinback said. A goal is to make sure workers know that "only their best efforts are good enough for veterans," he said.

Stead knows there's "no magic pill" but hopes the Amvets efforts lead to something positive.

"I'm hoping that with a louder voice, if a mass of people come together with some ideas and say, 'This is what we want,' some measure of change can come," he said.

OTHER NEWS:

U.S. Stocks' Three-Week Rally Slows After Dow Reaches Record (BLOOM)

By Michael Tsang

Bloomberg, October 22, 2006

Oct. 21 (Bloomberg) -- A three-week rally in U.S. stocks, which lifted the Dow Jones Industrial Average past 12,000 for the first time, slowed this week as earnings from Caterpillar Inc. and JPMorgan Chase & Co. underscored concern that profit growth has peaked.

Technology shares such as Applied Materials Inc. dropped after semiconductor-equipment orders slowed and Intel Corp., the world's largest chipmaker, said it plans to spend less this year.

``While the growth continues, it continues at a diminishing rate," said Cummins Catherwood, who helps manage $750 million at Walnut Asset Management LLC in Philadelphia. ``It gives you a little bit of pause in terms of your euphoria."

The Dow industrials added 0.4 percent to 12,002.37 after rising to a record three times this week. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index gained 0.2 percent to 1368.60. The Nasdaq Composite Index declined 0.6 percent to 2342.30.

For the Dow and the S&P 500, the gains were the smallest since the week ended in Aug. 4, while the Nasdaq's loss snapped a three-week winning stretch. Heightened concern that profit growth will deteriorate in coming quarters amid a slowing economy held back the market.

Earnings of S&P 500 companies will climb 8.8 percent in the first three months of 2007, according to Thomson Financial on Oct. 20. That would snap a string of 14 straight quarters of at least 10 percent growth, the longest such streak in five decades.

Economic Reports

Reports this week also cast more doubt on the economy's strength. Industrial production in September fell the most in a year, while manufacturing in the Philadelphia area unexpectedly contracted this month. The Conference Board's index of leading indicators, which points to the direction of the economy in the next three to six months, rose less than expected in September.

Industrial stocks, which include Caterpillar, led declines among the 10 industry groups in the S&P 500 this week, falling 1 percent.

Caterpillar, whose fourfold gain has led the Dow's rally from the average's trough in October 2002, slumped more than 14 percent to $59.

The world's largest maker of earth-moving equipment said sales growth next year will be flat to 5 percent, citing a slowdown in the U.S. economy triggered by the housing slump. Its third-quarter profit also rose less than analysts' forecasts.

JPMorgan, the third-largest U.S. bank, paced declines among financial shares. The stock declined 2.2 percent to $47.12 after touching an all-time high last week.

`Some Apprehension'

Revenue from consumer banking declined after demand for mortgages slumped, JPMorgan said, while lower fees and interest income led to a drop in credit-card revenue.

``The rate of earnings growth is slowing and that is causing some apprehension in the market," said Joel Binder, who oversees about $1 billion as chief investment officer at Aurora, Illinois- based Old Second Wealth Management.

DOJ_NMG_0084527

Technology-related shares posted some of the market's biggest declines. The Philadelphia Semiconductor Index, which tracks 19 chip-related companies, fell 5.1 percent for the week, the biggest such drop since July.

Chip-equipment companies reported September orders that indicate chipmakers may be slowing their capacity expansion for a third straight month, according to a report by Semiconductor Equipment & Materials International.

Meanwhile, Intel lowered its spending budget on new plants and equipment to a maximum of $5.9 billion from a forecast of about $6.2 billion.

Applied Materials, the world's biggest maker of semiconductor-production equipment, slid 9.3 percent to $17.25.

Good and Bad

Novellus Systems Inc., which also makes semiconductor- production equipment, slumped 7.7 percent to $26.81. The company forecast revenue that missed analysts' estimates.

SanDisk Corp., the world's largest maker of flash-memory cards, plunged almost 17 percent to $49.15 after price cuts eroded its third-quarter profit. SanDisk expects prices to decline 15 percent to 20 percent in the fourth quarter from the previous three months.

Disappointing results from industrial, financial and technology companies were mixed with earnings from health-care companies that exceeded expectations.

Johnson & Johnson advanced 6.3 percent to $68.62 in the week. The maker of health products from Band-aids to schizophrenia pills said third-quarter earnings rose, led by sales of prescription drugs. Profit excluding certain costs beat the average analysts' estimate, and J&J raised its 2006 forecast.

Merck & Co. rallied 5.7 percent to $45.64. The drugmaker raised its full-year profit forecast for the third time this year to a range of $2.18 to $2.25 a share from an earlier range of $2.10 to $2.24.

UnitedHealth Group Inc. gained 4 percent to $50.70. The largest U.S. provider of health insurance reported third-quarter net income jumped 38 percent after acquisitions raised the number of policyholders. The profit beat analysts' estimates by 3 cents, and UnitedHealth increased its forecast for next year.

Newsweek Says 55% Of U.S. Public Plans To Vote For Democrats (BLOOM)

By Neil Roland

Bloomberg, October 22, 2006

By a 55-to-37 percent margin, Americans who say they are likely to vote in the Nov. 7 elections plan to cast their ballots for Democratic candidates, according to a new Newsweek poll.

The Democrats have gained among both white Catholics and white evangelicals in the last two years, the poll released today showed. Among independents, 44 percent favor the Democrat in their district while 34 percent prefer the Republican candidate.

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to win control of the House and six to gain control of the Senate. While President George W. Bush has predicted that the Republicans will keep their congressional majorities, former House Majority Leader Richard Armey, a Texas Republican, said yesterday that Democrats may gain a majority of 10 seats in the House.

In the Newsweek poll, Bush's approval rating is at 35 percent, with 57 percent of Americans saying they disapprove of his performance. In an all-time low in the survey, 65 percent of Americans said the U.S. is losing ground in efforts to build security and democracy in Iraq.

A majority of respondents -- 56 percent, including 23 percent of Republicans -- said they believe Bush won't be able to achieve much for the rest of his second term.

The poll showed that 60 percent of white evangelicals plan to vote for a Republican candidate, and 31 percent for a Democrat. Exit polls after the 2004 elections found that 74 percent of white evangelicals voted for Republicans, while 25 percent voted for Democrats, Newsweek said.

In today's poll, Democrats received the support of 44 percent of white Catholics, while 42 percent said the planned to vote for Republicans. Catholics overwhelmingly supported Bush in the 2004 presidential election.

DOJ_NMG_0084528

Asked to name the issue that is most important to their vote, 31 percent of respondents cited Iraq, 18 percent said the economy and 16 percent said health care.

Princeton Survey Research Associates International, which conducted the survey, interviewed 1,000 adults aged 18 and older on Oct. 19-20. The margin of error is plus or minus 4 percentage points.

A Possibly Fatal Flaw In GOP Formula For Success (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

The great risk in President Bush's political strategy has always been that it leaves him very little margin for error.

From the outset of his presidency, Bush has accepted division as the price of mobilization.

With a few exceptions, such as education and immigration policy, he has targeted his central initiatives — tax cuts, judicial appointments, the unilateral projection of U.S. power abroad — primarily at the priorities of conservatives while conceding little to interests outside his coalition.

In Congress and across the country, that ideologically polarizing agenda has helped Bush unify and excite Republicans. But it has come at the cost of antagonizing Democrats and straining his relations with independent voters.

This strategy has rested on the calculation that if Bush generates enough turnout on election day from Republicans and conservative-leaning independents, he can survive unease among moderate independents and intense opposition from Democrats.

On balance, that equation worked for Bush in his first term. Bolstered by his post-9/11 glow, Bush inspired an enormous Republican turnout that spurred GOP congressional gains in 2002. In 2004, another Republican surge powered gains in Congress and Bush's reelection over Democrat John F. Kerry. For Karl Rove and other top GOP strategists, those victories were evidence that Bush was building a narrow but stable electoral majority.

But even amid success, the limitations of the strategy were evident. Although Bush inspired passionate commitment from his supporters, he did not generate anywhere near the breadth of support that other two-term presidents, such as Dwight D. Eisenhower or Ronald Reagan, achieved at their apogee.

Bush's margin of victory over Kerry, measured as a share of the popular vote, was the smallest ever for a reelected president. Even in the usual post-election honeymoon period, Bush's approval rating never exceeded 55% in Gallup surveys, below the high point for every other reelected president since World War II. Bush's support fell back beneath 50% even before his second inauguration.

All of this meant that even on Bush's best days, nearly half the country opposed him and his direction. That didn't leave him with much of a cushion for bad days, which have come in bunches during his second term.

A combination of missteps (the faltering federal response to Hurricane Katrina) and miscalculations (the Terri Schiavo case, the crash of the Social Security restructuring plan) topped by the relentless, grinding violence and disorder in Iraq, have kept Bush on the defensive almost constantly since early 2005.

Because Bush started with backing from only about half the country, these reversals have lowered him, and his party, to dangerous depths. His approval rating since mid-2005 has rarely reached 45%, and he is now limping into the midterm election with support in most surveys below 40%.

That discontent over Bush's performance and decisions, especially concerning Iraq, is the largest factor threatening the GOP hold on the House and Senate.

One measure of Bush's impact on the election comes from the Majority Watch project conducted by the polling firms RT Strategies and Constituent Dynamics. Since the summer, the project has conducted nearly 75,000 automated phone surveys in congressional districts around the country. And it has found a close correlation between attitudes about Bush and preferences in November.

Tom Riehle, a partner at RT Strategies, recently cumulated the results of the project's interviews. He found that 80% of voters who approve of Bush's performance say they intend to vote Republican for Congress next month. But 77% of those who disapprove intend to vote Democratic.

DOJ_NMG_0084529

That result partly reflects the intense partisanship of our time. But even among independents, attitudes toward Bush are a clear dividing line. Fully 71% of independents who approve of him say they will vote Republican. But 73% of independents who disapprove are voting Democratic.

The obvious danger for Republicans is that far more voters in the surveys disapprove (53%) than approve of Bush's performance (39%). Among independents, those who disapprove outnumber supporters by 2 to 1.

Bush's decline is exposing Republican candidates to different risks in different places. In Democratic-leaning states, Republicans who have survived as moderates are facing more resistance from center-left voters reluctant to help Bush advance his agenda by providing the GOP another vote in Congress.

"He's a really good and decent man, but he empowers the Bush administration," Anne Crofts of Providence said at a recent local Democratic rally to explain why she would vote against moderate Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.).

In states that are more conservative, Republicans confront two risks. The lesser threat is that Bush's assorted second-term disputes with conservative leaders and the congressional sex scandal may somewhat depress turnout by the GOP base. The bigger danger is a powerful desire for change even among many voters who philosophically tilt more toward Republicans than Democrats. Voters "are overlooking a lot of things about the Democrats that would normally bother them because they want change," said one senior GOP strategist.

Bush is once again stressing sharp-edged ideological differences with Democrats on taxes and national security; maybe that will rally enough conservatives to the polls to avoid a deluge on Nov. 7. But if a deluge comes, more of the Republicans looking to succeed Bush in 2008 may ask whether a political strategy that provokes so much opposition, even on its strongest days, can be sustained. They may also question whether the White House vision of a narrow but stable electoral majority is a contradiction in terms.

ronald.brownstein@latimes.com

Ronald Brownstein's column appears every Sunday. See current and past Brownstein columns on The Times' website at http://www.latimes.com/brownstein.

Voter Ire May Tip Scale In House (BOS)

The Boston Globe, October 22, 2006

Democrats seize on scandals, war

The following story was reported and written by Susan Milligan, Rick Klein, and Bryan Bender of the Globe staff.

DELHI, Ohio -- As Democratic House candidate John Cranley works the bingo halls and street festivals of Cincinnati, he hands out blue plastic cups that he hopes will help knock Representative Steve Chabot out of office -- and House Republicans out of the majority.

"Had enough?" the cups said.

To the distress of a Republican Party that has held control of the House for the past dozen years, many voters across the country seem to be nodding in angry agreement with Cranley's assertion, according to interviews with voters in four states and new polls showing a double-digit preference for Democratic control of the House.

But no single issue is motivating voters' disaffection with the GOP -- and some issues, such as the Iraq war, are hurting the Republicans differently in various parts of the country.

Those in the Northeast want a quick withdrawal from Iraq, while more conservative, traditionally pro military districts in Pennsylvania are hopeful that Democrats will manage the war more competently than Republicans.

Voters from New York to California are questioning their representatives' commitment to ethics, and those in post industrial pockets of the Midwest are nervous about their economic security.

Voters' anger over such a disparate collection of issues is threatening the political lives of even seasoned Republicans, and Democratic challengers with little or no experience are registering strong support in polls.

"This election is about change versus the status quo," said Cranley, a 32-year-old Cincinnati city councilor, at a debate in Delhi on Wednesday night. "It is a do-nothing Congress at best. It's a corrupt Congress at worst."

DOJ_NMG_0084530

As Democrats have risen in polls over the past three weeks, a growing number of seats -- perhaps as many as 58 -- are now considered in play by the national parties and independent analysts. Democrats need to pick up 15 Republican-held seats to retake the majority.

An unusual bipartisan poll released last week showed that 51 percent of voters in 50 of the most competitive districts want the Democrats running the House, compared with 40 percent who want Republicans in charge. When voters were asked about their own districts, Democrats were favored 50 percent to 43 percent, according to the poll conducted by Democrat Stan Greenberg and Republican Glen Bolger .

John Zogby , an independent pollster, said his data shows the Democrats poised to pick up 25 to 30 seats, even though the party has not offered a detailed agenda; rather, a confluence of events has turned voters against Republicans.

"If the Democrats win, it will be a Forrest Gump victory, with things swirling around them over which they had very little control," Zogby said.

GOP candidates still have more than two weeks to turn things around, and a major event, such as a terrorist attack, or a massive infusion of cash from Republican donors, could help the GOP eke out critical victories.

And it remains to be seen whether voters will opt for untested Democrats like Cranley over Republicans like Chabot, a six-term incumbent who rang up 60 percent of the vote in 2004.

But the fact that Chabot's district is considered in play points to the extent of voter anger against incumbents.

"I look at Congress now, and I wonder if they have lost touch with your average person," said Terri Rolfes , an administrative assistant at a Cincinnati-area Christian publishing company who is considering switching her vote to Democratic. "Maybe it's time for a change."

In upstate New York and beyond, corruption puts GOP seats in play Gasport, N.Y., is friendly territory for a moderate, antiabortion Republican like Representative Thomas Reynolds, who has held the Buffalo-area seat for a decade. Some of the district's rural churches plant rows of tiny crosses in their yards to mark abortions, while affluent suburbanites applaud Reynolds's commitment to lower taxes.

But the news last month that Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, had written sexually explicit e-mails to teenage House pages, put the spotlight on GOP leaders like Reynolds, the chairman of the committee charged with getting other Republicans elected to Congress.

Reynolds was contending with local frustration over the war and the economy. But the revelation that Reynolds had known of Foley's overly friendly e-mails to one page when he encouraged the Florida representative to seek reelection earlier this year has turned more voters against him.

"I certainly won't be voting for him," said Elizabeth Shabala, a 40-year-old speech pathologist, as she visited a local pumpkin farm. "This isn't an issue of Republicans versus Democrats. It's about protection of children."

Democratic challengers have used the Foley scandal to portray Republicans as more concerned with their political futures than the safety of teenagers. Democratic contenders in Indiana, New York, Minnesota, and New Mexico have used the Foley scandal in ads, while numerous others have done so in debates.

Democrats had sought to make the "culture of corruption" a major campaign theme last year, after several GOP lawmakers were linked to lobbyist Jack Abramoff; former Representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham, Republican of California, was sent to prison for taking bribes; and former House majority leader Tom DeLay of Texas stepped down amid charges he misused campaign funds.

But the corruption theme didn't resonate until the Foley scandal, which undermined the "family values" the GOP has been trumpeting for years. While Republicans have sought to draw attention to Democratic corruption as well, the issue has hit Republicans harder.

At a minimum, formerly safe Republican seats held by Foley, who resigned after the scandal broke, Cunningham, DeLay, and Bob Ney of Ohio, who resigned after admitting to accepting bribes from Abramoff's clients, are now considered potential Democratic pickups.

DOJ_NMG_0084531

In addition, senior Republicans such as Reynolds and Representative Deborah Pryce of Ohio, the GOP's conference chair, are under fire for failing to take action against Foley. And some analysts think the ethics cases have combined to fuel voters' desire to clean house.

"The whole is bigger than the sum of its parts," said Lee Miringoff , director of the independent Marist Institute for Public Opinion. Voters were "already grumpy about the performance of Congress," and the accumulation of scandals could tip the scales in close races, he said.

In conservative sections of Pennsylvania, voters reassess the war in Iraq Mizanur Rahman , perched behind the cash register of Halal Meat and Grocery in Upper Darby, Pa., nearly shouted when asked about his views on the Iraq war.

"We have made more enemies," he bellowed last Sunday, causing the butchers in the back of the store to look up from their carving table. "When our soldier kills their kid they are going to kill us. How many more enemies are we going to make?"

Most of Pennsylvania is not antiwar country, but many voters -- including Rahman -- have lost patience with the way the Iraq war is being run in Washington. Many who supported the invasion now say the war has been mishandled, and some are gravitating toward Democrats who are calling for new leadership -- but not an immediate pullout.

"More and more people -- I think a majority -- believe there must be a deliberate way out," said Joe Sestak , a former Navy admiral who is the Democratic nominee against 10-term incumbent Representative Curt Weldon . "They don't want to leave a mess, but they have come to the conclusion there is no military solution to this."

Sestak's message seems to be resonating. In a race that analysts earlier this year thought was safe for the GOP, Sestak has recently been running even with Weldon in most polls. Sestak's chances may have improved this week when the FBI raided the home of Weldon's daughter as part of an investigation into whether the representative assisted her public-relations firm.

Weldon denied any wrongdoing, and voters still seem more focused on the war than on last Monday's FBI raid.

Even in the so-called "T" of solidly Republican central and northern Pennsylvania, outside the urban orbits of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, concern about the war is helping Democrats.

The voter frustration has given a boost to Chris Carney, a college professor and intelligence officer in the Navy Reserve who hopes to be the first Democrat since 1960 to win the state's northeastern 10th district.

Carney is ahead of four-term Republican incumbent Representative Don Sherwood by double digits in some polls, and analysts attribute much of his gains to the unpopularity of the war in a district heavy with military families. At least 21 soldiers from the district have died in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Sherwood is also dogged by alleged improprieties: A woman with whom he was having an extramarital affair told authorities that he tried to strangle her. He acknowledged the affair but denied the abuse. A recent poll showed that the top issue for voters is Iraq, not Sherwood's personal conduct, said analyst Jonathan Williamson of Lycoming College in Williamsport.

"Among those [citing Iraq], most broke for Carney," Williamson said.

Carney has not called for a pullout; rather, he's pledged to stand up for the soldiers and help bring the war to an honorable end.

"I haven't called for a timeline -- I haven't pulled that trigger yet," Carney said in an interview last week in Clarks Summit, north of Scranton. "But I am starting to think seriously about it."

In the Northeast, no more patience for a war many feel shouldn't have started There is little such hesitation in the Northeast, where President Bush is deeply unpopular and some voters seem willing to toss out even highly respected moderate Republicans just because of their party affiliation.

Democrats ruefully note there is some precedent for a cleansing of the moderates: In 1994, when the Republicans took over the House, Southern voters ousted numerous long-serving moderate Democrats largely because of their affiliation with President Clinton.

"The war has pushed a lot of people over to thinking there ought to be a change in Washington," said Howard Reiter, the chairman of the political science department at the University of Connecticut, referring to the frustration with Republican moderates. "For the past 40 or 50 years, there's been a trend away from the Republican Party in New England and the greater Northeast. It's been a long time brewing."

DOJ_NMG_0084532

As a result, moderate Republican House members across the region are seeking to emphasize their ties to their districts, while distancing themselves from Bush.

In Connecticut, where anti war fervor helped political neophyte Ned Lamont defeat incumbent Senator Joseph I. Lieberman in the August Democratic primary, three Republicans are locked in down-to-the-wire House races.

Perhaps the most vulnerable is Representative Christopher Shays, a centrist from Connecticut's New York suburbs who has made 14 trips to Iraq to assess the progress of a war he enthusiastically supported. But he recently called for a timeline for troop withdrawal -- opening him up to charges of election-year pandering.

Democrat Diane Farrell, who came close to defeating Shays two years ago and is leading in some polls this year, is blasting Shays for supporting the war -- and mocking him for being an ineffectual opposition voice.

"When Chris Shays has agreed with the president, have the results been good?" Farrell said during a recent debate. "When he's disagreed with the Republican leadership, has it made any difference?"

Similar dynamics are playing out in New Hampshire, where Democrats are hoping to break into the all-Republican congressional delegation in the only state that flipped from President Bush in 2000 to his election rival, Senator John F. Kerry, in 2004.

In one district, antiwar activist Carol Shea-Porter beat the Democratic establishment's favored candidate to win the right to face Representative Jeb Bradley. And in another district, Democrat Paul Hodes is casting Representative Charles Bass's backing of the war as emblematic of his support for the Bush administration's "failed ideas."

Both Shea-Porter and Hodes trail in most polls, but Democratic strategists believe they are in striking distance.

"The larger context really is that Congress isn't working for us," Hodes said in an interview. "The administration and guys like Bass are in a state of denial."

In Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky, concerns about a loss of jobs The economy should be a selling point for Republicans, who have presided over growth in the gross domestic product, relatively low unemployment, and steady job creation. But in parts of the Midwest, voters who have lost jobs to overseas competitors don't want to hear about it.

In the traditional GOP strongholds of Indiana, Kentucky, and Ohio, the party is in danger of losing critical congressional seats because voters are uneasy about their personal finances. In Ohio, which has lost 200,000 manufacturing jobs in the past five years, two-thirds of residents believe the state's economy is worsening, according to a poll by the University of Cincinnati.

"[Representative Steve] Chabot continues to take money from oil companies, and I can't afford the price of gas," said Lee Valerio, a single mother from the Cincinnati suburb of Anderson. "We've lost jobs in Cincinnati, and people are always moving out of the city. We need a fresh face."

While Americans commonly list jobs and the economy as major concerns, the Republican Congress's solid performance on job growth and economic expansion over the past two years has not helped them in most places. Even the recent drop in gas prices has been met with skepticism: 42 percent of voters in a September Gallup poll said they thought gas prices were being manipulated by the Bush administration to influence the elections.

Brad Ellsworth, a Democratic candidate in Indiana, slammed GOP incumbent John Hostettler in a television ad for failing to get "tough" on gas "price-gouging," and bemoaned the high cost for parents driving children to soccer practice.

In Indiana and Iowa, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has run radio ads on the failure of the GOP-run House to raise the minimum wage. In a parody of a game show, an announcer says, "Let's play who deserves a pay raise!" The ad compares a hotel clerk who earns $5.15 an hour to Republican representatives who blocked minimum-wage increases, but voted a pay increase for themselves.

The Bush administration and some members of Congress frequently tout the good performance of the overall economy, but that's not likely to make a difference in critical districts, analysts say.

"It doesn't even make sense to talk about the national economy right now," said Jared Bernstein, an economist with the Economic Policy Institute. "The way the economy is playing out is very much local."

And that, like the war and corruption, is hurting the GOP.

Thinning The Herd (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0084533

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

"Tell us, why, again, Republicans need 55 senators?" Rush Limbaugh asked not long ago. "Why do we need 55 senators when we have so many malcontents and traitors in the bunch? And they all happen to be from the Northeast, and they all happen to be moderates, they all happen to be liberals."

In that spirit, the National Federation of Republican Assemblies set out to rid the party of this threat. It set up a "RINO Hunters Club" to "root out and hunt down" the squishy centrists who are Republicans in Name Only. The Club for Growth ran candidates to defeat them. Last week on his radio show, Sean Hannity blasted the RINO's again, saying they were costing good conservatives their jobs.

Well, this is one problem the Republican Party is solving. When the next Congress convenes, there will be many fewer RINO's in town. You look at the vulnerable Republicans and it's like a moderate Republican graveyard: Deborah Pryce, a bright and effective member from Ohio; Christopher Shays from Connecticut; Sweeney from New York; Gerlach from Pennsylvania; Reichert from Washington; DeWine from Ohio.

Why have 55 Republican senators? Why not 25? Why not 15 brave and true? Throw in a few dozen pure-minded Republican House members and you could hold the next Republican convention in a living room.

For the past several years, Republican elites have treated the moderates, upon whom their majority depended, as the deformed cousins of their movement. Congressmen from rock-ribbed Republican districts who've never had to confront a dissenting view applaud themselves for their manly courage while scorning the effete wispiness of Northeastern Republicans who go home and battle derision every weekend. The centrists themselves are so beaten down, they learned they can't even utter the word "moderate" in the halls of Congress. Instead, they unveiled what they called their "Suburban" agenda.

But the suburbs happen to be where this election is being fought — around Philadelphia, New York, Denver, Minneapolis and Columbus. The general rule is that Democrats win in the more densely populated suburbs close to the cities and the Republicans win the more sparsely populated ones farther out. The central fight in American politics now is over where the line is demarking the two zones, and the central Republican problem is that every time the party mobilizes its exurban base it further alienates the marginal voters in traditional suburbs where Congressional elections are won or lost.

The Republican moderates come from Lands' End and Eddie Bauer-rich tipping zones. The people in the office parks in these places may not be zillionaires, but they run the meeting planning firms that help HR executives facilitate sales force enrichment retreats.

They are looking for orderly places to raise their children. They are what you might call antiparty empiricists. They distrust partisans and can't imagine why anyone would be sick enough to base an identity on a political organization. They don't expect much from government but a few competently delivered services, and they don't like public officials who unnerve them.

The Republicans used to do well in these areas, but now it's as if they are purposely trying to antagonize the married moms at the pseudo-New Urbanist outdoor cafes. The deficits alarm them. Tom DeLay was a perfectly designed Northeastern alienation machine. As insular Democrats know little about what life is like in flyover country, so insular Republicans know little about how people think in the suburban Northeast, where blue New York Times delivery bags dot the driveways each morn.

The big issue is Iraq, but the core problem with suburban voters is not the decision to go to war; it's the White House's reaction to the mess afterward. As Robert Lang, the superlative suburban specialist at Virginia Tech, notes, when people mess up a project in an office park, there are consequences. But Donald Rumsfeld never gets fired. Jerry Bremer and Tommy Franks get medals.

This is not how engineers and empirically minded managers behave. The people in these offices manage information for a living, and when they see Republicans denying obvious trends, or shutting out relevant data, they say to themselves, "Those people are not like me."

So there goes your majority. In the years ahead, Republicans can either reintroduce themselves to the blue-state suburbs or they can ask themselves the dittohead question: Tell us, why, again, do we need to be a governing party anyway?

The Mere Midterms (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0084534

By Noah Feldman

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

When we go to the polls, we are doing two things at once. Pragmatically speaking, we are hoping to influence government policies and alter the behavior of the legislators and officials who design and implement them. Symbolically speaking, however, we're doing something more profound and less practical: expressing our collective verdict on the state of the nation. The people's voice is supposed to replace divine judgment as the ultimate yea or nay on the government in power: vox populi, vox dei.

Presidential elections still fulfill both of these functions. In the modern era, though, midterm elections have come to serve mainly as expressions of the public mood. Putting aside especially popular or unpopular local candidates, they offer a snapshot judgment on the president's performance — more like a midterm exam than a final that really counts. Voter turnout reflects these diminished stakes. Even though control of both the House and the Senate could change, and the late Bush years are politically charged times by any measure, we'll be lucky if more than 40 percent of the American electorate bothers to vote — as opposed to 60 percent in 2004.

Under the right circumstances, of course, a strong midterm result can directly influence policy making. The 1994 elections that brought Newt Gingrich to power in the House decisively shaped the remaining years of Bill Clinton's presidency, pushing him further to the right and bringing out his latent tendency to govern every day as if an election were being held the next. And even a lame-duck president can be affected by a clear midterm message if he wants to see his vice president elected and preserve his historical legacy.

This year, though, it is doubtful that the midterm elections will significantly alter the Bush administration's way of governing. For one thing, we're faced with the anomaly of the first vice president in recent times who has no intention of running for president himself. With the presidential election two years off, the Bush administration (read: Karl Rove) is very far from anointing a successor, if indeed it ever will. Of course, the Republican Party wants to win the White House in 2008, but the day he leaves office,

George W. Bush will no longer be the leader of that party. His own incentives are not necessarily aligned with those of the G.O.P. faithful.

Whether by coincidence or not, Bush is also a president who has been doggedly consistent in staying the course, come what may. Tax-cutting in the face of mounting deficits is one case in point, Iraq another. To his supporters, the continuity is a sign of his steadfast faith in his principles. To his critics, the intransigence reveals a president closed to new information, locked into dogmatic ideals and unable to accommodate reality. Both sides, though, agree that the president is no flip-flopper. That means he is particularly unlikely to change his policies as a result of a midterm message that the American people aren't satisfied with the job he's doing.

So what kind of a message will we the people send to Washington? Polls show that roughly 40 percent of Americans identify themselves as conservative and that their support for the president remains strong. On some issues, like immigration, the president has alienated parts of his right-wing base. (Of course, his views match not only those of globalist liberals but also of corporate America with its unceasing need for cheap labor.) But their frustration notwithstanding, true-red conservatives have nowhere else to go.

Another 20 percent of the electorate describe themselves as liberal, and it is safe to assume that few of them intend to vote Republican this year. That leaves the 40 percent of voters who consider themselves moderates. Those who voted for John Kerry are almost certainly going to vote Democratic again. (Do you know anybody who voted for Kerry in 2004 and wishes he hadn't?)

The people whose votes are in play this time are '04 Bush voters who are now disaffected by the president's performance. Any message in 2006 is going to have to come from them, and it will necessarily take the form of regret: I wish I'd voted for the other guy.

President Bush's low approval ratings seem to be owed to two main factors: the progressively worsening situation in Iraq and the perception, strengthened by the nonresponse to Hurricane Katrina, that the president is either incompetent himself or appoints incompetent people to important jobs. (The Foley sex scandal has been much in the news, but its impact may fade by Election Day.) It is notable, however, that neither of these serious problems — Iraq and the competence of the executive branch — can be readily affected through a midterm election. Even if the Democrats win big, they will not be able to effect substantial changes in either Bush's war policy or his ability to govern better.

DOJ_NMG_0084535

When it comes to making foreign policy, Congress has few if any prerogatives. It may have the power of the purse, but no Congress, and especially not a Democratic one, can afford to deny a president's requests for military spending to support troops on the ground. Our armed forces in Iraq will almost certainly remain there through the next two years — and they have to be financed until they come home. In a less partisan time, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee could function as an active player in the day-to-day shaping of foreign policy. Yet a glance at how the Bush administration has sidelined the moderate Republican leadership of that committee — Senators Richard Lugar and Chuck Hagel — suggests that a Democratically controlled committee would be even further out in the cold.

If the Democrats have little prospect of influencing Iraq policy, it is also because they have chosen not to adopt any policy of their own, except for occasionally calling for a nominal withdrawal deadline. This careful positioning reflects both the recognition that there's little they can do to change the president's mind and the political judgment that, for the most part, the public has not demanded more from them. Democrats do not want to be the first to declare that the war in Iraq has been lost. Although Americans overwhelmingly believe we are not doing well in Iraq, the Democrats cannot take the risk that the public will blame the messenger, equating those who acknowledge defeat with those who are responsible for defeat.

Nor can a Democratic Congress do much to make the Bush administration more competent. The Senate can block the most egregious nominees, helping to ensure that we will have no more appointments like the hapless Michael Brown, the man at the heart of the FEMA disaster. It can also keep at least some ideologues and nonentities off the federal courts — including the Supreme Court, should another spot open. But many of the most incompetent political hacks in any administration are below the radar of confirmation processes, and besides, someone has to fill the jobs that empty out late in an administration when the first-round draft picks head back to the private sector. If the Democrats do take the House, the Senate or both, many Republican Congressional aides will want to leave their now-minority staff positions for the prestige and power of the executive branch — and even if they can, Hill Democrats will be loath to block their former staff colleagues' nominations, knowing that some day in a Democratic administration, they too could be looking to make a similar move.

What that leaves the Democrats is oversight — an idea that right now gets their hearts racing but whose limits will eventually become apparent. With Democrats at the helm, Congress can certainly act in particular realms. It can try to limit secret wiretaps, assuming it can find them, and it can call cabinet secretaries and generals on the carpet to explain just why we are doing so badly in Iraq. There are old scandals to reopen, and no doubt plenty of new ones just waiting to be uncovered. What Congressional Democrats cannot do, however, is change the basic direction of the country. The president has not presided as a flexible man, and many of the problems Congress will confront are at present intractable. Government in the sunshine is a good thing — but a brightly lit Washington will still, mostly, be George W. Bush's Washington.

Dept. Of Advice (WP)

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

The clock is running out for Republicans hoping to keep control of Congress. Coaches and jocks step up to the plate with advice on what to do when it's fourth and long in the bottom of the ninth -- with the other team set to retake your House.

I would tell the GOP it's never over till it's over. Now, if you're down two touchdowns with 30 seconds left, yeah, it's over. But as far as the election goes, it's not even halftime. You've got to believe that people will come to their senses and rally around the team. Remember, the other team has never been in many winning situations. They don't know how to win. You're looking for them to be the Arizona Cardinals [who lost a two-touchdown lead in the final minutes] of last Monday night. They don't know what they're doing when the game is in the fourth quarter. You do.

-- Mark Rypien , former Super Bowl-winning quarterback for the Washington Redskins

* * *

Pundits, predictions and polls -- they don't mean anything. The only thing that matters is the final score. Think about how hard you've worked to get to this point. All those hours traveling to rallies, putting up signs, blogging, debating and ruining relationships with friends and family, kissing babies and shaking hands. There's a reason you play the game, guys. It's because you love your country. You have to trust the process. And when Election Day is over, no matter what happens, you need to be able to look each other in the eye and know that you left everything you have on the trail.

DOJ_NMG_0084536

-- Brenda Frese, coach of the University of Maryland
2005 NCAA championship women's basketball team

* * *

I remember one time when I was coaching football at Georgia Tech. We were behind 28-0 at halftime, and I had promised ABC I'd talk to them. The only thing you can talk about in a situation like that is that you've got to do everything you can to make the other team earn every yard -- or every vote. You can't give in to the score. The score is what you have at the end of the game, but after all is said and done, what you have to know is you made them fight and earn every yard. I'd approach the election the same way. We went out and had a magnificent second half, scored 27 points. We didn't win, but we made the other team realize they were in a fight. That's what politicians have to do, too. They can't listen to people booing them, they can't listen to the skeptics.

-- Pepper Rodgers , former football coach for Kansas, UCLA and Georgia Tech

In football, the focus should never be on the play that just happened but on the one about to take place. The past is gone and the future is all that matters. Same thing in campaigns. In these final weeks, voters are tuning in with a fine ear and candidates have the best opportunity to passionately articulate a plan for the future. So focus, show intensity and vividly describe how a voter's family, friends, loved ones and neighbors will be better off when your vision for America is implemented.

-- Steve Largent , former Republican congressman from Oklahoma and NFL Hall of Famer

* * *

As I would say to my players, it's not over till it's over! Never, ever give up! Fight with all your might. Pull every trick play you have out of your playbook and show them you're still the champions. Think about what it will be like if you should lose. That should be enough to ignite a fire in the weakest of the bunch. Remind the world what happened in Vietnam while Lyndon Johnson, a Democrat, was in office. Champions never quit. They fight to the bitter end through blood, sweat and tears! Life is tough. Life is football without a helmet.

-- John McKissick , head football coach,
Summerville (S.C.) High School, the winningest football coach in history

* * *

My advice to the Republicans is: Let it go. Let it go and wait for tomorrow. Sometimes you're down by 20 with three minutes left, you don't play hard anymore. You just finish up and wait for tomorrow. Tell them to concentrate on 2008, but not too hard.

Did I tell you I'm a Democrat?

-- Dikembe Mutombo , former Georgetown Hoya center, now with the NBA's Houston Rockets

* * *

Never give up. You've got to impress upon your opponent that one thing, that you haven't given up. And you have to regain the momentum in any way you can. If you have 5 or 10 minutes left in the fourth quarter and you're behind, you've gotta gain the momentum, make the other team make a mistake and capitalize on it. Right now, maybe the Democrats have the mental edge. So the Republicans have to recapture it. If you're at fourth and long, that's your last play, that sucks. But if you're in the fourth quarter and you still have 5 or 10 minutes to go, you have time to regain the momentum.

-- Ray Schoenke , former Redskins offensive lineman and candidate for the Democratic nomination in the 1998 Maryland gubernatorial race

* * *

I would tell Republicans that it's time to pull out a trick play or two to catch their opponent off guard and regain momentum . Time for a double-reverse pass or an onside kick, anything you can do to startle your opponent and put him on the defensive. And they have to stay positive. In a game two weeks ago, we were down 28-7 with one minute to go in the third quarter, but we stayed positive, even though we were getting our brains beat out. And we went on to win, 35-28. You never know how the outcome can change.

DOJ_NMG_0084537

-- Dave Mencarini , head football coach,

Quince Orchard High School, Gaithersburg

When you fall behind, you can't start thinking that it's a lost cause; you must truly believe that you can win. I know as a coach that my players tend to believe what I believe of them. You have to have your party pulling for you, and that stems from the leaders believing that you can still accomplish your goals. Once people have lost hope, they won't campaign as hard as they should. You've gotta have that work ethic. You keep playing to the end. People can be persuaded up until the last minute.

-- Dan Harwood , boys' basketball coach, Magruder High School, Rockville

* * *

When you're facing down the clock and you're behind, you call a timeout and you talk to your team and you say things like, "You know what got you here. Are you going to let these guys take it away from you?" Basically, you tell them, "Hey, don't panic. You're in a race." You've got to be strategic, you've gotta start putting all your pluses on one side and minuses on the other, your opponent's pluses on one side, his minuses on the other. It's about finding the weakness and hitting them.

-- Red Auerbach, Basketball Hall of Fame coach, former president and coach of the Boston Celtics

* * *

In sports you basically beg your team to just be as aggressive as possible. Because if you are behind, what do you have to lose? I always say, leave it all on the floor. Bring any trick that you have. You might as well see if it works. It's amazing what can happen in sports when the team that's winning thinks it's going to win for sure and begins to relax. A lot of crazy things happen when the momentum changes. The bottom line is you play until the final buzzer, and in an election you're going to campaign until the votes are in. No other way to play a sport or live your life -- you go until you can't go anymore.

-- Mike Jones, head basketball coach at

DeMatha Catholic High School in Hyattsville

* * *

When you're behind, the main thing you focus on is never giving up. Even when things look kind of grim, if you keep battling and working hard you never know what can happen. Have a lot of confidence in yourself and believe in what you're doing. When you're in a tough game or tough race, you see not only the quality player you have but the quality person you have. When it gets close to winning -- don't do something or not do something that you're going to regret later. Leave everything on the field. When you go to bed after the last game or the election, you'll be able to say "I did everything I could."

-- Randy S. Morris, manager of the 2006 Little League

World Series Champions, Northern Little League, Columbus, Ga.

* * *

People pride themselves on getting under your skin. Don't let them. Don't take no for an answer, that's what I would tell the Republican Party. It's the fourth quarter and you need to knock down a jump shot or get a rebound in traffic. Stay positive, no matter what. Eliminate the negativity. I knew I wasn't holding up my end of the bargain for a while last year and all of the negativity was just seeping in. You have to develop thick skin and stay positive. Eventually the outcome you want will work out.

Trust me.

-- Antawn Jamison , Washington Wizards forward

* * *

Right now, if I knew I had no shot, I would shut down all advertising, grab what's left of the campaign money and get the hell out of town. I mean, if it's evident you're going nowhere. . . . Now, what have you got to do from a realistic standpoint? Refuse to believe what everybody else is saying. You've got to count on somebody on the other side screwing up before the election. You've got to pretend you're the emperor with no clothes or pretend you're Alfred E. Neuman. One or the other.

Does that make sense?

-- John Riggins, Hall of Fame Redskins running back

DOJ_NMG_0084538

Democrats Strengthen Chances For Senate (WP)

By Charles Babington And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Va., Mo. and Tenn. May Tip the Balance

Democrats in the past two weeks have significantly improved their chances of taking control of the Senate, according to polls and independent analysts, with the battle now focused intensely on three states in the Midwest and upper South: Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia.

Democratic challengers are in strong positions against GOP incumbents in four states -- Pennsylvania, Montana, Ohio and Rhode Island -- a trend that leaves the party looking for just two more seats to reclaim the majority. The main targets are states where Republicans in recent years have dominated but this year find themselves in hotly competitive races.

Except for a brief period in 2001 and 2002, Republicans have held power in the Senate continuously since the 1994 elections and now hold 55 of 100 seats. Only last year, Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said it would take "a miracle" for his party to win control. But the same issues that are leading many pollsters and strategists to predict a Democratic takeover of the House -- including the unpopularity of President Bush and the Iraq war -- have made a turnover in the Senate more plausible.

Democrats are gleeful about the prospect of reversing years-long political trends against them in such places as Montana and Ohio, as well as Southern states such as Tennessee and Virginia. But recent history highlights how difficult it is for Democrats to compete in places where Republicans usually win at the presidential and congressional levels. Two years ago, as Bush was winning reelection, Democrats lost Senate seats in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana and South Dakota.

Analysts say, however, that this year's political environment is much more toxic for the GOP.

"The Democrats are going to gain somewhere between four and seven seats," said Stuart Rothenberg, author of an independent newsletter that tracks campaigns nationwide. Of the battlegrounds of Tennessee, Virginia and Missouri, he said, "They need two of the three, and they have a pretty good chance" of winning them.

In four other states, Republican incumbents -- Conrad Burns (Mont.), Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.), Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Rick Santorum (Pa.) -- are all running behind in the latest public polls. Assuming that Democrats hold New Jersey, where Sen. Robert Menendez (D) hopes the state's traditional Democratic tilt will carry him past hard-charging Tom Kean Jr. (R), they would need to grab two more Republican-held seats to gain a 51 to 49 edge. (An evenly split Senate would remain under GOP control because Vice President Cheney would break the tie).

In Virginia, Sen. George Allen (R) was cruising toward reelection until he referred to a Democratic worker of Indian descent as "macaca" at a campaign event, clumsily handled revelations of his Jewish heritage and seemingly lost his once-easy touch with Old Dominion voters. Democratic nominee James Webb is not a natural campaigner, Capitol Hill Democratic operatives acknowledge, but he has surged within striking distance of Allen in polls.

With two weeks to go, supporters hope Allen makes no more gaffes and can coax state voters to return to their habit of backing Republicans in federal elections.

"I think Allen has moved into a small but statistically valid lead," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), a close student of campaigns. "Allen needs to get his [conservative] base voters out, and he needs to not take another hit." A Virginia ballot initiative to ban same-sex marriage may bring social conservatives to the polls, Davis said, but it will do little for moderate Republicans who also are crucial to Allen's success.

In the race for an open seat in Tennessee, Republicans believe Bob Corker, the former mayor of Chattanooga, has turned his campaign around after replacing his campaign manager and is now more focused and aggressive. Democrats concede that Corker has cut into the lead of Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D) but are counting on Ford's campaign skills to carry him through the final weeks.

Eight-term Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.), who lost a 1994 Senate bid and whose father was a Tennessee governor, said he has never seen anything to match the enthusiasm surrounding Ford, an African American from Memphis. A sold-out Oct. 19 prayer breakfast in Nashville that featured Ford "was the most exciting and successful political event I've ever been to in Tennessee," Cooper said.

DOJ_NMG_0084539

Strategists see Missouri as perhaps the purest test of whether Republicans can overcome a strong Democratic headwind this year because there are few state-related factors or scandals affecting the contest. Neither Sen. James M. Talent (R) nor the challenger, state auditor Claire McCaskill (D), has been able to gain a clear advantage, and strategists on both sides anticipate a photo finish.

If Talent loses, "it will be because of the environment," one senior GOP strategist said. "If Corker loses [in Tennessee], you can point to some big strategic mistakes."

Until recently, almost no one on Capitol Hill was talking seriously of a possible Democratic Senate takeover, for several reasons. Open seats generally are easier for the opposition party to win, but this year, just one Republican incumbent, Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.), is retiring. Geography is even more challenging. Democrats must win several races in Red America, where through most of Bush's presidency, Republicans have deepened their hold on elective offices, most notably in the South. This year, only two of the seven most vulnerable Republican Senate seats are in states carried by Sen. John F. Kerry in 2004: Rhode Island and Pennsylvania. The others -- Ohio, Montana, Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia -- were Bush states in 2000 and 2004.

"I don't think it was ever a map for taking back the majority," said one Democratic strategist, who declined to be identified in order to provide candid information about the campaigns. "But the very fact of it is, we get closer to winning the majority every single week."

Republicans depend in particular on the South for their Senate majority. They now hold 18 of the 22 Senate seats in the former Confederate states, a 14-seat advantage in that region alone. Republicans remain entrenched in the Deep South, but their advantages in upper South states are less strong, says Merle Black, a political science professor at Emory University and the co-author with his brother Earl Black of a series of books about Southern politics.

"What we see across the Deep South is a lot of Republican strength," he said. "Those upper South states are where Democrats can campaign effectively against Republicans. I wouldn't make them favorites, but if trends break in their favor, they could win both of those seats."

Santorum, seeking a third term, and Burns, trying for a fourth, have been in trouble for months. Chafee, who is such a maverick Republican that he did not support Bush for reelection in 2004, survived a difficult primary, but only with late help from the Republican National Committee and the National Republican Senatorial Committee. He now trails former state attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse (D) in a state that is overwhelmingly Democratic and strongly anti-Bush. His biggest hope lies in the unusually large number of undecided voters in a state where the Chafee name is well-regarded, said Jennifer Duffy, who tracks Senate races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

DeWine always expected a tough reelection race because of the sour national mood and scandals in Ohio that have left Gov. Bob Taft (R) with an approval rating barely in double digits and Rep. Robert W. Ney (R) on his way to prison for his involvement in the scandal involving lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Ohio voters appear ready to take out their anger on the party that has controlled state politics since the early 1990s.

But DeWine's race has turned from a toss-up to one favoring his rival, Rep. Sherrod Brown, in a matter of weeks. Recent polls show Brown leading by seven to 14 percentage points. Republicans blame the Mark Foley scandal.

"The Foley thing had a more corrosive effect there than in other places," said one pessimistic GOP strategist. "Voters were softened to scandal."

Democrats: More Seats Coming Into Play (AP)

By David Espo

AP, October 22, 2006

Democrats hold solid leads for four of the six Republican seats they need to capture the Senate and about 10 of 15 required to win the House, according to officials in both parties. Numerous additional races remain highly competitive.

DOJ_NMG_0084540

After two weeks of adverse publicity linked to the Mark Foley scandal, public and private polling suggested partial recovery for some endangered Republican incumbents, and senior party officials made a concerted effort to project confidence.

"By many measures, there are strong indications of a right-of-center base that is engaged and committed," party chairman Ken Mehlman said Friday in a memo written for public consumption.

The assertion was a response to independent polls that show disapproval of President Bush's policies, including on the Iraq war, and discontent with Congress have made Democrats more eager to vote on Nov. 7 than Republicans.

At the same time, Democrats said unexpected opportunities for gains keep coming their way — including House races in Minnesota, Idaho and Nevada — and they have the money needed to battle Republicans to the end.

"We have enough to play defense in the blue states and offense in the red states," said Sen. Chuck Schumer of New York, who heads the Democratic senatorial committee.

After months of stockpiling their millions, candidates and the parties are spending freely in the final days before Election Day.

The National Republican Congressional Committee has spent more than $3 million to hold the seat of Ohio Rep. Bob Ney. Ney, who recently pleaded guilty to corruption charges, has yet to resign, but is not seeking a new term.

The GOP has invested more than $8 million into the Philadelphia suburbs and a northeast Pennsylvania district, where Republican Reps. Michael Fitzpatrick, Curt Weldon, Jim Gerlach and Don Sherwood face strong challenges. Democrats have put in nearly $7 million.

In Connecticut, GOP Reps. Chris Shays, Nancy Johnson and Rob Simmons face difficult challenges, although Republicans hope that Sen. Joseph Lieberman's independent candidacy will help them.

By contrast, Republicans have few opportunities to take away House or Senate seats belonging to Democrats. Georgia, where the GOP is aiming at two House seats, is one such case.

In the battle for the Senate, public and private polling shows Democratic challengers leading incumbents in Pennsylvania, Montana and Rhode Island as well as in Ohio, where the entire GOP ticket is struggling.

Officials who discussed the private surveys did so on condition of anonymity, saying they were not authorized to speak publicly.

Eager to offset likely losses, the National Republican Senatorial Committee has aired television commercials in New Jersey, hoping that Tom Kean Jr. can defeat Sen. Bob Menendez. Democrats countered quickly, with four times as much money.

Republicans apparently have not abandoned all hope in Michigan, either. President Bush is scheduled to campaign for challenger Mike Bouchard on Thursday. A party-financed television advertising campaign is possible, as well, aimed at toppling Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow.

Increasingly, though, officials in both parties said the battle for Senate control probably will come down to close races in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia. All three are Republican-held seats where Democratic challengers have exceeded precampaign expectations.

Under most scenarios, Democrats would have to win two of the three to gain a majority.

In Tennessee, Republicans concede that Rep. Harold Ford has proved to be the most adept of the Democratic challengers this year. Democrats say Republican Bob Corker's campaign has been sharper and more effective since a staff shake-up this month.

Democrats in Missouri hope challenger Claire McCaskill will benefit from support for statewide initiatives on stem cell research and a higher minimum wage. She is running against Sen. Jim Talent.

The closeness of the Virginia race, where Jim Webb is taking on Sen. George Allen, is the biggest surprise of the campaign season. Like other Republicans, Allen has begun edging away from Bush's war policy. "The situation there is one that needs adjustments, that needs changes in tactics," he said Friday.

Many Republicans turned pessimistic about their party's chances of holding the House when the Foley scandal broke. The Florida congressman abruptly resigned on Sept. 29 after he was confronted with sexually explicit Internet messages he had written teenage male pages.

The House ethics committee is investigating, and Republicans are working to shift the campaign spotlight elsewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0084541

"National security, border security, and the economy: these are the issues that matter most to the American people as we confront challenges domestically and abroad," House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, advised fellow Republicans.

Despite Mehlman's efforts at reassurance, some candidates remain concerned. "The Republicans are a bit disillusioned," said Rep. Chris Chocola, struggling in his bid for a third term in Indiana.

The House Republicans in greatest danger of defeat include Reps. Charles Taylor of North Carolina and John Hostettler of Indiana, and Sherwood and Weldon of Pennsylvania, according to private polls. Of those incumbents, only Hostettler is not campaigning against a backdrop of scandal, either personal or political.

In addition, Democrats lead for open seats currently in Republican hands in Arizona, Colorado, Florida, Ohio and Texas.

The situation in Foley's former district is unpredictable. Foley's name is staying on the ballot and votes for him will be counted for replacement candidate Joe Negron.

Two members of the Republican leadership, Reps. Deborah Pryce of Ohio and Tom Reynolds of New York, have fought back from earlier deficits and made their races competitive, according to strategists.

Many other races remain competitive, judging from public polls and party spending.

Republicans in that category include Reps. Fitzpatrick, Gerlach and Melissa Hart in Pennsylvania; Clay Shaw in Florida; Mike Sodrel and Chocola in Indiana; Geoff Davis in Kentucky; Heather Wilson in New Mexico; Marilyn Musgrave in Colorado, Dave Reichert in Washington; Thelma Drake in Virginia; Steve Chabot in Ohio; and Gil Gutnecht in Minnesota.

Democrats also are mounting strong challenges for Republican-held open seats in Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota and Wisconsin.

Relatively few Democratic-held seats appear in jeopardy.

Republicans have scaled back their initial target list, and continued to advertise against Reps. Jim Marshall and John Barrow in Georgia; Melissa Bean in Illinois; Leonard Boswell in Iowa; and in an open-seat race in Vermont.

Three States Could Swing Senate Control (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

In Tennessee and two other closely contested races, candidates court disaffected GOP voters.

In his paint-splattered sweatshirt and battered baseball cap, Chris Foust stopped by on his lunch break last week to listen to Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., the Democratic Senate nominee, at a downtown rally.

Foust, a soft-spoken regular churchgoer who worries about illegal immigration and opposes gay marriage, usually votes Republican and backed President Bush in 2004. But he's grown disillusioned with Bush, especially over the Iraq war. And after Ford finished his energetic speech at the noon rally, Foust decided to support him in next month's election.

"He seems like he's an honest guy," said Foust, who works for a commercial painting company. "He seems like he has a genuine concern for people."

Disenchanted, usually Republican-leaning voters like Foust may decide not only the tight Tennessee contest between Ford and Republican Bob Corker, but the battle for control of the Senate as well.

Two weeks before election day, odds are increasing that the Senate could turn on the results of close contests in Tennessee, Virginia and Missouri, three states along the border between the solidly Republican Deep South and Democratic terrain in the Northeast and industrial Midwest.

Each of these states presents a distinct political puzzle. But Democrats face the common challenge of attracting right-of-center voters like Foust who helped Bush carry all three states two years ago but have soured on the nation's direction since.

"No one is going to say these aren't tough states," said Democratic pollster Peter Brodnitz, who is advising Ford in Tennessee and Democratic Senate nominee Jim Webb in Virginia. "But voters are very hungry for change."

Still, finding enough disenchanted voters remains difficult for Democrats in the three states, largely because of enduring Republican strength in socially conservative small-town and rural communities. If Democrats fall short in their bid to recapture the Senate, these three states may be their Heartbreak Hill.

DOJ_NMG_0084542

Trends across the Senate battlefield are moving the three states into their potentially pivotal role. Recent polls show Democrats consistently leading incumbent Republican senators in Pennsylvania, Ohio and Montana, and maintaining a more marginal edge in Rhode Island. In New Jersey, where Republicans have their best opportunity to capture a Democratic-held seat, most recent surveys show Sen. Robert Menendez reestablishing a narrow lead over his Republican challenger.

But even if all those states break for the Democrats, the party still would capture the Senate only if it won two of the three Republican seats in Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia. In a measure of the Democratic challenge, Republicans now hold all six of the three states' Senate seats.

This year, in Virginia, public polls generally show Republican Sen. George Allen narrowly leading Webb, who was Navy secretary under President Reagan; in Missouri, Republican Sen. Jim Talent and Democratic state Auditor Claire McCaskill trading the lead; and here, Ford, who represents a district in Memphis, edging Corker, the mayor of Chattanooga, for the seat of retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

Of the three contests, Tennessee may combine the most fascinating ingredients. Ford is running against not only the recent history of Republican ascendancy across the South but the weight of history with a capital H: He is seeking to become the first African American senator from the South since Reconstruction.

Ford, who has served since age 26 in the House seat once held by his father, Harold E. Ford Sr., is also challenging liberal orthodoxy on more issues than probably any other major Democratic contender this year.

He embraces several familiar Democratic priorities, including raising the minimum wage and allowing Medicare to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices. But he supports constitutional amendments to ban same-sex marriage and flag burning and to require a balanced budget, and says he would have voted against the bipartisan Senate immigration bill because he opposes any form of legalization for illegal immigrants.

And though he is bitingly critical of Bush's management of the Iraq war, Ford opposes any effort to legislate a timetable for withdrawing American troops. Instead, he urges the U.S. to push Iraqi leaders to divide the country into semi-autonomous Shiite, Sunni and Kurd regions.

More striking is Ford's unabashed emphasis on his religious faith. In his speeches, he quotes Scripture as frequently as other candidates quote government reports.

Last week he delivered remarks that sounded more like a sermon than a political speech before 700 people who overflowed a downtown Knoxville hotel ballroom for an interdenominational prayer breakfast, one in a series of such events he's hosting. He has even filmed a television ad in which he testifies to his religious conviction from inside a church.

Just 36 and imperially slim, Ford is a charismatic presence who attracts large, integrated crowds that cluster around him for photographs after his speeches.

He maintains punishing hours on the campaign trail, but it is still tempting to view Corker as the tortoise to Ford's hare.

Corker, slight and 54, doesn't turn heads when he enters a room or attract such large audiences. But he projects an approachable competence and sincerity. "He seems a little more like a hometown kind of guy," said Aubrey Powers, a social worker, after attending a Corker appearance in Maryville, Tenn.

After shaking up his campaign staff this month, Corker is intensifying his effort to present himself as a bipartisan problem-solver.

But Corker also needs to consolidate the Republican base after defeating two more-conservative opponents in a bitter GOP primary this summer, and must stamp Ford as too liberal for the state.

The social issues that typically help Republicans in that effort have not cut as sharply for Corker. Though he now supports a ban on abortion, he did not earlier in his career; whereas the National Right to Life Committee has endorsed him, the Tennessee affiliate has not.

And though the National Rifle Assn., a potent political force here, has endorsed Corker and plans to tout him to its members, the group will not criticize Ford, who received a B grade from the organization, said Andrew Arulanandam, the NRA's public affairs director. That could amount to a major bullet-dodge for Ford.

In his ads and stump speeches, Corker stresses his Tennessee roots and his business experience. Meanwhile, his campaign and the National Republican Senatorial Committee have barraged Ford with personal attacks, portraying him as a slick career politician, condemning the "Ford Political Machine" and spotlighting his connections to Washington, where he spent most of his youth while his father served in Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0084543

The attacks have reached a point where even Corker, in a rare move, on Friday publicly urged the Republican National Committee to withdraw a new ad that features a blond white woman — presumably an actress — cooing into the camera that she met Ford at a party sponsored by Playboy magazine.

Race is the great wild card in the contest. In Washington, many analysts believe Ford will draw fewer votes than polls suggest because of voters' unspoken reluctance to back an African American. In Tennessee, that assumption isn't as widely shared.

"I don't think his race is going to be a factor," Frank Griffith, a lifelong Republican, said after a Corker rally in the small southeast Tennessee town of Madisonville. "I've lived here my whole life and I see the same people supporting the Democratic candidate with bumper stickers just like any other candidate."

Griffith, a retired teacher, said Ford's greatest problem would be convincing conservatives in his rural community that he was not too liberal.

The same might be said for Jim Webb in Virginia and Claire McCaskill in Missouri. In the end, the challenges facing Ford revolve less around the issues unique to him because of his race than those he shares with the Democratic nominees in each of the three states that could determine which party controls the Senate next year.

ronald.brownstein @latimes.com

Guardedly, Democrats Are Daring To Believe (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Robin Toner

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 21 — There is something unusual bubbling in Democratic political waters these days: optimism.

With each new delivery of bad news for Republicans — another Republican congressman under investigation, another Republican district conceded, another poll showing support for the Republican-controlled Congress collapsing — a party that has become so used to losing is considering, disbelievingly and with the requisite worry, the possibility that it could actually win in November.

“I’ve moved from optimistic to giddy,” said Gordon R. Fischer, a former chairman of the Iowa Democratic Party. “I really have.”

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, who is in line to become chairman of the Financial Services Committee in a Democratic House, offered wry evidence of the changing perception of the race. His office, Mr. Frank said, has been contacted by a portrait-painting firm offering to talk about possibilities for the traditional committee chairman’s painting, one of those perks of power long absent from the lives of House Democrats.

“I’ve acquired a lot of new friends this year,” Mr. Frank said. “And I haven’t gotten any nicer.”

For Democrats these days, life is one measure glee, one measure dread and one measure hubris. If they are as confident as they have been in a decade about regaining at least one house of Congress — and they are — it is a confidence tempered by the searing memories of being outmaneuvered, for three elections straight, by superior Republican organizing and financial strength, and by continued wariness about the political skills of President Bush’s senior adviser, Karl Rove.

Mr. Rove has made it clear that he considers Democratic optimism unjustified, predicting that his party’s cash advantage and get-out-the-vote expertise will dash Democratic dreams yet again. And Democrats say they welcome every passing dawn with relief, fearful that the next one will bring a development that could fundamentally alter the nature of the race, like the re-emergence of Osama bin Laden on election eve, which is what happened in 2004.

“I know a lot of people are in somersault land,” Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said reproachfully of fellow Democrats. “I just don’t have the liberty and freedom to do that.”

Still, Democratic ebullience could be found in all corners of Washington over the past few days. It was palpable at social and work gatherings, where Democrats traded gossip about how big a Democratic majority in the House could be; in Capitol Hill conference rooms, where Democrats were preparing transition plans (under orders to keep them quiet); and in offices of Democratic strategists and pollsters, who were drawing up growing lists of Republicans who might be vulnerable.

DOJ_NMG_0084544

"I feel better than I ever have," said Representative Louise M. Slaughter, a Democrat from upstate New York. "I think we have the best chance to take over simply because of the pileup of disasters."

Stanley B. Greenberg, who was the White House pollster for President Bill Clinton in 1994 when Republicans shocked Democrats by capturing the House, commissioned a poll recently and e-mailed it around town with a single-word headline: "Meltdown." In an interview, Mr. Greenberg said, "I don't see how we can lose the House; I don't think it's even close."

Ellen R. Malcolm, president of Emily's List, a Democratic women's network, and a longtime Democratic fund-raiser, said Democratic trepidations were beginning to melt away with each passing news cycle. "People are getting more encouraged by the day," Ms. Malcolm said. "Every poll that comes in seems to be better than the one before."

Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, who is in line to become speaker if her party wins the House, has put out the word that no one should be talking with too much certainty or detail about the days after Nov. 7. But even Ms. Pelosi has slipped on occasion. In a recent interview with The Associated Press, when asked which suite of offices she would use as speaker, she said with a laugh, "I'll have any suite I want."

The change in mood, and evidence of Democratic strength in the polls and in fund-raising, is feeding some crucial deliberations by Democratic leaders as the discussion in some quarters goes from whether Democrats can win to how large a margin the party can gain.

Democratic candidates in districts that had been considered long shots are now pleading with Mr. Emanuel's committee to send money their way. And some leading Democrats, among them Mr. Greenberg, are urging Mr. Emanuel to seize the moment by expanding the field in which Democrats are competing, saying the party has a chance to cement a big lead in the House in November.

This argument has worried some Democratic strategists, who warn that overconfidence could press party leaders into making decisions that may siphon resources from closely fought races and risk the Democrats' advantage. "On the House side, it makes sense to be focusing on 25 seats to win 14, not 50," said Steve Rosenthal, a political and labor consultant with close ties to the party, who described many Democrats as "overenthused."

"If we had unlimited resources it would be different," Mr. Rosenthal said. "But we have to be careful."

Mr. Emanuel said he was polling to see where the party might move next. But he said that barring some last-minute infusion of money, he was considering a relatively limited increase in the number of seats where Democrats would spend. In the past week, Democrats have expanded their field to just over 40 races from about 35, running advertisements against Republicans they consider newly vulnerable in Florida, Minnesota, Nevada, upstate New York and Washington State.

Some Democrats have expressed apprehension that this exuberance may be irrational, or at least premature, and are counseling restraint. Part of that is tactical: Democrats are trying not to help the Republican Party as it works to turn out its conservative base by presenting apocalyptic visions of a Congress led by liberals like Mr. Frank, Ms. Pelosi and Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York.

Part of the Democrats' queasiness stems from painful familiarity with Mr. Rove's record of success, and from their own recognition that they hold only slim leads in many races and could yet fall victim to an assertive and sophisticated Republican turnout operation.

"I'm a little concerned that we are spending all our time talking about what our agenda will be in January rather than how we are going to get our votes out in early November," said Chris Redfern, chairman of the Ohio Democratic Party.

Some of that concern is about the long-term psychic damage the party's rank-and-file may suffer if Democrats collapse at the finish line again. "We've all had these disappointments that contain our enthusiasm as we look to the last few weeks of this race," said Tom Daschle, the Senate Democratic leader defeated in 2004.

Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic strategist who advised the presidential campaign of Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, said: "We all sat around in 2004 and looked at exit polls that said John Kerry was going to be president. And that was wrong. We've been up this hill before."

DOJ_NMG_0084545

To win the House, Democrats must capture 15 seats. Of the 40 or so they see in play, at most 5 are held by Democrats, strategists for both sides say.

The prospects for a Democratic takeover in the Senate, where the party needs six seats, are tougher. Republicans say four of their incumbents are in serious danger of losing — in Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island — and are trying to build a firewall by pouring most of their resources into Senate races in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia, where polls show the contests even.

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said his committee, which has consistently out-raised its Republican counterpart this year, had more than enough money to compete with the Republicans in those states. Mr. Schumer said he was holding back some resources in case Republicans made an unexpected move in the final days of the campaign.

"They keep trying to pull rabbits out of the hat, but none of them come out," he said. "But we are holding some money in abeyance for some kind of October surprise."

While there may be a price to overconfidence, in a sense of complacency at some campaign headquarters, there are advantages at the grass-roots level, where it can fuel the excitement that Democrats hope will result in significant gains on Nov. 7. Republicans face the flip side of this problem, with the prospect that their voters, discouraged by the party's travails, will stay home.

All this has put Democrats in an unfamiliar place, but one they seem to be enjoying. "I'm a congenital pessimist," said Howard Wolfson, a consultant advising Democrats in several competitive contests in upstate New York. "But I'm as bullish on our chances as I have been at any time over the last 12 years."

Fighting For The Spoils (WP)

By Steve Hendrix

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Lawmaker and Rainmaker Rahm Emanuel Wants a Nov. 7 Victory For the Democrats So Bad He Can Almost Taste It. If Only He Had Time to Eat.

CHICAGO

This must be how Machiavelli ate his corned beef sandwiches.

Sitting in a South Side deli, Rahm Emanuel doesn't so much eat his lunch as overwhelm it with two hands and a hard stare. It's a combat glower familiar to the political opponents, reluctant donors and more than a few allies who have encountered the White House fixer-turned-Democratic-congressman in his still-young career. By most accounts, they usually didn't fare much better than the sandwich.

"There's no clean way to do this," Emanuel says, not quite clearly, through a garble of onion roll.

They heap the plates high at Manny's, an old-guard cafeteria popular with cops and pols. But within minutes, the football-size loaf of sliced meat and mustard is gone. Emanuel wipes his hands and picks up the BlackBerry that has been buzzing every 40 seconds or so on the Formica tabletop.

"God, I always eat it too fast," he mutters as he checks an e-mail. What follows is either a soft belch or a pfitz of surprise at some new poll results from Ohio.

Charging toward the biggest election day of his career, Emanuel, the 47-year-old chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, doesn't have much time for niceties.

Or, sometimes, even food. He's lost 14 pounds as the whirl of wheedling donors and lashing candidates to meet their fundraising targets has reached hurricane status in recent weeks. (It had been at least a year since he'd indulged his taste for Manny's corned beef.) He's always been slight, but his collar now gaps a bit at the neck; his cheeks, always lean, are now almost skeletal under the graying runner's buzz cut and the basset-hound eyes. He rubs his jaw (and you notice that he's missing a finger; he lost one to a boyhood infection). He admits he's not sleeping well.

"He's driving himself to exhaustion," says Paul Begala, a friend and political compatriot since they both served on Bill Clinton's first presidential campaign and afterward in the White House. "He's like Lyndon Johnson, who finished almost every campaign in a hospital bed. As someone from Texas, I don't make that comparison lightly, but Rahm just may be our skinny, nine-fingered, Jewish, Chicago version of LBJ."

DOJ_NMG_0084546

Whether that's a fair comparison may be clear soon. If, as historians say, Johnson began his conquest of Capitol Hill with the political chits he collected as a young and triumphant chairman of the Senate campaign committee, what does next month promise for Rahm Emanuel? As the member of Congress responsible for recruiting candidates for House races, raising money and vetting strategy for dozens of districts, he's received raves from campaign connoisseurs in Washington for running a taut committee. Notably, he's nearly closed the perennial cash-on-hand gap between his team -- with $36 million in the bank at the end of September -- and its GOP counterpart. He's fielded credible candidates in districts no one had expected to be in play a year ago. And he's generally been flogging the party like a never-satisfied CEO.

"He has been an amazing success any way you look at it," says congressional scholar Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution. "I think it's the best operation of any chairman of either party in several years."

If Democrats do take the House -- they need to gain 15 seats to do so -- Emanuel, in only his second term in Congress, stands to claim considerable credit for ending a 12-year electoral drought. That's the kind of triumph Johnson rode to the top of the Senate.

But if they don't . . .

"If they don't win, it will be seen as a colossal failure," says Mann. "Rahm will be devastated."Expectations Are High

In fact, Emanuel may have already fumbled the game of expectations -- they are wickedly high. With President Bush's approval ratings lodged at car-salesman levels, scandals going off like cluster bombs within the Republican caucus, and a general throw-the-bums-out restiveness in the land, even a near-miss by House Democrats will be seen as the greatest electoral choke since Dewey Didn't Defeat Truman after all. Commentators from George F. Will to James Carville have already laid down rhetorical markers: An opposition party unable to capture the House in this environment should find a purpose other than electoral politics. Selling Herbalife, maybe.

And Emanuel knows that some Democrats would find time during their grief for a small smile at his expense. Such is the "Rahmbo" style that his sizzling passage through the campaign has left scorch marks on some colleagues. Among the singed: Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, with whom Emanuel has tangled over spending priorities; several liberal would-be candidates who say they were steamrollered by Emanuel in favor of more centrist challengers; and some members of the Congressional Black Caucus who went to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi this year with complaints about Emanuel's abrasive style and his increasing demands for them to raise money for the DCCC.

"Well, I never said Rahm was a diplomat who spends a lot of time schmoozing," says Pelosi, who picked Emanuel last year to run the campaign. She tapped him over more senior lawmakers, she says, because she knew he'd be "coldblooded enough" to push the party relentlessly. And to those who came to have their feathers unruffled, she says she made it clear that Emanuel has her full support. "I said to them: 'We're here to win this election. What is this conversation about?' I don't think we can be better served than by having Rahm at the DCCC."

"He's abrupt with me all the time," she adds with a laugh. "I call him the Field Marshal."A Man for Changing Times

But to some observers of Chicago politics, Emanuel is less field marshal than Marshall Field (recalling the upscale department store that catered to the city's affluent classes). Emanuel was born in Chicago in 1959, the son of a doctor, and grew up in the decidedly non-working-class northern suburb of Wilmette. He's a graduate of the tony New Trier High School and a onetime ballet prodigy who was offered a scholarship with the Joffrey. A triathlete with a degree from Sarah Lawrence College, a master's in communications from Northwestern and a love of taking his children to modern dance concerts, Emanuel doesn't easily fit the stogie-gnawing stereotype of the old Chicago pol.

Nor did he serve the usual ward apprenticeships in the vaunted Democratic machine. Rather, after working as a fundraiser in various campaigns, Emanuel came fully of age politically with Clinton in Washington. He had never sought elected office before running for the House of Representatives in 2002. In particular, Emanuel knew he would be an odd successor for the working-class Polish and Catholic precincts of District 5, which stretches from the lakefront to the Cook County line. "The previous congressmen from my district were named Rostenkowski, Annunzio and Blagojevich," he says. "Then along comes Rahm Israel Emanuel? C'mon, how does that fit?"

DOJ_NMG_0084547

But this is a changing Chicago. In front of Manny's, a police Segway is chained to a street sign as the officer eats his pastrami inside. The warehouse across the street is being converted into a Best Buy. And politics, too, has gotten a makeover.

"Rahm is part of the young breed that people call the new Chicago machine," says Don Rose, a longtime liberal activist who worked for Mayors Jane Byrne and Harold Washington. "They're not 'dem' and 'dose' politicians. They know the difference between red wine and white wine. They're not driven by ideology, and they play to win."

They all play to win, those Emanuel boys. Rahm is the middle son of three. His big brother, Ezekiel, is a Harvard oncologist and bioethicist. Younger brother Ari is a high-flying agent in Los Angeles. He made news recently as the only major agent to publicly call for an industrywide shunning of Mel Gibson following the actor's drunken, anti-Semitic tirade. Their baby sister, Shoshana, is a student.

Yes, the folks are mighty proud, Rahm says. How many mothers have two children who have partly inspired TV characters (Josh Lyman on "The West Wing" for Rahm, Ari Gold on "Entourage" for Ari)?

"People ask me what my mother put in the soup," says Ari, who talks with Rahm two or three times a day. "I wish I knew. I have three boys of my own."

Their father is a Jerusalem-born pediatrician who came to the United States after working for the pre-independence Israeli underground. In Chicago, he met Emanuel's mother, an X-ray technician and daughter of a local union organizer who ended up in more than one paddy wagon as a protester in the 1960s. "Politics and the civil rights movement were very much a part of our family life," says Ezekiel. "We went on Martin Luther King's march on Cicero with my mom."

When Rahm was 17, he cut his finger on a meat slicer at Arby's, where he worked a summer job. It became infected, the infection spread to the bone, and a cut grew into a potentially life-threatening condition. Doctors eventually amputated the finger, and Emanuel spent eight weeks in the hospital. He says the experience made him more focused for college and beyond.

"He blames me for ending up at Sarah Lawrence," says Ezekiel, who thought a small Eastern college would suit his brother better than a big school. "But he loved it. He loved being around all those women."

The young Rahm wasn't particularly political. That passion emerged during college when he starting working with the advocacy group Common Cause. Later, he landed on a few campaigns, including Paul Simon's successful first Senate race in 1984. Almost immediately Emanuel proved a peerless fundraiser. Richard M. Daley hired him to dial up dollars for his successful mayoral run in 1989. Two years later, Emanuel got a job in the soon-to-be-legendary "War Room" of Clinton's upstart presidential campaign in Little Rock.

"With the exception of the candidate and his wife, Rahm may have been the only indispensable person in that campaign," says Begala, who credits Emanuel with keeping the money flowing during the Gennifer Flowers unpleasantness. "He was a force of nature."

He stayed with Clinton through most of two terms. Early on, though, his hard-charging style riled as many allies -- in both the White House and the Capitol -- as opponents. In 1993, he was fired as political director, reportedly at the urging of first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton. But he stayed on as a senior adviser to redeem himself, with both Clintons, by successfully spearheading some of their diciest legislative ambitions, including NAFTA and the assault weapons ban.

Those initiatives passed, and along the way Emanuel's wonkier self bloomed like a thousand white papers. He talks fluidly about 401(k) regulations and dependent health coverage and universal college tuition. With fellow Clinton alum Bruce Reed, he recently wrote a book, "The Plan," an election-year wish list of New Democrat policy proposals.

"He's a great strategist, but I actually think he cares more about the policy side of it," says Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who is close to Emanuel and is campaigning with him for several DCCC candidates in the final weeks. "He likes to talk tough, but deep under that crusty exterior is someone who believes that government can make a difference in people's lives."

But Emanuel's devotion to, say, tax reform may never overtake his rep for grenade-launcher etiquette. His spat with Howard Dean, for example, went publicly profane.

"Rahm and I have certainly had our disagreements," Dean says by e-mail. "But the bottom line is we both want to win."

Even within the White House, few were safe from his instinct for showstopping vulgarity. He once marched up to the newly elected Tony Blair in the Oval Office, where he and Clinton were preparing to go out for their first joint appearance. "This is important," Emanuel said to the British prime minister. "Don't [foul] it up."

DOJ_NMG_0084548

"Blair looked pretty shocked before he started laughing," says Begala, who was there. "They are a little more formal in Britain than they are in Chicago."Back in the Game

Toward the end of Clinton's second term, Emanuel and his wife, Amy Rule, a Wharton MBA, and the first of their three children moved back to Chicago with the express purpose of making some serious money. In 1999, without any previous experience, Emanuel joined the investment bank of Democratic donor Bruce Wasserstein. Within two years, thanks in part to the bank's being sold, Emanuel had made about $18 million, enough to get back into the game without worrying about his family's finances.

"Rahm was always going to go back into politics," says Ezekiel. "That was the whole point of going into investment banking, to earn a nest egg."

It was Da Mayor himself who first suggested that Emanuel run for the open North Side congressional seat in 2002.

"I told him he was crazy," Emanuel says. "But then I did a poll, and it actually looked like I had a shot."

With the Daley cogs turning on his behalf, Emanuel edged out a Polish American state legislator in the primary and went on to win the general election. It's a safe seat now -- he's not even running ads this year -- but he speaks with pride of the street-level fight he waged the first time.

"I walked a hundred precincts during that campaign," he says. "I stood in front of every grocery in my district seven times."

Emanuel keeps in regular contact with his City Hall patron. And some say he has brought LaSalle Street sensibilities to his House job, particularly those who have been on the wrong side of his DCCC machine. He hasn't hesitated to muscle aside liberal candidates in favor of ones he thought could go toe-to-toe with Republicans on security and social issues. He recruited several Iraq war veterans and found sheriffs to run in both Washington state and Indiana. He persuaded Heath Shuler, a former Redskins quarterback and an antiabortion Democrat, to run in North Carolina. (Shuler has said Emanuel's five-calls-a-day pushiness was worse than any college recruiter's.)

In one move that Rose calls a "classic Chicago power play," Emanuel pushed Tammy Duckworth, a political newcomer who lost both legs as an Army helicopter pilot in Iraq, to run in the congressional district of retiring Illinois Republican Henry Hyde. That didn't sit well with supporters of Christine Cegelis, a technology consultant who had scored a surprise 44 percent against Hyde in 2002. Her supporters say the DCCC effectively starved the antiwar Cegelis of money and support in favor of Duckworth, who calls the war "a mistake" but calls for more aggressive training of Iraqi forces before pulling out U.S. troops.

"There was a lot of frustration on the ground, trying to figure why the national Democratic Party was trying to squash a strong local movement like this," says Kevin Spidel, a founder of Progressive Democrats of America who managed the Cegelis campaign. "It generated a lot of volunteers for us. We were outspent 4 to 1 and came close to beating Rahm Emanuel and his Washington machine."Out of the Wilderness

Asked if he ever has regrets about his hardball habits, Emanuel stares into his glass of tea for a long moment.

"Look, you're never as tough as they say you are," he says finally.

But the self-reflection lasts only as long as it takes for him to remember the tactics of the other side.

"They call Tammy Duckworth a cut-and-runner when she left two legs in Iraq?" he shouts, jabbing a finger in the air, drawing stares from around the deli. "How dare they! I'm going to give them the medicine that they've been giving out. That's what shocks them."

If Duckworth wins, along with enough of Emanuel's other candidates to deliver the House into Democratic hands, it's easy to predict that all the hard feelings within the party will be quickly swept away by the shouts of hallelujah. And Rahm Emanuel, with a month to go before his 48th birthday and less than five years of seniority on the Hill, will be basking in acclaim for helping to lead his long-suffering party from the backbencher wilderness to the Promised Land of majority.

Just what is the proper reward for an electoral Moses? Plum committee assignments? (He already has a coveted seat on the Ways and Means Committee.) A leadership post? Leapfrogging to a chairmanship?

"How about the great honor of serving as the chairman of the DCCC?" says Pelosi. "Honestly, we've never even had a conversation about that."

Emanuel refuses to muse, publicly at least, on how a good Nov. 7 could boost his career. Or whether that career is likely to be on Capitol Hill, in Springfield or up at City Hall. For now, he's consumed only with the race.

DOJ_NMG_0084549

"I don't even want to talk about that," he says, tapping his BlackBerry on Manny's Formica. "Call me on November 8th. We'll talk about it then."

GOP Seeks To Get Back On Message (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

Republican House candidates still feel some heat from the revelation that Rep. Mark Foley sent inappropriate and sometimes lurid Internet messages to teenage boys, but party leaders insist they are starting to get their message out again to voters.

"The Foley matter has become absolutely quiet in the vast majority of House races, as voters have been able to separate the actions of one member from his party," said Jonathan Collegio of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC). "In most races, voters say it will have no impact on their decision."

The Foley scandal and the ensuing criticism of how Republicans responded or failed to prevent it dominated campaign coverage. The unfolding story buried the party's message and damaged some incumbents' re-election chances Nov. 7, when Democrats seek to eke out control of the House or Senate.

"This is just one more in a chain of scandals that are convincing people that the Republicans' power should not be continued," Democratic pollster Mark Mellman said.

"The impact that this had sort of sucked the oxygen out of our ability to talk about the message. That's not where you want to be a month to three weeks out," one Republican operative said, referring to the press blitz after the story broke Sept. 28.

Mr. Foley, Florida Republican, resigned from Congress the following day, after sexually explicit computer messages he sent to current and former congressional pages, all teenage males, became public.

The Republican operative, who asked not to be identified, said the negative fallout faded in recent days. Last week, even as the House ethics panel continued investigating the matter, Republican leaders touted tax, energy and anti-terrorism policies.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said in an Oct. 16 memo that the party is "back on offense" after it was sidetracked addressing Mr. Foley's "despicable conduct."

However, the damage may have been done.

House Republicans already were in a tough battle to retain their majority, with voters expressing frustration over the Iraq war, the Bush administration's response to Hurricane Katrina and other party members who left Congress this year under ethical clouds.

"What the Foley scandal did, wrapped up all in one, was it took the Republicans off message, hurt the leadership, dominated the news and certainly tipped the balance in favor of Democrats," independent pollster John Zogby said.

An NBC/Wall Street Journal poll last week found that 75 percent of those surveyed disapprove of the job Congress is doing, a 10 percent increase from mid-September. It also found that 47 percent are less favorable of Republican control after the events of recent weeks.

The scandal had a real effect in some races, including those of Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, who is chairman of the NRCC, and Rep. Deborah Pryce of Ohio.

Mr. Reynolds faced sagging polls and ran an ad apologizing for the scandal. He said he first learned of complaints about Mr. Foley last year from Rep. Rodney Alexander, Louisiana Republican and the sponsor of a page who received e-mails from Mr. Foley.

But Mr. Reynolds has been criticized for not doing more than telling House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, about the complaints.

Survey USA showed Mr. Reynolds trailing by five points in the days after the scandal broke, but showed him up by three points in a poll taken Oct. 16-18.

Mrs. Pryce, chairwoman of the House Republican Conference and a friend of Mr. Foley's, lagged well behind her Democratic opponent in a poll taken Oct. 8-10. However, Pryce campaign spokesman George Rasley said it was "a temporary blip in the polls" and "we're back to where we were before," with a neck-and-neck race.

DOJ_NMG_0084550

Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Stacey Paxton said the fact that a leader such as Mr. Reynolds is "fighting for his political life" proves that the Foley scandal is having an affect nationwide. Republican pollster Jon McHenry, though, said Democrats failed to nationalize the Foley issue by explaining how they would provide better leadership.

"Once again, Democrats seem to have not taken advantage of some clear momentum," Mr. McHenry said.

How Foley Skirted Rules To Pursue Relationships (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Former Pages Describe Lawmaker's Advances

They met on the House floor. He was a 16-year-old political junkie, dressed in the drab navy blazer and gray slacks of a congressional page, rushing phone messages to the members he served. Rep. Mark Foley was tanned and charismatic, a successful politician in his mid-40s willing to joke with him between votes.

They talked perhaps a dozen times. Then at his page graduation ceremony that June, in 2002, he was excited when Foley appeared, uninvited, and dictated his personal e-mail address for the boy to jot in his memory book. "I started contacting him right away," the young man recalled. "I knew a congressman that I . . . talked to online. That was pretty cool."

The messages were innocent at first. But after the young man moved home, he recalled, Foley started asking about "my roommates, if I ever saw them naked." Within months, the congressman was dangling a job offer, "because I was a hot boy," he said. Two years later, when he contacted Foley for advice on D.C. hotels, the congressman wrote back: "You could always stay at my place. I'm always here, I'm always lonely, and I'm always up for oral sex."

The experience of the young man, now 22, who agreed to recount his interactions with Foley on the condition of anonymity, was characteristic of the way the six-term House member pursued the online relationships that, once revealed, forced him to resign from Congress late last month. No one interviewed for this article could cite any instance in which Foley had sex with a former page. Foley's lawyer, David Roth, declined to comment for this story.

Interviews with nearly three dozen former pages suggest that the Florida Republican befriended a wide circle of teenagers during their stints as House pages. Then, shortly before they left or soon afterward, he singled out certain boys to write to -- including four newly confirmed by The Washington Post, in addition to former page Jordan Edmund and one other whose illicit online conversations with Foley ended the congressman's career. Some of the correspondence was brief and casual. But over months or years, if a boy seemed willing to go along, some conversations grew more sexual.

The FBI and Florida officials are conducting criminal investigations into Foley's dealings with former pages.

Foley was able to operate unimpeded for years -- forming the friendships with pages that would be the seeds of online relationships later on -- in spite of rigorous supervision of the teenagers in the congressional page program and a "zero-tolerance" policy for pages and adults who broke its rules.

Based on the interviews with pages, who spanned most of Foley's dozen years in the House -- and interviews with parents and former program employees -- the congressman's behavior went unchecked because he operated within accepted norms of the program's culture.

Although many pages regarded Foley as the House's friendliest member, his interactions with boys before they graduated often did not stray far beyond those of several other members of Congress each year who were known by the pages to take a caring interest in this corps of teenagers, most living away from home for the first time.

Foley also operated in an atmosphere in which male pages were able more easily than females to develop mentoring relationships with the male members of Congress, who account for nearly 9 in 10 members of the House.

Most of all, his interest in the boys coincided with the ambitions of many of the teenagers, who craved contact with members in hopes of fostering political careers of their own.

"I didn't want to piss off a member of an institution that I really revered," said a former Republican page from 2002, who said that, shortly after he finished the program, he exchanged a handful of messages with Foley over two months and that they gradually became sexual. He played along, then slowed his responses until Foley took the hint and stopped. He never considered reporting Foley to authorities. "I figured maybe someday I will want to be involved in Congress," he said. "I didn't want to make an enemy."

Besides, he said, "it was embarrassing."Overly Friendly

One evening early in the spring of 2000, a half-dozen pages -- three girls and three boys -- went to supper at Hawk 'n' Dove, a Capitol Hill pub. One boy had mentioned to Foley that they would be there, but no one expected that a congressman would show up.

Between House votes that night, Foley walked in. "It was the craziest thing. He ate wings off everybody's plate," recalled Rebecca Hoffman, a Democratic page who was there. He shot billiards with them, another page recalled.

"We were just absolutely shocked," said Hoffman, now 23. "We went back and told all our friends, 'You won't believe what happened.' "

Though Foley's willingness to socialize with pages stood out, their world granted them rare proximity to political power.

The page program is as old as the republic. Today, pages are all high school juniors and must be at least 16, and they typically work on Capitol Hill and take classes for an entire school year. They are the only people other than House members allowed entree to certain corridors, rooms and chambers in the Capitol, including the floor of the House.

Pages are taught to speak to a member only when spoken to. But those with plum assignments, in the Republican and Democratic cloakrooms or on the floor itself, find opportunities to talk with a few members who are particularly receptive.

"There's something that really feels good about getting to hang out with people who are powerful and well known," said Michael Buck, who was a Republican-sponsored page from Maryland's Eastern Shore in 1999-2000 and now is a teacher in the Mississippi Delta.

"You have your select group of people you become certain friends with," said Ray Lahoud, a law student who was a page in 1999-2000, referring to members of Congress. "They were sort of your mentors. They replaced your parents. . . . Mark Foley was one of those people who was always . . . talking to us. He knew us all by name."

Jacob Kosoff, a cloakroom page in 1997-98, remembers looking out a Capitol doorway one warm spring day and noticing Foley arriving on his bicycle below. He sprinted down a marble staircase, zipped through a metal detector and arrived on the House floor in time to catch the congressman. "Oh wow, you cycle to votes. That's cool," Kosoff recalls telling him.

Foley liked the attention. "He could not only tell you every time he was in a picture in the New York Times, but where he was in the photo," said one man who worked with him in Congress. "He thrived on the adoration of the people in the room. And here was a group of people who gave it unhesitatingly."

"I remember him riding by in his Bimmer and talking about all the cars he got and going down to Florida to take out his yacht," said Kristopher Hart, a page in 1999-2000 who went on to George Washington University and now runs a day spa near the campus. "He was like a little bit of a showman, but he was a great guy."

Shortly before the end of his page year, Hart said, he somehow obtained the online name Foley used for instant messages, MAF54. "We talked on IM just a couple of times. . . . It would be pretty cool to write and say, 'Are you in Congress or are you in Florida?' " They wrote sporadically through Hart's freshman year of college. "He never crossed the line."

At times, Foley seemed to speak suggestively to boys before they left the program. A female former page remembers becoming uneasy one day in 2000 as she watched him talk "a little too much" on the House floor to a boy she knew. Right afterward, she asked what Foley had said. The boy, she recalled, told her Foley had admired the page's "very big hands" and boasted about his "glorious" home in Florida. The boy added: "Eighteen. Eighteen's that magic number." The girl was appalled at what seemed to her to be a come-on that the boy did not fully understand.

After their graduation a few months later, she said, another male page told her that he and Foley were exchanging e-mails and that the congressman had asked him to mail a picture of himself to Foley's Washington house.

The Republican page from 2002, who exchanged instant messages with Foley for two months, said the first one arrived just before the start of his senior year of high school. He found the message when he logged on to his family's computer after dinner one night. At first, he assumed it was a prank by another page pretending to be the congressman. "It was a friendly conversation that got strange," said the young man, now 21. In one, Foley asked whether his roommates had worn "no boxers or briefs to bed."

DOJ_NMG_0084552

The young man said he did not immediately realize that the messages might be a solicitation. Catholic, conservative and from a small town, the former page said he had never known anyone who was gay. By early fall, Foley offered to write a college recommendation. By then, the young man said, "I just wanted the association with him not to be there."

Foley never asked to meet him, he said. "I think in my case, it was him just fantasizing," he said.

The self-described political junkie who received Foley's message about oral sex said his parents were standing next to him at graduation in 2002 when the congressman offered his address. Foley's online overtures "put the ball always in the page's court," he said. "I would have had to make the move."

Although he was only 17 at the time, he said, "if we actually would have met in person, I think he would have tried something. There's no doubt in my mind."Selective Vigilance

The dormitory where the pages live, for the past few years a renovated convent three blocks southeast of the Capitol, has bulletproof glass in the entryway, a metal detector and two armed Capitol Police officers around the clock. Pages must sign out with at least one other page every time they leave the building.

The stringent rules are the legacy of a sex scandal in 1983, when two male members of Congress were censured for having sexual relations with pages, a girl and a boy, in 1980 and 1973.

The weekend new pages arrive, they gather Sunday afternoon on the House floor to learn their duties and the rules. "This is a different world of important adults, important people making important decisions," Donnald K. Anderson, a former House clerk and an emeritus member of the Page Board, said he always tells the teenagers that day. "If something or somebody is bothering you, don't suffer in silence."

There is to be no smoking, no drinking or drugs, no sex. Students who are one minute late on their lights-out curfew get demerits that lead to being grounded.

Most students follow the rules. Pages who violate any of the major rules are ordered to leave.

In 2001-02, nearly a dozen pages were sent home, including four who had written a song with homophobic lyrics that mocked a gay staff member of the page dormitory.

"You were on the next plane home," said Matthew J. Frattali, who worked as a tutor in the page school for two years until he, too, was ordered to leave for having falsely recorded that a group of students was in study hall when he actually had let them go out to celebrate a birthday.

However, Frattali and former pages said the rules were looser when members of Congress were involved.

And the program's staff, even if they had known of a problem involving Foley or any other member, could not have simply invoked their zero-tolerance policy.

"One is sort of a page transgression," Frattali said. "One is a member transgression. You can't put a member on a plane and send him home."

Since the 1983 page scandal, the program has put an emphasis on discouraging interaction between female pages and male lawmakers and staff, without similar sensitivities about male lawmakers and male pages.

One female page remembers that she was chastised several years ago -- and a Republican House leadership aide was threatened with firing -- after she met with the aide after work one day in his office, with the door open, to talk about the Bible.

It struck her as unfair. She was one of many girls who watched enviously as Foley surrounded himself with male pages on the House floor.

On June 10, 2000, the last night in Washington for the page class that year, Foley parked his BMW at the edge of the park across from the old page dorm, since torn down.

A few pages noticed him, Michael Buck remembers, and ran to see him. "He was outside in his convertible, hanging out and telling us goodbye."

Research editor Alice Crites, staff researcher Madonna Lebling and staff writer James V. Grimaldi contributed to this report.

Democrats Play Up Candidates' Service (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084553

GLEN ELLYN, Ill. — As she campaigns for Congress in the suburbs of Chicago, Tammy Duckworth, a Democrat and an Iraq veteran, speaks with chilling conviction about the war.

Iraq was a big mistake, Ms. Duckworth says as she walks among voters on two artificial legs. Millions of dollars have been wasted there. Soldiers were being served costly steak and lobster on Sunday nights even as they were not given body armor they needed.

Though Ms. Duckworth is a political novice, her service and sacrifice (she lost her legs when a grenade hit her helicopter) have allowed her to speak her mind in a district once seen as downright hostile toward Democrats, having sent a Republican to Congress for 32 years.

Around the nation, a handful of military veterans like Ms. Duckworth have emerged as competitive Democratic candidates for Congress. For a party that has struggled against a perception that Republicans are stronger on matters of terrorism and national security, the veterans have been a powerful antidote: a group that inherently carries credibility with voters on issues like Iraq.

With only about a quarter of the members of Congress having served in the military, the fewest in recent decades, many voters say such experience matters.

"She was there," said Barb Bauler, who recently met Ms. Duckworth as the candidate served fruit salad at a retirees' club. "That is the bravest thing of all."

Tears creeping up in her eyes, Ms. Bauler pulled out a photograph of her daughter Kathleen to show Ms. Duckworth, telling her that Kathleen, a doctor in the Army, was to be deployed soon.

"Tell her to wear her gear," said Ms. Duckworth, who then reached over for a hug.

Some 60 former service members are challengers for the House or the Senate as Democrats, including a half-dozen who served in Iraq. The Democrats are not shy about military résumés. Among their promotions is a "Fighting Dems" Web site bearing the subtitle, "Back from the front lines, headed to Congress."

Polls show Ms. Duckworth and her Republican opponent, Peter J. Roskam, locked in a competitive contest. About half a dozen other races with veterans running as Democrats in places like Kentucky, Pennsylvania and Virginia are also seen as competitive, meaning the veterans could help tip the balance of power in Congress if they do well.

Many of the other veterans running as Democrats, though, are unlikely to be headed to Congress this season, analysts say, and a few complain that the party remembers them for promotions, but forgets them when it comes to money.

The Republicans have 41 challengers with military experience making bids for the House or the Senate, two of them Iraq veterans, but the party has not publicly focused as much on that group's service.

"A candidate's biography is hardly the sole indicator as to how people choose to vote," said Tracey Schmitt, a Republican National Committee spokeswoman. "Americans are going to take a long, hard look at where each individual stands on the issues that matter to them, whether it's national security or the economy."

Here, the war credentials of Ms. Duckworth have become particularly potent in part because of the visible wounds she received in Iraq two years ago. Her prosthetic legs leave her limping noticeably, and she sometimes cheerily props one of them up on a chair or pushes back her sleeve to display a web of scars on her right arm, which doctors feared might also be lost.

Encouraged to run by Democratic Party leaders, she faces Mr. Roskam, a longtime state legislator, for the Sixth District seat in the western suburbs now held by Representative Henry J. Hyde, who is retiring.

The battle has been relatively well financed, fierce and, some voters complain, overwhelming in its rush of commercials, mailings and countermailings. Each candidate suggests that the other will be in lock step with party leaders, unwilling or unable to offer independent opinions.

Mr. Roskam, a lawyer, criticizes Ms. Duckworth as a "recruited candidate" who is getting her help and financial support from everywhere other than here.

"I'm not the Rosie O'Donnell candidate, the Barbra Streisand candidate, the Al Franken candidate who is also all tied up with the Chicago Democratic machine," Mr. Roskam, who has longstanding roots in these parts, said in an interview after speaking at his former grade school.

DOJ_NMG_0084554

In turn, Ms. Duckworth portrays Mr. Roskam as an unwavering supporter of President Bush and Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, both of whom have appeared recently in Chicago, in part to help raise more than a half-million dollars for Mr. Roskam.

The district, much of which includes parts of DuPage County — where Mr. Bush's father won by 124,000 votes in 1988 but where Mr. Bush's victory margin was far narrower in 2000 (48,400 votes) and narrower still in 2004 (38,800 votes) — has shifted some. Republicans are still popular, but the Latino population is also growing, which Democrats say could help make the region more hospitable for them.

Ms. Duckworth talks about Iraq at nearly every stop. As she entered the room for one recent appearance, a screen lit up with a video of Bob Kerrey, the former senator, retelling Ms. Duckworth's harrowing story.

But Mr. Roskam, whose campaign has the unusual task of facing an opponent whose story has drawn notice from People magazine and scores of international publications, said most voters here were more focused on taxes and immigration than on Iraq.

On those points, Mr. Roskam said he would make Mr. Bush's tax cuts permanent and would support strictly securing the nation's borders without ensuring amnesty for illegal immigrants.

As for the war, Mr. Roskam said he agreed with Ms. Duckworth in certain ways. Difficult questions, he said, should be posed about why the nation "did not go in with overwhelming force." But he also said he would be "very judicious" in deciding when to withdraw American troops.

"There will be a point when Iraq gets as stable as it can get," he said. Ms. Duckworth, meanwhile, said Iraq was among the top issues, along with the budget and energy independence, for most voters.

Before them, she pounds away at the ways she says the war has been mishandled, saying that the job in Afghanistan should have been finished first; that contractors are getting rich as soldiers die; and that soldiers should begin coming home as Iraqis successfully take charge of security.

The war, Ms. Duckworth said, is why she finds herself running for office.

"I was there in the hospital looking at more and more bad decisions, more and more bad policy," she said.

Ms. Duckworth has raised more than $2 million (as has Mr. Roskam) and has also benefited from spending by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Some other veterans, particularly those in races considered long shots, have received less or no support; a few say they feel abandoned by the party.

"They want us when we're of value to them, and then they want us to sit down and shut up when we're not," said Bill Winter, a veteran. Mr. Winter said Democratic Party leaders in Colorado urged him to run for that state's Sixth District, then seemed to disappear, writing off his race against Tom Tancredo, a Republican incumbent, as not winnable.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said the party remained proud of all its veterans. "We would love to fund all of our candidates out around the country," Mr. Burton said, "but there's a harsh political reality — the finite nature of our funds."

Immigrants Flocking To GOP Districts (AP)

By Stephen Ohlemacher

AP, October 22, 2006

It's a slice of Americana: children playing soccer on a sunny Saturday morning, their parents cheering them on. But at these soccer fields, the dominant language is Spanish, the food truck sells authentic Mexican and few of the adults are eligible to vote.

Along the sidelines, America Gruner lugs a plastic tub filled with blank voter registration forms. Gruner has worked for months to register Latinos, inspired by an immigration debate that has become shrill to many Hispanics. Most politicians in this Republican stronghold in north Georgia offer little sympathy.

"They haven't, at least openly, supported us when we needed it," said Gruner, a legal immigrant who has registered about 100 voters so far.

Republican congressional districts are becoming magnets for immigrants — legal and illegal — but GOP lawmakers are not exactly embracing their new constituents.

DOJ_NMG_0084555

Of the 50 House districts nationwide with the fastest-growing immigrant communities, 45 are represented by Republicans. All but three of those lawmakers voted for a bill that would make illegal immigrants felons.

Overall, GOP districts added about 3 million immigrants from 2000 to 2005, nearly twice the number that settled in districts represented by Democrats, according to an Associated Press analysis of census data.

The numbers help explain why illegal immigration is such a big issue in rural Georgia, eastern Pennsylvania and in suburbs throughout the United States.

They also help explain why House Republicans passed five bills on border security in the weeks before Congress recessed for the Nov. 7 elections. Only one measure, calling for a border fence, has become law.

Max Burns, a Republican congressional candidate in eastern Georgia, typifies the hard line.

"No citizenship, no federal benefits, no guaranteed access to this country because they broke the law to come here," Burns says.

His tight race against Democratic Rep. John Barrow illustrates the GOP strategy in many congressional campaigns.

Barrow has voted for nearly every Republican immigration bill approved by the House in the past year. He voted to make illegal immigrants felons and to erect the border fence. He said he "opposes amnesty in any form."

Yet Burns' campaign ran a television ad attacking Barrow after the congressman was quoted in a newspaper as saying the U.S. should not let in any more immigrants until it assimilates the illegal ones already here. "He's for assimilating illegal immigrants," the ad intones. "That's amnesty!"

Barrow's campaign responded with a television ad boasting that "John Barrow voted to make it a crime to be in the United States illegally."

Barrow narrowly defeated Burns in 2004. The district was redrawn for the upcoming election to include several areas that have attracted new immigrants, including Vidalia, famous for its onions.

Shackled with an unpopular president and the war in Iraq, many Republican candidates are determined to focus on local issues as they fight to maintain control of Congress. Illegal immigration, it turns out, can be a potent local issue in communities unaccustomed to a lot of newcomers.

"It's a law-and-order issue to the people in my district," said Rep. Jim Gerlach, a Republican from southeast Pennsylvania.

Gerlach's district added 16,000 immigrants from 2000 to 2005, a 49 percent increase. He has aired a television ad calling President Bush "wrong" for proposing a guest worker program "that may lead to amnesty for illegal immigrants."

Gerlach is in a tight rematch with Democrat Lois Murphy, who barely lost the election two years ago. Murphy is appalled that Republicans are trying to make illegal immigration a campaign issue, saying the problem mushroomed on their watch.

"It's their failure and they shouldn't get any points for it," Murphy said.

There are nearly 36 million immigrants living in the U.S., according to the Census Bureau. An estimated 11 million to 12 million are in the country illegally.

For generations, most immigrants settled in big cities, attracted by fellow countrymen and by social service networks that catered to them. But immigrants increasingly are chasing jobs to fast-growing suburban and rural communities in Middle America — areas that have elected a lot of Republicans to Congress.

North Georgia has attracted thousands of Latino immigrants — legal and illegal — to work in carpet mills in Dalton, in poultry plants in Gainesville and on farms that dot the landscape in between.

The region exemplifies the struggle — and promise — of Latinos yearning for political power. Hispanics make up about 12.5 percent of the district represented by GOP Rep. Nathan Deal, but less than 2 percent of registered voters.

The district added 28,000 immigrants from 2000 to 2005, a 57 percent increase. But more than three-fourths of the immigrants are noncitizens, giving Barrow little incentive to reach out to them.

"It's difficult to know who's legal and who's illegal, but you know for sure that we haven't let that many legal immigrants in," said Deal, a seven-term incumbent from Gainesville.

Deal has proposed legislation that would deny citizenship to the U.S.-born children of illegal immigrants. It is unclear whether the bill would be constitutional and it is unlikely to pass this year. But it has attracted 87 co-sponsors in the House.

DOJ_NMG_0084556

Deal's opponent in November, Democrat John Bradbury, said Republicans offer slogans rather than solutions to illegal immigration. "We're dealing with people who are perfectly willing to accept catch phrases instead of thought," said Bradbury, a political newcomer who faces long odds on Election Day.

Gruner, the volunteer voter recruiter, moved from Mexico to Dalton five years ago to work as an interpreter in the schools. She is in the country legally, but empathizes with those who are not.

"We feel like this is a political game and the politicians are playing with us," Gruner said. "They don't see the faces. They just see a political outcome."

It takes Gruner two hands to carry the tub filled with voter registration forms as she strolls through the crowd at the soccer game.

She approaches two men sitting under a small tree next to the soccer fields. They wave her away, saying they are not U.S. citizens. The men are brothers, Raul and Juan Perez. Both were born in Mexico; only Juan is in the U.S. legally.

Raul Perez, 53, said he has entered the U.S. many times and now works as a stone mason on homes. He fetches an envelope stuffed with photographs of his work, pictures of ornate fireplaces and stone-sided houses. One features an elaborate stone wall alongside a backyard swimming pool, a waterfall cascading into the pool.

"You show them what an illegal can do," he says through an interpreter, offering the photo to a visitor.

Neither man has much use for politicians. They do not think Republicans or Democrats represent their interests. But they are hopeful.

"We have children who are citizens and they are getting ready to vote in a few years," says Juan Perez, 43. "We will be a majority someday."

About 40 miles to the south, in Rome, Michael Morton has joined a group that videotapes workers entering factories, asking them if they are in the country legally.

"Most of them will say no," said the retired marketing executive, who believes that illegal immigrants strain social services and take jobs from Americans.

Morton said he joined the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps because he felt his community was being overrun. The Arizona-based group patrols the Mexico border looking for illegal immigrants. Morton was planning a three-week trip to the border this fall.

"We have a great deal of respect for the work ethic they bring, but they are breaking the law to do it," Morton said. "They are a segregated culture and their culture seems to be in opposition to our American culture."

___

On the Net:

Downloadable file showing immigration changes in all congressional districts: http://wid.ap.org/documents/immigration_census.pdf

Webb Struggles Against Stiff Style (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

Since the first day of his U.S. Senate campaign in Virginia, Democrat James H. Webb Jr. has described himself as a nonpolitician.

And the self-description rings true in his performance on the hustings.

The decorated Vietnam War veteran's stiff and stern style of retail politics has been on display since his announcement in February that he would try to unseat Sen. George Allen, one of the state's most polished politicians.

"The idea that you have to go out and touch people and shake hands and warm up to total strangers, that was a bit of a shock to him at first, but he has warmed up to it," Mr. Webb's longtime friend Nelson Jones told The Washington Times. "People who know Jim know he is a shy guy."

On the campaign trail, the former Navy secretary is a far cry from former Gov. Mark Warner, a Democrat who is arguably the state's most personable public figure.

DOJ_NMG_0084557

With his toothy smile, Mr. Warner runs to the crowd and shakes hands, often sweats through shirts and hardly ever passes up a chance to kiss a baby.

Mr. Webb gives firm handshakes, but at times needs a reminder to smile in photographs. He has a catchy belly laugh, but it rarely is heard in public. He thrives on foreign-policy issues, but sometimes loses people accustomed to candidates rattling off sound bites.

"With politics, [Mr. Webb] is more of a policy guy, an intellectual, rather than a politician," state Sen. Robert Creigh Deeds, Bath Democrat, told The Times.

At a Memorial Day parade in Falls Church, Mr. Webb, 60, appeared uncomfortable walking before a crowd of supporters chanting "Jim Webb for Senate."

Following the lead of former Delegate J. Chapman Petersen, a Democrat, Mr. Webb gradually found a stride more fitting of a politician. He sporadically shook hands and said, "Hello, I'm Jim Webb."

"Sometimes you think if he was more of a glad-hander that might help him in some situations, but that is just not his personality," Mr. Petersen said.

Though Mr. Webb touts Andrew Jackson's philosophy of "measuring the health of a society at its base, not at its top," he sometimes struggles to direct his message toward the working-class voters he targets.

For example, while former President Bill Clinton describes what he calls Republican fear-mongering as a "mangy old dog" that won't hunt, Mr. Webb dubs it "classic Rovian strategy." The latter is a reference to White House adviser Karl Rove.

And at a recent banquet in Norfolk benefiting the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, some in the audience thought Mr. Webb's speech was geared more toward Capital Beltway insiders than those in southeastern Virginia.

At the Oct. 9 debate, Mr. Allen efficiently answered questions about such issues as the war in Iraq, while Mr. Webb rarely smiled, made little eye contact with the camera and often scanned his notes.

However, while Mr. Webb answered reporters' questions after the debate, Mr. Allen hurriedly left the room with his wife, Susan, who barely kept up with his pace.

Democrats say Mr. Webb's public persona is a double-edged sword: It hurts his ability to connect with people who see him as being too distant, while it helps him with those who see him as the antithesis of Mr. Allen's "good old boy" image.

That image and Mr. Allen's missteps have made the race a tossup.

"Whether [Mr. Webb's public persona] translates into a win, we will see," Mr. Petersen said.

•Christina Bellantoni contributed to this report.

In Md. Race, Groups Court 'Values Voters' (WP)

By Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Abortion Becomes a Defining Issue

Religious leaders and abortion foes are pumping more than $140,000 into the final two weeks of the Maryland U.S. Senate contest to motivate "values voters" by elevating such issues as abortion and same-sex marriage in a campaign that has largely been fought over the Iraq war, the future of Social Security and the candidates' disparate styles.

The issue of abortion, though, offers one of the starkest contrasts in the race: Republican Michael S. Steele, a former Catholic seminarian, strongly opposes the practice. Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin, a Baltimore congressman, was the keynote speaker at NARAL Pro-Choice Maryland's annual gala last night in Rockville.

Although the two major candidates rarely bring up the subject unprompted on the campaign trail, independent groups plan to highlight the issue in radio and television ads, direct mail and fundraising appeals leading up to Nov. 7.

National Right to Life's political action committee plans to run radio commercials on Steele's behalf in Western Maryland and the Eastern Shore in the week before the election and has spent more than $72,000 supporting the lieutenant governor's candidacy with ads and mail, according to the Federal Election Commission.

A coalition of religious leaders last week released a series of ads aimed at energizing churchgoing African American voters in Prince George's County and Baltimore to "vote for candidates who defend life." The 30-second spots do not mention Steele by name, but Bishop Harry R. Jackson Jr., the organizer, said voters will get the message when they review the candidates' records in guides distributed in 150 churches.

DOJ_NMG_0084558

"We're promoting values voting, and in this case it means Steele is our big choice," said Jackson, the senior pastor of Hope Christian Church in Lanham.

NARAL's national affiliate, meanwhile, has appealed to thousands of abortion rights supporters throughout Maryland to contribute to Cardin's campaign. The message delivered through e-mail last week was titled "Don't let Bush 'Steele' Your Choice in Maryland." And women's rights leaders, including National Organization for Women President Kim Gandy, gathered yesterday in Bethesda to take issue with Steele's recent assertion that his opinion on the 1973 Supreme Court decision to legalize abortion is "moot."

"Maybe he slept through ninth-grade civics class," Gandy said. "The last time I looked at the Constitution, the Senate has to consent to every federal court nominee."

Independent candidate Kevin Zeese -- who has the backing of the Green, Populist and Libertarian parties -- supports abortion rights but called the issue a "diversion from the major issues of our militaristic foreign policy and an economy that favors the wealthiest while the middle class struggles."

In the governor's race, the issue has not arisen because both candidates generally support abortion rights. Although Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. favors some limitations, he has done nothing to press them in his tenure.

Of the candidates, political pollsters and professors say Steele has the most to gain -- and lose -- from the attention as he tries to secure his GOP base, attract black Democrats and appeal to independents with a message of moderation.

Steele's challenge, they said, is to attract so-called values voters without turning off a broader audience in a state where the majority consistently tell pollsters that they believe abortion should be legal.

"The winning political tactic is to be all things to all people, but that tends to get shredded in the competitive environment," said political science professor Herb Smith of McDaniel College in Westminster, Md.

Smith said the effort to sway conservative Democrats could be successful if the communications are targeted through church congregation lists as the national GOP did in 2004 in states such as Ohio. But if the message is dispersed through mass media, he said, it could erode support for Steele among a larger segment of voters.

In a Washington Post poll in June, 63 percent of Maryland voters surveyed said abortion should be legal, compared with 56 percent nationally. In 1992, voters overwhelmingly supported an abortion measure on the statewide ballot that ensures access to legal early-term abortions in Maryland even if Roe v. Wade is overturned.

"If you're Michael Steele, the last thing you want is the campaign to be determined based on a set of social issues," said pollster Keith Haller of Potomac Inc., who is not working for either candidate.

The $70,000 ad campaign by the Maryland Values Coalition is part of a multi-front effort that includes handing out 60,000 voters' guides from the Association of Maryland Families mostly to evangelical and Catholic churches, registering voters and educating religious leaders.

In private meetings with pastors, Jackson said Steele is "clear that he's for life, a good Roman Catholic." In the final weeks of the campaign, he said, "these real differences need to be pointed out."

Steele raised the ire of abortion rights advocates last week after MSNBC reported his comments on the Roe v. Wade decision: "It's in the Supreme Court. What piece of legislation in the Senate is dealing with abortion?"

Cardin, joined by NARAL Pro-Choice America President Nancy Keenan, strenuously disagreed, pointing to 75 votes in the past decade on abortion-related questions. "It is a fundamental issue, and there are significant matters before Congress," Cardin said, from judicial nominations to family planning.

Steele later said that when it comes to such social issues as abortion, "I'm not saying that they're not relevant. I just don't want them to be the center and the primary focus when we have people starving in our neighborhoods, when we have kids who are not being educated in our classrooms."

Staff writer Ernesto LondoÃ±o contributed to this report.

Steele's Aura Of Independence Needs Substance (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0084559

By Marc Fisher

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Michael Steele looks like the most innovative and refreshing candidate in this fall's campaign. All puppies aside, his TV ads have been the talk of the town, not only for their striking style and the lieutenant governor's good humor, but because Steele is bold enough to take some shots at his party's orthodoxy.

Steele clearly relishes breaking the mold. Even if his early steps away from the Republican line on the war in Iraq were tentative and clumsily anonymous, Steele has managed to portray himself as someone who understands the average Marylander's frustration with both parties and with all the tired tropes of American politics.

So when Steele is asked whether Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld should resign, his response is neither to parrot the party line nor to obfuscate with standard-issue blather about how Cabinet members serve at the pleasure of the president. No, Steele declares the question to be "irrelevant. It's more political Washington stuff. Demagoguing. If I call for his resignation, what does that do? 'Oooh, Michael Steele says I should resign?' "

But while Steele's casual, backyard rhetoric is alluringly accessible, his reply is also a voter-friendly way of saying he's not going to answer the question. Similarly, when Steele is asked whether the Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade ruling on abortion was properly decided, he says, "I'm a Senate candidate. My opinion on that is moot." Another deflection, despite the effort to appear disdainful of the usual political rhetoric.

Like many voters who look at Democratic candidate Ben Cardin and his large contributions from big oil, pharmaceutical and insurance companies, I roll my eyes over his easy acceptance of politics-as-usual. But although Steele's TV ads present him as a different kind of politician, he also has taken plenty of moola from big industry.

The problem with Steele's enticing campaign is that, as lieutenant governor, the mantle of independence that he claimed turned out to be only a decorative cloak. For years, he touted his religious objections to the death penalty as a symbol of his ability to stand up for his principles even when they put him on the wrong side of Republican policy. But Steele couldn't deliver the goods: When he finally came up with his long-promised recommendation to Gov. Bob Ehrlich on Maryland's use of capital punishment, all Steele could muster was a confidential memo suggesting more study of the issue. If that's his idea of an independent stand, then those TV ads indeed are all bluster.

Still, the promise portrayed by Steele's campaign has more than a few Prince George's County residents thinking about jumping over to cast one Republican vote. I've spoken to dozens of black voters who are attracted by the prospect of a black senator, by Steele's pledge to break with his party and by his background as a native Washingtonian.

In Maryland politics, where Baltimore still reigns supreme, the possibility of having a senator who knows and cares about D.C. suburbs is almost enough for many voters to overcome their dismay with the Bush administration and Republicans.

Cardin, who has represented Baltimore his entire adult life, seems to have little interest in Washington area issues. When I asked him what the next move should be now that Virginia's legislature has failed to join Maryland, the District and the federal government in providing a dedicated source of funding for Metro, Cardin replied that he was "not familiar with that issue." The man who wants to represent all of Maryland was clueless about a $1.5 billion federal funding source that is the No. 1 priority for the transit system serving the state's largest bloc of voters.

But while Steele would give D.C. suburbs a voice in the Senate for the first time since Montgomery and Prince George's counties ballooned into major population centers, his campaign has become its own worst enemy. Surrounding himself with a staff that sports a deep antagonism toward Democrats and the federal government -- that is, toward significant chunks of the voter base he needs to win over -- Steele has run a stealth campaign, keeping the candidate's whereabouts a closely held secret and venturing out primarily on friendly, conservative talk radio.

And now, when you'd think Steele would be trying to prove his independence with a strong emphasis on policy and ideas, what does he do to drum up publicity? Import Don King, the clownish boxing showman who served time for manslaughter. "I must have an indictments list longer than his awards list," King joked while touring the state with Steele. Har, har.

Michael Steele had a choice in this campaign: Add substance to the aura of independence generated by his TV ads, or hide behind that aura, spending his energy instead on pumping up the imagery. Sadly, he stuck with the sizzle, leaving voters still hungry for meat.

DOJ_NMG_0084560

E-mail:marcfisher@washpost.com

Lamont Gives $2M To Flagging Campaign (AP)

By Andrew Miga

AP, October 22, 2006

Democratic candidate Ned Lamont, trailing Sen. Joe Lieberman by a double-digit margin, dropped another $2 million into his Senate bid in Connecticut on Saturday.

The wealthy cable television executive has tapped his personal fortune for $12.7 million to fund his campaign.

Lamont has about two weeks to catch Lieberman, a three-term incumbent who has pulled to a 17-point lead, according to a recent poll. Lieberman lost the Democratic primary to Lamont and then launched an independent campaign.

The third and final televised debate of the race was scheduled for Monday. Unlike their second debate, which featured all five candidates, only Lieberman, Lamont and Republican Alan Schlesinger will share the stage. That could make it easier for Lamont to engage Lieberman directly.

"People have a real opportunity to see three candidates stand up, enunciate real differences about where this country should go," Lamont said Friday while campaigning in Hartford. "That's the best way to get our message out, through debates."

Lieberman spokeswoman Tammy Sun said, "We expect Ned Lamont may stoop to new lows in misrepresenting Joe Lieberman's record in a desperate last-minute ploy."

Schlesinger, considered a long shot, was at 6 percent in the latest Quinnipiac University survey. He and Lieberman are vying for Republican support, so any Schlesinger gains could come at Lieberman's expense.

Lieberman drew much of the criticism that came from his rivals in the first two debates. He has widened his lead from 10 points last month, according to the latest Quinnipiac poll. The senator gained an edge with independent voters, the state's largest voting bloc, and with men, the survey showed.

"It's a steep uphill battle for Lamont to erase this substantial gap," said Quinnipiac poll director Doug Schwartz. "He's got to do something different, because what he's been doing up to this point hasn't been working. In fact, his numbers have been getting lower."

Lamont is flooding the airwaves with a new ad campaign in the coming days to try to close the gap. Lieberman, who enjoys a fundraising advantage, has accused Lamont of trying to buy the election with a $1 million barrage of TV commercials assailing him.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., the Democratic 2004 presidential nominee, hopes to give Lamont a boost when he campaigns with Lamont on Wednesday. Lieberman will stump with former Nebraska Sen. Bob Kerrey, a Democrat, on the same day.

—

Associated Press writer Susan Haigh contributed to this story.

Democrat, Republican Decry GOP TV Ad (AP)

AP, October 22, 2006

Both major-party candidates for a congressional seat are decrying an ad sponsored by a national Republican committee that accuses the Democrat of billing taxpayers for a call to a phone-sex line.

The ad, which began airing Friday, shows Michael Arcuri leering at the silhouette of a dancing woman who says, "Hi, sexy. You've reached the live, one-on-one fantasy line."

Arcuri's campaign said an associate mistakenly dialed an 800-number sex line two years ago from Arcuri's New York City hotel room, and released records supporting the claim. The number shares the same last seven digits with the number for the state Department of Criminal Justice Services, which was dialed the minute after the first call was made.

Arcuri, the district attorney in Oneida County, said the ad was "clearly libelous" and threatened to file a lawsuit. His GOP opponent, state Sen. Ray Meier, described it as "way over the line."

At least seven television stations in Syracuse, Utica and Binghamton refused to run the ad, Arcuri said.

The ad's sponsor, the National Republican Congressional Committee, stood by the 30-second message. Spokesman Ed Patru insisted it was "totally true" and said Meier was not consulted.

DOJ_NMG_0084561

The two candidates, who say they are friends, are running to fill the seat left open by the retirement of Republican Rep. Sherwood Boehlert. Political analysts have said the race is among the nation's most competitive.

Arcuri said he had "never seen such an unfair commercial. I have a 12-year-old daughter. She's going to have to go to school and hear other kids talk about this."

Robert Thompson, professor of television and popular culture at Syracuse University, called the ad "an egregiously stupid accusation."

Earlier in the week, both candidates said they were disappointed by the attack ads produced and funded by their national party committees. They said campaign-finance laws prevent them from screening the commercials.

One voter, Rosemarie Paladino of Utica, said she found such negative advertising so distasteful that she was tempted to avoid voting.

"But then I said, 'Wait a minute. I've got to exercise my right.'"

Peace Now? A Stark Choice Between The Perception Of A Noble Effort And Of A Mistake (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

NORWALK, CONN.

In the 11th, count 'em, 11th, debate between Representative Christopher R. Shays, the incumbent Republican, and his Democratic challenger, Diane Farrell, Ms. Farrell began, as she usually does, with a brilliantly concise formulation of why people should oust Mr. Shays after 19 years in Congress.

"Where Chris Shays agrees with President Bush and the Republican majority has it been good for our country? Think Iraq and fiscal policies. Where Congressman Shays disagrees with President Bush and the Republican majority has it made a difference? Think the environment and energy. And can we afford another two years without checks and balances in Washington?"

Republicans are supposed to be the ones framing issues with bumper-sticker clarity, and Democrats are supposed to be the ones depicted as lost in meandering self-reflection.

But there are few more vivid glimpses of the ways that Republicans are trying to drive the wrong way against traffic than the eloquent, spirited, even admirable race in Connecticut's affluent New York suburbs. It is one of three Connecticut races in which incumbent Republican Representatives are fighting to survive.

Mr. Shays has an artfully articulated maverick image and is one of the more respected members of the House. Candidates like him lose about as often as Roger Federer loses first-round matches. But in a race starkly defined by the war, both camps say the election, a repeat of the one two years ago that Mr. Shays won with 52 percent of the vote, is close to dead even.

Ms. Farrell says that the war is a mistake that should be ended as quickly as possible. Mr. Shays says it is a noble effort, terribly botched, that must be salvaged and can be if we make a commitment to do it. If that's not a choice, nothing is.

"I've talked to people who have voted for Chris Shays all their lives and they are thinking of voting for Diane Farrell to send a message," said John M. Orman, professor of politics at Fairfield University. "People still want to be loyal to him, but even Republicans are deciding if they want to vote against a friend and send a message."

If the war is issue one, two and three, Mr. Shays is issue four. He hasn't always helped himself in the slog from debate to debate.

He said what happened at Abu Ghraib wasn't torture, then backtracked. Asked to defend taking campaign funds from House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, who is under fire for his handling of the Congressional-page controversy, he noted that Senator Edward M. Kennedy was campaigning for Ms. Farrell. "I know the speaker didn't go over a bridge and leave a young person in the water and then have a press conference the next day," he told The Hartford Courant. "Dennis Hastert didn't kill anybody."

He said last week that the United States should have invaded Iraq sooner than it did, but not over weapons of mass destruction.

DOJ_NMG_0084562

He has tried to defend both the war and what some have seen as his new urgency about coming up with a way to end it. That is a balancing act so tenuous that David Broder of The Washington Post wrote that the war had reduced him "to a complete head case — consumed by the convoluted efforts to square the circle of his own conflicting interests."

STILL, if Mr. Shays wears his anguish like a beacon, his supporters say he has come by it honestly. A conscientious objector during Vietnam, he has made 14 trips to Iraq, putting himself in harm's way outside the confines of the secure Green Zone. He has been consistently second-guessing the conduct of the war, if not the case for it, since 2004.

And rather than Rove-ian sound bites ("cut-and-run Democrats"), he seems willing in debate after debate, forum after forum, to make his case for the war and how it can be redeemed in four steps: a series of timelines for replacing United States forces with Iraqi forces, based on an accurate assessment of combat readiness; an agreement among Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish leaders on power sharing; a conference of Iraq's neighbors on Iraqi security; and a plebiscite on the plan for American disengagement that would require a two-thirds majority for approval.

Many voters in his district have long since lost patience with the war and want a candidate whose first commitment is to ending it. The grim headlines and continuing carnage won't help a hawk, no matter how reflective, in an antiwar district. But if the voters want an honest debate on the war, 11 in fact, they've got it here.

"I'm not afraid to lose," said Mr. Shays. "Losing does not cause me angst. Will it be fun to call Diane Farrell on election night to say congratulations? No, that will not be fun. But I've lost before. I know what it's like. What I agonize over is sending men and women to war, and some of them are coming back in body bags. That to me is something to agonize about."

Unbowed Jefferson Keeps Up The Fight (WP)

By Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- At a barbershop in the Third Ward, in an area still woozy from Hurricane Katrina's knockout punch, the chatter was about what to do with Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.).

"He's got my vote. I like Jefferson," shop owner Charles Harris said as he finished up a haircut. "They haven't indicted him, number one. Whenever they come up with some concrete evidence, that might change things."

"I ain't voting for him 'cause of the $100,000 in the freezer," retorted one of Harris's customers, a former Jefferson supporter who declined to give his name. "You find $100,000 in your freezer, I ain't voting for you."

Jefferson has represented this part of New Orleans in the House for the better part of two decades, becoming the first black lawmaker elected to the United States Congress from Louisiana since Reconstruction. He has held seats on the Budget and Ways and Means committees. But in the Third Ward and elsewhere, some voters are no longer deciding on Jefferson based on his rÃ©sumÃ© or his legislative record, but on the $100,000 the FBI allegedly videotaped him accepting from an FBI informant.

FBI agents later found $90,000 in marked bills in Jefferson's freezer, wrapped in foil. The other $10,000 was missing but accounted for.

As Jefferson campaigns for a ninth term, the Harvard Law School graduate has shed little light on the federal investigation of bribery allegations, other than to insist on his innocence. In a TV ad, he talks about "the presumption of innocence afforded every person" and says, "For over 18 months, the federal government has investigated me and has yet to bring a single charge against me."

That message appears to be resonating among voters like Harris, and so, despite the constant threat of a federal indictment that sources familiar with the probe say is a foregone conclusion, the 59-year-old congressman is confidently campaigning.

Jefferson is showing up at public events, ready to work the crowd and touting a record of passing key legislation and getting funds to help post-Katrina New Orleans. Recently he went on the offensive, publicly accusing two of his 12 opponents of being "ethically challenged."

"He's a formidable candidate," says Danny Ford, executive director of the Louisiana Democratic Party, which endorsed another candidate. "He's not been indicted or convicted. He's got a lot of support."

DOJ_NMG_0084563

Twelve challengers -- eight Democrats, three Republicans and one Libertarian -- are running against Jefferson in the Nov. 7 election. Unless the winner gets more than 50 percent of the vote, there will be a runoff in December. Political observers said they expect Jefferson to be in a runoff and possibly win, unless he's indicted.

Some in Jefferson's district say the absence of an indictment, after such a lengthy investigation, settles the matter for them.

"I think to the common person, this has gone on so long, if the feds had something they would have indicted by now," says Michael M. Davis, a member of the Jefferson Parish Democratic Executive Committee, which has endorsed Jefferson.

But other voters have little doubt about the ultimate outcome.

"There will be a special election when he's convicted," predicted Jim Monaghan Jr., who owns Molly's at the Market, a popular watering hole on Decatur Street. "How can he not be with 90,000 frozen dollars?"

State Rep. Karen Carter, Jefferson's most formidable challenger, adds: "It's not about innocence or guilt. The Justice Department will take care of that. There's a cloud of suspicion that hinders the incumbent's ability to be effective."

Carter has the endorsement of the state Democratic Party, which for the first time in decades turned its back on an incumbent. And his own party earlier this year kicked him off the powerful Ways and Means Committee.

Jefferson "is not the underdog, but he's certainly playing that card to supporters," said Brian Brox, a political science professor at Tulane University in New Orleans.

At a recent afternoon's campaign stop at the William Guste high-rise apartments in the Third Ward, a tieless Jefferson took off his suit coat, rolled up his sleeves and began shaking hands and exchanging hugs with a sea of smiling, receptive voters. Many of them were African American and middle-aged. Some wore "Don't Mess With Jeff" buttons.

Among those in attendance was Joshua Travis, 64, who said: "You're innocent until proven guilty. Ain't that the American way?"

Another attendee, a 58-year-old man who declined to give his name, said the FBI probe makes no difference.

"All of them are stealing. He just got caught. Since he's been in office, he's one of the few black officials who has been able to get in office and do something for the people," the man said.

After giving a spirited stump speech, Jefferson got personal.

"People ask me, 'Jefferson, how you keep on going with all that's going on . . . and people saying things about you?' I tell them how to do it. You know how to do it. I just turn it over to God.

"When you see me going around the campaign, when you see me with my head up at work, that's how it gets done. . . . Keep working and keep praying and keep praying."

In Two New Mexico Towns, Voices Of Concern About The Party In Power (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

PLACITAS, N.M., Oct. 19 — Jerry Eller, a Republican engineer who built his own house in this small town with big mountain views, voted twice for President Bush.

But his disenchantment with the Republican Party cuts so deeply that if the 2004 presidential election were being held this year, Mr. Bush would not get his vote. “If Kerry was running this time,” said Mr. Eller, 53, referring to Senator John Kerry, the Democratic nominee in 2004, “I would vote for him.”

A Vietnam veteran with three sons of military age, Mr. Eller frets over the war in Iraq and a possible draft, an idea he calls far from improbable. But there are other disturbing issues, too, he said: the erosion of civil liberties, runaway spending, and the religious right’s squeeze on the party.

Next month, Mr. Eller said, he plans to vote for the Democratic candidate in the tight House race here. “You get one party in power and they become corrupt,” he said.

In interviews with nearly two dozen people in Bernalillo, a small, mostly Hispanic town on Route 66, and its neighbor, Placitas, which is more affluent and increasingly more Republican, voters expressed their concerns about the state of the nation. Asked what issues will sway their votes in the House race here, almost everyone interviewed said, “The war and ...” (fill in the blank).

DOJ_NMG_0084564

For some Republicans here, this one-two punch — the war and the federal deficit, the war and corruption, the war and the House page scandal — is enough to catapult some to the other side. Or at least to get them thinking of voting for the other party, something few of them imagined two years ago, they said.

In Placitas, a tranquil town of modern adobe houses, Republicans mostly describe themselves as moderate, the kind who disapprove of partisan politics. Some are New Mexico natives. Others come from elsewhere: Texas (to escape the humidity), Michigan (to flee the cold) and California (to stretch their money).

They live in a swing state. New Mexico went to Al Gore in 2000 and to Mr. Bush in 2004, both times by a sliver. In the First Congressional District here, which includes neighboring Albuquerque, voters opted for Mr. Kerry in 2004, although Sandoval County, Placitas' home, went for Mr. Bush. Yet voters in this district have sent a Republican to the House for nearly four decades. The state has a Democratic governor but a senator from each party.

Representative Heather A. Wilson, who was first elected in this district in 1998, has won each election with a boost from Democrats. Now, though, she is in a dead heat with Patricia Madrid, the Democratic attorney general, according to recent polls.

The rancorous campaign has generated debate, and considerable anger, among most voters, who expressed distaste for today's political culture, namely the partisan bickering and negative campaigning. But it has also prompted reflection. And while some Republicans here are steadfastly loyal, others said disenchantment had crept in.

A Republican newcomer to the area, Stan Nivault, 52, a married contractor and father of four from Austin, Tex., said he had never voted for a Democrat. But this year, Mr. Nivault, who calls himself a staunch Catholic, said he actually might, mostly because of the revelation that former Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, had sent explicit electronic messages to underage male Congressional pages.

"It's a bad thing," Mr. Nivault said. "I'm upset that the guy was there to begin with and that Republicans did not handle it correctly. Democrats have made a big issue of it, but they have a right to."

"Normally I vote straight Republican, but this year I may not vote that way because I'm a little upset," Mr. Nivault said. "Every time you open the paper or listen to television, it gets worse and worse."

As Bert Miller, a retired chemical engineer, hauled groceries to his car, he said that he would still vote Republican even though he had soured on the party.

Mr. Miller, 67, a fiscal conservative who moved here with his wife in 1998, said he was concerned about the war. But he is no less concerned about Republican spending gone amok.

"Republicans have been a disappointment," Mr. Miller said. "This president hasn't vetoed anything except one bill, on a social issue, stem cell research."

Mr. Miller said he yearned for old-fashioned Republican principles: tighter budgets and smaller government. "Things have gotten crazy," he said. "Let's get to work on the deficit and not same-sex marriage."

Russ Fisher-Ives, 51, a self-described liberal Republican, pulled up a chair at a restaurant on Route 66 in Bernalillo and said he was also disillusioned with the party. Mr. Fisher-Ives, who owns four acres nearby and moved here 31 years ago, said he did not know how he would vote. But the war in Iraq, once a more distant concern, has hit him hard, as has his distress over public education.

"This is another Vietnam; it's far bigger than Vietnam," said Mr. Fisher-Ives, an educator whose father once served as the Republican minority leader in the Connecticut Senate and as state treasurer.

Despite his Republican lineage, Mr. Fisher-Ives has contemplated switching parties, but then reconsidered. "I feel like they still have to answer to me as a registered Republican," he said. "I am not them. I am us."

For other Republicans, patriotism and safety remain a rallying cry; they would never think of straying, they said.

Croft Edwards, 37, has lived in New Mexico most of his life. An Army reservist and family man, Mr. Edwards said that he was "disappointed" in the system, but that he strongly believed Republicans were better suited to handle Iraq.

"Like George Bush or not, he likes to take action," Mr. Edwards said.

A Texas native, Beverly Maxie, 58, who fervently opposes abortion, agreed. As long as the war is being fought in Iraq — not here — Republicans are doing their job, Ms. Maxie said. "I am confident that Republicans will stay in power," she added.

DOJ_NMG_0084565

For most Democrats, even those not always so keen on their party, the war and its repercussions are paramount. And there are other concerns: political scandals, health care, the environment, the economy.

Molly Perez, 52, who is raising her grandchild, earns $10 an hour as a cashier at a supermarket and pays $800 a month in rent. She is barely making ends meet, Ms. Perez said, and high gasoline prices set her back considerably. She said she sometimes prayed that her beat-up Chevy Cavalier would remain road-worthy.

"My life has gotten harder since the last election," Ms. Perez said.

She said she was so disheartened with the process, though, that she did not know whether she would vote in the House race. If she does, it will be unenthusiastically for Ms. Madrid.

Ophelia Rinaldi, 73, a retired social worker, said she took the war in Iraq in stride until recently. Now, she said, "it's pie in the sky," adding that it was "drawing away all our resources." Ms. Rinaldi said she worried about health care and prescription drugs.

Leslie Elgood, 51, a Democrat who works for New Mexico Community Capital, a community development fund in Bernalillo, said she usually tried to vote outside the box. But this year (she voted early), Ms. Elgood supported her party down the line to send a message. Her anger, she said, began with the war and has swelled with each new scandal.

"The Democrats don't have a sense of my voice," she said, "but I want to give them power now. Maybe they feel more chastened."

Pa. Congress Candidates Spar Over War (LAT/AP)

By Patrick Walters, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

MALVERN, Pa. — Republican Congressman Jim Gerlach accused Democratic challenger Lois Murphy in a debate Saturday of being inconsistent in her support for U.S. troops in Iraq, while Murphy countered that the war has made the nation less safe.

The two-term congressman and Murphy are in battling to gain an edge in a race for a seat from the Philadelphia suburbs that could help determine whether Democrats gain control of Congress.

The race, one of the most competitive House races in the country, is a rematch of 2004, when Gerlach narrowly defeated Murphy. Recent polls have shown the two in a virtual tie.

Gerlach, a moderate Republican, charged in the AARP-sponsored debate that Murphy was not prepared to give U.S. troops the funding they need to help a new government succeed in Iraq.

"She apparently doesn't want to withdraw them and she's not sure she wants to fund them, either," he said at the Desmond Hotel, attended by about 200 people and moderated by KYW-TV news anchor Larry Mendte.

Murphy, a lawyer, denied the assertion that she would not fully support the troops. She condemned the war and called for more accountability.

"The war in Iraq has made us less safe, not safer," Murphy said. "He is satisfied with the progress we are making in Iraq and I am not."

The two also discussed the economy and health care. On the economy, Gerlach said tax cuts in 2001 and 2003 have helped turn it around. "This is a very strong economy that hopefully Congress won't screw up," he said.

Murphy argued that the cuts were not helping the middle class. More than 50 percent of the money went to the top 10 percent of income-earners, Murphy said.

"If he thinks that's a middle-class tax cut, I think he needs to go back to math class," she said.

On health care, Gerlach called for giving small-business owners more opportunity to purchase health coverage through a national cooperative and said he supports medical-liability reform to help cut medical costs. Murphy said she supported allowing Medicare to negotiate for lower drug prices.

GOP Candidate Seeking Bush's Home District Is Hurting (SA)

By Guillermo X. Garcia

San Antonio Express News, October 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084566

WACO — On paper, young and oil-wealthy Van Taylor, a Harvard University graduate who enlisted in the Marines and saw combat in Iraq, seems like the perfect Republican candidate for Congress.

A staunch conservative, he is independently wealthy, thanks to his family's involvement in Humble Oil Co. Taylor, 34, is worth more than $27 million, mostly from the Exxon-Mobil Corp. and pharmaceutical industry stock he owns.

When the campaign for Texas' 17th Congressional District began, Republicans hoped a decorated combat veteran would be able to do what redistricting failed to do in 2004: end the embarrassment of having a Democrat representing President Bush — his Crawford ranch is in the district — by knocking off entrenched incumbent Chet Edwards, the hometown congressman since 1991.

"It is an embarrassment," said M.A. Taylor, McClennan County GOP chairman, who's not related to the candidate. "This area overwhelmingly supports the president and is overwhelmingly Republican, and yet we have a congressman from the opposition who supposedly represents our interests.

"It is nothing short of personally humiliating."

But hopes of ending that embarrassment may be waning.

Last week, the National Republican Campaign Committee cancelled $1.5 million in television ads it had planned to run starting this week.

Republican officials "pulled the plug, and that's devastating for the Taylor campaign," said Edwards' spokeswoman Jessica Shaefer. "And the fact that their decision came just days after they ran a poll indicates that they clearly saw what our poll shows, a 21-point lead among likely voters."

A growing number of signs nationally suggest a Democratic wave may be in the offing Nov. 7. And while that wave may not have a dramatic effect in Texas, where the GOP has re-drawn districts to its advantage, it's likely to be strong enough to keep Edwards in Congress.

So while the president remains popular in his home state, one of the most dramatic demonstrations of his declining influence may unfold in the congressional district where he votes.

All along, Taylor's challenge of an entrenched "blue-dog Democrat" was viewed as a test of Bush's coattails. National Republican officials said it was a "high-level test," calling it the nation's most Republican congressional district not represented by the GOP.

Taylor says the president and first lady Laura Bush have personally promised they'll vote for him. That appears to be the extent of White House involvement in the race.

Supports the war

Ironically, an Edwards victory would not look like wins by Democrats elsewhere.

Nationally, Democrats are critical of Bush's prosecution of the Iraq war while Republicans lambaste what they call Democrats' "cut-and-run" strategy.

But here, in the literal heart of Texas, the dynamic runs counter to that: Edwards won't run against the president's record. Both candidates support the war and oppose pulling troops out of Iraq.

The 17th is a military-rich district, home to tens of thousands of retired soldiers and a Veterans Affairs hospital that last year treated some 17,000 veterans. In his 16 years in Congress, Edwards has a strong record of backing issues involving veterans.

"This is a red-state district, a God-and-country sort of place, and military issues play big here," said Ashely Cruise Turner, a history professor at McClennan Community College.

While Democrats nationally roast Bush, Edwards carefully walks a centrist line, refusing to attack his policies.

"If I believe the president's proposals are right for the district and for the country, then I work with him," he said.

It is a plan that his constituents apparently approve.

In 2004, Bush won almost seven of every 10 votes in the district. Edwards won every precinct in the county, including Crawford. Edwards notes that 50,000 voters in the Waco area who voted for the president crossed political lines to vote for him.

Taylor, meanwhile, launched a series of blistering attack ads portraying illegal immigration from Mexico as a major problem and faulting Edwards for votes he has cast on social issues that Taylor said make him too liberal for the district.

Like most political newcomers, Taylor's problem is getting his name before the voters.

Still, his military record is featured prominently in his campaign.

He saw combat during two tours as a captain with the 4th Marines, 3rd Recon Battalion, and he comes from a line of soldiers who saw action in the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, both world wars, Korea and Vietnam.

In an apparent effort to counter, Edwards received endorsements from a host of retired military brass: one four-star general and three three-star generals, including two who commanded at Fort Hood.

"I voted for Bush twice, I voted for his daddy, and while I probably vote Republican more than Democrat, I am voting for Chet," said retired Lt. Gen. Randy House from his ranch outside College Station. "It is important that people realize what Congressman Edwards has done for the military and their families at a time when his opponent is touting his military service," said House, former commanding general of the Big Red One, the legendary 1st Infantry Division.

In the crosshairs

Despite being in GOP crosshairs for years, Edwards has represented the 17th Congressional District for eight two-year terms.

He was one of six Democrats targeted for extinction via redistricting by the Republican-controlled Texas Legislature in 2003, and the only one to survive in a competitive district. At the top of the hit list, along with Martin Frost of Dallas and Lloyd Doggett of Austin, the conservative Edwards had his district redrawn. In the process, he lost a power base — Fort Hood.

In 2004, he withstood the redrawing of his district and a strong challenge from former state Rep. Arlene Wohlgemuth.

Taylor moved last summer to rural McClennan County, the largest of the 12 counties in the district, which stretches from the Dallas-Fort Worth suburbs south to Waco and east to College Station. It is a solidly conservative, mostly rural stretch of North-Central Texas that now is nearly 65 percent Republican.

That had national GOP leaders salivating at the chance to take Edwards out, at least until last week.

Taylor's campaign would not confirm the cancelled ad buys in the Dallas area.

But Democrats say the president's lack of involvement, coupled with the small party contribution to Taylor's campaign, is a sign the GOP does not believe Edwards is beatable.

Republican officials shrug that off.

"A decorated military veteran like Van Taylor means the war will play a larger role than any other race in the country. In that district, there is no better candidate," said Jonathan Collegio, an RNCC Washington spokesman.

McClennan GOP chairman Taylor assessed candidate Taylor's chance of victory as "even money."

Taylor, however, was left on his own. So far he has pumped $575,000 of his own money, including a $250,000 loan, into the campaign, according to Federal Election Commission records.

"The Republicans in D.C. made a fundamental miscalculation," said Matt Engle, a Democratic strategist who was Frost's longtime chief of staff.

The GOP, he said, "thought using Taylor's military record and his lack of (political) baggage would be a good wedge to hit Edwards with. But without national Republican money and Bush not getting involved, Taylor is in the ditch."

A Jeopardy Question For The Nov. 7 Crowd (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

Washington

POLITICAL reporters love asking hypothetical questions, almost as much as politicians hate answering them.

But it has become a settled expectation of political life that any candidate who supported the Iraq war resolution in 2002 must now answer the dreaded, “If you knew then what you know now” question.

That is, of course, some variant on the “If you knew then that Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction, would you still have authorized President Bush to use force in Iraq?”

The question has inspired some great rhetorical gymnastics. It has also sparked impressive finesse jobs across the political spectrum.

DOJ_NMG_0084568

In one sparkling turn last week, Senator Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania, said that he would rather be fighting terrorists in Iraq than in the United States. Only he put it this way: "As the hobbits are going up Mount Doom, the Eye of Mordor is being drawn somewhere else. It's being drawn to Iraq."

As is clear to fans of J. R. R. Tolkien, Mr. Santorum was comparing the rationale for combat in Iraq to the plan to distract the evil Lord Sauron in "The Lord of the Rings." Sauron was seeking the magical ring that would secure his power over Middle Earth. (Mr. Santorum merely wants to secure his Senate seat.)

At the very least, give Mr. Santorum points for appealing to an untapped constituency of potential supporters, "Lord of the Rings" lovers, a few of whom might even be old enough to vote.

Otherwise, the variety of responses to the "If you knew then what you know now?" question can be distilled into a few predictable categories. Herein, a primer:

The 'No, but' Response

This is by far the most common refrain among Democrats who supported the use-of-force resolution but who now wish they hadn't. The optimal answer should include a quick "no," followed by a swift indictment of the Bush administration's incompetence, dishonesty, stubbornness or some such unpleasant thing. And it never hurts to tack on an homage to the troops.

Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat of Tennessee who is running for Senate, achieved this in three tidy sentences. "Had I known then what I know now, I would have voted no," Mr. Ford told The Memphis Commercial Appeal last week. "The president and his team have pursued a flawed strategy. Thankfully, America has the best and the bravest war fighters in the world."

Second-Guessing Is for Weenies

Early supporters of the war — particularly Republicans — often dispatch with the question in favor of a general lament about typical Washington nay-saying, second-guessing and defeatism (as practiced by "Defeatocrats"). The implication is that criticizing the administration's Iraq policy is tantamount to whining, not to mention emblematic of all that is wrong with the hideous swamp they've all chosen to live and work in (or want to live and work in).

While systematically criticizing the administration's Iraq policy, the Senate candidate Claire McCaskill, Democrat of Missouri, has nonetheless voiced an aversion to "Monday morning quarterbacking." Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia and a prodigious practitioner of the football analogy, is also fond of the phrase.

"You can all second-guess and Monday morning quarterback," Mr. Allen said in a debate in July against his Democratic opponent, Jim Webb.

"We made decisions," Mr. Allen added on "Meet the Press" on NBC. "You can't say, 'Gosh,' five years later."

But of course, Mr. Webb is saying a lot of "Gosh."

"And this is what my opponent's campaign's about," Mr. Allen said, "is the second-guessing."

Sorry, Folks

Increasingly popular among Democrats, the tool has been wielded deftly by the Democratic ticket of 2004, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts and former Senator John Edwards, of North Carolina. The runners-up have thrown themselves into a virtual mea-culpa-palooza in recent months.

"It is essential to acknowledge that the war itself was a mistake, to say the simple words that contain more truth than pride," Mr. Kerry said in a speech to liberal activists in June. "It was wrong and I was wrong to vote for that Iraqi war resolution."

Mr. Edwards, the earnest former running mate, has been impressively prolific in his use of the "M-word."

"It was a mistake to vote for the war in 2002," Mr. Edwards wrote for the Washington Post op-ed page last November. "I take responsibility for that mistake." He concluded that "America's leaders — all of us — need to accept the responsibility we each carry for how we got to this place."

Incidentally there are wild rumors flying around that these guys might be running for president again.

C'mon, Everybody's Doing It

Also known as the "Hey, We All Saw the Same Intelligence" defense, candidates who supported the war (usually Republicans) are fond of cataloging all the others (usually Democrats) who supported it, too, based on the same intelligence. Extra credit for Republicans who drop Bill Clinton's name.

DOJ_NMG_0084569

"Look, Chris Dodd, Joe Lieberman and I voted to go to war," Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, told The Hartford Courant. "I consulted with a lot of people, including Bill Clinton."

It never hurts to throw in a few foreign countries, too. "Every intelligence agency in the world, including the Russians, including the French, including the Israelis, had reached the same conclusion," Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said on "Face the Nation" on CBS.

Hypothetical Meets Hypothetical

Instead of admitting he would have voted differently, the candidate maintains that there would not have even been a vote in light of "what we know now."

In other words, the hypothetical question has been rendered moot by hypothetical non-events.

When asked on "Meet the Press" if he regretted his vote, Senator Mike DeWine, Republican of Ohio, said, "It would never have been presented by the president," the "it" referring to the use-of-force resolution.

In a corollary strategy, the candidate does not answer the question directly, but instead channels the view of a singular "They," or whatever it is "The American People" supposedly believe.

"Based upon the information that we have now," said the Pennsylvania Democrat Bob Casey, Mr. Santorum's opponent, "I think a lot of Americans would have serious doubts."

The 'Only Authorization' Vote

Democrats who supported the Iraq resolution in 2002 are often quick to point out that they didn't actually vote for the war. Rather, they only voted to give the president the option to go to war, and they never expected him to rush to war as he did.

"In retrospect, it's clear to me they had no intention of doing anything other than going to war in Iraq," said Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, told The Manchester Union Leader.

And, of course, Mr. Biden and others who supported the Iraq resolution had also assumed that President Bush had a plan for "winning the peace."

"We know now that they had no plan for winning the peace," said Harry Reid, the Democrats' leader in the Senate, in a news conference. "But we didn't know it at the time."

Remember, Saddam Was Evil

Perhaps the most popular rationale among candidates who supported the Iraq resolution is that the current predicament is still better than having Saddam Hussein in charge. It also carries the implicit message that anyone who opposes the war believes the world is not better off without Mr. Hussein in charge.

"His regime was an organic threat to world peace," Senator Jim Talent, Republican of Missouri, told The Associated Press. "He had twice invaded his neighbors and violated the commitments he made after Desert Storm. He harbored and trained terrorists and was a tyrant who wanted weapons of mass destruction and was obstructing the war on terror."

Mr. Talent did not specify whether the world is any better off without Lord Sauron.

Times Endorses Spitzer And Other Democrats For Election (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

The editorial board of The New York Times today endorsed Democrat Eliot Spitzer, the current attorney general, for governor.

The board also endorsed Andrew M. Cuomo in his bid to become the next attorney general of New York, nearly two months after endorsing one of his opponents during the Democratic primary, which Mr. Cuomo later won.

In its endorsement of Mr. Spitzer over his Republican opponent, former state assemblyman John Faso, the board said Mr. Spitzer "has been fearless and dogged in his pursuit of justice. We are eager to see what happens when he applies those attributes to Albany's immobile Legislature, which has a long, sad history in wearing would-be reformers down, waiting them out."

The board's endorsement of Mr. Cuomo was lukewarm, reflecting many of the same reservations it cited in declining to endorse Mr. Cuomo during the primary campaign, when the endorsement went to Mark Green, the former New York City public advocate.

DOJ_NMG_0084570

The general election campaign, the editorial says, "has come down to a riveting if uninspiring brawl between two flawed candidates" — Mr. Cuomo and Jeanine F. Pirro, the Republican and a former district attorney of Westchester County — who each "seem an uncomfortable fit for the state's top law enforcement job."

Ms. Pirro's campaign has been dogged by her husband's conviction for tax fraud and more recent revelations that she is under federal investigation over whether she tried to illegally wiretap her husband's conversations. But the editorial says that Mr. Cuomo's record as housing secretary under President Bill Clinton "is not very reassuring, either."

The editorial says Mr. Cuomo spent "too much time on public relations" while secretary to bolster his political ambitions. But Mr. Cuomo's managerial experience, and the understanding of state government he accrued while working for his father, former Gov. Mario M. Cuomo, were reason enough to endorse him over Mr. Pirro, the editorial says.

The editorial board today also endorsed a string of congressional candidates, all of them Democrats challenging Republican incumbents.

In New York's 19th Congressional District, the board endorsed the Democratic candidate John Hall over the incumbent, Republican Sue W. Kelly. It also endorsed Linda Stender over Representative Mike Ferguson in New Jersey's Seventh Congressional District, Chris Murphy over Representative Nancy L. Johnson in Connecticut's Fifth Congressional District, and Joseph Courtney over Representative Rob Simmons in the state's Second Congressional District.

In New York's Third Congressional District, the editorial board endorsed David Mejias, a Democratic member of the Nassau County Legislature, against Republican incumbent Peter T. King, who this summer said the decision of The New York Times to publish articles about a secret terrorist-surveillance program was "treasonous."

"We do not support Mr. King, but not because he wants us in jail," the editorial states. "Our decision has to do with temperament, effectiveness and differences on issues ranging from taxes and Iraq to abortion and immigration."

Schwarzenegger Ramps Up Pressure Over Orange County Mailing (LAT)

By Scott Martelle And Susannah Rosenblatt

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

He says GOP candidate Nguyen should quit House race if he knew of his office's threatening letter to immigrants.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger stepped up the pressure Saturday on an Orange County Republican congressional candidate, telling reporters that Tan Nguyen should withdraw if he knew about his campaign's mailing of letters intended to threaten immigrant voters.

Schwarzenegger denounced the mailings traced to Nguyen's campaign to unseat Democratic incumbent Loretta Sanchez in the 47th District and said that "anyone that knew … has to resign immediately."

Speaking during a campaign appearance in Santa Ana, the governor said the mailings "were illegal; it's a hate crime…. There should be no tolerance for this kind of behavior."

Democratic gubernatorial challenger Phil Angelides had earlier denounced Nguyen's campaign, which sent mailers to 14,000 registered voters. Written in Spanish, they warned that immigrants who cast a ballot could face jail time or deportation.

Nguyen, himself a Vietnamese immigrant, said Thursday that he had fired his campaign office manager because of the letter but that he had no prior knowledge of it. However, the chairman of Orange County's Republican Party has said that he was told by the mailing company that sent the letter that Nguyen was personally involved.

The Nguyen controversy — and key Republicans' quick action to distance the party from the mailings — pointed to a sharp contrast between the two major parties' approaches to the elections, just over two weeks away. As the Democrats seek to promote themselves as a unified slate, the Republicans are largely running as individuals.

Schwarzenegger made two Orange County campaign stops Saturday unaccompanied by other Republican candidates for statewide office, while the Democratic statewide candidates crisscrossed Southern California and stressed the need for unity.

Angelides began his day at a UC Berkeley football game tailgate party, then traveled to three Los Angeles-area labor rallies, which also drew such statewide Democratic candidates as John Garamendi, running for lieutenant governor; Cruz Bustamante, running for insurance commissioner; John Chiang, running for controller; and Debra Bowen, running for secretary of state; and local candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0084571

"No matter where you go in this state, you see Democrats campaigning together," Angelides told about 200 supporters during an afternoon barbecue at a Gardena union hall. "These Republicans this year — in the year of George Bush's Republican Congress — they're all treating each other like they got the bird flu."

Despite Saturday's show of solidarity, the Democrats have their own fissures. Ray Cordova, chairman of the South Bay County Labor Council, told the Gardena crowd that he was "sick and tired" of seeing Senate President Don Perata and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez "ride around the state" with Schwarzenegger rallying votes for Propositions 1A through 1E, which would spend $37 billion on state construction projects.

Schwarzenegger and the legislative leaders worked together to get the measures on the ballot and have since campaigned for them together.

But the theme of the day was unity, and the need to propel California voters to the polls by building on what recent surveys have shown could be a nationwide Democratic surge on election day. Angelides for the last two days has cited polls that he says have shown his campaign rallying from 17 to 7 points behind — though the polls were, in fact, sponsored by different polling organizations and do not necessarily demonstrate a trend.

"We are rocking and rolling," Angelides said in Gardena. "Those guys are slipping and sliding."

Schwarzenegger's campaign day was more low key. In Santa Ana, he admired cowboy apparel and browsed ranchera albums on 4th Street, chatting with store owners and pausing for photos, handshakes and autographs before a private meeting with the Hispanic 100 civic group, which has endorsed him.

Speaking to reporters, Schwarzenegger reiterated his support for immigration reform, advocating a guest worker program and, under specific conditions, driver's licenses for illegal immigrants.

"Right now we have this policy where everyone looks the other way and everyone does things illegally," he said. "This is not the right way to go."

He moved on to Cook's Corner, a biker roadhouse in Trabuco Canyon, arriving on his maroon Indian Chief motorcycle. Nearly a thousand Harley-Davidsons and other choppers gleamed in the sun as part of the "California Dream Ride" to raise money for an organization that supports military families.

"I could have gone anywhere else in the world; I would not have remotely achieved the things that I have achieved, and it is all because of California," Schwarzenegger told the crowd.

scott.martelle@latimes.com susannah.rosenblatt@ latimes.com

*

For exclusive Web features, including the new Political Muscle blog, go to latimes.com/californiapolitics.

No More Immigrant-Bashing In The O.C. (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

Republicans rightfully denounced a candidate who sent an intimidating letter to Latino voters, saving face in a district they were bound to lose anyway.

THE DESPICABLE INCIDENT was, sad to say, not new to Orange County: Republicans trying to scare immigrants away from the polls. But the GOP's reaction this time — calling on its candidate to withdraw — was miles away from previous behavior. Nativist immigrant bashing may be alive in the O.C., but it's not well.

To be sure, the party's reaction to its candidate for the 47th Congressional District was a no-brainer. Tan Nguyen — himself an immigrant who seems to have forgotten the virulent racism that greeted many Vietnamese refugees when they arrived in Orange County — never had much of a chance against incumbent Democrat Loretta Sanchez. That alone is an extraordinary change for a seat that used to be solidly Republican. Nguyen had received little GOP backing from the start, so there was no loss in cutting him loose and plenty to gain in good PR.

If the county GOP wanted to come completely clean, it would apologize for its unconscionable actions in a 1988 state Assembly election, when it hired uniformed poll guards to carry signs in Latino neighborhoods stating "Noncitizens Can't Vote." That was thuggish and intimidating, but at least it was accurate.

DOJ_NMG_0084572

The Spanish-language letter that Nguyen's campaign sent last week to 14,000 registered Latino voters in Anaheim, Garden Grove and Santa Ana was incorrect, as well as threatening and not a little un-American. It claimed immigrants cannot vote (which would bar Nguyen himself from the polls) and ominously invoked the threat of jail time, deportation and Big Brother computer systems that would track down any would-be voters. It then announced that unlike in Mexico (the country Nguyen's campaign apparently assumes all Latinos are from), there is "no incentive" in the United States to vote. Guess democracy isn't a good enough reason.

It's possible that if this race were as near and dear to Republican strategy as the 1988 campaign, the GOP would make lighter of the deed. But there's a better chance modern-day Republicans would distance themselves from the odious stunt. The GOP has learned, through a series of political gaffes and electoral defeats, that Latinos are a potent constituency in this country who have not seen the Republican Party as their ally.

Call it enlightened self-interest on the GOP's part; it's still good to see Latino-targeted Jim Crow election chicanery getting the thrashing it deserves behind the Orange Curtain.

Ehrlich Woos Anti-O'Malley Democrats (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. yesterday rallied in Baltimore County with Democratic lawmakers and officials who endorse the Republican's re-election bid, as Democratic leaders urged voters in the city to defeat the governor even if they "don't care for" the party's candidate to replace him.

"I have represented majority-Democratic districts for all of my entire career," Mr. Ehrlich said, standing on a truck bed in a Dundalk parking lot before about 100 supporters.

"Many, many Democrats are stepping up ... not leaving their party, just voting for the person they believe will lead the state," the governor and former congressman from Baltimore County said.

An hour earlier, in the city's Remington area, black Democratic leaders attacked Mr. Ehrlich while denigrating his Democratic challenger, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley.

"Having spent four years in Annapolis with Governor Ehrlich, the boy's gotta go," state Sen. Lisa A. Gladden, Baltimore Democrat, told the crowd of about 100 at a meeting called to organize volunteers to go door to door with information on voters' rights.

Mrs. Gladden said she supports Mr. O'Malley's bid for governor only because it would help his fellow Democrats regain power.

"I have never voted for Martin O'Malley, never in my life, because I don't care for him," she said. "But you know what, I'm wearing his shirt, got his sign on the lawn, and quite frankly, I hope to God and I pray every day that O'Malley becomes our next governor."

Democrats control the Maryland legislature, and Mr. Ehrlich, who faces voters again two weeks from Tuesday, won election four years ago as the first Republican governor in more than 30 years.

Cheryl D. Glenn and Shawn Tarrant -- Democrats who won primary races for state delegate and are likely to be elected Nov. 7 -- also urged the crowd to vote for Mr. O'Malley, despite objections or reservations about his record in Baltimore.

"I know politics better than you do. Support O'Malley," Mrs. Glenn, a candidate in District 45, told the audience packed into a storefront room.

Mr. Tarrant, a community activist and regional manager for a pharmaceutical company, instructed the crowd not to "focus on the man," meaning Mr. O'Malley.

"Focus on the seat," said Mr. Tarrant, who likely will represent District 40. "We need the right Democrat in the seat. He can make the right selections."

Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Baltimore Democrat, organized the voter-education drive because, he said, many voters are confused and discouraged by officials' concerns about organization and security for the election.

DOJ_NMG_0084573

Mr. Ehrlich echoed those concerns yesterday during a radio interview, predicting "a lot of challenges" and "a lot of lawyers" after the election.

The governor again will have to win over Democratic and independent voters in Maryland, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2 to 1 and where blacks made up about 40 percent of Democratic voters in the primary.

The Ehrlich campaign released a list of 26 Democratic supporters, most of them former officeholders and some of whom previously had endorsed his re-election. Most of the Democrats for Mr. Ehrlich endorsed him four years ago.

"I am a Democrat, and I support the whole Democratic team except for one individual ... that guy they call mayor," Baltimore City Council member Nicholas D'Adamo Jr. said. "Are the streets in better shape? Is the murder rate better? Is education any better?"

The crowd that heard Mr. Ehrlich in Dundalk was made up mostly of older, white voters. The crowd at the anti-Ehrlich rally in the city was mostly black voters.

Mr. Ehrlich, who said polls show he is doing well among black voters, cited his support for Coppin State University, a predominantly black college in Baltimore.

Calvin Burnett, the former president of Coppin whom Mr. Ehrlich appointed as education secretary in 2004, stood with the governor at the rally.

O'Malley spokesman Rick Abbruzzese predicted that Mr. Ehrlich will not attract enough Democrats.

"Democrats believe that government can work to improve the quality of life for all people, which does not mean siding with special corporate interests over working families, as Governor Ehrlich has done time and again," he said.

Mr. O'Malley leads Mr. Ehrlich in almost every poll in the race by an average of about seven points.

Kinky Friedman A 'Lone Ranger' On Trail (AP-)

By Pauline Arrillaga

AP, October 22, 2006

Richard Kinky Friedman is standing, sans cowboy boots, in his suite at the Hilton as a third day of election stumping ends, remote control in hand and Fox News on the tube. His campaign manager, heavy-lidded as the clock nears midnight, is doing his sleep-deprived best to reassure Texas' most unlikely gubernatorial candidate that he might just win.

"We could still lose," Dean Barkley tells The Kinkster. "But we're not gonna."

Friedman frets on. "It's possible that I'm a little pop star, everybody just wants a picture."

Eyes roll, and Barkley retorts: "I'll get you a little security blanket."

Friedman's attention returns to Fox. A segment about the race is on, and Friedman's delivering one of his oft-recycled cracks about the definition of politics — "Poly means more than one, and ticks are bloodsucking parasites." (The line was originated by "some guy in Corpus," explains Friedman, king of the one-liners. "It's not that great.")

Now Gov. Rick Perry, the man whose job Friedman fancies, appears on screen delivering a crack of his own. "He's not running for class clown. He's running for the governor of a very important state."

Barkley chuckles, but the barefoot clown gripping the remote isn't smiling — for once in his rather hysterical life.

——

Day 1. San Antonio. A question: Who is Kinky Friedman?

"He's a trip," says Ron, the driver of a Dollar Rent A Car shuttle. "Some people say he's a racist, but he's just being himself. That's what I think. I like his style — a `Lone Ranger' type. They do their own thing. I like that."

An hour later, Friedman — the songwriter, satirist, mystery novelist and now independent political candidate — is with Jesse Ventura and a gaggle of reporters at the University of Texas at San Antonio, starting a college campus swing with the former pro wrestler and governor of Minnesota.

Ventura, taking a break from surfing in Baja, Mexico, and sporting a very surfer-like braided goatee, is offering some unsolicited advice about curtailing the sharp sense of humor that Friedman built a career on and molded him into The Kinkster.

"You have to learn that political correctness unfortunately rules in the public sector," Ventura tells him.

Friedman, in his signature black hat and boots, signature cigar in hand, is firmly resisting.

DOJ_NMG_0084574

"Political correctness is a real devil," he says. "It insinuates into our lives more than we think."

With that, Friedman rams the cigar in his mouth and gives "The Body," as Ventura used to be called, a friendly pat on the back.

Quintessential Kinky. Being himself. Doing his own thing. Sort of like ... a Lone Ranger. Just like Ron said. Ron, a black man with two diamond studs in one ear, big sunglasses and a bigger smile, who supported Perry in 2002. Ron, who has never in his life met Friedman, who when asked if he might vote for him smiled even bigger and said, "Nah."

Ron, who nevertheless gets The Kinkster — who's not all that easy to get.

What Kinky Friedman is: Hilarious. Crude. Biting. Unapologetic. Blunt.

What he also is: Intellectual. Sensitive. Giving. Philosophical. Loyal.

What he really is when you add it all up: Unconventional at every turn.

So why would someone like this want a job as conventional as governor? One response is now a popular Friedman bumper sticker: "Why the hell not?" The real answer's more complex, kind of like the man himself.

Friedman's books — from essay collections such as "'Scuse Me While I Whip This Out: Reflections on Country Singers, Presidents, and Other Troublemakers" to his mystery novels in which real-life rebels Willie Nelson and Hank Williams are characters — reveal someone who reveres the outlaw. That is, anyone with the cojones to thumb his or her nose at the system.

Perhaps, in part, that's because Friedman grew up on the outside — a Jew raised by socially conscious, freethinking parents in Christian-conservative, 1950s-traditional Texas.

He played chess, studied the classics at the University of Texas (where a friend bestowed upon him the nickname that stuck, reflecting Friedman's obsession with taming his untamable, kinky hair), and spent summers at the rural camp his parents started for children.

His mother, Minnie, was a public school speech therapist, once named "Outstanding Texas Citizen" by an exchange-clubs organization. His father, Tom, flew an Air Force bomber during World War II and later was a psychology professor.

Father Friedman liked to say, "Leave the world a better place than you found it," and his three children took that to heart. Daughter Marcie went to work for the American Red Cross, and son Roger eventually took over the kids' camp.

Kinky, the eldest, simply put his own twist on the mantra.

After a short stint with the Peace Corps in Borneo, he returned to the States with some songs in his pocket and an idea in his head.

The result was career No. 1 as leader of the band, "Kinky Friedman and the Texas Jewboys." He penned songs that at times drew more boos than cheers, satirical ditties about the issues of the day: racism, feminism, even the 1966 massacre at UT when student Charles Whitman climbed an observation tower and fatally shot 16 people.

One of Friedman's better-known songs, "They Ain't Makin' Jews Like Jesus Anymore," includes the n-word and a slew of other racially offensive terms but is a tune about one guy confronting another over his racist remarks.

"We had something to offend everybody," Friedman says. "That was the idea — to puncture this pompous, morality kind of a thing."

"We've always made fun, but underneath all of that it's about intellectualizing things and making people think," says original "Texas Jewboy" Jeff "Little Jewford" Shelby. Shelby, who met Friedman as a kid at the summer camp, is now chief of staff of the gubernatorial campaign (and also Friedman's announcer at each campaign stop.)

"We like pushing the envelope," Shelby says, "but it's not just for the sake of pushing it."

When the musical career floundered, Friedman managed to make a name for himself in career No. 2 — as a mystery writer and, later, a columnist at Texas Monthly magazine. The latter, in particular, gave him a new platform for skewering or championing whatever, or whomever, he wanted.

Cigar-smokers: championed. Hunters: skewered. Bob Dylan: championed. Dell, Starbucks, the strip-mall sameness of America: skewered.

The governor's thing, as the Friedman gang calls it, is not only a stab at career No. 3, it is yet another stage from which The Kinkster can take on the untouchable. The two-party system. The — his words now — "rusty cage of bureaucracy and corruption" that is democracy in the 21st century. The "wussification" of politics, and of Texas.

DOJ_NMG_0084575

"I love Texas," says Friedman. "I don't like what's happened to her. I don't like being last in all the good things and first in all the bad. The very least we can do is bring truth to the people. We're already bringing hope. The truth? Well, that's a little harder."

___

Day 2. On the road from San Antonio to Houston. A thought: How does political incorrectness play in politics?

"Please welcome the man who's breathing life into Texas independence, the next governor of the great state of Texas ... Kinky Friedmaaaaaaaaaaan!"

The man with the cigar takes the podium at Trinity University in San Antonio, firing off warm-up lines like a Texafied Jerry Seinfeld.

"I was showing my old friend around Austin recently. He said, `Boy, that's a beautiful statue of Rick Perry.' And I said, `That IS Rick Perry.'"

Applause. Laughs.

The jokes are expected; they vary little from stop to stop. What's not is how seriously some Texans are taking the guy who delivers them.

Taylor Collier is 18, a freshman with shaggy hair and ear buds around his neck, clad in a T-shirt that reads, "TELL THE TRUTH." He's outside the auditorium at Trinity, reciting a story about the time Perry showed up at an event Collier attended a while back.

"I couldn't even get up to him. I couldn't even talk to him. You know? But Kinky walks in here and I walk up to him just like, `How you doing? Nice to meet you.' You know? To me, Kinky strikes me as more of a Texan."

Needless to say, Collier's first vote in his first gubernatorial election is going to The Kinkster.

So is that of 49-year-old Elva Romero, who works at a convenience store at Texas State University in San Marcos.

"I'm for him," she says, "because I'm outspoken myself. Whatever comes to my mind is gonna come out, and that's it. If it's gonna hurt other people, well sorry. He's unique. He's different, and I think he can make a change ..."

A Republican calling a Houston radio show apparently thinks so, too. Host Dan Patrick is musing over the Friedman phenomenon. Friedman is fourth among the four major gubernatorial candidates in money and support, and he's polling at about 14 percent. But that's almost equal with the Republican Perry's Democratic challenger, Chris Bell.

"The public was really waiting for someone like him," Patrick surmises.

"I agree," says the caller, who's especially fond of Friedman's pitch for more National Guard troops on the Texas border.

When Friedman launched his campaign last year in front of the Alamo, calling for the "unconditional surrender" of Perry with a country swing band by his side, he was far more Jon Stewart than John Kennedy. Then he hired on Barkley, who directed Ventura's successful campaign and later replaced the late Paul Wellstone in the U.S. Senate.

Friedman's 60-40 ratio of style-to-substance is now 40-60, says Barkley. The joke-laden speeches are sprinkled with Friedman's stance on legalizing casino gambling to help pay for education, decriminalizing marijuana to free up prison space, developing a taxpayer ID card for illegal immigrants to work.

"We've packaged things a little differently," says Barkley. "But him telling what he really believes? No, that hasn't changed."

No matter the consequences.

The Texas NAACP asked Friedman to apologize after he remarked that "crackheads and thugs have decided they want to stay in Houston" in a speech lambasting rising crime that police in the city attribute to Hurricane Katrina evacuees. Friedman refused, responding: "I am not a racist, I am a realist."

The group excluded Friedman from speaking at its convention this month, while inviting Perry, Bell and independent Carole Keeton Strayhorn.

Then a television interview resurfaced in which Friedman was asked what to do about sexual predators, and he said, "Throw them in prison and throw away the key and make them listen to a Negro talking to himself."

His political opponents jumped on the anti-Friedman bandwagon, also calling for an apology — exactly the kind of politics-as-usual stuff that gets Friedman, and his longtime friends, fired up.

DOJ_NMG_0084576

"I definitely know he's not a racist, because I know Kinky," says Ada Beverly, the 77-year-old daughter of Friedman's childhood caretaker, a black woman named Lottie Cotton, whom Friedman adored. "Kinky is just a wonderful, folk-loving person. He's not gonna whup it around and pretend he's one thing if he's another.

"But once you get Kinky into your heart," Beverly says, "you have a most lovable person."

___

Day 3. Texas A&M University, Perry's alma mater. A revelation: There really is another side to Kinky Friedman.

It's the last stop of a long day, and 61-year-old Friedman is exhausted. He's munching on peanut butter crackers, having gone without nourishment for 10 hours. But the line for autographs stretches on, and Friedman won't leave until the last picture is snapped and T-shirt is signed (or cell phone, or empty Marlboro pack).

"He doesn't want to disappoint anybody," Sandy Wolfmueller later explains. She's known Friedman for 30 years, owns a bookstore where he does signing events. She recalls a time when the two of them had some falling out. Then her son died of a degenerative brain disease. "Don't ask me how he found out," she says, "but Kinky was one of the first to call."

Another fan: "He's got the biggest heart. All he does is save people and animals." That's Nancy Parker-Simons, who was tapped by Friedman to run an animal rescue ranch adjacent to his parents' summer camp outside of Kerrville. Friedman's own five dogs are watched over while he's on the road by a Katrina evacuee Friedman's putting up at his house.

Parker-Simons admits emitting a snicker or two when Friedman first broached the subject of running for governor.

Now she realizes, "He really is serious about it." Besides, "Texans would love it. We like to brag and all of that. And, boy, we would have a blast with him!"

It's at the Hilton, at the end of Day 3, with Fox News on the tube and the unsmiling clown staring at the set, that the punch line finally becomes clear: The funnyman's run for governor ain't no joke. Neither is Richard Kinky Friedman.

Edwards Takes Heat Over Quotations About Hillary (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Comments attributed last week to the wife of former North Carolina senator John Edwards (D) provided a faint foreshadowing of the intraparty battle that could arise when Democrats choose their presidential nominee in two years.

Elizabeth Edwards said last Thursday that her life has been a happier one than that of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), according to the magazine Ladies' Home Journal. Both Clinton and John Edwards, the Democrats' 2004 vice presidential nominee, are prospective 2008 candidates for the presidency.

Clinton "and I are from the same generation," Elizabeth Edwards said at a luncheon sponsored by the magazine. "We both went to law school and married other lawyers, but after that we made other choices. I think my choices have made me happier. I think I'm more joyful than she is." Ladies' Home Journal provided a transcript of the luncheon comments to the Associated Press.

On Friday, Edwards released a statement accusing the magazine of misquoting and misrepresenting her. "This is particularly true with respect to my comments about Sen. Clinton, who holds a serious and demanding public office while I am largely home, joyfully I must admit, with two lovely children," Edwards said in the statement.

Ladies' Home Journal said the quotes were accurate.

Edwards called the former first lady on Friday to apologize, a Clinton aide told the AP.

"They had a good conversation," Howard Wolfson said. "The senator thanked her for the call and wished her well on her book tour."

Edwards is promoting a memoir, "Saving Graces," that examines her experience with breast cancer.

Obama Is Not A Miracle Elixir (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

THE Democrats are so brilliant at yanking defeat from the jaws of victory that it still seems unimaginable that they might win on Nov. 7. But even the most congenital skeptic has to face that possibility now. Things have gotten so bad for the Republicans that were President Bush to unveil Osama bin Laden's corpse in the Rose Garden, some reporter would instantly check to see if his last meal had been on Jack Abramoff's tab.

DOJ_NMG_0084577

With an approval rating of 16 percent — 16! — in the new NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, Congress has matched the Democrats of 1994 or, for that matter, Michael Jackson during his own version of Foleygate. As for Mr. Bush, he is once more hiding behind children in an elementary school, as he did last week when the monthly death toll for Americans in Iraq approached a nearly two-year high. And where else could he go? Some top Republican Congressional candidates in the red state he was visiting, North Carolina, would not appear with him. When the president did find a grateful campaign mate at his next stop, Pennsylvania, it was the married congressman who paid $5.5 million to settle a lawsuit by a mistress who accused him of throttling her.

Maybe the Democrats can blow 2006 as they did 2004, but not without herculean effort. As George Will memorably wrote, if they can't at least win back the House under these conditions, "they should go into another line of work."

The tough question is not whether the Democrats can win, but what will happen if they do win. The party's message in this campaign has offered no vision beyond bashing Mr. Bush and pledging to revisit the scandals and the disastrous legislation that went down on his watch. Last spring Nancy Pelosi did promote a "New Direction for America" full of golden oldies — raising the minimum wage, enacting lobbying reform, cutting Medicare drug costs, etc. She promised that Democrats would "own August" by staging 250 campaign events to publicize it. But this rollout caused so few ripples that its participants might as well have been in the witness protection program. Meanwhile, it was up to John Murtha, a congressman with no presidential ambitions, to goad his peers to start focusing on a specific Iraq exit strategy.

Enter Barack Obama. To understand the hysteria about a Democratic senator who has not yet served two years and is mainly known for a single speech at the 2004 convention, you have to appreciate just how desperate the Democrats are for a panacea for all their ills. In the many glossy cover articles about Obamamania, the only real suspense is whether a Jack or Bobby Kennedy analogy will be made in the second paragraph or the fifth. Men's Vogue (cover by Annie Leibovitz) went so far as to say that the Illinois senator "alone has the potential to one day be mentioned in the same breath" as Richard Wright, Ralph Ellison, Abraham Lincoln and Martin Luther King. Why not throw in Mark Twain and Sammy Davis Jr.?

This is a lot to put on the shoulders of anyone, even someone as impressive as Mr. Obama. Though he remains a modest and self-effacing guy from all appearances, he is encouraging the speculation about seeking higher office — and not as a coy Colin Powell-style maneuver to sell his new book, "The Audacity of Hope." Mr. Obama hasn't been turning up in Iowa for the corn dogs. He consistently concedes he's entertaining the prospect of a presidential run.

There's no reason to rush that decision now, but it's a no-brainer. Of course he should run, assuming his family is on the same page. He's 45, not 30, and his slender résumé in public office (which also includes seven years as a state senator) should be no more of an impediment to him than it was to the White House's current occupant. As his Illinois colleague Dick Durbin told The Chicago Tribune last week, "I said to him, 'Do you really think sticking around the Senate for four more years and casting a thousand more votes will make you more qualified for president?' " Instead, such added experience is more likely to transform an unusually eloquent writer, speaker and public servant into another windbag like Joe Biden.

The more important issue is not whether Mr. Obama will seek the presidency, but what kind of candidate he would be. If the Democratic Party is to be more than a throw-out-Bush party, it can't settle for yet again repackaging its well-worn ideas, however worthy, with a new slogan containing the word "New." It needs a major infusion of steadfast leadership. That's the one lesson it should learn from George Bush. Call him arrogant or misguided or foolish, this president has been a leader. He had a controversial agenda — enacting big tax cuts, privatizing Social Security, waging "pre-emptive" war, packing the courts with judges who support his elisions of constitutional rights — and he didn't fudge it. He didn't care if half the country despised him along the way.

The interminable Iraq fiasco has branded the Democrats as the party of fecklessness. The failure of its leaders to challenge the administration's blatant propaganda to gin up the war is a failure of historic proportions (as it was for much of the press and liberal punditry). When Tom Daschle, then the Senate leader, presided over the rushed passing of the war resolution before the 2002 midterms, he explained that the "bottom line" was for Democrats "to move on"; they couldn't wait to campaign on the economy. The party's subsequent loss of the Senate did not prevent it two years later from nominating a candidate who voted for the war's funding before he voted against it.

DOJ_NMG_0084578

What makes the liberal establishment's crush on Mr. Obama disconcerting is that it too often sees him as a love child of a pollster's focus group: a one-man Benetton ad who can be all things to all people. He's black and he's white. He's both of immigrant stock (Kenya) and the American heartland (Kansas, yet). He speaks openly about his faith without disowning evolution. He has both gravitas and unpretentious humor. He was the editor of The Harvard Law Review and also won a Grammy (for the audiobook of his touching memoir, "Dreams From My Father"). He exudes perfection but has owned up to youthful indiscretions with drugs. He is post-boomer and post-civil-rights-movement. He is Bill Clinton without the baggage, a fail-safe 21st-century bridge from "A Place Called Hope" to "The Audacity of Hope."

Mr. Obama has offended no one (a silly tiff with John McCain excepted). Search right-wing blogs and you'll find none of the invective showered on other liberal Democrats in general and black liberal leaders in particular. What little criticism Mr. Obama has received is from those in his own camp who find him cautious to a fault, especially on issues that might cause controversy. The sum of all his terrific parts, this theory goes, may be less than the whole: another Democrat who won't tell you what day it is before calling a consultant, another human weather vane who waits to see which way the wind is blowing before taking a stand.

That has been the Democrats' fatal malady, but it's way too early and there's too little evidence to say Mr. Obama has been infected by it. If he is conciliatory by nature and eager to entertain adversaries' views in good faith, that's not necessarily a fault, particularly in these poisonous times. The question is whether Mr. Obama will stick up for core principles when tested and get others to follow him.

That's why it's important to remember that on one true test for his party, Iraq, he was consistent from the start. On the long trail to a hotly competitive senatorial primary in Illinois, he repeatedly questioned the rationale for the war before it began, finally to protest it at a large rally in Chicago on the eve of the invasion. He judged Saddam to pose no immediate threat to America and argued for containment over a war he would soon label "dumb" and "political-driven." He hasn't changed. In his new book, he gives a specific date (the end of this year) for beginning "a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops" and doesn't seem to care who calls it "cut and run."

Contrast this with Hillary Clinton, the presumptive Democratic presidential candidate, who last week said that failed American policy in Iraq should be revisited if there's no improvement in "maybe 60 to 90 days." This might qualify as leadership, even at this late date, if only John Warner, the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, hadn't proposed exactly the same time frame for a re-evaluation of the war almost a week before she did.

The Democrats may well win on Election Day this year. But one of their best hopes for long-term viability in the post-Bush era is that Barack Obama steps up and changes the party before the party of terminal timidity and equivocation changes him.

Growing Absentee Voting Is Reshaping Campaigns (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 21 — For millions of Americans, Election Day is already over.

Thirty states now allow no-excuse absentee voting, and most of them also allow voters to cast early ballots in person at county clerks' offices or satellite polling places.

In Montana, absentee ballots were mailed Sept. 22. As many as 40 percent of Florida's voters will cast their ballots before Election Day, Nov. 7. Oregon's elections are conducted entirely by mail, and Washington is moving that way. California sent out 3.8 million absentee ballots the week of Oct. 8.

Candidates are maneuvering to adapt to a changed political calendar, accelerating their advertising, their mailings and their get-out-the-vote calls. They are figuring out exactly who votes early and are trying to get to them before they cast their ballots. They are raising more money and spending it faster.

"Love it or hate it, it's the wave of the future," said Art Torres, chairman of the California Democratic Party. "Election Day started here on Oct. 10 and lasts 29 days. It's tremendously burdensome on our fund-raising and the people we have out in the field."

DOJ_NMG_0084579

Phil Angelides, the Democrat trying to unseat Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, spent $250,000 to mail 725,000 brochures last week, timed to drop into mailboxes the same day the absentee ballots arrived.

Mike McGavick, the Republican candidate for the Senate seat from Washington, pushed up his television advertising schedule to run spots that an aide called his "closing argument" three weeks before Election Day. More than half of the state's voters will cast ballots by mail before Nov. 7.

In the Denver suburbs, Rick O'Donnell, a Republican candidate for Congress, said he had been emphasizing his hard line on illegal immigration in recent speeches and advertisements to motivate loyal Republicans who he believed were more likely to vote early. Mr. O'Donnell is now pivoting to a message on taxes to try to appeal to independents and undecided voters who are waiting until Election Day.

"It is a different message when it is a different group of people," Mr. O'Donnell said.

"Every day we get a list of additional people who just in the last 24 hours have applied for ballots," he said. "The amazing thing is they are voting tonight at home on the kitchen counter. They come up to me and say, 'I voted for you.' "

Experts estimate that more than 20 percent of voters nationwide will cast their ballots before Election Day by mail or at early-voting locations, a proportion of the electorate that is rising with each election. Some states and counties open the ballots before Election Day and keep the results secret; others count them with regular ballots.

Analysts and party officials who study early voting trends say that a decade ago those who took advantage of absentee ballots tended to be relatively well off and highly educated, with Republicans outnumbering Democrats by almost two to one. But as the ease of early voting has spread, the ratio is slipping and some analysts say that nearly as many Democrats as Republicans now vote early.

Those who favor the practice say it is convenient for voters and increases turnout. Most elections officials welcome the trend because it reduces the strain on polling places and poll workers on Election Day.

But some experts say there is no proof that early voting increases turnout and may well have the opposite effect because some voters request absentee ballots and then neglect to send them in. They are also concerned that absentee ballots are more open to fraud than votes cast at established polling places.

Candidates and political parties are ambivalent. They can get partisans to vote early and then use them as volunteers to help turn out other voters. They can be sure their voters will not be discouraged or turned away at crowded polling places on Election Day.

But for candidates, the trend toward early voting vastly complicates campaigning, as Mr. Torres said. With voting spread over 29 or even 45 days, candidates have to budget their time and money carefully to make sure they are reaching all potential voters before they cast their ballots. They cannot rely solely on a late blitz of advertising, mail and phone calls to motivate voters. They cannot pray for a piece of late-breaking news to alter the outcome.

Nationwide in 2004, an estimated 25 million votes were cast early, roughly 20 percent of the 122 million total. In 2000, about 14 percent of the electorate voted early. There are no reliable national figures for 1996 and earlier, said Paul Gronke, director of the Early Voting Information Center at Reed College in Oregon.

Absentee voting offers an opportunity for political parties to refine and use increasingly sophisticated methods of identifying supporters known as microtargeting. Starting with lists of voters requesting absentee ballots and then researching how they voted in past elections, parties can identify loyalists.

The parties also use magazine subscription lists, catalog mailings and even cable television choices to further identify potential supporters. Both parties use the techniques, but Republicans started earlier and claim an advantage over Democrats in identifying and turning out their voters.

Critics of early voting, however, say that extending the balloting period can discourage voters and distort results. Curtis Gans, director of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate, said his research showed that no-excuse absentee voting hurt turnout, although 2004 was an exception.

Mr. Gans said that many voters, concerned about fraud and chaos at polling places after the contested 2000 election, took advantage of the new, more liberal rules for absentee and early voting. But he also said there were more cases of fraud in absentee balloting than in Election Day voting, citing recent cases of absentee vote-buying in Illinois, Florida and Georgia and a concern about overseas ballots in Florida in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0084580

The Georgia case, from 1996, involved two candidates for county commissioner in Dodge County, who set up tables at opposite ends of the hall in the county courthouse offering $20 cash payments for absentee votes. Both candidates were convicted of vote fraud.

Mr. Gans also said that early voting could minimize the impact of events that occurred close to Election Day, leading to what he called a "differential of information" among voters.

"What if on the Friday before the election Osama bin Laden is captured?" he asked. "Or we had a terrorist act or the stock market tanked, or we learned of a major issue of moral turpitude involving a major candidate?"

The weekend before the 2003 election to recall Gray Davis, the California governor, The Los Angeles Times reported that several women had said that Mr. Schwarzenegger, the winning candidate, had groped them. At that point, more than 2 million of the 9.4 million votes cast in the election had already been mailed.

In giving voters more flexibility in casting their ballots, there are those who say that something intangible is lost. Election Day is a civic ritual, they say, the one occasion every two or four years when millions of citizens show up in a public place to exercise their right to choose their representatives.

"Absentee voting erodes that sense of community," Professor Gronke said. "It is voting alone."

Californians Face Decisions, Decisions (WP/AP)

By Rachel Konrad, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Election Officials Concerned That Bulky Voter Guides Will Overwhelm Residents

SAN FRANCISCO -- Voter guides are landing with a thud on doorsteps across California as residents are facing an unusually large number of ballot measures and candidates in next month's election.

Election officials worry that the state's largest guides -- 192-page books sent to 12 million homes -- will overwhelm and discourage would-be voters.

The array of complicated issues on the ballot might also lead to long lines and delays at polling sites if people haven't done their homework.

"The state guide is pretty overwhelming. I haven't gotten through it myself," Shasta County Clerk Cathy Darling said. "My absentee ballot is sitting here in my desk drawer because I haven't read it all yet."

A majority of voters are expected to vote by mail. But the ballots are so big that election officials fear some might be returned for insufficient postage.

California Secretary of State Bruce McPherson said that 24 counties have mail-in ballots exceeding one ounce and therefore requiring 63 cents of postage. He is working with the post office to help ensure that ballots with only one 39-cent stamp will be delivered by Election Day.

The November sample ballot in San Joaquin County is the largest ever -- 100 to 124 pages, depending on the district, or triple the normal size. Many pages are devoted to a proposed tax increase to pay for road and rail projects.

San Joaquin County Registrar Debby Hench said printing costs in a typical election are about $300,000, but the cost this time could be double.

"We know they're big and intimidating-looking, so we're telling voters they need to pre-mark the sample ballot and be prepared when they go into the booth so they don't have to read everything in the polling place -- they will never be able to do that in a timely way," Hench said.

California guides have been swelling since the 1970s, when candidates, voters and interest groups increasingly turned to state propositions to enact legislation.

The October 2003 special election, in which Gov. Gray Davis (D) was recalled from office and replaced by Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) from a field of 135 candidates, required supersize ballots and guides. But at least it was light reading, with quips from candidates such as Hustler magazine publisher Larry Flynt, former sitcom star Gary Coleman and melon-smashing comedian Leo Gallagher.

DOJ_NMG_0084581

By contrast, the November ballot lists candidates for eight statewide offices, 13 propositions and local ballot measures in nearly all 58 counties.

"Voting in this state can sometimes feel like doing your taxes," said Kim Alexander, president of the California Voter Foundation.

Wealthy Coal Executive Hopes To Turn Democratic West Virginia Republican (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

CHARLESTON, W.Va. — Don L. Blankenship is not the governor of West Virginia. But here in coal country some say he may as well be, considering the power he wields.

Mr. Blankenship, the chief executive of the state's largest coal producer, Massey Energy, has promised to spend "whatever it takes" to help win a majority in the State Legislature for the long-beleaguered Republican Party in a state that is a Democratic and labor stronghold.

In a state where candidates who win typically spend less than $20,000, Mr. Blankenship has poured more than $6 million into political initiatives and local races over the past three years. Mr. Blankenship has spent at least $700,000 in his current effort to oust Democrats, and the state is awash with lawn signs, highway billboards, radio advertisements and field organizers paid for by him.

"Don Blankenship would actually be less powerful if he were in elected office," said United States Representative Nick J. Rahall II, a Democrat whose district includes a majority of Massey's coal mines. "He would be twice as accountable and half as feared."

Rather than bankroll his own political ambitions, as have businessmen like Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey and Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg of New York, Mr. Blankenship has exerted his financial clout in the mold of Warren Buffett and George Soros, choosing issues and candidates in line with his partisan philosophy.

Union leaders say Mr. Blankenship, 56, is the main reason that less than a quarter of the state's coal miners are now organized, down from about 95 percent just three decades ago. And environmentalists describe him as the biggest force behind a highly destructive form of mining called mountaintop removal that involves using explosives to blow off the tops of mountains to reach coal seams.

Local Republicans admiringly say that Mr. Blankenship combines the strategic savvy of Karl Rove, the White House adviser, and the fund-raising skill of Richard Mellon Scaife, the conservative financier. Mr. Blankenship personally oversees his media campaigns; he writes advertisements and designs polls, and speaks on talk radio more than the chairman of the state Republican Party.

"This has never been an easy state for Republicans," said the party chairman, Doug McKinney, seated in his party's headquarters, a dank cinder-block building in Charleston bought in 2002, half of it paid for with a $100,000 donation from Massey Energy. "But finally this state is at a tipping point, and Don is a big reason for that."

In 2004, Mr. Blankenship financed a $3.5 million campaign that catapulted a little-known lawyer, Brent D. Benjamin, who barely won the Republican primary, onto the public stage as the first Republican to serve on the state's Supreme Court.

In 2005, Mr. Blankenship spent $650,000 to deal Gov. Joe Manchin III, a Democrat, the most significant defeat of his tenure by blocking a plan to use bonds to shore up the state's under-financed employee pension plan.

George W. Bush won West Virginia in 2000, the first time since 1928 that voters backed a nonincumbent Republican for president. Mr. Bush won the state again in 2004, and in the past several years, a large number of Republicans have moved into the state's eastern panhandle, mostly from Virginia.

In 2002, Republicans picked up 11 seats in the House of Delegates (but are still in the minority), and local political analysts say it is possible, though a long shot, that the Republicans will pick up the additional 18 House seats they need to control the Legislature in November. The Democrats retain a strong majority in the Senate.

DOJ_NMG_0084582

"Don is really the linchpin of it all," said Gary Abernathy, a consultant for the state Republican Party.

Mr. Blankenship, who declined to be interviewed for this article, told a gathering of Republicans last year in his famously blunt and monotone delivery that it "doesn't take clairvoyance to know what we need to do" in West Virginia.

"If you go down to Virginia and copy the law book and write 'West' in front of it, you would clearly have a more prosperous economy, a better education system and you'd have a better state. It's that simple," he said, referring to Virginia, which is deeply Republican and has more pro-business laws than West Virginia.

The first step in that mission, said Cecil E. Roberts, president of the United Mine Workers of America, has been to oppose unions fervently in the state. "From the first day he could, Don began busting unions," Mr. Roberts said. "He was pretty effective at that, so now Don is trying to extend his reach across the state in politics."

Raised just up the road from Matewan, the scene of an epic 1921 strike, Mr. Blankenship keeps a reminder of his anti-union beliefs in the back of his office. In 1985, Massey broke from the industry and insisted that miners at each site negotiate separately with the company. During the 11-month strike that resulted, someone shot through Mr. Blankenship's office window. The old Zenith television whose screen was shattered by the bullet still sits not far from his desk.

After graduating with an accounting degree from Marshall University in Huntington, Mr. Blankenship worked at several companies before becoming a manager in 1982 at Massey, the fourth largest coal producer in the United States. Eight years later, he became the first non-Massey family member to serve as president of the company.

Mr. Blankenship, who received about $34 million in compensation last year (roughly four times the industry standard) runs the company from a double-wide trailer just across the state line in Belfry, Ky. In April, Mr. Blankenship's personal housekeeper filed a lawsuit seeking unemployment benefits in which she accused him of responding with angry fits to infractions like getting the wrong McDonald's order or stocking the freezer with the wrong ice cream. After the disasters at the Aracoma Alma Mine, which Massey owns, and the Sago Mine, in which a total of 14 miners were killed, Mr. Blankenship drew sharp criticism after he told The Herald-Mail of Hagerstown, Md., that such accidents were rare and statistically insignificant.

E. Morgan Massey, the company's former chief executive and an admirer of Mr. Blankenship's, said that while the criticism he faced as C.E.O. was that he was "too paternalistic," Mr. Blankenship had been viewed differently.

"Let's just say Don is the other way entirely," Mr. Massey said. Mr. Blankenship has also been faulted for his company's environmental record. Massey has had more toxic spills of coal waste than any other company in the state, and from January 2000 to December 2005, it received 4,268 citations from state regulators. The next closest company received fewer than 800. A Massey spokeswoman responded by pointing out that Massey is the largest coal producer in the state.

One of Mr. Blankenship's biggest concerns, especially after Massey lost a $50 million jury verdict in August 2002 for having forced a smaller company out of business, has been "plaintiff-friendly courts" that he says have made West Virginia an expensive place to do business.

At the same time, Mr. Blankenship has not been shy about using the courts to deal with his adversaries. In the past several years he has sued the governor, the United Mine Workers union, the state Supreme Court, and The Charleston Gazette, the state's largest newspaper.

Governor Manchin said he tried not to pay Mr. Blankenship any mind.

"I know Don writes a lot of checks," Mr. Manchin said. "At this point, I'm just sticking with the issues and reminding voters of the successes we've had with help from the Legislature. I'm not paying attention to Don."

The state Democratic Party, however, is taking the opposite approach. It is distributing bumper stickers saying, "Don, WV is not for sale," and has set up a Web site listing controversial comments from Mr. Blankenship. The party has sent letters to Republican candidates pressing them to give back Mr. Blankenship's contributions; so far, two candidates have done so.

The Democratic-controlled Legislature has also tried to rein in Mr. Blankenship's influence.

Last year in response to Mr. Blankenship's impact on the Supreme Court race in 2004, lawmakers passed a campaign-finance law capping at $1,000 how much an individual can give to so-called 527 groups like the one Mr. Blankenship used to influence that race.

However, individuals still can spend unlimited sums of their own money on campaign advertisements, and that is just what Mr. Blankenship has said he plans to do.

DOJ_NMG_0084583

Party Of Jesse Ventura Vies To Be More (WP)

By Conrad Defiebre, Minneapolis Star Tribune

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

The Big Two Dwarf Minnesota's Independence Party, but It Refuses to Fade

In 12 years as a major political party in Minnesota, the Independence Party has produced one larger-than-life governor, an appointed U.S. senator for 7 1/2 weeks and a smattering of local officials.

Now the party of Jesse Ventura is pinning its hopes on eight statewide and federal candidates, none of whom has ever stood for election before, plus a collection of 17 seekers of lesser offices.

Is this really a major party?

Officially it is, by virtue of attaining 5 percent or more of the vote in at least one statewide race in every Minnesota general election since 1994. And polls show that string is likely to continue with veteran public policy wonk Peter Hutchinson's long-shot gubernatorial run this year.

In some ways, the Independence Party is a serious political force while in others it's still a struggling newcomer.

"They are definitely a player, at the moment probably the most successful third-party movement in America," said Larry Jacobs, director of the Center for the Study of Politics and Governance at the University of Minnesota. "But they're not yet an organization, and their support can be unstable."

Not surprisingly, the two dominant parties -- with more than 200 nominees apiece on the Nov. 7 ballots -- scoff at the IP's thin candidate slates, threadbare finances, middle-of-the-road politics and recent election failures.

"It's hard to talk about the future of a party that hit its high-water mark eight years ago," said Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party spokeswoman Jess McIntosh, referring to Ventura's election. "They had their shot, they showed us what independent leadership looks like, and I don't imagine voters will give them another chance anytime soon."

Added state Republican Party spokesman Mark Drake: "They've been losing a lot of influence in the post-Ventura years."

But state IP Chairman Jim Moore shot back: "The last time the state worked was with a former wrestler who wore a feather boa."

Since Ventura "shocked the world" in 1998 by winning a three-way gubernatorial race with 37 percent of the vote, Tim Penny, the IP's choice in 2002, saw his support fall from the mid-20 percent range in an early poll to 16 percent on Election Day. Hutchinson is languishing in single digits.

Moore says that's about where Ventura was at this stage eight years ago -- he registered 10 percent in a Sept. 23, 1998, poll. But while Hutchinson, a former state finance commissioner and Minneapolis schools superintendent, has impressed debate audiences with his articulate grasp of issues, he has not matched Ventura's name recognition, florid personality and ability to connect with alienated voters.

The party does seem to be trying to re-create something of the offbeat Ventura style. It has produced satirical radio ads featuring the former governor and started an interactive Web site where the party mascot, Indie the Buffalo, answers visitors' questions. A recent "speed candi-dating" event offered happy-hour bar patrons in downtown Minneapolis brief one-on-one conversations with IP candidates.

With its support of rail transit, aggressive environmental initiatives, and abortion and gay rights, the IP is often seen as draining support from the DFL. "They're true liberals," the GOP's Drake said of Hutchinson and other IP candidates who have backgrounds in the DFL. But Jacobs said his public-opinion research shows that Hutchinson draws his current 9 percent support equally from Gov. Tim Pawlenty (R) and DFL Attorney General Mike Hatch.

Tim Anderson, 40, a Minnetonka software consultant, said he will vote the IP ticket now after a lifetime as a dedicated Republican. Anderson said he responds to Hutchinson's calls to simplify the government and get it out of "the hot-button moral issues" that he said have preoccupied the GOP for the past 10 years.

"I don't think they're going to win," he said of the IP slate, "but I like them anyway."

In addition to Hutchinson and his "Team Minnesota" statewide slate of experienced but little-known public policy hands, the IP is focusing resources on a "Team Washington" of U.S. Senate hopeful Robert Fitzgerald and U.S. House candidates Tammy Lee and John Binkowski.

DOJ_NMG_0084584

They are young, likable and well-positioned between DFL and Republican rivals who are "on the edges of their parties," Moore said. But none of them has broken out of single digits in polls.

In the view of IP founder Dean Barkley, "Tammy Lee has an excellent chance of doing well" against Keith Ellison (DFL) and Alan Fine (R) in the Minneapolis-area 5th District. "She might be able to pull that one off."

Binkowski is running against Michele Bachmann (R) and Patty Wetterling (DFL) in the 6th District, north of the Twin Cities.

The IP has fielded only two winners of state offices -- Ventura and state Sen. Sheila Kiscaden, a moderate Republican legislator who was snubbed by her party, won reelection in 2002 under the IP banner and soon thereafter switched to the DFL.

There's little indication that this year's crop of 16 IP legislative hopefuls will repeat Kiscaden's success.

"The problem with the Independence Party is that their only message is 'none of the above,' " said the DFL's McIntosh. "It's not positive, it's not progressive and it's not a message you can actually govern on."

Barkley, who masterminded Ventura's election and later was appointed by him to fill out the final weeks of the late Democratic Sen. Paul Wellstone's term, takes a more positive view.

"They may not be doing as well as they'd like," he said last week from Austin, where he is managing the independent gubernatorial campaign of singer-writer Kinky Friedman. "But we're patient. It's not going to happen overnight. The party is larger than ever. In '94, there were about 12 of us. It gets a little bigger every year."

Running For Office? Better Run From Colbert (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

Lawmakers are wary of his Comedy Central show, which often gives them enough cable to hang themselves.

WASHINGTON — Most politicians are as likely to pass up free TV face time before an election as they would be to refuse a campaign check.

Then again, there's a price to be paid for looking stupid.

That's what members of Congress have learned recently about "Better Know a District," a sarcastic weekly skit that is part of "The Colbert Report," a nightly half-hour on Viacom Inc.'s Comedy Central network.

Hosted by comedian Stephen Colbert, the year-old program is a spinoff of the cable channel's wildly popular "The Daily Show Starring Jon Stewart" and one of an increasing number of political humor shows on cable that are drawing the young viewers whom advertisers covet.

Politicians covet them too for their votes. So, many lawmakers initially played along with the segments in which Colbert interviews a member of the House of Representatives, with few checks and balances on his proclivity to make fools of them.

But after a couple of House members stumbled badly on the show, some incumbents decided that the dumbest thing to do with Colbert's offer of free TV exposure was to take it.

"I watch it all the time," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), "and I think, 'Why would anybody go on there?' "

With polls showing that the balance of power in Congress could shift from Republican to Democrat in next month's elections, few incumbents are in the mood to take chances. Indeed, it's been two months since a current member has appeared.

One who did appear, Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.), discovered the pitfalls when Colbert asked him about a bill he co-sponsored requiring that the Ten Commandments be displayed in the U.S. Capitol.

"What are the Ten Commandments?" Colbert asked matter-of-factly.

"What are all of them?" Westmoreland said, taken aback. "You want me to name them all?"

The June segment showed Westmoreland struggling to name just three. Westmoreland actually named seven, said his press secretary, Brian Robinson. And the remaining ones, he added, were somewhat obscure.

A Bible Belt conservative, the embarrassed Westmoreland has been trying to live down his Commandments performance. No Republican has appeared since.

DOJ_NMG_0084585

Negative phone calls from around the country poured in to Westmoreland's office, mostly from liberals charging hypocrisy, Robinson said. Several clips of the segment are posted on the YouTube website, and Westmoreland's Democratic opponent, Mike McGraw, put the video on his campaign website.

"It's a great thing to do if all Americans had a sense of humor," Robinson said of a Colbert appearance. "Unfortunately, some don't get the joke."

What really got the attention of House members was the experience of Rep. Robert Wexler (D-Fla.). Colbert told him he was free to make even the most outrageous statements because he was running for reelection unopposed. Then Colbert coaxed Wexler into a spoof declaration that he enjoyed cocaine and prostitutes because "it's a fun thing to do."

Several media outlets trumpeted Wexler's comments without making it clear that he was only answering Colbert's fill-in-the-blank questions.

"I'm going to try to keep my day job and not go into comedy," Wexler said, although he noted that the reaction from his constituents was overwhelmingly positive.

Wexler's gaffe, following Westmoreland's trouble, has made some legislators gun-shy about facing Colbert with elections approaching. Colbert and the show's staff have declined media interviews about the segments since the Wexler episode.

But ignoring Colbert has its own perils.

When Rep. Sue W. Kelly (R-N.Y.) declined to appear for the segment that aired Thursday night, Colbert invited her Democratic opponent, John Hall.

"I oppose everything that you stand for," Colbert said, "but you were willing to talk to me. So let's move your numbers right here. Let's smear your opponent."

Hall picked from a deck of "smear cards" fanned by Colbert.

"My opponent smokes marijuana," Hall said blankly.

"That's a bold accusation," the host responded. "It's out there now that Sue Kelly smokes pot."

Ever since Richard Nixon delivered the "Sock it to me" punch line on "Rowan & Martin's Laugh-In" during the 1968 presidential campaign, politicians have sought to use comedy shows to prove they aren't the stiffs they seem to be. Gerald Ford taped two brief lines from the White House for a 1976 episode of "Saturday Night Live."

Bill Clinton defused criticism over a painfully long speech at the 1988 Democratic convention by letting "Tonight Show" host Johnny Carson place an hourglass in front of him during an interview. Four years later, Clinton scored points in his 1992 presidential campaign by playing the saxophone on comic Arsenio Hall's talk show.

But Colbert's series is different.

Instead of high-profile presidential wannabes, it features relatively anonymous House members. The interviews are taped in the lawmaker's office, so there's no studio audience to chastise a hostile questioner. And the approximately five-minute segments are culled from sessions as long as 2 1/2 hours — plenty of time for even an experienced politician to say or do something to make a press secretary cringe.

Over the last year, "Better Know a District" has become the comedic buzz of Capitol Hill. Colbert bills it as a "434-part series" — he's banned the San Diego-area district represented by his "friend," convicted felon Randy "Duke" Cunningham, because constituents didn't notice his "cry for help."

Congressional staffers e-mail video clips, critiquing each performance. Speculating about who will appear next — and how foolish they'll look — has become nearly as popular as handicapping which party will control the House after November's election.

Looking foolish is usually a good bet.

Each segment begins with a short send-up of the representative's district. Colbert introduced the district of Rep. Xavier Becerra (D-Los Angeles) "Entertainment Tonight"-style. He plugged the pastrami sandwiches at Langer's deli with numerous references to Tom Cruise movies and asked in a quiz which hunk — George Clooney, Antonio Banderas or Becerra — was the district's congressman.

DOJ_NMG_0084586

Colbert's shtick lampoons blustery conservative cable TV commentators such as Fox's Bill O'Reilly. He remains in character when he sits down with members of Congress, firing off provocative or just plain stupid questions. Politicians often are flummoxed.

"Is it safe to say you're an America-hating terrorist lover hiding behind a stupid bow tie?" he asked Rep. Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.).

"Do you have to take your toupee off when you go through security?" Colbert asked Rep. John L. Mica (R-Fla.).

"Have you ever seen a naked woman?" he asked Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Sherman Oaks).

Paul Lewis, a Boston College professor who has studied humor and politics, said the series was just "a trap" for politicians.

"When they go on the show," he said, "they often seem like buffoons."

But for the 30 House members who have appeared over the last year, the risk of facing down Colbert has a potential reward — demonstrating a sense of humor and appealing to young people, who make up a large chunk of the 2 million people who watch each episode.

Many like to play along. Rep. Lynn C. Woolsey (D-Petaluma) arm-wrestled Colbert. Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio) portrayed "Judge Tubbs" in a parody of TV court shows. Rep. Eliot L. Engel (D-N.Y.) let Colbert comb his mustache.

"We don't want to be stuffed shirts only doing dry subjects in a dull format," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), who was the first House member Colbert profiled and had urged colleagues to appear. "We need to make politics interesting and fun to people any chance we get."

Becerra, who is running unopposed, decided Colbert was a risk worth taking. Appearing in August, Becerra was the last incumbent to make that calculation. But it was worth it, Becerra said, noting that it brought attention to his bill to create a national museum for American Latino culture and history.

Well, attention of a sort.

"Why would you want to take America's great art and translate it into Spanish?" Colbert asked Becerra in his Capitol Hill office. "Is this what you want to see?"

Colbert held up a series of pictures. In "Washington Crossing the Delaware," the Father of Our Country wore a sombrero, and a pinata replaced the American flag. "Whistler's Mother" rocked under a fruit-basket hat a la Carmen Miranda. Colombian coffee pitchman Juan Valdez and his trusty mule were seen nosing into "American Gothic."

"That's very clever," Becerra responded, trying not to laugh.

He and others said the key to avoiding political damage was knowing when to stop playing along. "In our business, we're allowed to be funny," Kingston said, "but not real funny."

Sherman participated in a PG-rated spoof of a pornographic movie involving Colbert and a pizza deliveryman, a nod to his district being in the San Fernando Valley, home to the nation's adult film industry. But Sherman said he turned down several requests from Colbert to do potentially embarrassing things in the spoof, titled "Fresh Hot Slice."

In the end, Sherman was shown simply watching Colbert and the deliveryman indulge in some sexually suggestive pizza eating.

"I ate no pizza," Sherman said. "That's not because Colbert didn't want me to eat some pizza."

Democratic consultant Jenny Backus said Colbert offered lawmakers an excellent opportunity to broaden their appeal, just not in the home stretch of the campaign.

"There will always be people in the House trying to stick out of the crowd … but right now is not the season to be doing that," she said, noting that a series of congressional scandals have many voters in a less-than-jovial mood. "In this climate, it's must-not-do TV."

jim.puzzanghera@latimes.com

The GOP Victory (BAR)

By Jim McTague

Barrons, October 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084587

JUBILANT DEMOCRATS SHOULD RECONSIDER their order for confetti and noisemakers. The Democrats, as widely reported, are expecting GOP-weary voters to flock to the polls in two weeks and hand them control of the House for the first time in 12 years -- and perhaps the Senate, as well. Even some Republicans privately confess that they are anticipating the election-day equivalent of Little Big Horn. Pardon our hubris, but we just don't see it.

Our analysis -- based on a race-by-race examination of campaign-finance data -- suggests that the GOP will hang on to both chambers, at least nominally. We expect the Republican majority in the House to fall by eight seats, to 224 of the chamber's 435. At the very worst, our analysis suggests, the party's loss could be as large as 14 seats, leaving a one-seat majority. But that is still a far cry from the 20-seat loss some are predicting. In the Senate, with 100 seats, we see the GOP winding up with 52, down three

We studied every single race -- all 435 House seats and 33 in the Senate -- and based our predictions about the outcome in almost every race on which candidate had the largest campaign war chest, a sign of superior grass-roots support. We ignore the polls. Thus, our conclusions about individual races often differ from the conventional wisdom. Pollsters, for instance, have upstate New York Republican Rep. Tom Reynolds trailing Democratic challenger Jack Davis, who owns a manufacturing plant. But Reynolds raised $3.3 million in campaign contributions versus $1.6 million for Davis, so we score him the winner.

Likewise, we disagree with pollsters of both parties who see Indiana Republican Rep. Chris Chocola getting whomped by Democratic challenger Joe Donnelly, a lawyer and business owner from South Bend. Chocola has raised $2.7 million, versus $1.1 million for Donnelly. Ditto in North Carolina, where we see Republican Rep. Charles Taylor beating Democrat Heath Shuler, a former NFL quarterback, because of better financing. Analysts from both parties predict a Shuler upset.

Is our method reliable? It certainly has been in the past. Using it in the 2002 and 2004 congressional races, we bucked conventional wisdom and correctly predicted GOP gains both years. Look at House races back to 1972 and you'll find the candidate with the most money has won about 93% of the time. And that's closer to 98% in more recent years, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Polls can be far less reliable. Remember, they all but declared John Kerry president on Election Day 2004.

Our method isn't quite as accurate in Senate races: The cash advantage has spelled victory about 89% of the time since 1996. The reason appears to be that with more money spent on Senate races, you need a multi-million-dollar advantage to really dominate in advertising, and that's hard to come by.

But even 89% accuracy is high compared with other gauges. Tracking each candidate's funding is "exceptionally valuable because it tells you who has support," says William Morgan, executive director of the renowned Mid-West Political Science Association in Bloomington, Ind. The cognoscenti, he says, give the most money to the candidate they believe has a good chance of winning.

WE FOUND NO SHORTAGE of people to challenge us. They argue that money doesn't make a difference when the electorate is as worked up emotionally, as it is this year. John Aldrich, a professor of political science at Duke University who writes extensively about elections, says that a candidate really doesn't need the most money to win; he merely requires enough cash to get his message across. Aldrich believes Democrats will win this year with less money because they won't have to spend so much to persuade voters to switch horses.

"The support for the president, the Congress and incumbents is relatively low by historical standards," he says. In fact, a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News Poll says voter disgust with Congress is the lowest in the survey's 17-year history.

It's true that our formula isn't foolproof. In 1958, 1974 and 1994, the wave of anti-incumbent sentiment was so strong that money didn't trump voter outrage. We appreciate that voters in 2006 are hopping mad at the GOP because of the war and because of scandal. We just don't agree that the outrage has reached the level of those earlier times. The reason is that the economy in 2006 is healthier. And the economy is the only other factor that figures in our analysis.

In 1958, in sharp contrast to now, the country was in a deep recession. Though the Democrats controlled the House, voters blamed their pain on Republican President Dwight David Eisenhower, and it cost the GOP 48 seats. In 1974, a Watergate year, inflation and an Arab oil embargo pinched household budgets and helped fuel voter anger at Republicans. In 1994, though the economy was improving, unemployment was above 6% and personal income began to fall in the quarter prior to the election, souring the mood of the electorate. People blamed their pain on high taxes, which they associated with Democrats, and ushered in Newt Gingrich & Co.

DOJ_NMG_0084588

Take a look at how Jim McTague did with his picks in 2004. (Part 1 | Part 2)

Though the current economy is slowing, unemployment remains relatively low, at 4.6%, and disposable-income growth is positive. While GDP figures will be revised downward in coming weeks and unemployment figures could edge up, it may not matter. Those numbers are "interesting stuff for economists, but voters will continue to focus on pocketbook issues like the price of gas and the value of their 401(k)s," says GOP insider Rick Hohlt. Pump prices have been falling and the Dow Jones Industrial Average has been on a tear, reaching 12,000 last week.

Hohlt and analyst John Morgan say Republicans will have unusually tough election-day challenges from Democrats in more than 50 races -- a high number. They recall no more than 20 highly competitive races in 2004. All but 10 of this year's contested seats are held by incumbents, and Hohlt and Morgan aren't predicting an outcome.

IF WE'RE EVEN HALF right, and the GOP retains control of the Senate but loses the House, then there would be important ramifications for the stock market. Since traders often have disdain for Democrats, there could well be a relief rally, at least in the short term. "It would force investors to rethink some overzealous discounting of stocks," says Chuck Gabriel, chief political analyst for Prudential Equity Group.

Fear of Democrats, he suggests, may be playing a role in the weakness in energy and pharmaceutical stocks, with investors bracing for a populist backlash against profits. "Elections may or may not be a driver, but it would not hurt to remove that headwind," says Gabriel.

Shares of student lender Sallie Mae also may also be feeling the weight of the presumed Democrat victory. The theory is that Democrats would reduce student-loan rates if they control both ends of the Capitol, hurting profit margins for parent SLM (ticker: SLM). It's unlikely Democrats could succeed with the Senate in GOP hands.

Gabriel adds that shares of mortgage giants Fannie Mae (FNM) and Freddie Mac (FRE), which have gained since Mark Foley resigned on Sept. 29 amid a sex scandal, might decline with even a partial GOP victory. Republicans are considered less friendly to the quasi-governmental agencies than pro-housing Democrats.

President Bush certainly would have to rethink his approach to Congress if our scenario plays out either in full or in part. The GOP majority in Congress would be so slim that the president would have to live up fully to a promise he made during his first election campaign to be a "uniter," not a "divider." He'd have a monstrously difficult time getting Congress to make his tax cuts permanent. His desire to reform Social Security with private investment accounts likely would remain unfulfilled.

The scandals and the unpopular war are not all that are propelling Democrats this year. The party has fielded candidates who are more attractive and better financed than in many past campaigns.

There are nine House races where the GOP's funding advantage is minimal, allowing for upsets. However, we don't think the Democratic pockets are deep enough to bring about a rout in these contests. There are nine other races where Democrats have very narrow funding advantages -- but the Republican Party has ready money to pour into such contests. Sara Taylor, director of the White House Office of Political Affairs, says the Republican Party has a $56 million cash advantage over Democrats going into the final weeks of the campaign. That's a lot of TV ads.

MANY ON WALL STREET believe the Democrats will triumph this year, too. "I'm not a big believer in generic polls, but the 23-point lead that Democrats have over the GOP in the recent USA TODAY/Gallup Poll is about as wide as it gets," says Greg Valliere, chief political strategist for the Stanford Washington Research Group, a leading adviser to the Street. The poll Valliere cites showed 59% of respondents favoring Democratic candidates, 36% favoring Republicans and 5% undecided. "I threw in the towel for the Republicans a day or two after the Foley scandal broke," he says.

Even the "investors" who buy contracts on the Iowa Electronics Market are down on the Republicans for the first time in memory. Contracts that will be worth $1 if Hastert & Co. end up retaining control of the House on Nov. 7 are trading for around 30 cents -- hardly a vote of confidence.

You hardly can blame Democrats for feeling giddy as the mid-term contest approaches. The GOP Congress has proved more adept at producing scandal than legislative reforms, and the unrelenting bloodbath in Iraq doesn't instill strong public confidence in our commander-in-chief. Maryland Democratic Rep. Chris Van Hollen contends the GOP's old trump card, terrorism, no longer has an effect on voters because they perceive America's pacification effort in Iraq "is a mess and in chaos because of gross incompetence by the Bush administration."

DOJ_NMG_0084589

There's no denying that the Democrats have fielded stronger candidates this time around. The effects of that will be on display throughout Election Day in close races around the country. Here's a rundown on some of the tightest.

In Connecticut's fourth congressional district, Republican Rep. Chris Shays is in a bruising rematch against Diane Goss Farrell, whom he narrowly beat in 2004. He's raised $3.2 million to her $2.5 million. That puts her within reach of an upset, but we reckon Shays' funding advantage will help him keep his seat, even though the district voted against Bush in the past two presidential elections.

In New Hampshire's second district, incumbent Republican Rep. Charlie Bass, who was elected in 1994, has raised a total of $918,789. The challenger, lawyer Paul Hodes, whom Bass beat handily in 2004, has raised about $1.1 million. Although Bass is the incumbent and within striking distance, it looks as though he's going to be knocked off, based on the money.

In Indiana's 9th district, in the southeastern part of that state, Republican incumbent Mike Sodrel looks as if he will survive a spirited challenge by Baron Hill. Sodrel unseated Hill in 2004 after losing to him in 2002. Sodrel has raised $2 million versus $1.2 million for Hill, a comfortable funding advantage.

When Barron's visited the 9th district in July, we wrote that Sodrel would face an uphill fight because Republicans there were angry at Bush for running up the deficit and for mismanaging the Iraq war. Not only is Bush unpopular in the district; so is GOP Gov. Mitch Daniels. The fundraising numbers tell us that the GOP base might have had second thoughts about voting for a Democrat. Still, we expect Democrats to unseat Republicans in two other Indiana congressional districts.

In Pennsylvania, pundits have written off Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, who has raised $17.3 million. His Democratic challenger, Bob Casey, who has raised $15 million, has a large lead in the polls. This is the first serious challenge for Santorum since he was elected in 1994. We see him defying the pollsters on Nov. 7 and hanging on to his seat, with voters from the Western part of the state riding to his rescue.

Take a look at how Jim McTague did with his picks in 2004. (Part 1 | Part 2)In Rhode Island, we predict Republican Lincoln Chafee will lose to democratic challenger Sheldon Whitehouse, a former U.S. attorney. Whitehouse has raised more than $4 million versus about $3.5 million for Chafee. According to the Center for Responsive politics, nearly 80% of the challenger's money comes from individuals as opposed to political committees. Chafee has raised about 50% from individuals. Clearly Whitehouse has a better organization.

With only two weeks to go, a barrage of contradictory poll findings is apt to confuse the oddsmakers, not to mention voters. But we're sticking with our numbers, and they say one thing: The Democrats don't have quite enough heft to push aside the elephant.

The End Of An Era? (WP)

By Darryl Fears And Hamil R. Harris

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

With Farrakhan Ill, the Nation of Islam Prepares for Change

Nearly 30 years after Louis Farrakhan seized control of the Nation of Islam, the organization is preparing for a change at the top. The controversial minister is battling what he has described as a "life-threatening" illness -- painful swelling of the prostate that has left him more than 30 pounds underweight, dehydrated, anemic and unwilling to eat.

Farrakhan, 73, recently relinquished his duties and turned control over to an executive panel of trusted lieutenants, exhorting them to move the Nation of Islam forward and prove that it is more than the charisma and influence of one man.

"The minister has good days. He has bad days," said Ishmael Muhammad, who leads the organization's flagship Mosque Maryam in Chicago and sits on the executive board. "The doctors are meeting to talk about what steps they can take to help him . . . so that he does not have to suffer through the pain he's constantly in."

Muhammad said the board runs the Nation of Islam's day-to-day responsibilities. It includes Abdul-Alim Muhammad, Farrakhan's medical adviser; Leonard Muhammad, the chief of staff; and Mustafa Farrakhan, one of the leader's sons.

DOJ_NMG_0084590

Although they are considered equals, each board member is poised to take over the organization if Louis Farrakhan fails to fully recover.

Power struggles are nothing new within the deeply insular Nation of Islam. After leader Elijah Muhammad died in 1975, Farrakhan split with Wallace D. Mohammed, the son who replaced him, and started his own following.

Wallace Mohammed angered some members by renouncing his father's unorthodox teachings and seeking to convert the Nation to orthodox Sunni Islam. But Farrakhan, a former calypso singer, followed Elijah Muhammad's doctrine almost to the letter, mesmerizing black audiences with messages of social liberation and empowerment that culminated with the Million Man March in 1995, one of the largest African American gatherings in history.

"Minister Farrakhan has been one of the strongest voices in our community in terms of his critique against racism in the black community, and that voice has been important," said Ronald Walters, a University of Maryland professor of political science who teaches a course in black leadership.

But Farrakhan failed to follow through on his promises to unify black men, create jobs and make black communities self-sufficient, Walters said.

"It didn't go anywhere," he said. "He didn't lend himself to implementation. He went off into the desert, and we couldn't get the implementation and administration started."

A change in leadership could allow the Nation to move away from a controversial mythology. Followers are taught that the group's founder, Wallace Fard, was an incarnation of God and that a scientist named Yacub created white people, notions that are dismissed by orthodox Muslims.

Eight years ago, as he fought prostate cancer, Farrakhan softened his tone and sought to burnish an image that had been improving since the Million Man March. He said reports that he had called Judaism a "gutter religion" misquoted him, and he said he did not mean to offend.

But recently, Farrakhan returned to anti-Semitic statements. During a speech at the group's Savior's Day ceremony in February, he was quoted as saying that "false Jews promote the filth of Hollywood," including homosexuality. "You may not like me," he said, "but I don't give a damn. I'm throwing down the gauntlet today."

Such comments by the Nation of Islam leader are "offensive not only to Jews, but it hurts their credibility as an organization trying to lift up blacks," said Deborah Lauter, director of civil rights for the Anti-Defamation League, a Jewish organization. "Promoting hatred of Jews and whites diminishes the positive messages they're trying to send. The Jewish people will not sit at the table with hate groups, whether they are black or white."

Earlier this year, Farrakhan began experiencing pain that he says was a result of the radiation treatment he received for his bout with prostate cancer in 1998.

"As you know, I have been suffering from the after-effects of an extremely high dose of radiated seed," Farrakhan wrote in a statement last month. "Over time, these seeds have done severe internal damage."

He continued, "I am postponing indefinitely all engagements, meetings and appointments so that I can concentrate, with Allah's (God's) Help, to bring myself back to a state where I may be able to continue to serve the rise of our people."

Speaking more directly to his followers, he wrote, "I know that you (the Believers) will accept the challenge to move our Nation forward, being ever watchful for any smart, crooked deceiver and hypocrite who would create confusion over my present condition."

In Washington, Abdul-Alim Muhammad said the Nation of Islam will thrive with or without Farrakhan. "As we go forward, it will not be wise to think that we are going to produce someone like him," he said.

Although Farrakhan vowed to come back strong, "so that I can continue to serve because I do not believe that my earthly work is done," some followers, in private conversations, seemed uncertain about his future.

Benjamin Muhammad, who once ran the NAACP under the name Benjamin F. Chavis Jr., wished Farrakhan well and said he is in his prayers. But he said the illness is a difficult challenge to overcome.

Ishmael Muhammad said speculation about life without Farrakhan "is premature when the man is still yet present among us." He said the Nation of Islam would continue to fight oppression through its members worldwide.

DOJ_NMG_0084591

"We never discuss actual membership," he said. Critics have said the number of Nation of Islam followers has fallen greatly as black Americans convert to orthodox Islam.

Others outside the organization wondered whether it could last without Farrakhan's charismatic influence.

"My guess is that the NOI will be around in some form for the indefinite future," said Ibrahim Abdil-Mu'id Ramey, director of human and civil rights for the Muslim American Society's Freedom Foundation.

"It will not in my opinion be as large or vital as it is now. I think an analogy that might be appropriate is the analogy of the Garvey Movement."

When Marcus Garvey died in 1940, his Universal Negro Improvement Association faded almost to nothing. There are people today who keep its memory alive, Ramey said, "but it is no longer an organization at the forefront of the African American struggle."

Rice Criticizes Russia's Limits On News Media (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 21 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice criticized shrinking Russian press freedoms, questioned the enforcement of a restrictive new law on foreign private groups here and called for eased tensions between Russia and neighboring Georgia when she arrived here Saturday to discuss the North Korean nuclear crisis.

Ms. Rice's remarks raised the possibility of a testy atmosphere for the discussions in Moscow, the last stop of her pan-Asia trip aimed at urging tough enforcement of the Security Council sanctions imposed on North Korea a week ago in response to its Oct. 9 underground nuclear test.

In a symbolic decision that no doubt will be scrutinized by the Kremlin leadership, Ms. Rice invited senior editors of Novaya Gazeta, a leading independent journal, to a meeting at her hotel. The session, which included the son of the assassinated journalist Anna Politkovskaya, came just before she headed into official government meetings.

Earlier, Ms. Rice said that the future of a free Russian press and electronic media "is a major concern" of the United States government.

"There is still an independent print press," she said. "Unfortunately, there is not much left of independent television in Russia."

Ms. Politkovskaya, shot to death this month in what appeared to be a professional killing, had made a name for herself with tough reporting on the war in Chechnya, and was a fierce critic of the administration of President Vladimir V. Putin.

Mr. Putin, who was to meet with Ms. Rice not long after her session with Ms. Politkovskaya's colleagues and the journalist's son, Ilya Politkovsky, has described the killing as "a crime of loathsome brutality," but also said that "her influence on political life was extremely insignificant in scale."

Ms. Rice told correspondents traveling aboard her plane that she also would ask Russian leaders to explain the enforcement of a new law that requires foreign nongovernmental organizations to register with the government. The deadline for registration was last Thursday, and dozens of the groups, many of them highly critical of the Kremlin, were told to cease operations until their registration applications had been processed. How long that will take is unclear.

"In some cases it is being implemented in ways that are making it difficult for NGO's to operate, and so I think we have to go over that," Ms. Rice said.

A senior State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity in accordance with diplomatic protocol, said later Saturday that three organizations at the center of the debate — the National Democratic Institute, the International Republican Institute and the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace — had successfully registered. Even so, the official said, the United States still sees no guarantee that "Russia will not abuse this law and this process."

As she began a day of meetings that was to include lunch with Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov and a dinner with Defense Minister Sergei B. Ivanov, Ms. Rice said she planned to urge Moscow to reduce any chance for increasing conflict with neighboring Georgia. Simmering Russia-Georgia animosity escalated this month after Georgia detained four Russian military personnel for suspected espionage.

DOJ_NMG_0084592

The senior State Department official described Ms. Rice's discussions with Mr. Lavrov on Georgia as "constructive." The official added: "I'm not here to tell you that all will be well. I'm here to tell you we had a good conversation" on potential steps to help ease tensions between the two countries.

On North Korea, Ms. Rice cast doubts on South Korean press reports that the North's leader, Kim Jong-il, had expressed regret to a visiting Chinese envoy for ordering the nuclear test and had pledged not to detonate another nuclear device.

Ms. Rice said she was given no information to confirm those press reports during her talks in Beijing on Friday and said she believed that the North Koreans "would like to see an escalation of the tension."

During her talks in Moscow, Ms. Rice said, she also intended to discuss efforts to halt not only North Korea's nuclear program, but Iran's. Before her arrival, Mr. Lavrov, the foreign minister, told a Kuwaiti news service that his government would not allow the Security Council to be a vehicle for pressuring Iran over its nuclear program.

Moscow Meeting Highlights Concerns On Press Freedom (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 21 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Saturday interrupted her diplomacy on the North Korean nuclear crisis to meet with the son of a slain Russian journalist and top editors of her newspaper, saying that "the fate of journalists in Russia is a major concern."

Rice's high-profile meeting, scheduled at the request of the State Department, came shortly before she met with Russian President Vladimir Putin, primarily to discuss Russia's implementation of sanctions on North Korea for testing a nuclear device.

Rice arrived here Saturday after stops in Japan, South Korea and China, and her decision to highlight her concern about eroding press freedoms in Russia indicated the delicate balance the Bush administration is trying to strike with Russia. One of Rice's aides said the meeting was intended to express condolences and offer support for independent journalism. "It was not a poke in the eye but the right thing to do," he said.

Anna Politkovskaya, a veteran journalist who had sharply criticized the Kremlin and its proxies in the conflict in Chechnya, was shot four times on Oct. 7, presumably for her reporting. No senior Russian officials attended her funeral, which attracted thousands of mourners.

"Anna Politkovskaya was a particularly well-known and well-respected journalist, so I think it's important to note that," Rice told reporters traveling with her from Beijing to Moscow, previewing the comments she made to the editors of Novaya Gazeta, the newspaper where Politkovskaya had worked.

Novaya Gazeta is "one of the best independent voices in Russia," Rice said, noting that the country still has independent print media and some independent radio. "Unfortunately, there is not much left of independent television in Russia," she said.

When Rice entered the meeting with the journalists, she introduced herself and made brief opening remarks in Russian before reverting to using an interpreter.

Dmitry Muratov, editor-in-chief of Novaya Gazeta, gave Rice some books and copies of the newspaper dedicated to Politkovskaya. The slain journalist's son, Ilya, 28, a public relations specialist, said he agreed with Rice's comments about his mother's courage and the tragedy of her loss, but he declined to comment on Rice's statements on press freedoms. He said that was not his area of expertise.

Rice on Saturday also cast doubt on a widely publicized report that North Korean leader Kim Jong Il had assured Chinese officials he would not conduct a second nuclear test. The Chinese envoy who met with Kim "did not tell me that Kim Jong Il either apologized for the test or that he would not ever test again," she said.

Rice Takes Time Out From North Korea To Push Russia On Rights (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, October 22, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice broke away from her North Korea crisis mission to send some pointed messages to President Vladimir Putin's government over human rights and other sore points in US-Russian relations.

DOJ_NMG_0084593

Rice arrived from Beijing at midday for a flurry of meetings with Putin, Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov that were to focus primarily on implementing UN Security Council resolution 1718 imposing sanctions on North Korea over its recent nuclear test.

But she found time to meet at her request with editors of Novaya Gazeta, the independent newspaper of slain investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya, and also questioned the Russian leaders over human rights issues.

Rice requested the encounter, which took place in a Moscow hotel, a State Department official said.

Politkovskaya's son, Ilya Politkovsky, 28, was also present.

The journalist, a prominent Kremlin critic who investigated corruption and human rights abuses, was gunned down this month outside her Moscow apartment in what police said was a contract killing.

No arrests have been made in the case, the 13th apparently deliberate killing of a journalist since Putin came to power in 2000.

Independent media have dwindled significantly under Putin's rule, with virtually all television networks now under state control and many radios and newspapers held by interests close to the Kremlin, US officials said.

Two days after Politkovskaya's October 7 murder, Rice warned the Russian government "that everybody is watching, that an investigation of this event is absolutely necessary."

In an emotional encounter, Rice, a Russia scholar and expert in the history of the former Soviet Union, briefly addressed the group in Russian before making a few remarks in English on the purpose of her one-day Moscow visit.

A senior State Department official said Rice wanted to hold the meeting "as part condolences... and part support for what is left of a free media in Russia."

He denied the meeting was intended as a slight to Putin.

"We certainly didn't plan it as a poke in the eye, but the right thing to do," he said.

In addition to concerns about press freedom under Putin, Rice said she and her aides would ask about a new law requiring foreign non-governmental organisations (NGOs) to register with authorities.

The NGOs, including Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, have complained that the law is a bid by Putin to monitor and restrict their work, which often involves investigating alleged human rights abuses in the country.

A deadline for registration passed on Thursday and a number of NGOs that did not submit their documents in time were forced temporarily to suspend their operations, though Russian officials said most did comply on time and promptly received new registration.

The State Department's point man for Europe, Dan Fried, discussed the issue Saturday with Russia's Human Rights ombudsman, Vladimir Lukin, a senior official said.

While the Americans welcomed the fact that some major US NGOs had received their registration, there were still concerns the law could be misused in future, the official said.

"I can't say with confidence that the Russians will not abuse this law," he said.

Rice and her delegation also raised the flare-up in tensions between Russia and the pro-US government of the former Soviet republic of Georgia and reports of harrassment of Georgians living in Russia.

Relations between the two states soured dramatically after Georgia arrested four Russian military officers accused of spying last month.

The four were quickly released, but the two governments remain locked in confrontation over two breakaway Georgian regions, Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which have received support from Moscow.

Georgia has threatened to use military force against the rogue regions, a move that could spark a conflict with Russia.

"Cooler heads need to prevail here... because that is the kind of problem that can get out of control," Rice said before meeting with the Russians.

The senior official said the two sides held constructive talks on the crisis and "the Russians acknowledged that they don't want to go over the cliff, to have some terrible blowup with the Georgians that destabilizes the South Caucasus."

Rice Prods Moscow On Press Freedom, Iran (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0084594

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 22, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Saturday delivered a symbolic rebuke to Russia over shrinking press freedoms even as she courted President Vladimir Putin for help punishing Iran over its nuclear program.

Rice made a point of scheduling an interview with Novaya Gazeta, the newspaper where a reporter critical of Russian policy in neighboring Chechnya had worked before her murder this month. Rice also met with the reporter's son.

Rice's one-day trip to Moscow followed talks in Asia last week over North Korea's nuclear test on Oct. 9. Russia voted for U.N. penalties against North Korea after the test, and the United States is seeking Russian cooperation for an upcoming vote on sanctions against Iran.

Yet even before Rice arrived in the Russian capital, her Russian counterpart said Moscow will not allow the Security Council to be used for punitive measures against Iran. Russia, however, was ready to discuss ways to pressure Iran into accepting broader international oversight of its nuclear program, Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said.

"Any measures of influence should encourage creating conditions for talks," Lavrov said in an interview with the Kuwaiti News Agency KUNA that was posted on the Russian Foreign Ministry Web site Saturday.

"We won't be able to support and will oppose any attempts to use the Security Council to punish Iran or use Iran's program in order to promote the ideas of regime change there," according to the interview Friday.

A draft resolution is expected to be introduced in the Security Council early this week, and diplomats have said they would seek limited penalties for Tehran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

Rice's decision to meet with Novaya Gazeta editors and reporters was a reminder to Putin of the widening rift between Russia and the U.S. over what the Bush administration sees as a rollback of democratic gains under the Russian president.

She met privately with Putin later Saturday.

Previewing her message to the newspaper editors, Rice told reporters traveling with her that she wanted to speak to one of a shrinking number of "independent voices" in Russian media.

"The fate of journalists in Russia is a major concern," Rice said. "Anna Politkovskaya was a particularly well-known and well-respected journalist so I think it's important to note that."

Politkovskaya repeatedly had accused Chechen Prime Minister Ramzan Kadyrov's security forces of abducting, torturing and killing innocent people. Her newspaper posthumously published her last story that described alleged torture by the Kremlin-backed Chechen security services.

Politkovskaya, a sharp critic of Putin and the conduct of the Kremlin and of Russia's war in Chechnya, was found shot dead at her Moscow apartment building.

Since Putin's election more than six years ago, he has presided over what critics have called a steady rollback in press freedoms won since the Soviet Union's collapse. Top independent television stations have been shut down and print media are under growing pressure from officials.

Putin said the killers had done the Russian government no favor. The killing "inflicts much greater damage to the government than any of her writing," he said after the killing.

The media rights group Reporters Without Borders has called Putin one of the world's press freedom "predators."

Rice's last Asian stop was in Beijing, North Korea's traditional ally, where she met with a Chinese government envoy just back from a hastily arranged visit with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il.

Rice said the envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, told her nothing that confirmed news reports about conciliatory moves from the North.

"Councilor Tang did not tell me that Kim Jong Il either apologized for the test or said that he would never test again," Rice said, adding that she does not know the source of widely circulated South Korean media reports to the contrary.

"I don't know whether or not Kim Jong Il said any such thing. But the Chinese ... in a fairly thorough briefing to me about the talks, said nothing," that confirms it, Rice said.

Lavrov, in the Kuwaiti interview, urged the U.S. and North Korea to settle issues such as U.S.-imposed financial restrictions in order to clear the way for international talks to resume on the North's nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0084595

"Both sides should show flexibility," he said.

Rice's Visit To Newspaper Seen As Rebuke To Putin (WT/AP)

By Anne Gearan, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice delivered a symbolic rebuke yesterday to Russia over shrinking press freedoms even as she courted President Vladimir Putin for help punishing Iran over its nuclear program.

Miss Rice made a point of scheduling an interview with Novaya Gazeta, the newspaper where a reporter critical of Russian policy in neighboring Chechnya had worked before her slaying this month. Miss Rice also met with the reporter's son.

Miss Rice's one-day trip to Moscow followed talks in Asia last week over North Korea's nuclear test on Oct. 9.

Russia voted for U.N. penalties against North Korea after the test, and the United States is seeking Russian cooperation for an upcoming vote on sanctions against Iran.

Yet even before Miss Rice arrived in the Russian capital, her Russian counterpart said Moscow will not allow the Security Council to be used for punitive measures against Iran.

Russia, however, was ready to discuss ways to pressure Iran into accepting broader international oversight of its nuclear program, Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said.

"Any measures of influence should encourage creating conditions for talks," Mr. Lavrov said in an interview with the Kuwaiti News Agency KUNA that was posted on the Russian Foreign Ministry Web site yesterday.

"We won't be able to support and will oppose any attempts to use the Security Council to punish Iran or use Iran's program in order to promote the ideas of regime change there," according to the interview yesterday.

A draft resolution is expected to be introduced in the Security Council early this week, and diplomats have said they would seek limited penalties for Tehran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

Miss Rice's decision to meet with Novaya Gazeta editors and reporters was a reminder to Mr. Putin of the widening rift between Russia and the United States over what the Bush administration sees as a rollback of democratic gains under the Russian president.

She met privately with Mr. Putin later yesterday.

Previewing her message to the newspaper editors, Miss Rice told reporters traveling with her that she wanted to speak to one of a shrinking number of "independent voices" in Russian media.

"The fate of journalists in Russia is a major concern," Miss Rice said. "Anna Polikovskaya was a particularly well-known and well-respected journalist, so I think it's important to note that."

Mrs. Polikovskaya repeatedly had accused Chechen Prime Minister Ramzan Kadyrov's security forces of abducting, torturing and killing innocent people. Her newspaper posthumously published her last story, which described reputed torture by the Kremlin-backed Chechen security services.

Mrs. Polikovskaya, a sharp critic of Mr. Putin's and the conduct of the Kremlin and of Russia's war in Chechnya, was found fatally shot at her Moscow apartment building. It appeared to be a professional hit.

Since Mr. Putin's election more than six years ago, he has presided over what critics have called a steady rollback in press freedoms won since the Soviet Union's collapse. Top independent television stations have been shut down and newspapers are under growing pressure from officials.

Mr. Putin said the killers had done the Russian government no favor. The killing "inflicts much greater damage to the government than any of her writing," he said after the killing.

The media rights group Reporters Without Borders has called Mr. Putin one of the world's press freedom "predators."

Diplomatic Juggling Act In Russia (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

Rice discusses nuclear issues with Putin and officials, and shows support for press freedom.

DOJ_NMG_0084596

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pressed Russia for a tougher stance against nuclear proliferation Saturday while fitting into her schedule a gesture of support for press freedom here.

In a diplomatic juggling act, Rice met with President Vladimir V. Putin and other officials, but also risked the Kremlin's ire by meeting with editors of the newspaper Novaya Gazeta.

Anna Politkovskaya, a prominent reporter for the newspaper who had been a fierce critic of Putin, was gunned down outside her home Oct. 7. The apparent assassination has not been solved.

Rice squeezed an afternoon meeting with Politkovskaya's colleagues between sessions with Foreign Minister Sergei V. Lavrov and with Putin. She was also scheduled to have a late dinner with Defense Minister Sergei B. Ivanov.

Few details emerged on the results of Rice's meetings, which culminated a four-nation tour that began in Asia and focused on North Korea's nuclear program. U.S. officials had no immediate comment on the talk with Putin.

A senior State Department official said that in her meeting with Lavrov "there was a discussion of next steps" to be taken in regard to Iran's nuclear research. "This was a decent exchange, a good exchange, and I think we're making progress," he said. "But I don't want to predict next steps."

This week, the U.N. Security Council is scheduled to consider a draft resolution on Iran that is expected to call for penalties over Tehran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

Russian presidential spokesman Alexei Gromov told reporters that Rice had briefed Putin on her visits to Tokyo, Seoul and Beijing.

"The president and the secretary of State shared perspectives on issues relating to North Korea as well as on more general issues of nuclear non-proliferation," Gromov said, according to the Russian news agency RIA Novosti.

Speaking on her airplane with reporters traveling with her, Rice said that in her meetings with Russian officials she would discuss steps to implement the recent U.N. resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea in response to its Oct. 9 nuclear test.

She mentioned possible U.S.-Russian cooperation in enforcing sanctions against North Korea under the 2003 U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, which involves a group of 16 countries that have agreed to take steps to stop the flow of weapons of mass destruction, including boarding ships for inspections.

Rice also said, according to a State Department transcript, that she would discuss relations between Russia and Georgia, a former Soviet republic. The relationship has withered in recent months over several issues, including Russian support for separatists in Georgia.

"I think we've been clear with both sides that cooler heads need to prevail here," she said.

The State Department official said that in the meeting with Novaya Gazeta, Rice wanted to show support for Politkovskaya's family, the newspaper and the remaining independent media in Russia.

There was no intent to insult Putin, he added.

"We certainly didn't plan it as a poke in the eye, but an absolutely necessary and human step," he said. Politkovskaya was born in the United States when her father was a Soviet diplomat at the United Nations, and she held dual Russian and American citizenship. She made her career in Russia, achieving prominence for her coverage of human rights abuses in war-torn Chechnya.

The journalist's son, Ilya Politkovsky, 28, was present at the meeting.

"I was touched to the soul to see how Condoleezza Rice, both as a person and a politician, found precise, delicate and tactful words to express her deep sorrow and sympathy in front of the slain journalist's son," said Dmitry Muratov, editor of Novaya Gazeta. He declined to comment further on what Rice said about political issues or press freedoms, or to allow the release of a transcript before the next edition of his newspaper, which comes out Monday.

In her comments to reporters en route to Moscow, Rice cast doubt on reports in South Korean and Japanese media claiming that North Korean leader Kim Jong Il had told a Chinese envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, that Pyongyang was contrite about the test and had no plan to explode a second nuclear device.

"Councilor Tang did not tell me that Kim Jong Il either apologized for the test or said that he would not ever test again," Rice said.

DOJ_NMG_0084597

Rice said that China's vote in the Security Council in favor of sanctions against North Korea marked a "very unusual and quite significant" step by Beijing.

"I don't think that there is any doubt that Chinese attitudes about North Korea are evolving," Rice said. "I cannot conceive of even a short time ago China agreeing to call North Korea's behavior a threat to international peace and security."

david.holley@latimes.com

Thugs Pillage Moscow Art Gallery, Beating Its Activist Owner (NYT)

By Sophia Kishkovsky

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 21 — A group of men burst into a contemporary art gallery here Saturday, destroying work by an ethnic Georgian artist and beating up the owner, Marat Guelman. Mr. Guelman is well known both for his display of politically inspired and irreverent art and, most recently, his public attacks on neofascists for their dislike of non-Russians and of Western influence on Russian society.

Mr. Guelman said the attack was carried out by 10 men who looked like skinheads. The attack was the latest incident to raise troubling questions about xenophobia and freedom of expression in Russia.

On Friday, Russian officials seized 11 pieces of art that Mr. Guelman had exhibited. The art was on consignment to a London gallery owner, Matthew Bown, who was taking the pieces out of the country when he was detained at Sheremetyevo-2 airport on Friday.

The photo collages that were seized included one depicting President Vladimir Putin, President Bush and Osama bin Laden lounging in boxer shorts and another of a veiled suicide bomber with her skirt held up to reveal racy lingerie.

Mr. Bown was allowed to leave for London, but the artwork was not released.

It is unclear whether the seizure of the artwork on Friday and the attack on the gallery were related, coincidence or driven by news about the airport seizure on the radio and the Internet. Mr. Guelman has made a fair number of enemies this year because of his public criticism of neofascists and nationalists.

He is now on a list of “enemies of Russia” that is being circulated on the Internet by Russian neofascists.

Anna Politkovskaya, the journalist who was gunned down in her apartment building on Oct. 7, was also on the list, as are many prominent human rights advocates. Ms. Politkovskaya made her name as a searing critic of the Kremlin and its policies in Chechnya.

Mr. Guelman has also angered Russian Orthodox fundamentalists with his criticism of their influence on politics and for displaying artwork they consider antireligious. Although he has long cultivated connections with the Kremlin, he has been increasingly critical of Mr. Putin.

It was also unclear whether the attack on the gallery and the Georgian art was related to anti-Georgian sentiment that has surged this fall.

Tensions between the Kremlin and President Mikheil Saakashvili of Georgia led to a crackdown on Georgians in Russia this month. The government has accused some Georgian-owned businesses of violating health or other regulatory standards and has deported hundreds of ethnic Georgians deemed to be in Russia illegally.

In a telephone interview on Saturday evening after he was released from the hospital, Mr. Guelman said he had been treated for a broken nose and other injuries.

He said 10 men dressed in dark blue and wearing hats and heavy boots charged into the gallery at around noon, forced the employees against a wall, seized their phones and then proceeded to vandalize the artwork and attack him.

“They started to beat me with their shoes, with chairs,” he said. “Then they threw a computer at me. It was awful.”

He said pieces of graphic art by Alexander Djikia, a Moscow-based ethnic Georgian artist who has lived in the United States, were destroyed and paintings by him were damaged. Mr. Djikia could not be reached for comment.

The official RIA Novosti news agency said Saturday that the Moscow prosecutor’s office had opened a criminal investigation into the gallery attack.

DOJ_NMG_0084598

Aleksandr Brod, the director of the Moscow Bureau of Human Rights, which tracks xenophobia and hate crimes in Russia, said the attack on Saturday highlighted troubling currents. Mr. Brod is also on the list of "enemies of Russia."

"Such demonstrative attacks on famous people are becoming the norm," he said. "This is a big misfortune and serious grounds for the authorities to stop and think," he said.

In Anti-Immigrant Mood, Russia Heeds Gadfly's Cry (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 21 — Aleksandr A. Belov found wide publicity last year when the organization he created gave a cash award to a Russian woman accused of stabbing an Armenian taxi driver to death. During her trial, covered with lurid relish by the news media, she testified that the driver had tried to rape her.

"She rid Moscow of a rapist," Mr. Belov told a radio station at the time. Not just a rapist, however: a rapist from abroad. He went on to assert that half of all serious crimes were committed by immigrants, the issue at the heart of his personal mission and, by all appearances, his growing public prominence.

A court convicted the woman, Aleksandra Ivannikova. But the verdict was later overturned after a public outcry amplified in no small part by Mr. Belov and the group he started four years ago, the Movement Against Illegal Immigration.

Now after years on the fringes of polite conversation, Mr. Belov's views — unabashedly hostile to foreigners, at times unflinchingly racial in character — are no longer just tapping a nativistic undercurrent, but moving into the mainstream of the political debate. Or perhaps the mainstream is moving toward them.

"The president has made statements in the last couple of weeks that are practically identical to what we were calling for a year ago," Mr. Belov said in a lengthy interview on Wednesday, referring to President Vladimir V. Putin. "I cannot say that our group directly influenced the president, but we identified this problem earlier."

The problem, in his view, is immigrants, almost all of them former comrades of the Soviet Union, divided now not only by new borders but also by religion and ethnicity.

Like immigrants everywhere, they have come in search of work. And as elsewhere, their presence has fueled resentment, cultural clashes and, especially here in Russia, a wave of racial violence that has included at least 39 racially motivated killings this year, according to Sova, an organization that monitors hate crimes.

On Oct. 5, Mr. Putin gave such simmering feelings a public endorsement, denouncing the "semi-gangs, some of them ethnic" that control Russia's wholesale and retail markets, where many migrants work. He said markets should be regulated "with a view to protect the interests of Russian producers and population, the native Russian population."

Mr. Putin's remarks echoed complaints voiced widely last month in Kondopoga, a small mill town in northern Russia. A bar fight there ended with the deaths of two ethnic Russians and led to mass protests and ultimately a violent rampage on Oct. 2 that destroyed markets and other businesses owned by Chechens and other immigrants, who fled the town in fear. A common grievance heard afterward was that the newcomers had criminally cornered the city's markets.

"Criminal groups play a major role in markets," Mr. Putin said a month later. "And all of this results in our citizens being rightly indignant."

In Kondopoga that day, standing and holding a microphone, was Mr. Belov. His exact remarks — whether he called for the expulsion of the migrants or not — remain a matter of dispute, but he is unapologetic about what unfolded there.

"Russians are a sufficiently tolerant people," he said during the interview, conducted in a Japanese restaurant in southern Moscow. "We have lived a long time with a huge number of people. We are like a family. And one day the mother-in-law comes to visit, and everything is fine. But then the mother-in-law brings her brother, her mother, uncles, aunts. Then they decide to live forever in your apartment. And you have to say, 'Mother-in-law, you cannot come to visit anymore.' "

Mr. Belov is 30, part of the first post-Soviet generation in Russia, a country that is still struggling, in a way, to define itself and its ideology. The Soviet Union endeavored to erase ethnic and racial boundaries, at least officially. And its collapse gave rise to a new Russian nationalism, founded on the language, culture and history of the Russian Empire, on the Orthodox Church and on an abiding preoccupation with ethnic identity.

DOJ_NMG_0084599

He said Russia, despite its ethnic diversity, was never a country open to immigration or assimilation, but rather an empire that conquered others, who then had to adapt to the majority's values. "Russia is not, like the United States, a country that was founded by immigrants," he said. "It was founded as a nationalist state."

Post-Soviet Russia has produced other nationalists. Some are blatant racists operating in the shadows. Some are members of religious or social organizations. Still others are politicians, most notably the leader of the Liberal Democratic Party, Vladimir V. Zhirinovsky, a former presidential candidate known for his clownish antics and expressions of xenophobia.

Mr. Belov is far less flamboyant and, he said, uninterested in politics — or at least becoming a politician. "Elections in Russia," he said, "are just a formality." Instead, he vows to throw his support to any party that "subscribes to our views."

He grew up in Moscow, the son of parents who worked in science. He has spent his working life in civic groups. He was a member of Pamyat, an ultranationalist organization that emerged in the chaos of the Soviet collapse but has since faded from public view, with many of its leaders jailed for anti-Semitic statements and acts. His family name was originally Potkin, but he changed it, he said, to disassociate himself from his previous position at Pamyat. (Belov is derived from the Russian word for white.)

Mr. Belov argues that his cause is not based on race, but solely on the issue of immigration, and the illegal sort above all. He created the Movement Against Illegal Immigration in 2002 in response to racially charged incidents in small cities near Moscow: a gang rape in Khimki blamed on immigrants; and a fight between immigrants and local residents in Krasnoarmeisk.

For a time, the group, known here by its initials in Russian as D.N.P.I., existed largely in cyberspace. Its members railed against immigrants and their crimes, but also against citizens of Russia, especially those from Chechnya and the Northern Caucasus, a predominately Muslim region. ("In the Caucasus, people live on a different civilizational level of development," Mr. Belov said.)

Raising money online and gathering political support among like-minded politicians, the group has become more organized. It now claims thousands of members in branches across all of Russia. Last November, at the time of Ms. Ivannikova's acquittal, Mr. Belov's group joined others in a mass demonstration in Moscow on a newly created holiday known as Day of National Unity.

Rights organizations denounced the march as an ugly expression of hate and a mockery of the holiday, which replaced the old one commemorating the Bolshevik Revolution.

The authorities also appeared shocked by the crowd and the message, though they had granted a permit for the rally.

A year later, at Mr. Putin's directive, the authorities have begun the most aggressive campaign against immigrants to date.

The arrests of four Russian military officers for spying in Georgia last month precipitated a wave of harassment against Georgians living here.

The authorities have closed casinos, restaurants and markets where Georgians worked and deported hundreds of Georgians, including more this week, saying they were here illegally.

The anti-Georgian campaign has roots in the Kremlin's hostility to Georgia's politics and its president, Mikheil Saakashvili, of course. Its results, however, fit seamlessly with Mr. Belov's prescription for what ails Russia.

Mr. Belov and the movement have not been fully embraced by the authorities.

Dozens of the movement's members have been arrested for holding unsanctioned protests; Mr. Belov himself was detained briefly in July.

The group has applied for a permit to hold another Day of National Unity march, but has not yet received one.

Mr. Belov said the Kremlin feared all public protests, wary of what he called "this mythical orange revolution," referring to the mass protests in Ukraine in 2004 that overturned a fraudulent election.

"The government," he said, "should not be afraid of its own people."

Georgia Denies Military Plan (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084600

Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili on Saturday ruled out the use of force to establish control over two pro-Russian separatist regions.

He also said Tbilisi remained open to dialogue with Moscow to reduce tension that has escalated since the former Soviet republic temporarily detained four purported Russian spies last month.

"We certainly, absolutely, categorically are not starting any military confrontation," Saakashvili said.

His comments were a rebuttal to Russian President Vladimir V. Putin's assertion Friday at a summit with European Union leaders that Georgia was planning to take back South Ossetia and Abkhazia by military means.

Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which broke away from Georgia's control during bloody wars in the early 1990s, receive strong Russian backing. Many residents in both regions hold Russian passports. Fears are strong that the escalating tensions between Moscow and Tbilisi could trigger an outbreak of violence that could draw in the entire volatile Caucasus.

Putin sidestepped European appeals for moderation on Georgia. "The situation is developing in the direction of possible bloodshed," he told reporters Friday. He accused Georgia of trying to take back the two regions "by military means."

Russia Warns Against Iran 'Regime Change' Through UN (AFP)

AFP, October 22, 2006

Russia would oppose any effort to use the UN Security Council to promote a change of regime in Iran, Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov has said in an interview.

"We cannot support and will actively oppose any attempt to use the Security Council to punish Iran or to use Iran's nuclear program in order to promote the idea of regime change" in Tehran, Lavrov said in the transcript of an interview with the Kuwaiti news agency KUNA, released by the Russian foreign ministry on Saturday.

Lavrov added that Russia regarded the threat of nuclear weapons proliferation as an "extremely serious" problem and called on Iran to respect international demands aimed at ensuring that its nuclear program posed no threat in this regard.

"We believe that the Iranian side must finally bow to the constructive proposals that have been made and fully cooperate with the IAEA to answer all currently outstanding questions" about its nuclear ambitions, Lavrov said.

The interview with Lavrov was conducted on Friday and the transcript was released by the foreign ministry as he held talks in Moscow with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who arrived in the Russian capital Saturday on the final stop of a trip focusing on the North Korea crisis.

The United States has accused Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons under cover of a nuclear power program that is being developed with Russia's help. Tehran has consistently denied this charge, maintaining that the program is strictly for energy production, and therefore allowed by treaty.

Lavrov said that the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the UN nuclear watchdog agency, at present had no way of telling whether or not there was a military component to Iran's fledgling nuclear program.

At the same time however, IAEA experts still had several "serious questions" about Tehran's nuclear program, based on their own inspections of Iranian nuclear facilities, that Iranian nuclear negotiators had promised to answer fully.

"We firmly call on our Iranian colleagues to provide these answers as soon as possible," Lavrov said, stressing that it was Iranian nuclear negotiators themselves who had pledged to provide detailed clarifications on a number of points.

"But all this does not mean that the presence of a threat to peace and security can be confirmed. And it is only such a threat that can provide a basis for sanctions," he said.

Lavrov reiterated Russia's position that only IAEA nuclear inspectors had the expertise and the access to determine whether or not Iran's nuclear program did indeed pose a threat, and insisted this idea was at the core of the UN resolution on Iran adopted in July.

Rice Gets Russia Assurances On North Korea Sanctions (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, October 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084601

Russia has indicated it would strictly enforce sanctions on North Korea as US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met top leaders in Moscow at the end of a tour to push for full implementation of the UN penalties in response to Pyongyang's nuclear test.

"It seems clear that the Russians take 1718 seriously," a senior State Department official said Saturday after Rice held talks with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, referring to the UN Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea.

"They talked about tightening some of their controls on the border," the official said, adding: "They are interested in working with us" on the sanctions.

There was no immediate comment from Russian officials on Lavrov's talks with Rice.

Rice was due to hold separate meetings with President Vladimir Putin and Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov, though all of her meetings in Moscow were closed to media.

She arrived in the Russian capital Saturday from China and was scheduled to depart Sunday.

Speaking to reporters aboard her plane en route to Russia, Rice said the purpose of her stop in Russia at the end of a five-day swing that included visits to Japan, South Korea and China was to coordinate tactics to counter the threat posed by North Korea's recent nuclear bomb test.

"The purpose of this visit is to continue the discussions about the North Korean nuclear test and adherence to resolution 1718," Rice said.

"Since Russia is part of the six-party framework, we can talk as we have in other places about the path back to diplomacy should North Korea choose that path. The trip to Moscow really is a continuation of the work with the members of the five parties on the North Korean file."

Rice queried reports that North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il had apologized for the nuclear bomb test his country carried out on October 9 and, according to South Korea's Yonhap news agency, had promised that the country would not conduct a second test.

"I don't know whether or not Kim Jong-Il said any such thing," Rice said.

She said she had heard nothing of the kind in her discussions in Beijing with Tang Jiaxuan, China's special envoy on North Korea who on Thursday became the first foreign official to meet Kim face to face since the October 9 test.

"Tang did not tell me that Kim Jong-il either apologized for the test or said that he would not ever test again."

Lavrov said prior to his meeting with Rice that both the United States and North Korea needed to be flexible in resolving their differences.

"Both sides need to show flexibility," Lavrov said in an interview with the Kuwaiti news agency KUNA, the transcript of which was published on the Russian foreign ministry's website.

Rice's visits to Japan, South Korea and China this week focused on how to implement UN sanctions, which include international inspections of North Korean cargo.

Her talks in Seoul and Tokyo were inconclusive in terms of securing specific promises on implementation of these cargo inspections.

The United States says it wants to prevent the North, which US President George W. Bush has described as part of an "axis of evil," from transferring weapons of mass destruction and nuclear know-how to groups and governments hostile to the United States.

In addition to withdrawing from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty in 2003, North Korea is also on the list of nations that have not joined an international treaty banning chemical weapons.

Rice has been urging nations to vigorously enforce the sanctions and take a hard line on Pyongyang.

Prior to Rice's arrival in Moscow, North Korea said that US joint war games with South Korea, coming in the wake of the recent imposition of fresh UN sanctions, were pushing the region to the edge of war.

The statement, carried by the official Korean Central News Agency, said North Korea possessed a "tremendous war deterrent" and also warned Japan against taking part in any future joint exercises.

"The US is ceaselessly staging DPRK-targeted war exercises in the sky, on the ground and in the sea of the Korean Peninsula and its vicinity," it said, using the initials of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

DOJ_NMG_0084602

"This is a grave provocation driving the situation on the peninsula to the brink of war and a dangerous play with fire aimed at igniting a war against the DPRK," it said, citing one ongoing operation and another war game planned for next week in South Korea.

Although Rice and other US officials insisted that the Moscow visit was about North Korea, Rice also said that she would raise a variety of other issues with her Russian hosts, including controversial regulations for non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and the crisis with Georgia.

Rice Sees Bright Spot In China's New Role Since N. Korean Test (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 21 -- President Bush came into office six years ago deeply skeptical of Chinese intentions, casting doubt on the idea advanced by the Clinton administration that there could be a "strategic partnership" between China and the United States.

Now, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other U.S. officials have begun to depict China's increasingly central role in the administration's myriad foreign policy problems as a significant achievement.

Rice, who arrived here Saturday on the last leg of her mission to galvanize action against North Korea, said she saw "some data points" that suggest China is becoming more of a partner on issues of importance to the United States, though the shift will not "happen in one fell swoop."

There is some evidence of China's shift, but the argument also has the virtue of finding a silver lining in the dark strategic cloud posed by North Korea's test of a nuclear weapon.

Many experts regard North Korea's test as a failure of Bush's nonproliferation policy. Critics have charged that Bush, distracted by Iraq, allowed North Korea to bolt from a Clinton-era agreement on freezing its nuclear programs, build a stockpile of weapons-grade plutonium and finally test a weapon. Bush, unlike President Bill Clinton in an earlier crisis, refused to conduct sustained bilateral negotiations with North Korea and instead set up a somewhat cumbersome six-party negotiating framework hosted by China.

At many points, the United States found itself at odds with other partners in the six-party process, such as China and South Korea, which repeatedly urged the Bush administration to show more flexibility in its tactics. Meanwhile, administration officials were often divided on North Korea policy, with some wanting to engage the country and others wanting to isolate it.

Before North Korea announced it had detonated a nuclear device, some senior officials even said they were quietly rooting for a test, believing that would finally clarify the debate within the administration.

On her trip to Asia this week, Rice has come close to saying the test was a net plus for the United States. She has tried to deflect criticism by saying the test was an affirmation, rather than a failure, of the Bush administration's policy of trying to draw China deeper into negotiations on North Korea.

Noting that North Korea has spent three decades developing a nuclear weapon, Rice said it was "very unusual and quite significant" that China, which has traditionally considered sanctions to be a violation of national sovereignty, supported a tough U.N. Security Council resolution punishing North Korea. The resolution is under Chapter 7 of the U.N. charter, which calls for mandatory sanctions for issues affecting international security.

"I don't care how many times you visited Pyongyang," Rice said, referring to a trip made by then-Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright to the North Korean capital in 2000. "China had to be part of this regime to deal with the North Korea nuclear problem, and you're seeing it. Thirty years ago, you wouldn't have been able to get a Security Council resolution on North Korea, and when you get one it's Chapter 7, it's 15-0 and China's at the center of it. Not bad for a couple years' work."

Rice acknowledged that it was still unclear how hard the Chinese government would push North Korea, although she said China's views on the issue were "evolving." She said China had concerns about North Korea's stability and the prospect of a mass influx of refugees if the government collapses. And though China has always valued the status quo, Rice said: "I don't think that they are making a lot of assumptions about the status quo."

DOJ_NMG_0084603

China is very concerned, for example, that Japan might decide to build a nuclear arsenal in response to North Korea's test. The Japanese government has ruled that out for now. But when Rice visited Tokyo on her first stop, officials there wanted to focus almost exclusively on receiving firm assurances that Japan is still protected by the U.S. nuclear umbrella. The test "had set off a lot of questions that the Japanese were asking about their own security posture," Rice said.

In addition to the North Korea discussions, China is an important participant in the drive to roll back Iran's nuclear program. China also has extensive oil investments in Sudan, which has adamantly rebuffed a U.S.-led push to bring U.N. peacekeepers to Sudan's troubled Darfur region.

In 2005, when China abstained from a U.N. resolution launching a war crimes investigation into atrocities in Darfur, U.S. officials reported that China's state-owned petroleum company immediately erected billboards in Khartoum, the Sudanese capital, attesting to China's friendship with Sudan. But in Rice's talks with Chinese officials Friday, she said she was able to have "more concrete discussions" about how to deal with Sudan, including strategizing on an upcoming meeting of African leaders in Beijing.

U.S. Reaffirms Promise To Defend S.Korea (AP)

By William C. Mann

AP, October 22, 2006

The U.S. is pledging "immediate support" of South Korea as part of a "firm" commitment to defend its ally under America's nuclear umbrella, stronger language than in last year's version of their long-standing policy statement.

Noting North Korea's nuclear test Oct. 9, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and South Korean Defense Minister Yoon Kwang-ung "demanded that North Korea refrain from any further action that might aggravate tensions," according to the joint communique made public Saturday.

Both sides agreed that North Korea's "continued development" of weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles, and the threat of proliferation were "a challenge" to the alliance between the United States and the Republic of Korea, the defense chiefs said in the statement.

It said Rumsfeld "offered assurances of firm U.S. commitment and immediate support" to South Korea, including continuation of the extended deterrence offered by the protective umbrella of the U.S. nuclear arsenal.

By comparison, last year's statement said Rumsfeld "reaffirmed the U.S. commitment to the security" of South Korea and "to the continued provision of a nuclear umbrella" for the U.S. ally.

At their meeting Friday, Rumsfeld and Yoon disagreed over how explicitly the U.S. should say that South Korea is under that umbrella.

The recent North Korean nuclear test has raised South Koreans' concerns about the future of their defense relationship with the United States. Already, there are significant changes in the works as the U.S. reduces the number of its ground troops in South Korea and pulls troops farther from the North Korean border area.

The South Korean delegation sought to persuade Pentagon officials to issue a public statement saying that if the North attacked the South with nuclear weapons, the U.S. would retaliate as if American territory itself had been attacked by nuclear weapons.

U.S. officials resisted, saying that would go beyond what the U.S. normally says publicly about how it would respond with regard to nuclear weapons. For decades, U.S. policy has been deliberately designed to include some ambiguity about the circumstances under which it would use nuclear arms.

Japan is covered by a similar U.S. "umbrella" promise.

The new joint statement said Yoon "expressed appreciation for the close cooperation and steadfast support of the U.S. in the face of North Korean intransigence."

Rumsfeld, at a news conference Friday with Yoon, noted that a public statement is issued each year following the U.S.-South Korean defense talks and that it always reaffirms the provision of a nuclear umbrella for South Korea, consistent with the 1954 U.S.-South Korean defense treaty.

DOJ_NMG_0084604

Rumsfeld said he was unaware of any proposal to change the language, "nor can I imagine how it could be improved upon."

Yoon responded by saying the matter had been discussed extensively in a series of meetings this past week and that he hoped the language on U.S. nuclear protection for South Korea would be different than in years past.

___

On the Net:

Joint statement: http://www.defenselink.mil/news/Oct2006/d20061020uskorea.pdf

Seoul Hesitant To End N. Korea Projects (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, October 22, 2006

South Korea is still sending tourists to a mountain resort in the North and maintaining a joint economic zone, despite pressure to cancel the projects after Pyongyang's nuclear test.

The country has its reasons for refusing to shutter key projects that help keep Kim Jong Il's regime afloat, including competition with China for influence over the impoverished nation.

South Korea and China together account for two-thirds of overseas trade for the communist North, and South Korea hopes to one day reunite the two Koreas.

The U.S. has scoffed at the tourism venture at the North's majestic Diamond Mountain resort, saying the project simply hands money to the North Korean government. Washington also has questioned labor practices in a joint economic zone where North Korean workers provide cheap labor for South Korean firms.

But Seoul has been reluctant to inflame North Korea as it pursues its policy of reconciliation that has led to unprecedented cooperation between the two countries that share a peninsula.

Totally cutting off the joint projects also would mean Seoul would lose influence in the North, leaving the isolated nation wide open for China — the North's No. 1 trade partner and a key source of aid.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said she will not presume to tell South Korea or China how to enforce U.N. sanctions imposed against North Korea after the Oct. 9 underground blast.

But she has called on all nations to cooperate and pointedly noted in a South Korean TV interview Friday that the North "set off a nuclear weapons test right here in South Korea's backyard."

"It is important to use whatever leverage a country feels that it can use to get the North Koreans to make the right choice" to rejoin arms talks and disarm, Rice told KBS in Seoul.

South Korea is keen to maintain stability and not let its unpredictable neighbor spoil its hard-won prosperity built from the ruins of the 1950-53 Korean War. Today's South Korea is a high-technology mecca and cultural trendsetter for Asia, proudly proclaiming itself as "Dynamic Korea" in its main tourism slogan.

The inter-Korean projects are part of Seoul's strategy to use trade and exchanges to ensure that success is not wiped out by a war or a chaotic collapse of North Korea. The North has needed foreign assistance to feed its 23 million people since the mid-1990s, when its state-run farm system collapsed after the loss of Soviet subsidies.

But in the wake of the North's first-ever nuclear test, Seoul has faced new calls to cancel the landmark reconciliation projects in line with the U.N. sanctions.

On Tuesday, the U.S. envoy on North Korean human rights, Jay Lefkowitz, warned that unmonitored assistance to the North could prop up a "criminal regime."

China has made increasing economic inroads in the North in recent years, and South Korea has expressed concern that North Korea could become a de-facto Chinese province.

Chinese goods are the dominant products in what passes for "markets" in North Korea, and Chinese tourists visit regularly.

A state-supported Chinese think tank has claimed that two ancient Korean kingdoms were actually Chinese, including the Koguryo dynasty that reigned from 37 B.C. to A.D. 668 in an area that stretched from the Korean peninsula to Manchuria in northeast China. Koguryo is viewed by Koreans as the origin of their nation, and its name forms the root of today's "Korea."

DOJ_NMG_0084605

China had its fingers in Korean politics going back centuries, under the tributary system in place across east Asia.

The idea that China is staging a shadow campaign to maneuver for position after a North Korean collapse rattles intensely nationalistic Koreans, who have seen their tiny peninsula survive as a nation despite being surrounded by massive powers. They also keenly remember decades of Japanese occupation in the early 20th century, which ended with the heart-rending division of the peninsula.

Despite appearing to vacillate in the face of U.S. demands to comply with U.N. sanctions, Seoul's reluctance to back out of its projects with North Korea could be a way of signaling strength — and ensuring that Koreans will have a land to call their own for centuries more.

___

Burt Herman is chief of bureau in Korea for The Associated Press.

Envoy's Tirades Elicit Chuckles At U.N. (WT)

By Damien Mcelroy, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- Diplomats at the United Nations dread the arrival of North Korean Ambassador Pak Gil-yon at the microphone.

Known sarcastically as Dr. Chuckles for his highly-strung manner, he is a master of florid tirades.

"He just comes in and tells us how Pyongyang is defending itself from terrible aggression and then flounces off," a diplomat said. "We never get anything worthwhile out of him."

The United States and North Korea do not have diplomatic relations, but Pyongyang has posted officials to New York to represent it at the United Nations.

As negotiations drag on over sanctions after its nuclear test, Mr. Pak has scurried around the corridors of the U.N. building, condemning moves to adopt sanctions, claiming instead that the world should congratulate North Korea's scientists.

In exchanges notable for their harsh tone, Mr. Pak has threatened more nuclear tests.

Cornered by Korean reporters, he screamed: "Do I have to repeat the same story again and again? We will do everything."

The ambassador's performance has done nothing to salvage the already low reputation of North Korean diplomacy.

North Korean embassies, outposts of the ruling Workers' Party, are notorious as linchpins of lucrative drug-running and money-laundering activities.

In a decade, there have been 50 criminal cases involving North Korean diplomats uncovered by law-enforcement authorities worldwide. Diplomats have been arrested in or thrown out of Egypt, China, Russia, Germany and Bulgaria.

David Asher, a former State Department adviser, said Pyongyang expected its embassies to funnel funds back to the ruling party.

"North Korea is perhaps the only country in the world whose embassies and overseas personnel are expected to contribute income to the party center, not rely on central government funds for their operations," Mr. Asher said.

Even in the depths of its stiffest challenge, the country's unending taste for intrigue has been on display.

Until earlier this month, Mr. Pak's deputy, Han Song-ryol, was the mission's spokesman. But he has been silenced and recalled to Pyongyang.

In contrast to his ebullient leader, Mr. Han morosely refused to comment.

"I do not have the right to talk because I will soon leave this position," he said prior to his departure.

Tension, Desperation: The China-North Korean Border (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

NORTH KOREA'S porous 880-mile border with China is its lifeline to the outside world. About 39 percent of its trade last year was with China, which, critically, supplies it with 80 to 90 percent of its oil. Trafficking in money transfers and human beings also flourishes.

DOJ_NMG_0084606

By contrast, North Korea's border with Russia is 11 miles and heavily guarded; the 150-mile-long demilitarized zone with South Korea has hundreds of thousands of soldiers on each side. Until now, the North's ships have regularly visited Japan, from which relatives sent cash and goods, but North Korea's nuclear test is expected to end that trade.

For China, the bottom line is to erect the right number of fences, as it did along the border city of Dandong recently. Build too few and you invite instability in China. Build too many and North Korea collapses.

A collapse is clearly something Beijing doesn't want, and why it is lukewarm toward harsh sanctions. A collapse might send more North Koreans into China than the 100,000 to 300,000 estimated to have flooded the border during the North's great famine in the mid- to late-1990's. (Paradoxically, the famine also opened trade links when local North Korean groups formed to barter raw materials for Chinese grain.)

The end of the North Korean state could also bring reunification of the Korean Peninsula under America's ally South Korea, another development Beijing does not want. Also, the border itself could be put into question. South Korea has, in recent years, challenged China over the legacy of Koguryo, an ancient Korean kingdom whose rule extended into present-day China. The region is home to hundreds of thousands of ethnic Korean-Chinese, who face discrimination in China and might be sympathetic toward a reunified Korea making territorial claims.

Send In The Fat Guys (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

A North Korean visiting South Korea once sniffed that all the cars must have been brought in from around the country just to make a good impression for his visit. His South Korean host added dryly that it had been even more difficult to bring in all the tall buildings.

Such interactions with the outside world are the best hope to chip away at North Korean totalitarianism, but we've missed the opportunity because for decades we've conspired with Kim Jong-il to isolate his people.

Lately Americans have been quarreling over who is more to blame for North Korea's nuclear test, Bill Clinton or George W. Bush.

Well, Mr. Clinton inherited a situation that, if it had continued, would have resulted in North Korea having hundreds of nuclear weapons by now, and producing an additional 50 each year. Instead, Mr. Clinton negotiated a deal with North Korea that resulted in it producing not a single ounce of new plutonium in his eight years in office.

In contrast, President Bush inherited that North Korean nuclear freeze and, if he had just left it alone, North Korea wouldn't have produced any new plutonium. But Mr. Bush overruled Colin Powell's efforts to continue the engagement — and so North Korea has churned out enough plutonium on Mr. Bush's watch for perhaps eight nuclear weapons.

But in a larger sense, the North Korean nuclear test — and the fact that Kim Jong-il is still in power — represent a failure not so much of either Mr. Bush or Mr. Clinton, but of decades of bipartisan American policy that aimed to isolate the North.

Look around the world at the regimes we despise: North Korea, Cuba, Burma and Iran. Those are among the world's most long-lived regimes, and that's partly because the sanctions and isolation we have imposed on them have actually propped them up — by giving those countries' leaders an excuse for their economic failures and a chance to cloak themselves in nationalism.

Kim Jong-il sees that the best way to preserve North Korean totalitarianism is in the formaldehyde of its own isolation. In effect, Mr. Kim has placed sanctions on his own country, and we're abetting him.

In the 1970's, North Korea poked its head out of its shell, negotiating with South Korea, seeking foreign investors and sending letters to Jimmy Carter seeking talks. Mr. Carter considered inviting the leaders of North and South Korea to a summit meeting at a place like Camp David — but dropped the idea when his own aides reacted with horror.

Yet if we had held such a meeting, and gradually encouraged trade and other contacts, North Korea's regime might well have collapsed by now. At least, it would have moderated enough that the country would look like China or Vietnam.

I lived in China in the 1980's and 1990's when Communist ideology was collapsing there, and I'm convinced that the best way to undermine North Korea's government would be to send in business executives — overweight ones, if possible. In a country like North Korea, where the government responded to famine by broadcasting a cautionary "documentary" about a man who exploded after eating too much rice, nothing would be more subversive than tubby foreigners.

DOJ_NMG_0084607

Mr. Bush is right that we have to punish North Korea for its brazen nuclear test, and the administration has been sensible and prudent in the last few weeks in devising a series of penalties. But after North Korea drags itself back to six-party talks, we should begin to move away from our long, failed strategy of trying to isolate the world's most isolated country.

In particular, it's a mistake for us to reproach the South Koreans — who have more of a stake than anybody, and who understand the North Koreans better than we do — for operating factories in the Kaesong industrial zone in North Korea.

It's true that those North Korean workers have no rights, and that North Korea will use the hard currency to bolster its military. But those South Korean factories are expected to employ 700,000 workers by 2012.

While North Korea can survive punitive sanctions, I don't think the regime can survive the shock of having 700,000 of its citizens working for South Korean capitalists — and realizing that the southerners are so rich and spoiled that they refuse to eat rice with gravel in it.

The biggest threat to North Korea's regime isn't from American warships, but from the sight of other Koreans dieting, or listening on iPods to love songs, or watching decadent television comedies.

So let's stop helping the Dear Leader isolate his own people.

Radioactive Nationalism (NYT)

By Peter Maass

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

In a classic Mexican standoff, two men point guns at each other's heads. Neither wants to shoot, but each knows the downside of not pulling the trigger first. It is an inherently gripping situation, and Quentin Tarantino's "Reservoir Dogs" offers one of the most memorable examples: in a climactic scene that takes place in a warehouse, three men aim guns at one another, with catastrophe (for macabre laughs) just a twitch away.

We can now thank North Korea's leader, Kim Jong Il, who is credited with directing several movies, for creating a Mexican standoff that outdoes Tarantino but is no postmodern parody; it takes place in the real world. Earlier this month, North Korea announced that it had exploded an atomic bomb, thus becoming the newest and scariest nuclear power in the world. This set off alarms in South Korea, Japan, China, Russia and the United States; all have good reasons to fear North Korea and one another. We now have a Mexican standoff that involves a) as many as six participants, including b) countries that are threatening one another with c) nuclear weapons. Tarantino couldn't invent it.

Yet something — someone — is missing from this semi-apocalyptic drama. Warming his hands over a fire in north Waziristan or wherever, Osama bin Laden, the embodiment of evil in our times, is no more a factor than John Dillinger. True, there are fears that North Korea might try to sell a nuke to Al Qaeda or other terrorist groups. But diplomats are just as concerned that Japan might choose to build a nuclear weapon or two, that South Korea would be tempted to do the same, that China, Russia and the United States will shove against one another and that in the Middle East, Iran will accelerate its nuclear program, leading Saudi Arabia and Egypt to Google "how to build the bomb."

What's happening, in other words, is an old-fashioned clash of nations and national interests, exacerbated, as often happens, by the imperatives of regime survival. The suspicions and alliances date back a century or more, though the weaponry, instead of muskets and catapults, is nuclear. After 9/11, we came to believe that the menace that mattered most was the wrath of religious terror, and our geopolitical lingua franca embraced a new vocabulary to define it — jihad, suicide bombers, asymmetric warfare, nonstate actors. Whatever happened to nationalism and the risky maneuverings of states? Nothing, actually. Kim Jong Il, entering from stage far-left, reminds us that new threats, like Islamic extremism, do not replace old ones.

The Korean peninsula is an ancient hothouse for nationalism and its offshoots; it is also a brilliant example of the uses, abuses and durability of national esteem. The peninsula is sandwiched between China and Japan, which are two of the great powers of modern and not-so-modern history; without their pride and willingness to sacrifice for a common goal, Koreans would speak Japanese or Chinese today. Defiantly, through a millennium or two of attack and occupation, they held on to their language and even their gene pool. When I lived in Seoul in the 1980's, intermarriage, to a Japanese or an American or whomever, was rare and an occasion for scorn or, at best, pity. The taboos are lessening — earlier this year, the government lifted a ban against mixed-race Koreans serving in the military — but as a recent article in The Asia Times noted, "A foreigner, even another Asian, stands out." More so on the other side of the DMZ: not long ago, a North Korean general chastised South Korea for even allowing intermarriage.

DOJ_NMG_0084608

The Korean peninsula was divided into American and Russian zones after World War II — Japan had ruled Korea brutally for nearly a half-century — and was then reduced to cinders by the Korean War. The resurrection of North and South was stunning because they started from utter scratch and without a blueprint or Marshall Plan. Both governments drummed into their people that unless they worked hard and prepared to fight hard, they would be overrun and subjugated by their brother enemies. Each side wanted to prove itself as the true carrier of the Korean torch. The peninsula's division and war was akin to the splitting of a highly charged nationalist atom that unleashed an explosion of directed energy.

The cross-border rivalry provided material not just for political experts but also for Freudian analysts. In addition to postwar spasms of violence — like several attempts by northern assassins to kill South Korea's leaders — the one-upmanship reached the absurd. American soldiers at Panmunjom, the truce village, entertain visitors with a story of how, at the outset of armistice talks in the 1950's, delegations from North and South brought in larger and larger national flags — each side wanted its totem to be the biggest. Eventually, the flags were too large to fit through the doors; physics rather than good sense forced them to agree to modest and identically sized flags.

My three-year sojourn in South Korea was punctuated with iterations of nationalist fervor, some of them charming. There was, in those days, a club that supported Koreans training for stunts that would get them into The Guinness Book of World Records; if memory serves, one hopeful was a man who walked up mountains on his hands. The club's aim wasn't just to help zealous citizens get into the holy book, but to have South Korea itself inscribed as the country with the most world records. This wasn't entirely removed, in its linking of nationalist glory and athletic achievement, from East Germany's effort to legitimize itself, and trump its brother state, by becoming an Olympic power, even if that required doping a generation of athletes (which it did).

Today, even though it has a highly advanced economy — more than 80 percent of South Koreans have broadband Internet access at home, the highest rate in the world — the country has a nearly provincial relationship to its local heroes, like Ban Ki-moon, the foreign minister who will be the next U.N. secretary general. The most famous South Korean of recent times was Hwang Woo Suk, a scientist who in 2004 and 2005 announced breakthroughs in cloning. At home, he was worshiped, a hybrid of Einstein and Madonna. The government awarded him the title Supreme Scientist and gave him millions of dollars. The embrace was so intense that when a television news program reported on unethical conduct in Hwang's lab, the program's sponsors withdrew their ads and the show was temporarily taken off the air. The reporting was accurate — Hwang faked his research. The awards were withdrawn, prosecutors charged him with embezzlement — yet even so, supporters staged rallies, and a Web site in his honor pleads, "Please come back, Dr. Hwang."

In North Korea, nationalism has taken a different course and been put to different uses by a tyranny that exports counterfeit dollars and has been described, with amusing accuracy, as a "Soprano state," after the Mafia family in the HBO series. But until the 1970's, when it began to be hollowed out because of the inherent contradictions of command economics, North Korea was more industrialized and prosperous than South Korea. It has always, and proudly, had the upper hand in a key nationalistic category — foreign troops are not based on its soil. When I visited Pyongyang in 1989 (a long time ago, but North Korea's cryonic rhetoric has changed little in half a century), officials I met were obsessed by two things: the threat posed by American troops on their doorstep and South Korea's cowardly acceptance of these foreigners. It was not unlike, I now realize, the religious fervor with which Islamic conservatives criticized the presence of American troops in Saudi Arabia and the cowardly royal family that welcomed them (when Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990).

The decades-long rotting of North Korea's economy, and thus the erosion of its military power, was a key reason to develop nuclear weapons: nukes are a poor man's defense, cheaper to build and maintain than an army, and a guarantee that you will not be invaded because the stakes are cataclysmic. North Korea's million-man army is poorly equipped and poorly trained, and no match for the smaller but more sophisticated South Korean military, which is augmented by 28,000 G.I.'s on the ground and additional U.S. forces that would come to South Korea's aid if attacked. Nukes are also a great way, if you lead a small, hopelessly poor and violently repressed nation, to get the attention of the rest of the world; rather than being treated like Albania,

DOJ_NMG_0084609

North Korea will be treated like Albania with nukes. The government's English-language announcement boasted that its test came "at a stirring time when all the people of the country are making a great leap forward in the building of a great prosperous powerful socialist nation." This nationalist, and deluded, phrase was in the first sentence.

Because nationalism is more of a collective belief than a particular policy, the positions adopted in its name can evolve, even rotate. Inter-Korean hostility subsided as a result of the "sunshine policy" initiated by former President Kim Dae-jung, who dropped the stance of utter hostility taken by the conservative generals who ruled South Korea from the 1960's until the 1990's. The same national pride that set North and South against each other can also create common ties. Now, instead of regarding the North as a violently psychotic regime, the southern attitude is more along the indulgent yet exasperated lines of "Oh, no, what's our nutty brother done today?" Particularly among South Koreans with no memories of the Korean War — that's now most of the country — yearnings for peace and good relations, as well as anti-Americanism, are stronger than the hostile anti-Communist intent of their fathers and grandfathers. And in the wake of Germany's costly unification, policy makers in Seoul realize that the collapse of the North, which an older generation wished for, would create a high degree of political instability and an enormous financial burden that should perhaps be avoided. This helps explain why Seoul has limited its antinuclear criticism of the North, and why South Koreans aren't rushing for bomb shelters quite yet.

One factor bringing the Koreas together is their shared enmity for Japan. North Korea's tirades against Tokyo are nearly unprintable; the South Koreans are more polite but fervently resolute whenever their prestige is challenged by Japan. In the mid-1990's, when FIFA, the international soccer organization, decided to hold the 2002 World Cup in Asia for the first time, the host-country finalists were South Korea and Japan. The competition was intense beyond belief; among other extravagances, Buddhist monks in Seoul prayed three times a day that their homeland would get the nod. In the end, recognizing that the humiliation of losing to an ancient rival would be too much for either side to bear, FIFA took the unusual step of splitting hosting duties between the two countries. Even then, naming the event was problematic; FIFA called it "World Cup 2002 KoreaJapan," but when Japan printed its tickets, the geographic reference was deleted because Korea came first.

More than any other country, Japan feels threatened by North Korea's nuclear capacities. The brutality of the Japanese occupation of parts of China and all of Korea has not been forgotten in the region nor fully apologized for. The sexual slavery of Korean women during World War II remains an issue the Japanese avoid rather than accept full responsibility for. Of course Japan is linked to China and South Korea in good ways — they are major trading partners, and Japan has been an important source of loans and investment. None want to go to war, and one triumph of the nation-state system is that it is not a suicide pact, though neither is it a foolproof way to keep the peace.

If this sounds familiar — history shaped by the rivalries, interests and missteps of nations rather than terrorists dashing from hideout to hideout — it should. It's the way the world has been ordered and disordered since the emergence of the nation-state and even before, and it did not vanish on Sept. 11, 2001. If anything, traditional powers that kept to themselves in past years are asserting themselves in new ways. Because of an influx of funds for its oil and gas, the Russia of Vladimir Putin is far more aggressive than the shipwreck presided over by Boris Yeltsin. The fast growth of China's economy has increased its appetites for not just greater political clout but also for resources with which to feed its bustling industries. And of course there is Iran, which has not forgotten its Persian history and would not mind recapturing, by becoming a nuclear state, the influence it once had.

In the 19th century, Britain and Russia struggled for control of Central Asia in what was called "the Great Game." In the 21st century, the great game is far more complex, taking place across the globe between an expanding number of actors with a multiplicity of interests and a variety of weapons. Yet certain basic facts — war is an extension of politics, politics are often driven by a need for resources as well as collective feelings of pride or shame — remain much the same in the wake of Sept. 11. We are obliged to focus on Islamism and the terrorist threat it has produced, to study Arabic and the work of Sayyid Qutb, but we should not fail to consult Kennan, Clausewitz or Thucydides either.

The Chinese Go After Corruption, Corruptly (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

BEIJING

DOJ_NMG_0084610

THE corruption scandal in Shanghai that had already taken down one of China's most powerful officials claimed two smaller scalps last week: the chief of the national statistics bureau was fired, and an official with the Formula One racing circuit was hauled in for questioning. The contrast between the statistician and the racing executive may have been incidental, but it underscored the perception, fair or not, that official corruption is everywhere in China.

To some extent, the ruling Communist Party does not disagree.

In an economic boom gilded with excess and profiteering, official corruption is so widespread, and increasingly so brazen, that it is almost taken for granted. The latest World Bank governance survey found that China had seriously backslid in the category of "containing corruption" when much of the rest of the world, if not improving, was basically unchanged on the issue.

President Hu Jintao and Prime Minister Wen Jiabao have warned that corruption threatens the credibility and legitimacy of Communist Party rule and have vowed to stamp it out. But many experts say that truly stamping out corruption would involve the type of broad political reform and a full embrace of the rule of law that the party has long resisted. The current corruption sweep authorized by Mr. Hu in Shanghai and other cities is widely viewed as more of a purge of allies linked to his predecessor, President Jiang Zemin, than an unfettered crackdown.

"The problem with China today is that if you want to pursue corruption, so many people are tainted," said Minxin Pei, a scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington. As a result, Mr. Pei noted, Mr. Hu could never investigate corruption solely on its merits because it would topple so many of his own political allies.

No one truly knows the depth of corruption in China because so much malfeasance goes undiscovered or is covered up by the party. Even so, the information that does reach the public domain is stunning. Last year, the party committee responsible for internal discipline investigated more than 147,000 corruption cases, most handled outside the legal system. The People's Supreme Court reported that more than 10,000 officials were convicted of corruption charges in the first six months of this year. Chinese newspapers regularly carry stories about the latest arrests or executions with details about officials using government money to pay for prostitutes, luxury homes, extravagant meals and vacations.

Some accounts seem out of Dickens: a cadre with the Chinese Federation of Cripples is sentenced to prison for stealing about $12,000 that was to have been used to organize the Congress of Chinese Cripples. An accountant with a nursery school run by the state-owned China Northern airline is caught stealing roughly $15,000, including the children's lunch money.

The Communist Party is trying to send a signal to rank-and-file members that corruption must be reined in, partly because of rising public anger over abuses like officials' illegally seizing land from farmers or razing blocks of apartments to clear land for developers. In these cases, officials typically pay meager compensation to farmers and tenants but then reap enormous profits by selling to the developers.

"There is a long tradition of corruption," said Andrew H. Wedeman, a China specialist at the University of Nebraska who is researching a book on the link between corruption and development in China. "But in this transitional period, the stakes have gone way up."

The transitional period is China's shift to a market economy, in which party officials at all levels, operating under minimal oversight, often control whether someone can get land, or a needed license or purchase order. The Ministry of Commerce has estimated that 4,000 officials have fled overseas in recent years with roughly $50 billion in embezzled money. In 2005 alone, an expert in the National Audit Office found, $35 billion in state funds was misappropriated.

Mr. Wedeman said higher amounts of money at stake have corresponded to corruption seeping into higher levels of government. He noted that the number of officials at the county level or higher prosecuted for corruption had tripled in the last decade, to almost 3,000. By one count, 20 officials at the ministry level of the central government have been arrested since 2002.

Official corruption also has contributed to the deepening moral vacuum and cynicism felt by many ordinary Chinese when making money is paramount. Petty corruption is commonplace. Peddlers sell fake expense-account receipts outside train stations. Doctors demand "red envelope" payments from patients. Graduate students bribe scholarly journals to publish their work.

"The problem is that ordinary people don't believe there is anything in place to control the power that officials have," said Zhang Jiansheng, 53, a retired soldier who owns a small teahouse in the provincial capital of Yinchuan. He added: "People are in search of material comforts now. That spirit of helping each other is not as strong."

DOJ_NMG_0084611

The government responds largely with propaganda campaigns, like the recent "Eight Honors and Shames" theme promoted by Mr. Hu to encourage upright behavior and discourage deceit. Some older people like Mr. Zhang appreciate the effort. But many people, particularly the young, regard such campaigns as cynical efforts to avoid meaningful changes — like political reform.

To some extent, the corruption problem is not atypical for the country's stage of development, some analysts say. In ratings by Transparency International, the global civil society organization fighting corruption, China ranks in the bottom half of the world, though not the very bottom. Daniel Kaufmann, an author of the World Bank governance survey, said that China had steadily declined in the bank's corruption ranking.

"It is pertinent to ask the question of whether the measures and approaches being implemented are the most effective ones," he said.

Mr. Kaufmann is one of many experts who contend that any country trying to curb corruption inevitably benefits from a freer press and greater government transparency. Corruption is hardly a secret in China, and cases are reported and investigated in some newspapers. But the lines are clearly drawn. No newspaper would dare independently investigate a high official in the central government. At the local level, officials commonly censor corruption reports. The scrutiny is so great that a minor government official in southwest China was arrested for writing a satirical poem about corruption and sending it to friends by e-mail and text message.

China's legal system also is curtailed. The overwhelming majority of corruption cases are never presented to prosecutors but are instead handled by party investigators. And when cases are handed over to the courts, analysts say, the party often recommends the punishment.

The Shanghai investigation is a case in point. Under Mr. Hu's orders, the powerful party boss Chen Liangyu, also a member of the ruling Politburo, was arrested last month on allegations that he misused city pension funds for speculative real estate deals and other ventures. Notably, he was detained not by the local police or prosecutors but by an investigative team sent down from Beijing by the party's Central Inspection Discipline Commission. It is a reminder that often the Communist Party opts to address corruption outside the law.

Egypt, Under Stress, Sees U.S. As Pain And Remedy (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

CAIRO, Oct. 20 — Faced with twin political threats — a rising Islamic movement at home and diminished influence throughout the region — Egypt is pressing the United States for an aggressive promotion of Palestinian statehood as a means of strengthening itself and other Arab governments allied with Washington, senior officials say.

Egyptian officials told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on her recent visit here that the United States should move straight "to the endgame," with a major policy initiative tackling the most contentious Palestinian issues: borders of a future state, the site of the capital, and the so-called right of return for Palestinian refugees.

Whether Washington agrees — a senior Egyptian official with first-hand knowledge of the conversation said Ms. Rice seemed to be listening — Egypt's request is evidence of growing concern and frustration here. The leadership is showing signs of vulnerability, and in large measure it has blamed American actions in the Middle East for many of its problems, from the rise of Iran as a regional power to the growing popularity of political Islam.

Egyptians and other Arab leaders who are friendly with the United States see a major regional peace initiative by Washington as the first necessary step toward stealing momentum from Islamic groups, officials here said. In Egypt, however, optimism is limited that Washington will put the stated interests of its Arab allies ahead of the perceived interests of Israel.

"There is a realization that strategic estrangement in the post-Iraq period has been harmful to both sides," said Abdel Moneim Said, the director of Egypt's premier research center, the Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies, and a member of the governing National Democratic Party. "Both are going through a series of reassessments of their positions."

Egypt itself is in a moment of political twilight, so the regional and domestic challenges it faces appear magnified. The situation is delicate, and officials interviewed spoke only on condition of anonymity.

DOJ_NMG_0084612

While its critics say the government's own failure to combat poverty, corruption and political oppression is to blame for its weakened state, officials say the United States has undermined them. The invasion of Iraq has put Baghdad into Iran's orbit; the insistence on democratic elections allowed Hamas to gain power in the Palestinian areas; and, more recently, the refusal to press for a speedy end to Israel's bombardment of Lebanon helped lionize Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the leader of the militant group Hezbollah.

Add to the mix the fact that President Hosni Mubarak is 78 and has ruled Egypt for 25 years. Increasingly, it appears he is trying to pave the way for his son Gamal to inherit the presidency. But there is no consensus among the ruling elite. Some are concerned that the son would lack legitimacy unless selected through a free and democratic process, which Egypt has shown no hint of supporting.

And there is no certainty that the military would go along with the president's son, who would be the first president from outside the armed forces since the monarchy was overthrown in 1952.

For all the hand-wringing, experts agree that a sudden political crisis is unlikely in Egypt, or at least not the kind that would lead to an Islamist-led revolution. But the confluence of internal uncertainty and external pressures has affected Egypt's policies, and its regional influence.

For example, despite repeated efforts, Egypt has been powerless to stabilize the conflict between the main Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah. In the past, Egypt's security services were influential, and effective, in the Palestinian areas.

On the domestic front, Egyptian officials have stepped up repression as a means to blunt the rising popularity of the Muslim Brotherhood, locking up its leaders without charge. There also is talk of amending the Constitution to avoid the embarrassing prospect of only one candidate for president, but in such a way as to prohibit any independent candidates aligned with the Brotherhood. The group has been the only credible opposition.

In its foreign relations, for the first time in nearly three decades Egypt is trying to improve business ties with Russia, and President Mubarak plans to visit China next month. Top government and party officials have also made aggressive public statements aimed at embarrassing, or challenging, the United States. In one notable scene when Ms. Rice was in Cairo, she and the Egyptian foreign minister, Ahmed Aboul Gheit, appeared together at a news conference beamed live around the world.

"I've spoken about Ayman Nour each time that I meet with my Egyptian counterpart," Ms. Rice replied when asked by a reporter if she was still pushing for the release of Mr. Nour, the imprisoned opposition political leader.

"You didn't raise it today," Mr. Aboul Gheit interjected without hesitation.

But these efforts, the moves toward Russia and China, and the aggressive public remarks from officials mask a reality that is driving the government to press the United States to become more engaged in the Arab-Israeli peace effort.

"You can't have a deal in the Middle East without the Americans, regardless of the judgment we carry," one government official said.

Many people, inside and outside government, say the roots of the government's problems lie more in its domestic failures than in outside pressure. Although Egypt's government has moved to improve macroeconomic policies, for example, a vast majority of this nation of 70 million live in deep poverty.

While they talk about moving toward democracy, Egyptian authorities have canceled elections, prohibited the creation of new parties and locked up political opponents. "The state is failing to meet its most basic responsibilities, starting with providing clear drinking water," said Mustapha Kamel, a political science professor at American University in Cairo. "There is a feeling the ruling team does not have a good vision for dealing with the problems of the country."

The popularity of political Islam in Egypt, many political analysts said, is not a result of the Palestinian crisis. "It is not because the Brotherhood is religious, but because the public is fed up with the ruling party and their promises," said Abdallah al-Ashaal, a former assistant to the foreign minister who now teaches international law and relations at Cairo University.

But Dr. Ashaal did say Egypt — and the United States — would benefit greatly if the Palestinian issue were addressed. "If you find a fair solution to the Palestinian problem, you pave the way for talks with all parties," he said, referring to Syria and Lebanon as well.

DOJ_NMG_0084613

So in an atmosphere of distrust of the United States, officials here are still hoping that Washington will heed their call. “You can’t achieve peace without the United States,” said Hesham Youssef, chief of staff at the Arab League, “but we can’t continue business as usual.”

Abbas Seeks To Curb Hamas In West Bank (AP)

By Josef Federman

AP, October 22, 2006

The Palestinian president brought a security commander out of retirement Saturday to block Hamas from building up its forces in the West Bank, the latest sign that the standoff between the Islamic militant group and Fatah could erupt into widespread violence.

The commander, Ismail Jaber, has been tainted by corruption but is respected by thousands of gunmen loyal to Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement and holds sway over key West Bank commanders.

Abbas has been locked in a power struggle with Hamas since the Islamic group trounced Fatah in parliamentary elections early this year, with control over Palestinian security forces a key aspect of the dispute.

Most of the forces are loyal to Abbas, but Hamas formed its own militia of 6,000 men and deployed it throughout the Gaza Strip, a move that has sometimes led to violent clashes.

Jaber's appointment came a day after Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar, a top Hamas leader, said the Islamic group would beef up its militia in Fatah's West Bank stronghold. A Hamas official said they planned to recruit about 1,500 members there.

Under Abbas' new plan, Jaber will take command of all West Bank security forces, except for three branches that fall under control of the Hamas-run Interior Ministry.

Abbas hopes Jaber will help him curb Hamas' plans in the West Bank, an official close to the Palestinian leader said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the issue with the media.

Adding to Fatah's concerns, Hamas officials said Iran has promised to help train their security forces.

Jaber's appointment marks a turnaround for Abbas. In April 2005, Abbas forced Jaber and other senior officials into retirement as part of his efforts to root out corruption. Jaber was suspected of putting thousands of fictitious names on his payrolls and pocketing the money.

However, Jaber has years of experience and is seen as one of the few people who can unify the pro-Fatah forces in the West Bank, which have been riven by infighting and rivalries.

Jaber, who is in his 60s, was a top commander for the Palestine Liberation Organization in Lebanon during the 1980s, and later followed the late Yasser Arafat to the West Bank after the interim peace deals with Israel in the early 1990s. He served as Arafat's national security adviser and police chief in the West Bank.

Jaber also has influence over parts of the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a violent but decentralized group of gunmen loosely linked to Fatah.

On Friday, Al Aqsa leaders from four large refugee camps in the West Bank met in the city of Nablus to discuss the threat posed by Hamas.

"We decided there will be no Hamas force in the West Bank. We won't let them do what they did in Gaza," said one of the commanders, Nasser Abu Aziz. "Every Hamas policeman will be in our sights."

Both Hamas and Jaber face difficult tasks. Hamas' power base in the West Bank is much smaller than in Gaza. The Fatah-dominated security forces, meanwhile, are largely in disarray, and it is unclear whether Jaber will have the funds or organizational abilities to impose order.

Jaber did not return a message seeking comment. In Gaza, Hamas officials declined comment on the appointment.

But the appointment was likely to add to growing tensions. Some 17 people have died in Palestinian infighting in recent weeks, and on Friday, Fatah-aligned gunmen opened fire on Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's convoy, causing no injuries.

The violence stems from a political standoff between Abbas and Hamas over international calls for the Islamic group to renounce violence and recognize Israel.

DOJ_NMG_0084614

Abbas, a moderate who was elected separately last year, has urged Hamas to accept the demands in order to get international sanctions lifted. Hamas refuses to give in, despite widespread hardship caused by the sanctions.

In new violence Saturday, members of the Palestinian security forces fired in the air in Gaza City's main shopping district and burned tires near Abbas' home to press demands for the payment of salaries on the eve of a major Muslim holiday. The three-day Eid el-Fitr holiday begins early next week, and children are traditionally given new clothes and toys.

A similar protest by unpaid security men near the Nusseirat and Bureij refugee camps in central Gaza erupted into an armed battle with Hamas gunmen early Sunday. Witnesses and hospital officials said a well-known Fatah activist was killed, and three people were wounded.

Because of the sanctions, the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority has been largely unable to pay the salaries of 165,000 civil servants, including 80,000 members of the security forces, since it came to power in March.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Hamas should be given more time to meet international demands to renounce violence and recognize Israel.

"Demanding now that Hamas fully accept the Quartet's conditions, such as the recognition of Israel, the denunciation of violence against Israel, and the acceptance of all existing agreements is unrealistic at the present stage," Lavrov told the Kuwaiti news agency KUNA on Friday.

For Multiculturalist Britain, Uncomfortable New Clothes (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

LONDON

RARELY has Britain's struggle to define its relationship with a disaffected and diverse Muslim minority seemed so fraught as it was last week, with the debate fixated on where a woman can wear a flimsy, kerchief-size item of Islamic dress called the niqab, the full-face veil.

The discussion, intensified by Prime Minister Tony Blair's calling the veil "a mark of separation,'' is not simply about dress. It seems to signal a broader shift as non-Muslim Britons set new limits of tolerance, not just for recent immigrants but for a younger, home-grown generation of more assertive British Muslims.

Among some of those who have long favored tolerance for individual choice, there is a ginger step toward the notion that the right of the group might trump the right of the individual under more circumstances, even as they are hard-pressed to say exactly why they are drawing the line at the niqab, beyond its being a matter of "communication."

For 40 years, Britain has nurtured a policy of multiculturalism celebrating ethnic diversity and its emblems. That policy evolved in the 1960's, at a time when Muslim immigrants, largely from Pakistan, arrived to take menial jobs. Now, Britons are confronted with the sometimes alienated descendants of that first generation — like three of the four Londoners last year — people born in the country, raised in its schools and newly drawn to a re-examination of their ancestors' faith.

A blame-game question is emerging: Who is responsible for the widening gulf between majority and minority?

Along with Mr. Blair's comment, a Conservative opposition figure, David Davis, said some British Muslims had set themselves on a course of "voluntary apartheid," leading parallel lives outside the mainstream. The inference was that multiculturalism had failed.

The counterargument emerged at a labor tribunal in Yorkshire where Aishah Azmi, 24, a teaching assistant, challenged a school board's decision to suspend her from teaching because she wore the full veil.

"Muslim women who wear the veil are not aliens," Mrs. Azmi said at a news conference after the tribunal found that she had not been discriminated against or harassed, though it concluded that she had been made to feel like a victim. This split ruling left her ultimate return to the school, veiled or not, uncertain. "Integration requires people like me to be in the workplace so that people can see that we are not to be feared or mistrusted," she said.

But those who have opposed the wearing of the niqab, like Jack Straw, the Labor Party veteran who is leader of the House of Commons, argue that it prevents communication. They point out that, while the Muslim head-scarf — the hijab — allows the face to be seen, the niqab reveals only the eyes. In school, opponents of the niqab argue, particularly in language lessons, students cannot see the face of the teacher to follow what she is saying.

DOJ_NMG_0084615

Of course, the niqab is not the only item of clothing used to express a distinctive notion of piety. There's the Sikh turban, the nun's wimple, the Hasidic Jewish man's black hat and side curls. None of those — not since the battle of Sikhs to wear their turbans at work in the 1970's — has been so singled out.

But the niqab is the only item that completely masks its wearer. In much of the Muslim world, it is part of a pervasive culture dictating that women show their faces only to other women, or to men in their families. In Britain, it has come to offer an emblem by which Islamic separation may be criticized without challenging the right of 1.6 millions Muslims — fully 3 percent of the population — to practice their faith.

The debate opened this month when Mr. Straw complained that in his constituency office in Blackburn, he felt unable to communicate with women wearing the niqab. "There is a wider issue here," he said. "Communities are bound together partly by informal chance relations between strangers, people being able to acknowledge each other in the street or being able to pass the time of day. That's made more difficult if people are wearing a veil."

His remarks drew broad support among non-Muslims, prompting suggestions that he had used the issue to raise his profile as Labor Party figures maneuver for position after Mr. Blair steps down. Only 22 percent of Britons surveyed in an opinion poll taken afterward said they thought Muslims had done enough to integrate, while 57 percent said Muslims should do more to fit it.

For some it is an uneven debate.

"It's not a neutral conversation," said Salma Yaqoob, a Muslim city councilor in Birmingham. Non-Muslims start from a perception that " 'we have all been victimized as a majority by this awkward minority'; they start from a hostile stance and the Muslims start from a defensive stance."

The full veil, she said, is worn by a "tiny, tiny minority" of Muslim women, some of whom have taken to it after concluding that Islam provides "a sense of identity that gives a framework for their lives." Indeed, it is the very intensity of the debate about Islam, Ms. Yaqoob said, that propels their embrace of it.

"As the context now is so highly politicized, and the Muslims are so much in the headlines, people ask, 'What is this thing we are being demonized for?' " she said in a telephone interview.

Shahid Malik, a Muslim Labor legislator from the same area of Yorkshire as Mrs. Azmi, said he welcomed the debate over the full veil. "If we don't talk about these things, they are stored up for the future," he told reporters in Yorkshire.

"As individuals, all women have the right and freedom to wear what they wish, and rightly so," he said. "However, in certain occupations there are dress codes which employees are expected to adhere to while at work. All right-minded people — Muslim and non-Muslim alike — will agree that in asking a classroom assistant not to wear a veil while in contact with children because it hinders their learning is perfectly acceptable and just common sense. But when your style of dress limits your ability to carry out your role, then the welfare and education of the children must come first."

The paradox is, of course, that Muslims born and raised in Britain are an integral part of the society that seems to reject them. To be accepted, they need to assert their presence, yet in doing so, they fall afoul of pressures to conform to the standards of the non-Muslim majority.

The debate may also exact a toll on that majority. In an interview, David Edgar, a British playwright, said Britain risked losing the "Voltaire principle, which is: I disagree with what you say but I defend to the death your right to say it."

"We are slipping very quickly from saying something I agree with — that the veil is a separatist gesture — to something I profoundly disagree with, which is that it should be banned," he said.

Yasmin Alibhai-Brown, a Muslim who is a columnist for The Independent, sees it a little differently. "What any of us does in our own lives is a private matter — a precious and inalienable right," she wrote. "But once we enter the job market or national and local authority domains, or tread into places where there is interaction with different citizens, privacy and individual choice become contested — quite rightly, for there is such a thing as British society."

Europe's Immigration Quagmire (LAT)

By Ayaan Hirsi Ali, Ayaan Hirsi Ali, A Former Dutch Legislator From Somalia, Now Lives In The U.s., Where She Is A Fello

DOJ_NMG_0084616

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

The continent needs more realistic policies that recognize both immigration's economic benefit and the dangers of Islamism.

IN AFRICA, we sometimes used animals to say things on sensitive issues to avoid discussing the messenger instead of the message. So I shall use the ostrich and the owl to sketch the two most important positions on immigration and pluralism in Europe.

The view of things in Europe today, as the ostrich sees them, is bright. He sees an open market of 450 million people with an amazing potential. He sees a thriving economy and the free movement of people, goods, money and services. Immigration, to the ostrich, can only be viewed as an opportunity for an aging native population. Borders are better open than closed. Islam is a faith like Christianity, and Muslims shall adapt their religion to life in Europe.

According to the ostrich, very soon there shall be a European Islam, signs of which are already visible in the young women in tight jeans; high heels; black, sleeveless, tight tops and matching head scarves, all designed by Prada. This Prada Islam will replace the old rural one and function as a vaccine against the Wahhabi Islam of the Saudis.

The overrepresentation of migrants in all the wrong statistics — such as unemployment, unfinished education and crime — is to the ostrich merely a temporary affair. It's a phase that all groups from underprivileged backgrounds go through, and it will be short, as long as there is economic growth.

According to the ostrich, the wealthy natives should stop whining about the backwardness of immigrants and concentrate on the benefits. The ostrich points to the nurses, nannies, construction workers, grocers, bag carriers, cleaners, factory workers and a host of other jobs natives won't do but are necessary to keep the economy going.

The ostrich is not worried about the flow of migrants transforming the culture and society of Europe in any negative way. He sees only one thing as a setback: the xenophobia of native Europeans. If only the inherently racist white society could overcome its fear of what is alien, it would notice how migrants have improved the cuisine, the music, the arts and the economy of Europe.

Then there's the owl, which is a night bird and gets, more often, a glimpse of the dark side of things. Europe is healthy and wealthy, but the owl worries that it may not be so wise.

The shadow side of the free movement of people, for instance, is the trade in women and children for the ruthless sex industry. Also, weapons go unnoticed from hand to hand, from country to country. Some of these weapons could be biological, chemical or worse.

The old owl sees how poor migrants are exploited by cruel employers who provide little or no pay and hire and fire the migrants at will. The owl can't help but notice that even after the recent amnesty, Spain has an estimated 1 million illegal immigrants. Britain has roughly half a million. France, 200,000 to 400,000, if you trust the French. I think there are more. Germany has about 1 million.

The owl acknowledges unreservedly Europe's aging populations, its decreasing population growth and its need for migrants — but also sees that selection of migrants is not always based on who is useful for the economy.

The owl sees that Islam is not Christianity and that not all Muslims understand or want to share in any European future based on European values of freedom, tolerance and an attitude of live and let live.

The owl sadly looks on as poor kids are taught to view themselves as victims, and the society in which they live as the enemy. He can't help but notice that Muslim migrants are receptive to the seduction of the Islamist movement. Even worse, there are now natives converting to this brand of totalitarianism.

Nor can the owl ignore the growth of the extreme right-wing movements and parties. He fears that the debate on pluralism in Europe will be hijacked by two uncompromising extremes: whites' power fascism and Islamic fascism.

The owl thinks that the ostrich is right: We should always look on the bright side of life. But he also thinks we should be careful not to get delusional.

Foretelling the future can be fun for astrologists and crystal-ball gazers. For academics, it is not. If you get it right, you're damned like Samuel Huntington. If you get it wrong, you're called a certified idiot. So instead of predictions, we draw rough sketches of a best-case scenario and a worse-case scenario.

DOJ_NMG_0084617

In a worst-case scenario, the warnings of the owl will not be heeded. The optimism of the ostrich will be abandoned. The monopoly of force that is now exclusive to states will be challenged by armed subgroups. European societies will be divided along ethnic and religious lines. The education system will not succeed in grooming the youth to believe in a shared past, let alone a shared future.

The European states will find themselves limiting civil liberties. Europeans will come to accept the de facto implementation of Sharia law in certain neighborhoods and even cities. The exploitation of the weak, women and children will be commonplace. Those who can afford to emigrate will do so.

Instead of an ever-growing union in Europe, future generations may witness an ever-disintegrating one.

In a best-case scenario, Europeans will heed the caution of the owl without losing the liveliness of the ostrich. This approach will be translated into a three-dimensional, comprehensive policy.

First, controlled or planned immigration. The European Union will introduce quotas such as those in the U.S., based on the selection of migrants who are beneficial to the economy. The current system in most European countries is designed to attract the highest number of people with truly heartbreaking stories, not the highest number of people who are willing and able to adapt to the European society.

Second, an intervention, sometimes proactive, in Europe's neighboring states or in failed states with conditions that force people to migrate in large numbers. This plan will consist of aid, trade, diplomatic pressure and military intervention, if necessary. That's taboo in Europe at the moment. Right now, the EU selects the countries it wants to aid based on lists provided by the World Bank or the United Nations. The criteria for aid are based on such vague notions as the 100 poorest countries or countries with good governance or some other goody-goody sounding reason. That should change.

